ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

OCCULTISM & PARAPSYCHOLOGY

FIFTH EDITION

Volume ①

A - L

Edited by J. Gordon Melton

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF
OCCULTISM & PARAPSYCHOLOGY

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF OCCULTISM & PARAPSYCHOLOGY

A Compendium of Information on the Occult Sciences, Magic, Demonology, Superstitions, Spiritism, Mysticism, Metaphysics, Psychical Science, and Parapsychology, with Biographical and Bibliographical Notes and Comprehensive Indexes

FIFTH EDITION

In Two Volumes

VOLUME ONE
A-L

Edited by J. Gordon Melton

GALE GROUP

Detroit
New York
San Francisco
London
Boston
Woodbridge, CT

J. Gordon Melton

Gale Group Staff

Jolen Marya Gedridge, Editor
Christy Wood, Associate Editor
Pamela A. Dear, Contributing Associate Editor
Jason Everett, Contributing Assistant Editor
Rita Runchock, Managing Editor

Mary Beth Trimper, Production Director
Evi Seoud, Production Manager
Rita Wimberley, Buyer

Kenn Zorn, Manager, Production Design
Barbara J. Yarrow, Manager, Imaging and Multimedia Content
Tracey Rowens, Senior Art Director
Michael Logusz, Graphic Artist

Datapage Technologies International, Inc., Typesetting

ISBN 0-8103-8570-8 (Complete Set)
ISBN 0-8103-9488-X (Volume 1)
ISBN 0-8103-9489-8 (Volume 2)
Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

VOLUME I

VOLUME II

Introduction

This fifth edition of the Encyclopedia of Occultism & Parapsychology (EOP) continues the tradition established by its predecessors in providing the most comprehensive coverage of the fields of occultism and parapsychology. The first edition, published in 1978, brought together the texts of two of the standard reference works in the field, Lewis Spence's Encyclopedia of Occultism (1920) and Nandor Fodor's Encyclopedia of Psychic Science (1934). Later, editor Leslie Shepard took on the task of updating their observations and supplementing the volume with new entries.

The production of this massively ambitious work was sparked by a heightened interest in psychic phenomena, the occult, witchcraft, and related topics in the 1970s. This interest, which led directly to the New Age movement of the 1980s, provided a continued wealth of material for parapsychologists to examine. It also led to a reaction by a group of debunkers to form the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal. This group believed that they were spokesmen for the scientific establishment.

Defining the Terms

The term "occult" remains suspect in many circles. The word derives from Latin and simply means "to shut off from view or exposure." However, it eventually came to refer to realities specifically hidden from common sight; the occult realm is invisible to the physical eye but can be seen by an inner "spiritual" vision and/or grasped by psychic intuition. The occult is the opposite of "apocalypse," which means "to uncover." The last book of the Christian Bible is alternatively called The Apocalypse or The Revelation. To many religious people, the term occult denotes that which is opposite of what God has revealed; hence, the realm of Satan and his legions of demons. Some substance for this observation has been provided by religious leaders who combine an exploration of the occult with open opposition to the more traditional religions and religious institutions.

As used in EOP, however, occultism stands for (1) the broad area of human experience (now called extrasensory perception, or ESP) that goes beyond the five senses; (2) the philosophical conclusions drawn from consideration of such experiences; and (3) the social structures created by people who have had extrasensory experiences, who attempt to produce and cultivate them, and who believe in their vital significance for human life. Therefore, occultism (or its currently preferred term "paranormal") entails a wide spectrum of experiences—from clairvoyance and telepathy to visions and dreams, from ghost sightings to the pronouncements of mediums and channelers. The paranormal encompasses the phenomenon known as psychokinesis (commonly referred to as "mind over matter")—whether in the dramatic form of levitation or teleportation, or in the more commonly experienced phenomenon of spiritual healing. It also covers experiences related to death, such as out-of-body travel and deathbed visions.

The occult also includes a host of techniques and practices originally designed and created to contact the extrasensory realm. Most frequently associated with the term occult are the techniques of magic and divination (including astrology, the tarot, and palmistry). In addition, various forms of meditation, yoga, and psychic development should be included, as well as some practices more commonly associated with religion, such as speaking in tongues, prayer, and mysticism.

By extension, the occult or paranormal can also legitimately incorporate a legion of mysterious phenomena not obviously extrasensory in nature: anomalous natural occurrences not easily understood or explained by contemporary science. Such phenomena as the Loch Ness monster, unidentified flying objects (UFOs), and Bigfoot, may eventually be attributed to the realm of ordinary sense perception, but their very elusiveness has led them to be associated with the occult.

The Evolution of Occultism

The present-day view of the occult is highly influenced by the history of the paranormal in the West during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Through the seventeenth century, most people believed in the active operation of occult (then termed "supernatural") entities and forces. This belief brought comfort to some; but, for others, it became a source of fear, leading to suffering, and even death, for many. It allowed some people to rule by their reported ability to manipulate supernatural powers, and made it possible for the Inquisition to persecute thousands as witches and Satanists. It also enabled unscrupulous religious leaders to deceive people with sham relics and miracles.

By the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, there began a serious critique of the more questionable supernatural phenomena, beginning with relics and extending to the actions of the witchfinders. As Protestantism secularized (denied sacred value to) the world, and the acceptance of scientific observation and organization of natural phenomena spread, a general spirit of skepticism was created. In the eighteenth century, this skeptical spirit created the first significant movement to challenge the role of the supernatural in human society—Deism.

Deism affirmed the existence of God the Creator, but suggested that God had merely established a system of natural law, leaving the world to govern itself by that law. By implication, God was divorced from the world, and supernatural events did not occur; rather the "supernatural" was merely the misobserved "natural." Furthermore, neither angels nor spirits communicated with humans; and, in turn, prayer did not reach God. Religious spokespersons responded, of course, and popularized a new definition of "miracle"—the breaking by God of his own natural laws to intervene in the lives of his creatures.

Deist thought was largely confined to a small number of intellectual circles, among them some very powerful and influential people, including most of the founding fathers of the United States—Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and George Washington. In the nineteenth century, the skeptical view of the supernatural became the cornerstone of the Freethought movement. This minority movement impacted every level of intellectual and theological thinking at that time. Theologians regularly began their courses with "proofs" of the existence of God; preachers debated village atheists; evangelists strengthened their efforts to reach the godless masses.

In the midst of the debate between traditional religionists and Freethinkers, a few people (known as Spiritualists) proposed a different viewpoint in which the distinction between this life and the life beyond became a somewhat artificial intellectual construct; everything was part of one larger natural world. To demonstrate and prove scientifically the existence of this larger universe, Spiritualists turned to mediums—people with special access to those realms once called the supernatural. Entering a trance-like state, these mediums would bring forth messages containing information that seemingly could not have been acquired by normal means. The mediums' manifestations of a wide variety of extraordinary phenomena seemingly pointed to the existence of unusual forces operating in the physical world, forces unknown or undocumented by the emerging scientific community at the time.

Almost concurrently with the emergence and spread of Spiritualism, a few intellectuals, having close ties to traditional religion, yet imbued with the new scientific methodology, concluded that scientific observation could be used to investigate reports of "supernatural" phenomena, especially reports of ghosts and hauntings. This sparked the formation in 1862 of the Ghost Club in England. During the next two decades, the growth of Spiritualism provided a fertile field for investigation, and in 1882 a new generation of investigators founded the Society for Psychical Research in London to study actual phenomena occurring during Spiritualist seances as well as other incidents of "psychic" phenomena.

The period from 1882 to the beginning of World War II could be described as a stormy marriage between Spiritualism and psychical research by some, while others might call it a scandalous, illegitimate affair. Spiritualism, and the movements it spawned, most notably Theosophy, uncovered the phenomena, which psychical researchers observed, analyzed, and reported on. With an increasingly sophisticated eye, psychical researchers researched, catalogued, experimented with, and debated the existence of psychical phenomena. These researchers understood that psychic events, if verified, had far-reaching implications for the understanding of the world and how it operated.

Over the years psychical researchers amassed a mountain of data and reached a number of conclusions, both positive and negative. On one hand, researchers positively documented a host of basic psychic occurrences (telepathy, clairvoyance and precognition) and compiled a body of evidence that seemed to support human-spirit contact. At the same time, especially though research on physical mediumship, investigators repeatedly discovered that situations involving visible phenomena (materializations, apports, movement of objects) were often fraudulent. The high incidence of deceit and trickery, even by mediums previously investigated and pronounced genuine, created a major dilemma. It challenged the credibility of Spiritualism and, while not suggesting that every medium or member was a fraud, insinuated that the movement protected con artists and defended their work, even in the face of unquestioned evidence of guilt. It also implied that psychical researchers who produced any positive evidence were either naive, sloppy methodologically, or conspirators with the mediums.

Both Spence's Encyclopedia of Occultism and Fodor's Encyclopedia of Psychic Science were published during a time when the interest in physical phenomena was peaking. Spence wrote from a Spiritualist perspective, and was very hopeful that scientists would find the means of proving the validity of physical phenomena. He fully accepted the existence of materializations, teleportations, and apports. Fodor's work, written just a decade and a half later, acknowledged the element of fraud in Spiritualism, while at the same time, retained the prominent psychical researcher's confidence in the larger body of data gathered by his colleagues.

Since Fodor and Spence

Even as Fodor was writing, however, a revolution was starting within the ranks of psychical research. J. B. Rhine, a young biologist, suggested an entirely new direction for research. Psychical research, Rhine noted, had relied mainly upon the studied observation of phenomena in the field, and operated by eliminating possible mundane explanations for what was occurring. Investigators visited ghostly haunts, sites of poltergeist occurrences, and Spiritualist seances and then developed detailed reports of what they had seen and heard. After a half-century, this approach eventually eliminated a good deal of fraudulent phenomena. However, psychical researchers had been unsuccessful in convincing their scholarly colleagues not only of the truth of their findings but of the validity of their efforts. Even though psychical research had attracted some of the most eminent scientists of the era to its ranks, it remained "on-the-fringe." To Rhine, the only way to validate future findings was to bring research into the laboratory. Only such experimental data would then be convincing to the modern, scientifically trained mind.

Superseding the older psychical research approach, Rhine's new methods and early experimental successes provided inspiration for the study of parapsychology. It also furnished a means to build a positive expanding foundation for the field; while, at the same time, it distanced itself from the Spiritualist community and the overwhelming evidence of its widespread fraud. Parapsychology called for a reorganization of research around the primary commitment of building a firm body of experimental data on basic psychic experiences. A few psychical researchers continued the more intriguing work of investigating evidence of survival of bodily death, and for at least a generation, parapsychologists and traditional psychical researchers engaged in intramural warfare. A sort of reconciliation occurred only after parapsychology had proven itself, and psychical research's strong identification with the Spiritualist community had diminished.

Today, laboratory research dominates the scientific study of the paranormal. Psychics, mediums, and channels are still investigated; but they are now invited into the laboratory for close observation—a dramatic change from the days when Spence and Fodor were writing about the paranormal.

During the several generations since Spence and Fodor, the place of both Spiritualism and Theosophy in the larger psychical community has also radically changed. Both groups had wholeheartedly accepted the nineteenth-century scientific perspective as their starting point. In the meantime, science has moved on—quantum mechanics superseded Newton physics, and depth psychology, sociology, and cybernetics emerged on the scene—but the two groups failed to change with it. Consequently, Spiritualism and Theosophy have been pushed aside by a host of competing groups who can work more freely in the post-Newtonian environment. In addition, largely as a result of the New Age movement of the 1980s, metaphysical and occult religions enjoy an acceptability in the West not seen since the scientific revolution. This acceptability is evident in the amount of favorable press given to psychic and occult phenomena.

The New Age and Beyond

The hidden underlying reality described as the invisible spiritual structure of the universe is known as esotericism. This structure is enlivened by the cosmic energy or power that energizes the world at a more abstract level than the various forms of energy defined in classical physics. The esotericist characterizes the reality beyond that depicted by physicists in their observations of the world; these descriptions are termed "meta-physics." Esotericism, in contrast to Bible-based religions and philosophies, is considered a "third force" in Western thought.

The esotericists' approach to life is generated from human experience, in which, people spontaneously encounter psychic and mystic moments, seek magical means of forecasting the future, and act upon intuitive insights that seem to defy rational thought. Beginning with the rise of Christianity in the West, esoteric traditions were routinely persecuted, with many of its representative communities destroyed and their members imprisoned and/or killed. Their ways were viewed as being evil and outside the conventions of society. In the last two centuries, society has continued to perpetuate an intolerance toward those drawn to an esoteric perspective.

After its suppression, Esotericism made a strong comeback, and steadily grew in size and prestige during the last centuries of the second millennium C.E. In the post-Protestant era, Rosicrucianism was the first important international esoteric movement. It was followed by Speculative Freemasonry in the eighteenth century and Theosophy in the nineteenth. Out of Freemasonry came a tradition of initiatory magic represented in the neo-Templar orders of continental Europe, as well as a rebirth of ritual/ceremonial magic in the English-speaking world.

Western Esotericism's shared belief that magic was real, has led Roman Catholicism to oppose this movement, defining it as evil and using such labels as sorcery, witchcraft, and black magic. However, beginning with Protestantism (in its Reformed Presbyterian version) and the secular Enlightenment of the eighteenth century, the situation changed. Protestants and modern secularists opposed Esotericism because it perpetuated an archaic, superstitious, unreal world. Secularists also accused esotericists of perpetuating a prescientific worldview.

Under the combined forces of Protestantism and the Enlightenment, Esotericism almost disappeared during the eighteenth century, though it still retained a vital presence in many urban areas. During its comeback, Esotericism utilized insights and methodologies derived from new, emerging sciences. Two formally trained scientists, Franz Anton Mesmer and Emanuel Swedenborg, are recognized as the fathers of modern Esotericism. They opened a dialogue with the contemporary scientific community—a feat that distinguishes modern Esotericism from its prescientific ancestors.

As the modern world developed, the esoteric tradition spread throughout all of the world's cultures. A major dialogue began with Eastern traditions in the 1960s as the West welcomed large numbers of immigrants from Japan, Korea, China, and Southeast Asia into its communities. At the same time, African religions, many having found a home in the Caribbean, were also integrating themselves into Western life. All of these religions will be scrutinized and carefully observed in the coming decades by the more traditional Western religious communities.

The Current Need for a New Edition of EOP

In the more than half a century since Spence and Fodor published their volumes, not only has the occult/metaphysical/psychic world changed—a change clearly symbolized by the New Age movement—but the general opinion surrounding Spiritualism, Theosophy, and psychic phenomena has been radically altered by the science of parapsychology. The acceptance of the Parapsychological Association into the American Academy for the Advancement of Science indicated a new tolerance for (if not agreement with) psychical research by the scientific community, as parapsychologists have become methodologically more conservative and less accepting of much of the data from earlier decades.

During the 1970s there was an "occult explosion" in the media, while the 1980s saw the emergence of the New Age movement. Looking back from a vantage point in the new millennium, it can now be seen, that there has been a growing curiosity in psychical phenomena and metaphysical thought. Beginning in the late 1960s, this attraction steadily rose over the next three decades. Fads can certainly be identified—from exorcism to channeling, from crystals to angels—but what remains constant is that the entire field has become established in mainstream society in a way that no one but a psychic could have predicted in the 1950s.

The changing appraisal of occultism and the new directions the field has taken necessitates a thorough re-editing and updating of the Encyclopedia of Occultism & Parapsychology. In particular, entries that came directly from Spence and Fodor definitely needed revision in light of current research and opinion. However, care has been taken to retain the historic context in these entries. Editing has also removed much archaic language. Spence, in particular, writing from a British perspective, had numerous off-the-cuff references to events and people, now known only to a few dedicated students of the history of psychical research. As much as possible, additional material has been added to the text to identify such passing references to these now obscure people and events.

In addition, a list of sources for further reading has been added to the majority of entries. Special care was also taken to include recent publications, as well as to list complete citations of those books mentioned in passing in the body of an entry, especially those sources that have been quoted in the text. Some of the items cited are still quite rare, but others having been reprinted in recent decades by University, Causeway, and Arno Presses, are now more generally available.

Finally, more than 450 new entries, mostly events and personalities, have been added. The editor has also attempted to update every organization, publication, and society listed. Entries cover new occult groups and movements, highlight recent work in parapsychology, and continue to reference events not only in England and North America, but across continental Europe and around the world. Where source material has been missing in past editions, the latest sources have been added to assist the reader in locating more information on certain topics.

It is important to note that a conscious effort has been made to continue the policy so carefully established by Les Shepard in providing reliable and authoritative information, and to treat both the occult and parapsychology in a manner that avoids sensationalism, name-calling, and unnecessary labeling. In that process, it is an unfortunate task to have to cite a number of cases of fraudulent activity; but in each case, the evidence for such references has also been included.

Format of Entries

The entries in this edition are organized in a letter-by-letter sort. For biographical entries, birth and death dates are given where known. Many of the people covered in this volume were unfortunately not subject to the standard data-gathering sources of their time. Individuals often came out of obscurity, briefly participated in a controversial event(s), and then retreated back into obscurity; therefore, such basic information is often elusive. Every effort has been made to locate that basic data, and numerous new references have been added and others corrected in this edition. Where dates are highly debatable, the abbreviation "ca." followed by a century or year indicates the period during which the person flourished. A question mark in lieu of a death date indicates that the individual was born before 1900 and a death date is not known. When Internet research has been used, the source has been cited. Most importantly, the editor has attempted to track down the home pages of all of the living people and contemporary movements included in this edition. Unfortunately, Internet addresses become obsolete at a rapid rate; so the user may find listed Internet addresses to be non-operative. In such cases, using a search engine to locate person or topic in question may lead to newer Internet postings.

Cross-references are indicated by bold type within the text or by "See" and "See also" references following an entry.

Indexes

This edition of EOP contains two new features, which now replace the former Topical Index. First, the Internet Resources section gives websites, broken down into subject groups, for organizations, societies, print products, and personalities. The second addition is the General Bibliography, which collects academic resources into one alphabetic listing. The standard General Index provides readers with access to significant people, movements, cultures, and phenomena within the world of occultism and parapsychology in one alphabetical arrangement.

Acknowledgments

I want thank those who have assisted me in the work of this edition. My colleagues Jerome Clark, Marcello Truzzi, Chas Clifton, Tim Ryan, and Macha NightMare have revised entries that are especially relevant to their areas of research and expertise. I also wish to acknowledge Marco Frenschkowski who surveyed the fourth edition and made numerous helpful suggestions for its improvement. Jolen Marya Gedridge, with whom I have now worked on numerous projects with the Gale Group, has been my capable and knowledgeable in-house editor. She not only led the updating of many of the older entries and has kept me on track in meeting my work milestones. I am most grateful for her contribution on both fronts. Finally, with this edition especially, I have called upon numerous people—far too many to name—for bits of specialized information, for all that contributed data, I thank you.

User Comments Are Welcome

Users who can offer any additional information, corrections, or suggestions for new entries in future editions are encouraged to contact the editor. Please address Dr. Melton either c/o Gale Group, 27500 Drake Rd., Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535, or at his office:

Dr. J. Gordon Melton
Institute for the Study of American Religion
Box 90709
Santa Barbara, CA 93190–0709

A

A∴A∴

A secret society founded by Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) comprised of three orders: the Silver Star, the Rosy Cross, and the Golden Dawn. This society is also described as the Great White Brotherhood, although that is a term more properly applied by Theosophists. The initials A∴A∴ indicate Argenteum Astrum, and the triangle of dots signify a secret society connected with ancient mysteries.

During his period in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (GD), Crowley believed that he had reached the exalted stage of the Silver Star and was thus a Secret Chief of the Golden Dawn. After 1906 Crowley launched his own order of the Silver Star, or A∴A∴, using rituals and teachings taken from the Golden Dawn.

In March 1909 he began publishing the magazine the Equinox, as the official organ of the A∴A∴, including rituals of the Outer Order of the Society in the second number. This alarmed members of the Golden Dawn, who wished their rituals to remain secret, and S. L. MacGregor Mathers, one of the Golden Dawn chiefs, took legal action to restrain Crowley from continuing to publish the rituals. Although a temporary injunction was granted, Mathers did not have funds to contest an appeal setting this aside, and Crowley continued to publish his own version of GD secret rituals.

In addition to the publicity from this legal action, Crowley also gained additional notice through public performance of "the Rites of Eleusis" at Caxton Hall, University of London, in 1910. This ceremony comprised seven invocations of the gods, with dancing by Crowley's disciple Victor Neuburg, violin playing by Leila Waddel (named by Crowley as his "Scarlet Woman"), and recital of Crowley's poems. The performances were impressive, if bewildering to ordinary members of the public, who were charged a fee of five guineas a head. Not surprisingly, in the prudish atmosphere of the time, there were sharp criticisms of such a daring presentation.

A hostile review of the Rites appeared in the journal the Looking Glass, mocking the lyrics as "gibberish." In a further issue, the Looking Glass published sensational allegations about Crowley and his associates Allan Bennett and George Cecil Jones. In response, Jones sued the journal in 1911, and Crowley obtained considerable publicity through the court hearing. Although Crowley must have reveled in such public attention, he lost several friends through it, in particular his disciple J. F. C. Fuller, who had written the eulogy of Crowley titled The Star in the West (1907).

Meanwhile, Crowley had joined another secret order, the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), which strongly emphasized the power of sex magic. After Crowley departed to the United States toward the end of 1914, the A∴A∴ ceased working as a group in London.

Sources:

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England: 1887 to the Present Day. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Suster, Gerald. The Legacy of the Beast. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1989.

Symonds, John. The Great Beast: The Life and Magick of Aleister Crowley. London: Macdonald, 1971. Rev. ed. London: Mayflower, 1973.

———. The King of the Shadow Realm. London: Duckworth, 1989.

Aaron's Rod

A magic wand deriving from the biblical narrative of the rods of Moses and Aaron that were used in the miracles of dividing the waters of the Red Sea and in causing water to gush from a rock in the desert. When Aaron cast his rod before pharaoh and his magicians (Exodus 7), the rod transformed into a serpent, hence the occult use of Aaron's Rod with a motif of a serpent. An old Jewish legend states that Aaron's rod was created on the sixth day of Creation and was retained by Adam after leaving the Garden of Eden, subsequently passing into the hands of a succession of patriarchs. An apocryphal Christian legend states that the rod was cut from the Tree of Knowledge, eventually came into the possession of Judas, and was the beam of the cross on which Christ was crucified.

The hazel wand used by water diviners in dowsing echoes the water finding by Aaron's rod in the desert. Some form of wand has always been a symbol of authority. The wand also survives as the magical staff of modern conjuring magicians.

AASC Newsletter See Anthropology of Consciousness

Ab

Semitic magical month. Crossing a river on the twentieth of that month was supposed to bring sickness. Ancient texts state that if a man should eat the flesh of swine on the thirtieth day of Ab, he will be plagued with boils.

Ab is also an ancient Egyptian term for the heart. Since the heart was the seat of the conscience, its preservation was a crucial part of the mummification process.

Abaddon

"The Destroyer," from a Hebrew word meaning "destruction." Chief of the demons of the seventh hierarchy. Abaddon is the name given by St. John in the Apocalypse to the king of the grasshoppers. He is sometimes regarded as the destroying angel or prince of the underworld, also synonymous with Apollyon (Rev. 9:11). (See also Black Magic)

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus. London, 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Abadie, Jeannette See Jeannette D'Abadie

Abaris

A Scythian high priest of Apollo and a renowned magician. He chanted the praises of Apollo, his master, so flatteringly that the god gave him a golden arrow on which he could ride through the air like a bird. Therefore, the Greeks called him the Aerobate. Pythagoras, his pupil, stole this arrow from him and thus accomplished many wonderful feats. Abaris foretold the future, pacified storms, banished disease, and lived without eating or drinking. With the bones of Pelops, he made a statue of Minerva, which he sold to the Trojans as a talisman descended from heaven. This was the famous Palladium, which protected and rendered impregnable the town wherein it was lodged.

Abayakoon, Cyrus D. F. (1912– ?)

Astrologer born in Ceylon (now Sri Lanka). He was educated by Buddhist priests who instructed him in the traditional science of astrology. He also became highly skilled in palmistry and the curing of disease through Mantra yoga (science of sound vibration through sacred utterance). He made a number of accurate predictions of important world events, including the assassination of Gandhi, the fall of Khrushchev, the assassination of Kennedy, and the Watergate scandal.

Sources:

Abayakoon, Cyrus D. F. Astro-Palmistry: Signs and Seals of the Hand. New York: ASI, 1975.

———. Rahu Pimma [and] Yama Kalaya. Delhi, India, ca. 1957.

Abbott, David P(helps) (1863–1934)

Amateur magician and investigator of Spiritualist mediums. He was born in Falls City, Nebraska, September 22, 1863. His early education consisted of three months a year in a country schoolhouse on Nebraska prairies, and a final nine months in Falls City High School. In later life Abbott followed the trade of a money lender but took a great interest in science and philosophy. He also became an amateur magician, inventing and performing many startling feats of magic. He lived for some years in Omaha, Nebraska.

Abbott published numerous essays and several books on psychical subjects. His book Behind the Scenes with the Mediums exposed many techniques of fake mediumship, including slate writing and billet tests (see pellet reading). In spite of his skepticism regarding the claims of mediumship, however, Abbott did not rule out the possibility of genuine phenomena. In a thoughtful contribution to the second volume of The Dream Problem by Ram Narayana (Delhi, 1922), he stated: "I mention these things to show that telepathy is far from established as a fact, yet I must say that I believe it to be possible under certain conditions, but positively it can not be commanded at will in the slightest degree." He then related personal and family experiences of veridical dreaming.

Sources:

Abbott, David P. Behind the Scenes with the Mediums. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1912.

———. The History of a Strange Case. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1908.

———. Spirit Portrait Mystery . . . Its Final Solution. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1913.

Abdelazys

An Arabian astrologer of the tenth century generally known in Europe by his Latin name, Alchabitius. His treatise on astrology was highly acclaimed and was translated into Latin and printed in 1473. Other editions have since appeared, the best being that of Venice (1503) entitled Alchabitius cum commento, translated by John of Seville.

Abduction, UFO

During the 1980s, ufologists began to give a significant amount of their time to consideration of accounts of individuals who claimed to have not just seen various forms of spacecraft, but to have been forcefully taken aboard them and forced to undergo various kinds of medical-like procedures, the most typical being different types of body probes. The UFO community had to deal with accounts of people having direct contact with entities in control of spacecraft. These were most often stories of friendly contact with extraterrestrials who brought a message of warning about the current trend of society which should be countered by a new awareness of the Earth's role in the larger world of spiritual realities. The people claiming these kinds of relationships with extraterrestrials were labeled contactees and largely dismissed by ufologists.

The first reports that fit what was to become the general pattern of abduction stories came in the 1960s. In 1961, a New Hampshire housewife, Betty Hill, reported a UFO sighting to NICAP (the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena). During the course of the follow-up interviews by NICAP investigators, unclear parts of the account came to the fore. Among these were a missing two hours. The sighting had taken place while Betty and her husband were returning home. They arrived two hours later than they should have. Eventually the couple went into psychotherapy and under hypnosis described their meeting with a group of beings described as approximately five feet tall, with a large hairless head, greyish skin, large slanted eyes, a slit mouth, diminutive nose and ears, and long fingers. They were taken aboard a spacecraft and examined. A needle was stuck into Betty's stomach. Before they left, they were told to forget the experience, and as the spaceship left the ground, their recollection of what had just occurred faded.

The Hill's story would possibly have been lost amid the vast files of UFO reports if writer John Fuller had not discovered the Hills and authored a book detailing the story that had been revealed in the string of hypnotic sessions. Fuller's 1966 book, Interrupted Journey, along with the condensed version of the story published by Look magazine, placed abductions on the UFO community's agenda. Admittedly, other accounts of forced contact with extraterrestrials had been reported to various UFO organizations. One, the story of a young Brazilian man, Antonio Villas Boas, who claimed to have been abducted in 1957, was published in 1965 in Flying Saucer Review, the respected British UFO periodical. It was given a thorough review following the publication of the Hill case. Taken aboard the saucer, he allegedly had a blood sample taken and was forced to have intercourse with a human-like woman, after which samples of his sperm were retrieved and saved.

Though two thoroughly documented cases were now on record, additional accounts were slow in coming. It was not until the 1970s that a series of cases attracted renewed attention to the abduction phenomena. In 1973, two shipyard workers, Charles Hickson and Calvin Parker, were abducted as they were fishing in Pasacagoula, Mississippi. Several others also occurred that year. Then in 1975 six men in Arizona reported that a coworker had disappeared as he approached a hovering UFO. Travis Walton reappeared five days later and began to recount his story of a forced encounter with the being aboard the craft. Again that year, other less notable abduction cases were reported, but equally important, a made-for-TV movie about the Hill case ran on NBC on October 20. An increasing number of cases were reported annually through the end of the decade.

As the abduction reports often included an element of memory loss, the encounters themselves were frequently years if not decades prior to any investigator hearing of the abduction incidents. Typical was the Betty Andreasson case. Though her reported abduction occurred in 1967, the investigation by Raymond Fowler did not begin until 1976 and his book recounting the story did not appear until 1979. However, his The Andreasson Affair (1979) and The Tujunga Canyon Contacts (1980) by Ann Druffel and D. Scott Rogo prepared the UFO community for a fresh consideration of the abduction stories during the next decade.

Abduction stories would take center stage in the 1980s. Leading the demand that ufologists pay attention to the abduction cases was Budd Hopkins, a relative newcomer to the field, whose 1981 book, Missing Time, recounted a number of abduction cases he had uncovered. He also noted the similarities in the cases: the gray humanoids who conducted the abductions, the physical examination that included the taking of blood or skin samples and attention to the reproductive organs. Hopkins' work called attention to the fact that there were a large number of cases with a number of similarities that could be quantified. Growing interest in the work reached a new high in 1987 when popular horror fiction writer Whitley Streiber issued a book, Communion, in which he told the story of his own abduction. The book became a best-seller and brought attention to the UFO community that it had not enjoyed since the days of the Condon Report (1969). That same year, in a catalog of cases issued by the Fund for UFO Research, folklorist Thomas E. Bullard reported the existence of more than 300 cases. As a result of the attention given to abductions in 1987, the number of reports would rise considerably.

These hundreds of cases, which have arisen from people independently of others or awareness of abduction stories in general, while varying immensely in details, tell a very similar story. The abductee's life is interrupted by strange beings and their will to resist is impaired. They are taken aboard a spaceship, sometimes levitation being an instrumental part, and are subjected to an invasive physical examination. Generally, the victim is forced to forget the incident and only years later, prompted by troubling emotions possibly manifest in nightmares, the victim engages in psychotherapy or hypnosis, during which the memory of the abduction emerges.

The element of memory loss coupled with the intrusive invasion of the body during the examination has given rise to comparisons of the abduction stories with a very similar story of Satanic ritual abuse in which under psychotherapy and/or hypnosis, stories emerge of people having been forced to participate in a Satanic ritual where they were raped. Subsequently they forgot the incident(s). Together, the abduction and the Satanism tales have created a new designation of the forgotten memory syndrome.

As basic research on abductions occurred, investigators sharply divided over their interpretation. Many ufologists, such as historian David Jacobs, followed Hopkins in arguing for the basic truth of the cases and saw the cases as the best evidence of an extraterrestrial presence on Earth. More extreme elements wove increasingly paranoid tales of government conspiracies and compacts with hostile aliens. However, most abductees have only sought to discover what had happened to them, and have been happy to learn that others have had a similar experience. Over time, they have sought for some larger meaning in this incident. Most investigations have concluded that there is no psychopathology in the abductee's life and that he/she has no reason to tell such a negative story.

Criticism of the literal acceptance of the story as indicative of extraterrestrial contacts begins with the large number of reported contacts. Given the present state of interstellar travel, there is more than a little doubt that the number of spaceships could or would come to earth to account for all of the contacts. The many examinations, focused on reproductive organs, also raise questions of the purpose of the body probing. What is to be gained? Also, the stories, while supported by their consistency, are quite free of independent supporting evidence. In many cases, related to accounts of incidents far in the past, evidence may have been lost. But over all, there has been little collaboration. Some hoped for supporting evidence in items implanted in the bodies of contactees, but such foreign items discovered in abductees' bodies have proved to be purely mundane in nature. The lack of supporting evidence for the tales again emphasized the similarity of abduction and Satanic abuse stories.

Others, both supportive and critical of the abductees, have adopted alternate interpretations. Some UFO debunkers, led by tradition critic Philip Klass, have dismissed the abduction stories as either hoaxes or fantasies. Some psychologists have supported a purely psychological interpretation. The most appealing explanation, in that it also accounts for the very similar Satanic abuse stories, grows out of the definition of the forgotten memory syndrome. This theory suggests that the abductee has experienced a real trauma, usually sexual abuse during his/her childhood, but during attempts to recover the memory, a story is constructed that both confirms the trauma but also disguises it either in a Satanic cult or spaceship.

During the 1990s, an additional significant factor was added to the abduction stories—they began to merge with the contactee stories. Whitley Strieber called attention to this aspect of abduction stories in the sequel to Communion, Transformation: The Breakthrough (1988). In the latter volume, Strieber told of a series of contacts with the "Visitors" that began in childhood and his growing belief that their intrusion into human life was essentially benevolent. He was eventually joined in this appraisal by Leo J. Sprinkle, who had been conducting annual gatherings for contactees each summer at the University of Wyoming. As abductees joined the gatherings, over time, he discovered the boundaries between their stories blurring. In like measure, psychiatrist John Mack also found the stories of the abductees whom he counseled also yielded to explanation when set in a larger context of personal transformation and changes in consciousness. They came to feel that the experience was best seen as a harsh but necessary lesson leading to change and spiritual growth. Both Strieber and Mack found a large audience in the New Age community.

One cannot speak of a consensus in the consideration of abductions, though through the 1990s, ufologists lost some of their focus upon the accounts, possibly due to the lack of new information. Research appeared to have reached somewhat of a dead end. Like other areas of UFO research, they have not led to hard physical evidence of extraterrestrials—a spaceship, alien materials, or an alien.

Sources:

Bullard, Thomas E. "Abduction Phenomenon." In Jerome Clark, ed. UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1999.

Druffel, Ann, and D. Scott Rogo. The Tujunga Canyon Contacts. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1980.

Fowler, Raymond. The Andreasson Affair. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979.

Hopkins, Budd. Missing Time: A Documented Study of UFO Abductions. New York: Richard Marek Publishers, 1981.

Jacobs, David J. The Terror That Comes in the Night: An Experience-Centered Study of Supernatural Assault Traditions. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

Klass, Philip J. UFO Abductions: A Dangerous Game. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1988.

Mack, John E. Abduction: Human Encounters with Aliens. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1994.

Pritchard, Andrea, et al., eds. Alien Discussions: Proceedings of the Abduction Study Conference. Cambridge, Mass.: North Cambridge Press, 1994.

Strieber, Whitley. Communion: A True Story. New York: Beach Tree/William Morrow, 1987.

———. Transformation: The Breakthrough. New York: William Morrow and Co., 1988.

Aben-Ragel

An Arabian astrologer born at Cordova at the beginning of the fifth century. His book of horoscopes was translated into Latin and published at Venice in 1485, under the title De Judiciis seu fatis stellarum. Aben-Ragel's predictions were known for their remarkable accuracy.

Abigor

According to Johan Weyer, Abigor is the Grand Duke of Hades. He is shown in the form of a handsome knight bearing a lance, standard, or scepter. He is a demon of the superior order and responds readily to questions concerning war. He can foretell the future and instructs leaders on how to make themselves respected by their soldiers. Sixty infernal regions are under his command.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Abou-Ryhan

An Arabian astrologer whose real name was Mohammed-ben-Ahmed; he is credited with introducing judicial astrology. Many stories told of him in the East show that he possessed an extraordinary power to read the future.

Abracadabra

A magical word said to be formed from the letters of the abraxas, written thus:

A
AB
ABR
ABRA
ABRAC
ABRACA
ABRACAD
ABRACADA
ABRACADAB
ABRACADABR
ABRACADABRA

or the reverse way. The pronunciation of this word, according to Julius Africanus, was equally efficacious either way. According to Serenus Sammonicus, it was used as a spell to cure asthma. Abracalan, or aracalan, another form of the word, is said to have been regarded as the name of a god in Syria and as a magical symbol by the Jews. It seems doubtful whether the abracadabra, or its synonyms, was really the name of a deity.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Rider, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Abraham the Jew (ca. 1362–ca. 1460)

Little biographical information exists concerning this German Jew, who was an alchemist, magician, and philosopher, ca. 1400. What is known is mostly derived from a manuscript in the Archives of the Bibliotheque de l'Arsenal, Paris, an institution rich in occult documents. Written entirely in French, the manuscript purports to be translated from the Hebrew, and the handwriting style indicates that the scribe lived at the beginning of the eighteenth century or possibly somewhat earlier. A distinct illiteracy characterizes the French script, with the punctuation being either inaccurate or conspicuously absent.

Abraham was probably a native of Mayence, and appears to have been born in 1362. His father, Simon, was something of a seer and magician, and the boy took up his occult studies initially under parental guidance, then later under another teacher, Moses, whom Abraham describes as "indeed a good man, but entirely ignorant of The True Mystery, and of The Veritable Magic."

Abraham thereafter decided to continue his education by traveling. With his friend Samuel, a Bohemian by birth, he wandered through Austria and Hungary into Greece, and next into Constantinople (now Istanbul), where he remained two years. Abraham then traveled to Arabia, in those days a renowned center of mystic learning, and afterward to Palestine and Egypt.

In Egypt he became acquainted with Abra-Melin, a famous Egyptian philosopher, who entrusted certain documents to him and confided to him a number of invaluable secrets. Abraham then left Egypt for Europe, where he settled eventually at Würzburg in Germany, became deeply involved in research on alchemy. He married a woman who appears to have been his cousin, and had three daughters and two sons, the elder named Joseph and the younger, Lamech.

He instructed both sons in occult affairs, while on each of his three daughters, he settled a dowry of 100,000 golden florins. This considerable sum, together with other vast wealth, Abraham claimed to have earned by traveling as an alchemist. He was well known and was summoned to perform acts of magic before many rich and influential people, notably Emperor Sigismund of Germany, the bishop of Würzburg, King Henry VI of England, the duke of Bavaria, and Pope John XXII. No details exist about the rest of Abraham's career, and the date of his death is uncertain, but it is commonly supposed to have occurred about 1460.

The previously mentioned manuscript which yielded this biographical information is entitled The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin, as delivered by Abraham the Jew unto his son Lamech. This title is rather misleading and not strictly accurate, for Abra-Melin had absolutely no hand in the opening part of the work, which consists of an account of Abraham's own youth and early travels in search of wisdom, along with advice to the young man aspiring to become skilled in occult arts. The second part, on the other hand, is either based on the documents that Abra-Melin handed to Abraham or on the confidences the Egyptian sage disclosed to Abraham. This part of the manuscript deals with the first principles of magic in general, and includes such chapters as "How Many, and what are the Classes of Veritable Magic?" "What we Ought to Take into Consideration before the Undertaking of the Operation," "Concerning the Convocation of the Spirits," and "In what Manner we ought to Carry out the Operations."

The third and last part of the document is mostly derived straight from Abra-Melin, and the author, ignoring theoretical matter as far as possible, gives information about the actual practice of magic. In the first place he tells how "To procure divers Visions," "How one may retain the Familiar Spirits, bound or free, in whatsoever form," and how "To excite Tempests." In other chapters he discusses raising the dead, transforming oneself into "divers shapes and forms," flying in the air, demolishing buildings, discovering thefts, and walking underwater. The author writes about the thaumaturgic healing of leprosy, dropsy, paralysis, and various common ailments such as fever and seasickness. He also offers advice on "How to be beloved by a Woman" and how to command the favor of popes, emperors, and other influential people. He addresses the question of summoning visions in "How to cause Armed Men to Appear," and he tells how to evoke "Comedies, Operas, and all kinds of Music and Dances." Many of these feats are achieved by employing Kabalistic squares of letters. The manuscript details many different signs of this sort.

Abraham's personality and temperament as revealed in this work indicate a man heaping scorn on most other magicians and speaking with great derision of nearly all mystical writings other than his own and those of his hero, Abra-Melin. Abraham fiercely criticizes all those who recant the religion in which they were raised and contends that no one guilty of this will ever attain skill in magic. Nevertheless, throughout the manuscripts, Abraham manifests little selfishness and seems to have worked toward success in his craft with a view to using it for the benefit of mankind in general. His writings also reflect a firm belief in a higher self existing in every man, and a keen desire to develop it. (See also Nicholas Flamel)

Sources:

The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin the Sage. Translated by S. L. MacGregor-Mathers. Chicago: De Laurence, 1932. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Abrams, Albert (1863–1924)

A San Francisco physician who devised a system of diagnosis and healing variously termed radionics, electronic medicine, or electronics. Abrams, who had a distinguished medical background, graduated in medicine at Heidelberg University, Germany, and was professor of pathology at Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, California. Working on cancer patients, he believed that he had discovered that diseased tissue radiated an abnormal wave. His work further led to his invention of the oscilloclast, an electrical instrument for generating oscillations involving changes of skin potential, based on an electronic theory of disease. Developments of Abrams's apparatus have since come to be known as black boxes. In 1922, just two years before his death, the British Royal Society of Medicine issued a negative report on Abrams, and his work almost died out. It was picked up by Ruth Drown during the 1930s. His work was carried on by the American Association for Medico-Physical Research.

Sources:

Abrams, Albert. New Concepts in Diagnosis and Treatment. San Francisco, Calif.: Physico-Clinical, 1922.

Barr, James. Abrams' Methods of Diagnosis and Treatment. London, 1925.

Scott, G. Laughton. "The Abrams Treatment" in Practice: An Investigation. London: Bless, 1925.

Stanway, Andrew. Alternative Medicine. New York: Penguin, 1982.

Abrams, Stephen Irwin (1938–)

Psychologist who studied extrasensory stimulation of conditioned reflexes in hypnotized subjects. He was born July 15, 1938, in Chicago, Illinois, and studied at the University of Chicago and Oxford University, England. Abrams has served as visiting research fellow at the Parapsychology Laboratory, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina; president of the Parapsychology Laboratory of the University of Chicago (1957–60); and charter associate of the Parapsychological Association. His paper "Extrasensory Behavior" was presented at the Seventh Annual Congress of the Parapsychological Association at Oxford in 1964.

Abraxas (or Abrasax)

The Basilidian sect of Gnostics of the second century claimed Abraxas as their supreme god and said that Jesus Christ was only a phantom sent to Earth by him. They believed that his name contained great mysteries, as it was composed of the seven Greek letters which form the number 365, the number of days in a year. Abraxas, they thought, had under his command 365 gods, to whom they attributed 365 virtues, one for each day. The older mythologists consider Abraxas an Egyptian god, and demonologists describe him as a demon with the head of a king and with serpents forming his feet. Ancient amulets depict Abraxas with a whip in his hand, and his name inspired the mystic word abracadabra.

Sources:

Drury, Nevill, and Stephen Skinner. The Search for Abraxas. London: Spearman, 1972.

Abred

The innermost of three concentric circles representing the totality of being in the cosmology of the Celts. Abred represents the stage of struggle and evolution against Cythrawl, the power of evil. (See also Barddas)

Absent Healing

Healing at a distance from the subject, sometimes through the subject providing some associational link such as a written request for healing, or in reverse form, by the healer sending a piece of material to be placed on the subject's body where the healing is required, or simply by prayers for the subject's recovery on the part of the healer or a band of healing associates. Many people today, Christian, metaphysical, or modern Spiritualist, hold sessions at which they pray for the recovery of petitioners who write them for help. (See also Healing by Faith; Psychic Healing)

Absolute (Theosophy)

Theosophists profess to know nothing further about the Absolute, the Logos, the Word of God, than that it exists. The universes with their solar systems are the lowest manifestations of this Being, which humans are capable of perceiving. Human beings themselves are an emanation from the Absolute, with which they will be ultimately reunited.

Abteilung für Psychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie des Psychologischen Instituts der Universität Freiburg I. Br.

Parapsychology laboratory at the University of Freiburg in Germany under the direction of Johannes Mischo. The laboratory has a library and an experimental program and works in close cooperation with the Institut fur Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene (Institute for Border Areas of Psychology and Mental Hygiene). Address: Belfortstr. 16, D-79085, Freiburg I. Br., Germany.

Abu Yazid al-Bestami (ca. 801–874)

Noted Islamic mystic who founded the ecstatic school of Sufism. Born in Bestam in northeastern Persia, he became known as al-Bestami. His claim that the mystic quest could result in complete absorption and identification with divinity is thought to have been an influence of Hindu Vedanta. In this respect, his heterodoxy was blasphemous to orthodox Islam.

Beginning with the Sufi concept of approaching divinity as the lover approaches the beloved, al-Bestami claimed that this love was in itself an obstacle. He renounced conventional worship in the mosque, pilgrimage to Mecca, and even the mystical practices of asceticism and meditation. Various miracles were ascribed to al-Bestami.

Sources:

Attar, Farid al-Din. Muslim Saints and Mystics. Translated by A. J. Arberry. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

Zaehner, R. C. Hindu and Muslim Mysticism. London: Athlone Press, 1960.

Abyssum

An herb used in the ceremony of exorcising a haunted house. Abyssum is consecrated by the sign of the cross and hung up at the four corners of the house.

Academia De Estudo Psychicos "Cesare Lombroso"

Cesare Lombroso Academy for Psychical Research, founded in Sao Paolo by José de Freitas Tinoco in September 1919. The academy investigated the mediumship of Carlos Mirabelli. In 392 sittings, Mirabelli produced what were considered to be remarkable results as he demonstrated a wide variety of materializations, levitation, psychokinesis, and automatic writing. The academy proclaimed Mirabelli the greatest of all mental and physical mediums, but its 1926 report was called into question by Theodore Besterman, who studied Mirabelli for the American Society for Psychical Research in 1934. The academy continued to exist into the 1930s.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine

An important but short-lived organization founded in California in 1970 with the basic belief that spirit and matter are a unity. The academy held that the true nature of healing must be sought in that unity and the interrelationship of body, mind, and spirit in health and disease. Treatment of disease should be directed at the whole person, and any lasting healing of the physical body should synthesize mental, emotional, and spiritual aspects. This belief restates traditional Hindu yoga teachings in a Western context.

The academy served its membership by offering symposia, workshops, and publications (including APM Report, published quarterly for members). Investigating paranormal and unorthodox healing, the academy presented its research findings to both professional medical and lay communities. It sponsored seven major symposia between 1971 and 1974, primarily in the San Francisco and Los Angeles areas, as well as Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia. Other activities included one-day seminars on acupuncture and biofeedback and nine two-day acupuncture workshops. In June 1974 the academy presented a symposium on nontraditional approaches to treatment of the developmentally disabled, sponsored jointly with the Division of Retardation of the state of Florida's Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services. The academy laid the groundwork for the formation of the American Holistic Medical Association in 1978. (See also Healing Center for the Whole Person)

Sources:

The Dimensions of Healing: A Symposium. Los Altos, Calif.: Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine, 1972.

The Varieties of the Healing Experience. Los Altos, Calif.: Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine, 1971.

Academy of Religion and Psychical Research

Organization founded in 1972 from a proposal developed in 1971 by J. Gordon Melton, its first secretary, to operate in those areas where parapsychology and religion intersect. It has served as an academic affiliate of Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (SFF). The academy encourages dialogue, idea exchange, and cooperation between clergy, academics in philosophy and religion, and the researchers and scientists in parapsychology and related fields. It conducts educational programs for scholars, Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship members, and the general public and works closely with related organizations. The academy organized several large conferences soon after its founding beginning with one at Garrett Theological Seminary in 1972, but its activity slowed in the mid-1970s when SFF went through a period of organizational disruption.

Reorganized by the end of the 1970s, the academy now conducts an annual conference, usually in conjunction with the annual meeting of SFF, and occasional seminars. It sponsors an annual competition for the Robert H. Ashby Memorial Award for the best paper on an announced subject. It publishes the Journal of Religion and Psychical Research quarterly and Proceedings (issued from time to time). The academy may be reached at P.O. Box 614, Bloomfield, Connecticut 06002-0614. Website: http://www.lightlink.com/arpr/.

Sources:

The Academy of Religion and Psychical Research. http://www.lightlink.com/arpr/. March 8, 2000.

Achad, Frater (1886–1950)

The magical name assumed by Charles Stansfeld Jones (1886–1950), a British occultist and author who lived in Canada and founded the Fellowship of Ma-Ion. He was a follower of magician Aleister Crowley who designated him his magical child.

Jones is to be distinguished from theosophical writer George Graham Price who channeled two popular texts, Melchizedek Truth Principles (1963) and Ancient Mystical White Brotherhood (1971), both published under the pseudonym Frater Achad. Little is known of Price's life apart from his channeling the two books.

Sources:

Achad, Frater [Charles Stansfeld Jones]. The Anatomy of the Body of God. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1969.

Achad, Frater [George Graham Price]. Ancient Mystical White Brotherhood. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1971.

———. Melchizedek Truth Principles. Phoenix, Ariz.: Lockhart Research Foundation, 1963.

Acheropite

Term used to describe a supernormally produced portrait on cloth. Another term, used for a cloth that bears the miraculous portrait of Jesus, is veronica, based on an apocryphal legend of a woman who wiped the face of Jesus during the procession to the Cross. The controversial Turin Shroud is one of the more interesting examples of such a cloth.

Achmet See Ahmad ibn Sirin

Aconcio, Jacques See Jacobus Acontius

Acontius, Jacobus (ca. 1500–ca. 1566)

Also known as Jacques Aconcio. Theologian, philosopher, and engineer. Born in Trent, Tyrol, he became curate of that diocese, then became a Calvinist in 1557. Acontius came to England about two years later, where he dedicated his major work, Stratagemata Satanae (The Stratagems of Satan), to Queen Elizabeth. The book attributes all doctrines other than the Apostles' Creed to Satan as stratagems to tempt mankind from truth. However, the book was also a strong plea for religious toleration. An English translation was first published in 1648 under the title Satan's Stratagems; or, The Devil's Cabinet-Council Discovered.

Active-Agent Telepathy

Term used by parapsychologists for situations in which the agent in telepathic experiments seems to be an active factor in causing mental or behavioral effects in the percipient, or subject, rather than being simply a passive participant whose mental states are recognized by the percipient.

Acupressure

A form of body work which, as the name implies, is based in acupuncture. Acupuncturists apply pressure to the designated points on the body with the hand rather than using needles. A popular practice in Japan, it was severely restricted by laws against massage in the nineteenth century. That law was repealed in 1955. As acupressure revived, it found a receptive audience in the West. Acupressure is similar to but distinct from other body techniques like do-in and shiatsu. For further information, contact the Acupressure Institute, 1533 Shattuck Ave., Berkeley, CA 94709.

In the 1970s, Michael Reed Gach developed a variation on acupressure that he termed acu-yoga. It combines acupressure with hatha yoga. Individuals are taught to apply pressure on the points while assuming various yoga positions.

Sources:

Cerney, J. V. Acupressure: Acupuncture without Needles. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1974.

Chan, Pedro. Finger Acupressure. New York: Ballantine Books, 1975.

Gach, Michael Reed. Acu-yoga: Self Help Techniques. Tokyo: Japan Publications, 1981.

Acupressure News

Quarterly magazine concerned with information on acupressure. Includes articles and news items relating to activities, techniques, and attitudes of the medical profession. Address: 2309 Main St., Santa Monica, CA 90405.

Acupressure Workshop

A former organization that arranged classes in acupressure, shiatsu, t'ai chi ch'an, and yoga from elementary to advanced study. They were first located in West Los Angeles and then in Santa Monica.

Acupuncture

An ancient Chinese medical system over five thousand years old, recently revived in China and demonstrated to Western doctors. It is based on the belief that subtle energy flows in the body related to the cosmic principles of Yin and Yang. Yin relates to shadow, moon, passivity, softness, femininity; Yang denotes sunlight, activity, masculinity, hardness. The balance of these energies in the human body affects health and disease. Acupuncture therapy alters these energy flows by inserting needles at key points for varying periods of time. Anesthesia for surgical operations can also be effected by acupuncture. Both ancient Chinese and Hindu medical systems are related to a philosophical or mystical view of the universe, and the concept of Yin and Yang and subtle energy flows has much in common with the kundalini energy of the Hindu yoga system. In hatha yoga, the system of asanas, or physical positions, affect the vital energies in the body through muscular tension and relaxation. Comparison may also be made with the theories of Wilhelm Reich and his concept of orgone energy.

Special developments of acupuncture include shiatsu and acupressure, a form of acupuncture without needles, and acupuncture charts locating ear and hand points. Dr. Lester Sacks, a Los Angeles doctor, introduced a system of ear acupuncture in which a special "gun" fires a surgical staple into the ear near a particular acupuncture point, to help patients who want to lose weight or stop smoking, drinking, or taking drugs. Whenever the patient feels his craving coming on, he wiggles the staple, and the craving apparently subsides.

A simple device for self-treatment of acupuncture points on the back is the "MA-roller," a specially shaped wooden rod, on which the patient lies. It is marketed by Great Earth Therapeutics, Forest Row, Sussex, England.

Acupuncture came into the West in 1928 when Soulie de Morant, the French consul in China, returned home with the texts he had translated into French and persuaded several doctors to examine the practice. Interest grew steadily throughout Europe and America after World War II. The Acupuncture International Association was founded in 1949 by a group of nonconventional physicians in the United States. J. R. Worsley established the Chinese College of Acupuncture in England in 1960. However, the major opening for acupuncture in the West came in the early 1970s, when the United States reestablished friendly relations with the People's Republic of China. In 1973 the National Institute of Health sponsored an Acupuncture Research Conference, a signal of official approval for the testing of acupuncture's claims. Over the next few years a host of acupuncture texts appeared, acupuncture associations formed, and journals initiated.

The literature of acupuncture is extensive, and there are now several journals devoted to the subject, including Acupuncture News, American Journal of Acupuncture, and Journal of the Acupuncture Association of Great Britain. The American Association of Acupuncture and Oriental Medicine may be contacted at 1424 16th St. NW, Washington, DC 20036. There is also an International Veterinary Acupuncture Society at 2140 Conestoga Rd., Chester Springs, PA 19425.

Sources:

Academy of Traditional Chinese Medicine. An Outline of Chinese Acupuncture. New York: Pergamon Press, 1975; Peking: Foreign Language Press, 1975.

Austin, Mary. Acupuncture Therapy. 2nd ed. New York: ASI Publishers, 1972.

Dubrin, Stanley, and J. Keenan. Acupuncture and Your Health. Chatsworth, Calif.: Books for Better Living, 1974.

Hashimoto, M. Japanese Acupuncture. New York: Liveright Publishing, 1968; London: Thursons, 1966.

Mann, Felix. Acupuncture. New York: Random House, 1963; London: W. Heinemann Medical Books, 1962.

Matsumoto, Teruo. Acupuncture for Physicians. Springfield, Ill.: Thomas, 1974.

McGarey, William. Acupuncture and Body Energies. Phoenix, Ariz.: Gabriel Press, 1974.

Nanking Army Ear Acupuncture Team. Ear Acupuncture: A Chinese Medical Report. Emmaus, Pa.: Rodale Press, 1974.

Nightingale, Michael. The Healing Power of Acupuncture. New York: Javalin Books, 1986.

Acuto-manzia

Unusual form of divination by pins practiced by Italian psychic Maria Rosa Donati-Evstigneeff. Ten straight pins and three bent pins are used. They are shaken in cupped hands, then dropped onto a surface dusted with powder. This system would seem to involve some psychic faculty, and is related to such forms of divination as geomancy and tea leaves.

Adalbert (ca. 740 C.E.)

A French pseudo-mystic of the eighth century. He boasted that an angel brought him relics of extraordinary sanctity from all parts of the earth and he claimed to be able to foretell the future, and to read thoughts. "I know what you have done," he would say; "there is no need for confession. Go in peace, your sins are forgiven." Adalbert's so-called "miracles" gained him great popularity, and he gave away many cuttings of his nails and locks of his hair as powerful amulets. He is even said to have set up an altar in his own name.

The small amount of biographical information that exists tells of miraculous powers bestowed by an angel at his birth. Adalbert was accused of showing to his disciples a letter that he declared was brought to him from Jesus Christ and delivered by St. Michael. Adalbert was also accused of composing a mystical prayer invoking uncanonical angels believed to be demons.

In 744 C.E. a Church synod denounced him. A year later, after appealing to Pope Zacharius, Adalbert was deprived of priestly office. Later he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the monastery of Fulda.

Adam, Book of the Penitence of

A manuscript in the Library of the Arsenal at Paris that deals with kabalistic tradition. It recounts how the first two sons of Adam, Cain and Abel, respectively typifying brute force and intelligence, slew each other, and that Adam's inheritance passed to his third son, Seth. Seth was permitted to advance as far as the gate of the Earthly Paradise without being threatened by the guardian angel with his flaming sword, which is to say that he was an initiate of occult science.

He beheld the Tree of Life and the Tree of Knowledge, which had become grafted upon each other so that they formed one tree. Some commentators believe this to symbolize the harmony of science and religion in the Kabala. The guardian angel presented Seth with three seeds from this tree and directed him to place them within the mouth of his father, Adam, when he died. From this planting arose the burning bush, out of which God communicated to Moses his holy name, and from a part of which Moses made his magic wand. This was placed in the Ark of the Covenant and was planted by King David on Mount Zion, where it grew into a triple tree and was later cut down by Solomon to form the pillars Jachin and Boaz, which were placed at the entrance to the Temple.

A third portion was inserted in the threshold of the great gate and acted as a talisman, permitting no unclean thing to enter the sanctuary. However, certain wicked priests removed it, weighted it with stones, and cast it into the Temple reservoir, where it was guarded by an angel, who kept it from the sight of men. During the time of Christ the reservoir was drained and the beam of wood discovered and thrown across the brook Kedron, over which the Savior passed after he was apprehended in the Garden of Olives. It was taken by his executioners and made into the cross.

This legend is markedly similar to those from which the conception of the Holy Grail arose. Man is restored by the wood through the instrumentality of which Adam, the first man, fell. The idea that the Cross was a cutting of the Tree of Knowledge was widespread in the Middle Ages and may be found in the twelfth century Quete del St. Graal, ascribed to Walter Map but probably only adapted by him. All the traditions of the Kabala are embodied in the allegory contained in the Book of the Penitence of Adam, which supplements and throws considerable light on the entire kabalistic literature.

Adam, L'Abbé

About the time that the Templars were being driven from France, the Devil was said to have appeared under various guises to the Abbé Adam, who was journeying with one of the servants from his convent to another part of his abbacy of the Vaux de Cernay. The evil spirit first opposed the progress of the Abbé taking the form of a tree white with frost, which rushed toward him with inconceivable swiftness. The Abbé's horse trembled with fear, as did the servant, but the Abbé himself made the sign of the Cross, and the tree disappeared.

The Abbé concluded that he had seen the Devil and called upon the Virgin to protect him. Nevertheless, the fiend shortly reappeared in the shape of a furious black knight. "Begone," said the Abbé. "Why do you attack me far from my brothers?" The Devil once more left him, but returned in the shape of a tall man with a long, thin neck. To get rid of him, Adam struck him a blow with his fist. The evil spirit shrank and took the stature and countenance of a little cloaked monk, with a glittering weapon under his garb. His little eyes could be seen darting and glancing under his cowl. He tried hard to strike the Abbé with the sword he held, but Adam repulsed the strokes with the sign of the Cross.

The demon became in turn a pig and a long-eared ass. The Abbé, impatient to be on his way, made a circle on the ground with a cross in the center. The fiend was then obliged to withdraw a little distance. He changed his long ears into horns, which did not hinder the Abbé from boldly addressing him. Offended by his plain-speaking, the Devil changed himself into a barrel and rolled into an adjoining field. In a short time he returned in the form of a cart wheel, and, without giving the brother time to put himself on the defensive, rolled heavily over his body, without, however, doing him any injury. After that he left him to pursue his journey in peace. This story is related in Regne de Philippe le Bel by Robert Gaguin and in Histoire de la Magie en France by Jules Garinet (1818).

Adamantius (ca. fourth century C.E.)

A Jewish doctor, who became a Catholic at Constantinople in the time of Constantine, to whom he dedicated his two volumes on Physiognomy; or, The Art of Judging People by Their Faces. This work, full of contradictions and fantasies, was printed in the Scriptores Physiognomoniae veteres of Johann G. F. Franz at Attembourg in 1780.

Adam Kadmon

A Tree of Life in the Kabala in the form of an idealized spiritual being.

Sources:

Halevi, Z'ev ben Shimon. Adam and the Kabbalistic Tree. London: Rider, 1974.

Adams, Evangeline Smith (Mrs. George E. Jordon, Jr.) (1859–1933)

Noted American astrologer. Born February 8, 1859, in Jersey City, New Jersey; daughter of George and Harriette E. (Smith) Adams (of the Adams family of New England); and a descendant of John Quincy Adams, sixth president of the United States. She was educated in Andover, Massachusetts, and Chicago, Illinois, and from childhood she was strongly impressed by the religious and academic atmosphere of Andover, which was then the center of various theological institutions. While still young, Adams had her horoscope read by Dr. J. Herbert Smith, then professor of Materia Medica at Boston University and became profoundly interested in astrology. Smith's reading of Adams's horoscope and his personal observation of her character convinced him that she was an ideal personality to help elevate astrology to the dignity of an accepted science. He taught her all he knew, and she supplemented this knowledge by studying Hindu Vedanta under Swami Vivekananda, pioneer of Hindu philosophy in the United States. After years of study, Adams started practice as a professional astrological consultant in New York.

She became nationally known when she read a chart for the owner of New York's Windsor Hotel on Fifth Avenue predicting a serious disaster that would take place almost immediately. The hotel owner was unaware of any impending problems and took no action, but the next day his hotel was destroyed by fire. The resulting media publicity brought Evangeline Adams immediate fame nationwide. In 1914 she was prosecuted for "fortune-telling" but contested the case in court. She demonstrated her methods of work and made an accurate prediction concerning the judge's son. Judge John H. Freschi acquitted her, stating: "The defendant has raised astrology to the dignity of an exact science."

Adams published various books and pamphlets on astrology, and many famous individuals (including J. Pierpont Morgan, Mary Pickford, singer Enrico Caruso, and King Edward VII of Britain) visited her headquarters at Carnegie Hall. From 1930 onward she broadcast three times weekly, and received thousands of letters requesting astrological readings. As early as 1931, she predicted that the United States would be at war in 1942. In 1932 she was booked for a 21-night lecture tour but canceled it after predicting her own death, which duly occurred. She is generally recognized as the leading astrologer of her time who laid the groundwork for professional astrology in the United States. She died in New York November 10, 1933.

Sources:

Adams, Evangeline. Astrology: Your Place among the Stars. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1930.

———. Astrology: Your Place in the Sun. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1928.

———. Astrology for Everyone: What It Is and How It Works. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1931.

———. The Bowl of Heaven. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1926.

Adams, John Q(uincy), III (1938–)

Parapsychologist who experimented with school children and teachers to test clairvoyance and extrasensory effects. He was born March 7, 1938, in Dallas, Texas, and studied at Oberlin College, Ohio (B.A., 1960).

Adamski, George (1891–1965)

First of the 1950s flying saucer contactees who claimed direct contact with beings who had traveled to Earth in spaceships from planets in outer space. Adamski was born in Poland on April 17, 1891. He was two years old when his family emigrated to Dunkirk, New York. In 1913 Adamski served with the 13th Cavalry on the Mexican border, received an honorable discharge from the army in 1919, then settled in Laguna Beach, California. He studied occult metaphysics and in 1936 founded the Royal Order of Tibet, through which he offered a course in self-mastery. Although he had no scientific training, he was often referred to as "Professor" by his Royal Order of Tibet mystical philosophy students. In 1940 he moved to the Valley Center with his followers, where they established a farming project. Four years later he moved to the southern slope of Mount Palomar in Southern California. He had no formal connection with the observatory there and worked as a handyman at a hamburger stand.

Soon after the modern flying saucer era began, Adamski emerged in 1947 as a popular lecturer. He claimed to have sighted a UFO in 1946 and in 1949 wrote a novel, Pioneers in Space, to promote discussion of the subject by the general public. He also began to show pictures of what he claimed were saucers he had seen near his home near Mount Palomar.

Adamski also coauthored, with Desmond Leslie, Flying Saucers Have Landed (1953), the book that launched the contactee phenomenon. Adamski claimed that he had been contacted by the Venusian occupant of a flying saucer that landed in the California desert November 20, 1952. Subsequently Adamski claimed to have had contact with spacemen from Mars and Saturn and to have traveled 50,000 miles into space in their craft. After Adamski's revelations, the convention of spaceman contacts, messages from outer space, and warnings about the welfare of the cosmos became firmly established. Adamski expanded upon his revelations in two subsequent volumes: Inside the Space Ships (1955) and Flying Saucers Farewell (1961).

By the late 1950s Adamski was an international celebrity who lectured to large audiences in North America and Europe. He also had his critics. In 1957 editor James Mosley devoted an issue of Saucer News to an exposé of Adamski. In 1963 Adamski's close associate C. A. Honey denounced him after discovering that Adamski had rewritten the original messages from the saucer beings in the Royal Order of Tibet materials. As his following had grown, Adamski had formed his followers into study groups and offered lessons in cosmic philosophy. In spite of the critics and defections, he retained a large following at the time of his death on April 23, 1965, from a heart attack, in Washington, D.C. His close associates founded the UFO Education Center in Valley Center, California, and the George Adamski Foundation, in Vista, California, to carry on his legacy.

Sources:

Adamski, George. Cosmic Philosophy. Freeman, S.D.: Pine Hill Press, 1961.

———. Flying Saucer Farewell. 1961. Reprint, Behind the Flying Saucer Mystery. New York: Paperback Library, 1967.

———. Inside the Space Ships. 1955. Reprint, Inside the Flying Saucers. New York: Paperback Library, 1967.

Barker, Gray. The Book of Adamski. Clarksburg, W. Va.: Saucerian Publications, 1965.

Leslie, Desmond, and George Adamski. Flying Saucers Have Landed. London: Werner Laurie, 1953. Rev. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Zinsstag & Timothy Good. George Adamski: The Untold Story. Beckenham, U.K.: Ceit Publications, 1983.

Adare, Lord (1841–1926)

Author of a remarkable work, Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home, printed privately in 1869 at the request of his father, Earl of Dunraven. To make this book accessible to a large public and in memory of his father to whose title he succeeded, the author agreed in 1924 to a second edition by the Society for Psychical Research, omitting the attestation of some of the prominent witnesses of the phenomena. The probable reason for the privacy of the first publication was that the Earl of Dunraven, being a Roman Catholic, wished to avoid the censure of the Church.

The friendship of Lord Adare and Daniel Douglas Home dated from 1867. It began at Malvern in Dr. Gully's hydropathic establishment, where Home was a guest and Lord Adare a patient. For the next two years he spent a great deal of time in Home's company. His friendship for Home (as stated in his preface to the 1924 publication) never diminished or changed thereafter.

The phenomena recorded in the book are of a wide range and embrace almost every spiritualistic manifestation. Only the absence of apport phenomena and the penetration of matter through solid matter is conspicuous. Its possibility was stoutly denied by Home. The records fail to meet scientific requirements in many ways. The control was left to the senses, no instruments were introduced, and many points in the narrative were left incomplete.

No attempt was made to appraise the sittings in scientific categories. "Miracle worship" might best describe the attitude of Lord Adare and of his fellow-sitters. On the other hand, while deficient in some ways, these records demonstrate the conscientiousness of those who observed Home. Each wrote letters addressed to the Earl of Dunraven shortly after the séances. Lord Adare, for almost two years, lived most of the time with Home, which bolstered his belief that Home was not perpetrating a large scale deception. The preface states: "We have not, on a single occasion, during the whole series of seances, seen any indication of contrivance on the part of the medium for producing or facilitating the manifestations which have taken place."

Adcock, C(yril) J(ohn) (1904– ?)

Parapsychologist and university lecturer on psychology. Born in England, Adcock studied at the University of Auckland and the University of London (B.A., M.A., Ph.D.). He lectured at Victoria University, Wellington, New Zealand, and is a member of the Parapsychological Association and American Psychology Association. His work in parapsychology included group testing of ESP and tests of statistical significance of ESP experiments.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

ADC Project

Established by Judy and Bill Guggenehim to accumulate firsthand accounts of people who have felt the direct presence of or have actually seen deceased loved ones. They have collected more than two thousand such accounts of "after death contact" (ADC) in their study and welcome any further accounts. Telephone interviews are conducted at the expense of the ADC Project, PO Box 536365, Orlando, Florida 32853.

Addanc of the Lake

A monster that figures in the Mabinogion legend of Peredur. Peredur obtains a magic stone that renders him invisible, and he thus succeeds in slaying this monster, which had daily killed the inhabitants of the palace of the King of Tortures.

Addey, John (1920–1982)

Theosophist and astrologer, born at Barnsley, Yorkshire, England, on June 15, 1920. Addey earned his master's degree from Saint John's College, Cambridge. He became interested in astrology while at Cambridge, and after World War II he joined the Theosophical Society's Astrological Lodge, which brought him into a long-term relationship with C. E. O. Carter. In 1948 Carter established the Faculty of Astrological Studies to train astrologers, and Addey became one of its first students, obtaining his diploma in 1951.

Within a few years, however, he found himself doubtful of his art and its scientific underpinnings. He turned to scientific research, his most important focus centering on longevity and people suffering from polio. His observations led him to the development of a "wave" theory of astrology. He subsequently moved to integrate completed and ongoing statistical studies of astrological effects and the insights of Hindu astrology into what he termed harmonics, a system of astrology that emphasizes the integral divisions of the horoscope chart. He saw in harmonics a method of bringing a united theoretical base to the many different systems of astrology that were emerging in the postwar world.

In 1958 Addey led in the founding of the Astrological Association, a professional association of astrologers primarily in Great Britain. His underlying agenda was the development of harmonic theory, which he presented in a series of booklets in the 1970s.

Harmonics was initially received with some enthusiasm by Addey's astrological colleagues; however, as astrologers worked with Addey's thought, they found it was too abstract and offered little insight to assist in the essential task of interpreting an astrological chart. As such, Addey's theoretical work was soon forgotten, though his empirical studies remain a major building block of contemporary astrology's attempt to provide astrology with an acceptable scientific base.

In 1970 Addey founded the Urania Trust, which had the exceedingly ambitious goal of reintegrating astrology into astronomy, an objective on which almost no progress has been made. Addey also served a term as editor of the Astrological Journal.

Addey died in 1982.

Sources:

Addey, John. Astrology Reborn. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1972.

———. Harmonic Anthology. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1976.

———. Harmonics in Astrology. Romford: L. N. Fowler, 1976.

———. Selected Writings. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1976.

Lewis, James L. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Additor

A ouija board modified by the addition of a little round hollow box with a pointer protruding from it. The hollow box is a miniature cabinet that is believed to accumulate psychic force as it moves under the fingers over a polished board printed with the alphabet.

The term autoscope has been given to such devices as the ouija board, planchette, and additor, that are believed to facilitate the production of messages from an unknown intelligent source, at times the subconscious mind, at other times from discarnate spirits of the dead. (See also Automatic Writing)

Adelphi Organization

The Adelphi Organization dates to 1976 when Richard Kieninger, the founder of the Stelle Group, left Stelle, Illinois, and founded a second group near Dallas, Texas. Kieninger's autobiographical volume The Ultimate Frontier had provided the main teaching at Stelle, but he was asked to leave the community after his sexual liaisons with several of the married women were discovered. The new organization was modeled on Stelle and had the same goal, which Kieninger had been given by his teacher, of building a new nation that would survive the disasters at the end of the twentieth century.

After Kieninger left Stelle, a significant power struggle developed. His former wife, the president of the corporation, and the entire board of trustees resigned and left the community. Those remaining reestablished relations with Kieninger. Stelle and Adelphi reunited, the headquarters moved to Texas, and Kieninger was named chairman of the board. However, in 1986, Kieninger was again forced out and founded a short-lived group, the Builders of the Nation of God. A short time later Kieninger was accepted back at Adelphi and at that point Adelphi and Stelle went their separate ways.

Adelphi continues with its program of building a city on an island in the Pacific Ocean. The Adelphi Organization publishes a newsletter, Adelphi Quarterly, and can be reached at PO Box 2423, Quinlan, TX 75474. Website: http://www.adelphi.com/.

Sources:

The Adelphi Organization. http://www.adelphi.com/. March 8, 2000.

Kieninger, Richard. The Hidden Christ. Dallas, Tex.: Paragon Press, 1989.

———. Observations. 4 vols. Chicago: Stelle Group, 1971–79.

———. Spiritual Seekers Guidebook and Hidden Threats to Mental and Spiritual Freedom. Quinlan, Tex.: Stelle Group, 1986.

Kossy, Donna. Kooks: A Guide to the Outer Limits of Human Belief. Portland, Ore.: Feral House, 1994.

Kueshana, Eklal [Richard Kieninger]. The Ultimate Frontier. Chicago: Stelle Group, 1963.

Adelung, Johann Christoph (1732–1806)

German philologist and grammarian. Adelung published a work on the occult entitled Histoire des folies humaines, on Biographie des plus celebres necromanciens, alchimistes, devins, etc. (Leipzig, 1785–89). He died at Dresden.

Adepts

According to the Theosophical Society and some occultists, adepts are individuals who, after stern self-denial and consistent self-development, have prepared themselves to assist in influencing the advancement of the world. The means by which this is attained are said to be long and arduous, but in the end the successful adept fulfills the purpose for which he was created and transcends other human beings.

The activities of adepts are multifarious, being concerned with the direction and guidance of the activities of other human beings. Theosophists claim that their knowledge, like their powers, far exceeds that of other mortals; they can control forces both in the spiritual and the physical realm and are said to be able to prolong their lives for centuries.

Adepts are also known as the Great White Brotherhood, rishis, rahats, or mahatmas. Ordinary people who earnestly desire to work for the betterment of the world may become "chelas," or apprentices to adepts, in which case the latter are known as masters, but the apprentice must first have practiced self-denial and self-development in order to become sufficiently worthy. The master imparts teaching and wisdom otherwise unattainable (and thus resembles the guru in the Hindu tradition) and helps the apprentice by communion and inspiration. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky alleged that she was the apprentice of such masters and claimed that they dwelled in the Tibetan Mountains. The term adept was also employed by medieval magicians and alchemists to denote a master of their sciences.

Adhab-Algal

The Islamic purgatory, where the wicked are tormented by the dark angels Munkir and Nekir.

Adjuration

A formula of exorcism by which an evil spirit is commanded, in the name of God, to do or say what the exorcist requires of him.

Adler, Margot (1946–   )

Margot Adler, author and Wiccan priestess, is the granddaughter of renowned psychotherapist Alfred Adler. She was raised in a nonreligious setting and attended the University of California at Berkeley (B.S., 1968) during its era of political radicalism. Following her graduation she began a career in broadcast journalism at radio station WBAI-FM. In 1978 she accepted her latest position, with National Public Radio.

Living in New York in the early 1970s, she encountered witchcraft through a study group founded by the New York Coven of Welsh Traditional Witches. In 1973 she became associated with Gardnerian witchcraft. In 1976 she became the priestess of Iargalon, a Gardnerian coven. During her years as an active priestess, she researched and wrote Drawing Down the Moon, a sympathetic history and survey of the modern Wiccan and pagan community. Over the years since, the book, now in its second edition, has introduced many people to witchcraft.

Since 1982 Adler has practiced as a solitary, but remains one of the most visible leaders of the pagan community in North America. In 1988 her handfasting to John Gliedman was the first pagan marriage covered in the New York Times society pages.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. New York: Viking Press, 1979. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press, 1986.

———. Heretic's Heart: A Journey Through Spirit and Revolution. Boston: Beacon Press, 1997.

Adonai

A Hebrew word signifying "the Lord" and used by Jews when speaking or writing of "YHWH," or Yahweh, the ineffable name of God. The Jews entertained the deepest awe for this incommunicable and mysterious name, and this feeling led them to avoid pronouncing it and to substitute the word Adonai for "Jehovah" in their sacred text. The ancients attributed great power to names; to know and pronounce someone's name was to have power over them. Obviously one could not, like the Pagans, suggest that mere creatures had power over God.

This custom in Jewish prayers still prevails, especially among Hasidic Jews, who follow the Kabala and believe that the Holy Name of God, associated with miraculous powers, should not be profaned. Yahweh is their invisible protector and king, and no image of him is made. He is worshiped according to his commandments, with an observance of the ritual instituted through Moses. The term "YHWH" means the revealed Absolute Deity, the Manifest, Only, Personal, Holy Creator and Redeemer.

Adoptive Masonry

Masonic societies that adopted women as members. Early in the eighteenth century such societies were established in France, and they spread speedily to other countries. One of the first to "adopt" women was the Mopses. The Felicitaries existed in 1742. The Fendeurs, or Woodcutters, were instituted in 1763 by Bauchaine, Master of a Parisian lodge. It was modeled on the Carbonari, and its popularity led to the establishment of other lodges, notably the Fidelity and the Hatchet.

In 1774 the Grand Orient Lodge of France established a system of three degrees called the Rite of Adoption and elected the duchess of Bourbon as Grand Mistress of France.

The rite has been generally adopted into Freemasonry, and various degrees were added from time to time to the number of about twelve in all. Latin and Greek mysteries were added to the rite by the Ladies' Hospitallers of Mount Tabor. The greatest ladies in France joined the French lodges of adoption.

The Rite of Mizraim created lodges for both sexes in 1819, 1821, 1838, and 1853, and the Rite of Memphis in 1839. America founded the Rite of the Eastern Star in five points. In these systems, admission was generally confined to the female relations of Masons. The Order of the Eastern Star and that of Adoptive Masonry were attempted in Scotland but without success.

Adramelech

According to Johan Weyer, Adramelech is Chancellor of the infernal regions, Keeper of the Wardrobe of the Demon King, and President of the High Council of the Devils. He was worshiped at Sepharvaim, an Assyrian town, where children were burned on his altar. Rabbis of the period said that he showed himself in the form of a mule or sometimes of a peacock.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Advanced Spiritual Church Healing Center

Center founded by British-born psychic Douglas Johnson. Holds public meetings and is concerned with psychic and spiritual development. Last known address: 10945 Camarillo St., North Hollywood, CA 91602.

"AE"

Pen name of George W. Russell (1867–1935), Irish poet, painter, mystic, and journalist.

Aerial Phenomena Research Organization (APRO)

Founded in January 1952 in Sturgeon Bay, Wisconsin, "to conduct investigations and research into the phenomenon of unidentified flying objects (UFOs) and to find a scientifically acceptable solution to this phenomenon." Led by Jim Lorenzen and his wife, Coral Lorenzen, who authored several popular UFO books, APRO emerged as one of the most outstanding UFO investigation organizations. Through the 1950s the Lorenzens and APRO moved successively to Los Angeles (1954), Alamogordo, New Mexico (1954), and Tucson, Arizona (1960). Beginning as an association of flying saucer clubs that collected accounts of UFOs and commented upon them in the APRO Bulletin, APRO grew into a substantial research organization. It was distinguished from the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP), the other main UFO research organization of the 1950s, by its coolness to the idea of a government cover-up of UFO data and its interest in sightings of humanoid-like creatures associated with the UFOs.

APRO membership peaked in 1967 with 1,500 members. Then in 1969 it suffered two disasters. First, the University of Colorado report of its study of UFOs, popularly known as the Condon Report, struck Ufology (the study of UFOs) a significant blow with the conclusion that nothing was likely to be achieved by further study. As a result, the Air Force dropped its semipublic data collection effort, Project Blue Book. Then APRO suffered a major schism when Walt Andrus, who led a regional office in Illinois, broke away and founded the Midwest UFO Network (now the Mutual UFO Network). Membership began a decline from which APRO never recovered. Jim Lorenzen died in 1986, and Coral followed two years later. The board voted to disband the organization shortly thereafter.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959; The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 2. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Lorenzen, Coral E. The Great Flying Saucer Hoax: The UFO Facts and Their Interpretation. New York: William Frederick Press, 1962. Rev.: Flying Saucers: The Startling Evidence of Invasion from Outer Space. New York: New American Library, 1966.

Lorenzen, Coral, and Jim Lorenzen. Abducted! Confrontations with Beings from Outer Space. New York: Berkley, 1977.

———. Encounters with UFO Occupants. New York: Berkley, 1976.

———. UFOs: The Whole Story. New York: New American Library, 1969.

———. UFOs Over the Americas. New York: New American Library, 1968.

Aerial Phenomenon Clipping and Information Center

A former subscription information service that operated during the 1980s, providing a monthly sampling of reports of unidentified flying objects and related phenomena such as monster or occult occurrences. The reports were compiled from the various wire services and reproduced from original news sources.

Aeromancy

The art of foretelling future events by the observation of atmospheric phenomena, as, for example, when the death of a great man is presaged by the appearance of a comet. Francois de la Tour Blanche stated that aeromancy is the art of fortune-telling by means of specters that are made to appear in the air, or the representation by the aid of demons, of future events, which are projected on the clouds as a film is projected onto a screen. "As for thunder and lightning," he adds, "these are concerned with auguries, and the aspect of the sky and of the planets belonging to the science of astrology."

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

The Aetherius Society

Founded by Sir George King (1919–1997), a British occultist and flying saucer contactee from the West country, whose mother had formerly run a healing sanctuary. He was in his apartment one morning in March 1954 when a voice informed him: "Prepare yourself. You are to become the voice of Interplanetary Parliament." It was King's habit to meditate daily, and while so engaged several days later, he was visited by an Indian yoga master who informed him of his mission: the Cosmic Intelligences had selected him as their "primary terrestrial channel." King began to communicate with an entity named Aetherius, a Venusian who was one of the Cosmic Masters of the Interplanetary Parliament located on Saturn. (Jesus Christ is also considered a Parliamentary Master.) Until his death in 1997, Dr. King was in regular contact with these masters.

Eventually King went public when he permitted the Master Aetherius to speak through him at a channeling held at Caxton Hall in London. He began the magazine Aetherius Speaks to Earth (now Cosmic Voice) and in 1956 founded the Aetherius Society. By this time the issue of UFOs had become a matter of public concern, and UFO contactees like King were offering an answer. Before the decade was out, King had attracted a following in the United States, and an American headquarters was established in Los Angeles.

King developed a picture of the cosmos as ruled by an extraterrestrial hierarchy similar to the theosophical spiritual hierarchy. The hierarchy sent spiritual energy to the planet, which could be used to fight the forces of evil, especially those coming from evil extraterrestrials. Spaceships position themselves above the earth at special times of the year, considered the best moments for transmitting the energies from outer space. King authored a series of books spelling out the theology and practices of what emerged as a new occult religion.

King claimed that he received a mystical consecration on July 23, 1958, from the Master Jesus for his mission; the Lord Buddha added his consecration on December 5, 1978. The society continues and has headquarters in both London and California, where it owns a complex of buildings. It may be contacted at 757 Fulham Road, London, SW6 5UU, England and 6202 Afton Place, Los Angeles, CA 90028. Website: http://www.aetherius.org/.

Sources:

King, George. The Nine Freedoms. Los Angeles: Aetherius Society, 1963.

———. The Practices of Aetherius. Hollywood, Calif.: Aetherius Society, 1964.

———. The Twelve Blessings. London: Aetherius Press, 1958.

———. You Are Responsible. London: Aetherius Press, 1961.

The Story of Aetherius Society. Hollywood, Calif.: Aetherius Society, n.d.

Aetherius Speaks to Earth See Cosmic Voice

Aetities (or Aquilaeus)

A precious stone of magical properties, composed of iron oxide with a little silex and alumina, and said to be found in the stomach or neck of the eagle. It is supposed to heal falling sickness and prevent untimely birth. It was worn bound on the arm to prevent abortion and on the thigh to aid parturition.

AFAN See Association for Astrological Networking

Affectability

A term coined by parapsychologist Charles Stuart implying susceptibility to feedback in a situation where the subject in an ESP test is told the score on the previous run and asked to estimate the score on the next run. In this context, "affectable" subjects were those who consistently gave estimates that reflected their score on the immediately previous run; "unaffectable subjects" were not so influenced. Stuart also used the term "affectable" for subjects who were markedly extreme in expressing likes or dislikes to various possible interests, while "unaffectable" subjects were relatively indifferent to many of these interests. By measurement on a Stuart Interest Inventory, Stuart claimed that unaffectable subjects appeared to score higher than affectable on ESP perception. However, the term "affectability" can be applied generally to the degree of suggestibility of a subject.

Sources:

Stuart, Charles. "An Analysis to Determine a Test Predictive of Extra-chance Scoring in Card-calling Tests." Journal of Parapsychology vol. 5 (1941).

———. "An Interest Inventory Relation to ESP Scores." Journal of Parapsychology vol. 10 (1946).

Affiliated New Thought Network

The Affiliated New Thought Network is a cooperative fellowship of independent New Thought centers, many with a previous association with Religious Science and the teachings of Ernest Holmes, that originated in the mid-1990s in California. New Thought is that spiritual metaphysical perspective that originated in the late nineteenth century as a religious expression of the Emersonian tradition. Many of its early proponents had been members of the Church of Christ, Scientist. It has been characterized as a very loosely organized movement in contrast to the tight organization of Christian Science. Ernest Holmes was the last student of Emma Curtis Hopkins, generally regarded as the founder of New Thought. Prominent in the formation of the network was Harry Morgan Moses of the New Thought Center of San Diego. The network's goal is the promotion of New Thought as a practical philosophy and instructing people on its day-to-day application. It is the members' belief that New Thought can foster global transformation and healing.

Associated with the network as its educational arm is Emerson Institute, located in Oakhurst, California. The institute provides a full curriculum of classes that includes not only an emphasis on the metaphysical teachings of the first generation of New Thought from Emma Curtis Hopkins to Ernest Holmes, but also the insights from a spectrum of contemporary teachers such as Deepak Chopra and Wayne Dyer.

Since its founding, the network has grown from five affiliated centers, all in California, in 1997 to more than 40, scattered across the United States and Canada, in 2000. The network may be contacted c/o Dr. Harry Morgan Moses at the New Thought Center, 8798 Complex Dr., San Diego, CA 92123. Its webpage can be found at http://www.newthought.org/.

Sources:

Affiliated New Thought Network. http://www.newthought.org/. May 16, 2000.

Emerson Institute. http://emersoninstitute.edu/. May 16, 2000.

AFRICA

(Note: The north of Africa, including the Sahara and the Sudan, has been Islamic territory for many centuries. For a discussion of Islamic magic and alchemy, see the entry Arabs. Instances of Arabic sorcery are also discussed in the Semites entry.)

Beliefs and practices thought of as occult in Western society were integral to the traditional tribal religions in the southern two-thirds of Africa, especially those concerning sympathetic magic, the cult of the dead, and witchcraft. During the history of this region, the basically pantheistic and polytheistic religions have also been cross-fertilized with Islamic and Christian teachings, creating new beliefs and modifying old ones. Today a large but undetermined number of Africans follow traditional beliefs involving deities, ghosts, and spirits as well as an array of special powers in nature presided over by the supreme entity adopted from Christianity and Islam. The latter, somewhat remote from everyday problems, is believed to largely operate on humans through the many other deities.

Southern Africa

Among the Zulu and other Bantu tribes of equatorial and southern Africa, witchcraft or malevolent sorcery was traditionally practiced—in secret, for the results of detection were terrible. Tribes instituted a caste of witchfinders assigned the task of tracking down witches.

The nineteenth-century writer Lady Mary Anne Barker observed,

"It is not difficult to understand, bearing in mind the superstition and cruelty which existed in remote parts of England not so very long ago; how powerful such women become among a savage people, or how tempting an opportunity they could furnish of getting rid of an enemy. Of course they are exceptional individuals; more observant, more shrewd, and more dauntless than the average fat, hard-working Kaffir women, besides possessing the contradictory mixture of great physical powers and strong hysterical tendencies. They work themselves up to a pitch of frenzy, and get to believe as firmly in their own supernatural discernment as any individual among the trembling circle of Zulus to whom a touch from the whisk they carry is a sentence of instant death."

The Zulu witchfinders were attended by a circle of girls and women who, like a Greek chorus, clapped their hands and repeated a low chant, the measure and rhythm of which changed at times with a stomp and a swing of the arm. Ceremonial dress was also an important part of the witch doctor's role, for such things appealed directly to the imagination of the crowd and prepared onlookers to be readily swayed by the necromancer's devices. One of the witchfinders, Nozinyanga, was especially impressive. Her fierce face, spotted with gouts of red paint on cheek and brow, was partly overshadowed by a helmetlike plume of the tall feathers of the sakabula bird. In her right hand she carried a light sheaf of assegais (spears), and on her left arm was slung a small and pretty shield of dappled oxhide. Her petticoat, made of a couple of large handkerchiefs, was worn kiltwise. From neck to waist she was covered with bead-necklaces, goat's-hair fringes, and the scarlet tassels. Her chest rose and fell beneath the baldric of leopard skin, fastened across with huge brazen knobs, while down her back hung a beautifully dried and flattened skin of an enormous boa constrictor.

When the community had resolved that a certain misfortune was caused by witches, the next step was to find and punish them. For this purpose the king summoned a great meeting, his subjects sitting on the ground in a ring or circle for four or five days. The witchfinders took their places in the center, and as they gradually worked themselves up to an ecstatic state, resembling possession, they lightly switched with their quagga-tail one of the trembling spectators, who was immediately dragged away and butchered, along with all of his or her relatives and livestock. Sometimes a whole kraal was exterminated in this way, so reminiscent of European witch-hunts.

Barker also described a sorceress named Nozilwane, whose wistful glance, she noticed, had in it something uncanny and uncomfortable. She was dressed beautifully in lynx skins folded over and over from waist to knee, the upper part of her body covered by strings of wild beasts' teeth and fangs, beads, skeins of gaily colored yarn, strips of snakeskin, and fringes of Angora goat fleece. Lynx tails hung like lappets on each side of her face, which was overshadowed and almost hidden by a profusion of sakabula feathers. "This bird," Barker commented, "has a very beautiful plumage, and is sufficiently rare for the natives to attach a peculiar value and charm to the tail-feathers; they are like those of a young cock, curved and slender, and of a dark chestnut color, with a white eye at the extreme tip of each feather." Among all this thick, floating plumage were interspersed small bladders and skewers or pins wrought out of tusks. Like the other witchfinders, she wore her hair highly greased and twisted up with twine until it ceased to have the appearance of hair and hung around the face like a thick fringe, dyed deep red.

Bent double and with a catlike gait, Nozilwane came forward. Every movement of her undulating body kept time to the beat of the girls' hands and their low crooning chant. Soon she pretended to find the thing she sought, and with a series of wild pirouettes leaped into the air, shaking her spears and brandishing her shield like a bacchante. Nowamso, another of the party, was determined that her companion should not get all the applause, and she too, with a yell and a leap, sprang into the dance to the sound of louder grunts and harder handclaps. Nowamso was anxious to display her back, where a magnificent snakeskin, studded in a regular pattern with brass-headed nails, floated like a stream. She was attired also in a splendid kilt of leopard skins, decorated with red rosettes, and her dress was considered more careful and artistic than any of the others'. Nozilwane, however, had youth and stamina on her side. The others, although they all joined in and hunted out an imaginary enemy, and in turn exulted over his discovery, soon became breathless and spent and were glad when their attendants led them away to be anointed and to drink water.

Central Africa

The magical beliefs of central and eastern Africa were for the most part connected with beliefs and practices concerning the dead and the honoring of images. When the ghost of a dead person was weary of staying in the bush, many believed that the spirit would come for one of the people over whom they exerted the most influence. The spirit would say to that person, "I am tired of dwelling in the bush, please to build for me in the town a little house as close as possible to your own." The spirit would also instruct him to dance and sing, and accordingly he would assemble the women at night to join in dance and song.

Then, the next day, the people would go to the grave of the obambo, or ghost, and make a crude image, after which a bamboo bier, on which a body is conveyed to the grave, and some of the dust of the ground were carried into a little hut erected near the house of the visited, and a white cloth was draped over the door. A curious element of the ritual, which seems to show that these people had a legend something like the old Greek myth of Charon and the river Styx, was a song chanted during the ceremony with the following line: "You are well dressed, but you have no canoe to carry you across to the other side."

Possession

In most preindustrial cultures, epileptic diseases were assumed to be the result of demoniac possession. In much of Africa the sufferer was supposed to be possessed by Mbwiri, and the person was relieved only by the intervention of the medicine man (priest) or a spirit or deity. In the middle of the street a hut was built for the sufferer, and there he resided, along with the priest and his disciples, until cured, or maddened. Townspeople held a continuous revel, including what seemed like unending dances to the sound of flute and drum, for ten days to two weeks, engaging in much eating and drinking all at the expense of the patient's relatives.

The patient at some point danced, usually feigning madness, until the epileptic attack came on accompanied by a frenzied stare, convulsed limbs, the gnashing of teeth. The man's actions at this point were not ascribed to himself, but to the demon that had control of him. When a cure, real or pretended, had been effected the patient built a little house for the spirit image, avoided certain kinds of food, and performed certain duties. Sometimes the process terminated in the patient's insanity; some were known to run away to the bush, hide from all human beings, and live on the roots and berries of the forest.

One European writer observed of the tribal medicine man, "[They] are priest doctors, like those of the ancient Germans. They have a profound knowledge of herbs, and also of human nature, for they always monopolise the real power in the state. But it is very doubtful whether they possess any secrets save that of extracting virtue and poison from plants. During the first trip which I made into the bush I sent for one of these doctors. At that time I was staying among the Shekani, who are celebrated for their fetish [image]. He came attended by half-a-dozen disciples. He was a tall man dressed in white, with a girdle of leopard's skin, from which hung an iron bell, of the same shape as our sheep bells. He had two chalk marks over his eyes. I took some of my own hair, frizzled it with a burning glass, and gave it to him. He popped it with alacrity into his little grass bag; for white man's hair is fetish of the first order. Then I poured out some raspberry vinegar into a glass, drank a little of it first, country fashion, and offered it to him, telling him that it was blood from the brains of great doctors. Upon this he received it with great reverence, and dipping his fingers into it as if it was snap-dragon, sprinkled with it his forehead, both feet between the two first toes, and the ground behind his back. He then handed his glass to a disciple, who emptied it, and smacked his lips afterwards in a very secular manner. I then desired to see a little of his fetish. He drew on the ground with red chalk some hieroglyphics, among which I distinguished the circle, the cross, and the crescent. He said that if I would give him a fine 'dush,' he would tell me about it. But as he would not take anything in reason, and as I knew that he would tell me nothing of very great importance in public, negotiations were suspended."

The claims of the priest to possess supernatural powers were seldom questioned. He was not only a doctor and a priest who intervened with the spirits and deities—two capacities in which his influence was necessarily very powerful—he was also a witchfinder, and this office invested him with a truly formidable authority. When a man of worth died, his death was invariably ascribed to witchcraft, and the aid of the priest was invoked to discover the witch.

When a man was sick a long time, his neighbors called Ngembi, and if she could not make him well, they called the priest. He came at night, in a white dress, with cock's feathers on his head, carrying a bell and a little glass. He called two or three of the victim's relatives together. He did not speak, but always looked in his glass. Then he told them that the sickness was not of Mbwiri, nor of a ghost, nor of God, but that it came from a witch. They would say to him, "What shall we do?" He would then go out and say, "I have told you. I have no more to say." They then gave him a dollar's worth of cloth, and every night they gathered together in the street and cried, "I know that man who bewitched my brother. It is good for you to make him well." Then the witch made him well.

If the man did not recover they called the bush doctor from the Shekani country. At night he went into the street; all the people flocked about him. With a tiger skin in his hand, he walked to and fro, until, singing all the while, he laid the tiger skin at the feet of the witch. At the conclusion of his song the people seized the witch and put him or her in chains, saying, "If you don't restore our brother to health, we will kill you."

Western Occultism in Africa

Today more than 100 million Africans follow a form of Islamic faith, and an almost equal number some form of Christianity. In addition to Roman Catholic and Protestant faiths, there are many variant forms of Christianity, and many Christian groups have become independent of the older missionary churches and reorganized as indigenous religious bodies. The religious picture has been confused in recent years as a result of the unrest attending the throwing off of colonial regimes and the establishment of autonomous governments. Another important factor in the changes surfacing on the entire continent, in addition to political reform and upheaval, has been the education of many young Africans at American and European universities. As they travel back to Africa with western ideas and the seeds for a new way of economic survival, the scene is likely to change on all fronts—even regarding their own ancient superstitions and folk legends.

In the midst of these changes, Western occult, metaphysical, and mystical literature has circulated through the continent since the 1920s, especially in South Africa, the central African states, and such West African nations as Ghana and Nigeria. Since World War II there has been a noticeable popular response to such ideas. As early as 1925 the Rosicrucians were present in West Africa, and New Thought was introduced into Africa in the 1930s when several American teachers toured the country and assisted in the formation of the School of Practical Christianity in 1937 (now known as the School of Truth). Today a broad range of such groups as the Church of Religious Science, the Unity School of Christianity, Swedenborgians, and the Church Universal and Triumphant are in existence. In the last two decades, guru-oriented groups such as ECKANKAR, Subud, and the Grail Movement, and some of the new Japanese religions have appeared. Numerous gurus, including Maharishi Mehesh Yogi, Satya Sai Baba, and Guru Maharaj Ji have a following. The New Age movement has been particularly strong in South Africa, mostly among the white population, and has provoked the appearance of a reactionary anti-New Age effort.

Most interesting has been the emergence of new indigenous African metaphysical movements. Typical of these are the Spiritual Fellowship and the Esom Fraternity Company, both operating in Nigeria. The latter, for example, has established a training school specializing in the healing arts and sciences and what is called a "cosmic hospital." The Spiritual Fellowship grew out of the literary efforts of A. Peter Akpan, who has developed an eclectic program of spiritual development aimed at attaining the higher levels of consciousness. Yogi Kane is a Hindu teacher operating in the Senegal, where he teaches what he terms "Egyptian" yoga. East and West come together in these new movements in a mutual affirmation of astrology, divination, spiritual healing, and an esoteric approach to life. These indigenous have also become an avenue for the advancement of women who often must assume a secondary role in traditional African religions as well as in Christianity and Islam.

Sources:

Gardiner, John. The New Age Cult in South Africa. Cape Town: Stuikhof, 1991.

Hackett, Rosalind I. J. "New Age Trends in Nigeria: Ancestral and or Alien Religion?" In Perspectives on the New Age, edited by James R. Lewis and J. Gordon Melton. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

———. Religion in Calabar: The Religious Life and History of a Nigerian Town. Berlin: Mouton de Gruyter, 1989.

Oosthuizen, Gehardus C. "The 'Newness' of the New Age in South Africa and Reactions to It." In Perspectives on the New Age, edited by James R. Lewis and J. Gordon Melton. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

Parrinder, Geoffrey. African Traditional Religion. London: Sheldon Press, 1974. Reprint, New York: Harper, 1977.

Wellard, James. Lost Worlds of Africa. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1967.

African Architects, Order of Eighteenth-century Masonic order founded in Prussia in 1767 by Brother Von Kopper and C. F. Koffen, under the auspices of Frederick II. The order was concerned largely with historical research into freemasonry, Christianity, alchemy, and chivalry and attracted many distinguished European literary figures of the period. A vast building was erected as Grand Chapter, containing an extensive library, museum of natural history, and a chemical laboratory. The Architects published many works of freemasonry and awarded an annual gold medal to the author of the best historical memoir on the subject. Branches of the order were established at Worms, Cologne, and Paris, and it was said to be affiliated with the Society of Alethophilas, or Lovers of Truth, after which it named one of its grades.

There were two temples, comprising the following degrees: (1) Apprentice of Egyptian Secrets, (2) Initiate into Egyptian Secrets, (3) Cosmopolitan, (4) Christian Philosopher, and (5) Alethophilos. Higher Grades: (1) Esquire, (2) Soldier, and (3) Knight, thus supplying Egyptian, Christian, and Templar mysteries to the initiate. In 1806 a pamphlet was published at Berlin entitled A Discovery Concerning the System of the Order of African Architects.

AFS See American Folklore Society

Ag

A red flower used by some Hindus to propitiate the deity Sanee (the planet Saturn). It is made into a wreath with jasoon, also a red-colored flower, which is hung round the neck of the god, who is of a congenial nature. This ceremony is performed at night.

Agaberte

Daughter of a certain giant called Vagnoste dwelling in Scandinavia. She was a powerful enchantress and was rarely seen in her true shape. Sometimes she would take the form of an old woman, wrinkled and bent, and hardly able to move about. At one time she would appear weak and ill, and at another tall and strong, so that her head seemed to touch the clouds.

She effected these transformations without the smallest effort or trouble. People believed her capable of overthrowing the mountains, tearing up the trees, drying up the rivers with the greatest of ease. They held that nothing less than a legion of demons must be at her command in order for her to accomplish her magic feats. She seems to be like the Scottish Cailleach Bheur, a nature hag.

Agapis

According to ancient tradition, this was a yellow stone said to promote love or charity; it also cured stings and venomous bites when dipped in water and rubbed over the wound.

Agares

According to Johan Weyer, Agares is Grand Duke of the eastern region of Hades. He is shown in the form of a benevolent lord mounted on a crocodile and carrying a hawk on his fist. The army he protects in battle is indeed fortunate, for he disperses their enemies and puts new courage into the hearts of the cowards who fly before superior numbers. He distributes place and power, titles and prelacies, teaches all languages, and has other equally remarkable powers. Thirty-one legions are under his command.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Agasha Temple of Wisdom, Inc.

The Agasha Temple of Wisdom is a Spiritualist church that, during its first generation, was built around the mediumship of Rev. Richard Zenor (1911–1978), a channel for the master teacher Agasha. The temple was founded in 1943 and attained some degree of fame after reporter James Crenshaw wrote sympathetically about it in his book Telephone Between Two Worlds. Toward the end of Zenor's life, an attempt was made to compile the more important discourses of Agasha in several volumes edited by William Eisen. Two years after Zenor's death, Rev. Geary Salvat, also a channel, was chosen to succeed him. Salvat channels the master teacher Ayuibbi Tobabu.

Both Agasha and Ayuibbi Tobabu have articulated what they consider a universal philosophy based on the acceptance of individual responsibility and a spiritual democracy within the larger context of universal laws. Basic laws include the Golden Rule (Do unto others as you would have them do unto you) and the law of compensation (For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction). The temple is headquartered at 7525 Fallbrook Ave., West Hills, CA 91307. It has several centers in the United States and one in Japan.

Sources:

Crenshaw, James. Telephone Between Two Worlds. Los Angeles: DeVorss, 1950.

Eisen, William. Agasha, Master of Wisdom. Marina del Rey, Calif.: DeVorss, 1977.

———. The English Cabala. 2 vols. Marina del Rey, Calif.: DeVorss, 1980–82.

Eisen, William, ed. The Agashan Discourse. Marina del Rey, Calif.: DeVorss, 1978.

Zenor, Richard. Maggie Answers You. San Diego: Philip J. Hastings, 1965.

Agate (or Achates)

According to ancient tradition, this precious stone protected against the biting of scorpions or serpents, soothed the mind, drove away contagion, and put a stop to thunder and lightning. It was also said to dispose the wearer to solitude, promote eloquence, and secure the favor of princes. It gave victory over enemies to those who wore it.

Agathion

A familiar spirit that was said to appear only at midday. It took the shape of a man or a beast, or even enclosed itself in a talisman, bottle, or magic ring.

Agathodaemon

Benevolent deity in Greek mythology, the "good spirit" of vineyards and cornfields. According to Aristophanes, Agathodaemon was honored by drinking a cup of wine at the end of a meal. He was represented pictorially in the form of a serpent or sometimes as a young man holding a horn of plenty, a bowl, and ears of corn. Winged serpents were also venerated by the ancient Egyptians, Chinese, and other peoples. (See also Dragon)

Agent

Term in parapsychology to denote the individual who attempts to communicate information to a percipient, or subject, of extrasensory perception.

The Age of Progress

American Spiritualist weekly edited by Stephen Albro, who witnessed and reported on the early demonstrations of the Davenport Brothers in the 1850s.

Agharta (or Agharti)

In his book Agharta (1951), Robert Ernst Dickhoff claimed that Martians colonized Earth 80,000 years ago and built an elaborate system of underground tunnels, starting in Antarctica, with exits in Tibet, Brazil, the United States, and elsewhere. A secret underground port for UFOs called Rainbow City was supposed to be still in operation.

This colorful story appears to be related to the Tibetan legend of the subterranean kingdom of Agharti, presided over by "the King of the World." Millions of people are said to live in these underground realms in cities without crime and using a highly developed science. The King of the World understands the people on Earth and influences them secretly. He is to appear before the people of Earth in a final cosmic struggle of good against evil. This legend was recounted in the book Beasts, Men, and Gods by Ferdinand Ossendowski. Ossendowski (1876–1945) was a Polish writer who traveled extensively through Central Asia in the 1920s. (See also Shaver Mystery; Subterranean Cities)

Sources:

Dickhoff, Robert Ernest. Agharta. Mokelumne Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1964.

Ossendowski, Ferdinand. Beasts, Men, and Gods. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1922.

Agla

A word from the Kabala formerly used by rabbis for exorcisms of the evil spirit. It is made up of the initial letters of the Hebrew words, Athah gabor leolam, Adonai, meaning, "Thou art powerful and eternal, Lord." Among superstitious Christians it was also a favorite weapon with which to combat the evil one, as late as the sixteenth century. It is found in many books on magic, notably in the Enchiridion ascribed to Pope Leo III.

Aglaophotis

A kind of herb said to grow in the deserts of Arabia and much used by sorcerers for the evocation of demons. Other plants were then employed to retain the evil spirits as long as the sorcerer required them.

Agondonter (Newsletter)

Quarterly publication concerned with the twentieth-century channeled gospel Urantia, published by the First Urantia Society of Los Angeles. Last known address: PO Box 563, Los Angeles, CA 90053.

Agpaoa, Tony (1939–1982)

A Filipino Spiritualist healer, born in 1939, who claimed to perform surgery with his bare hands without anesthetic. To perform psychic surgery Agpaoa passed his hand across the area to be operated, and an incision appeared. He operated either with his fingers or a pair of scissors, and the wound appeared to suture instantaneously without scarring.

As with similar psychic surgery in Brazil, such operations were highly controversial. Early reports, were most positive, but later studies have condemned Agapoa and his colleagues as clever conjurers. For example, in his book Flim-Flam! James Randi pointed out that when Agpaoa needed to have his own appendix removed, he had the operation at a San Francisco hospital, although there were scores of other psychic surgeons in the Philippines. In fact, Agpaoa was treated in a hospital for a stroke that he died from in 1982. (See also José Arigó)

Sources:

Chesi, Gert. Faith Healers in the Philippines. Austria: Perlinger Verlag, 1981.

Jensen, Bernard. Tony: The Miraculous Spiritual Healer at Work. Escondido, Calif: The Author, [1966].

Randi, James. Flim-Flam! Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1982.

Sherman, Harold. Wonder Healers of the Philippines. Los Angeles: DeVorss, 1967.

Valentine, Tom. Psychic Surgery. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1973.

Agricola

Name adopted by mineralogist Georg Bauer (1490–1555), who had also searched for the elixir of life and the secret of the Philosophers' Stone.

Agrippa von Nettesheim, Henry Cornelius (1486–1535)

German soldier and physician, and an adept in alchemy, astrology, and magic. He was born at Cologne September 14, 1486, and educated at the University of Cologne. While still a youth he served under Maximilian I of Germany. In 1509 he lectured at the University of Dole, but a charge of heresy brought against him by a monk named Catilinet compelled him to leave Dole, and he resumed his former occupation of soldier. In the following year he was sent on a diplomatic mission to England, and on his return followed Maximilian to Italy, where he passed seven years, serving various noble patrons.

Thereafter he practiced medicine at Geneva, and was appointed physician to Louise of Savoy, mother of Francis I; but, on being given some task which he found irksome, he left the service of his patroness and denounced her bitterly. He then accepted a post offered him by Margaret, duchess of Savoy, regent of the Netherlands. On her death in 1530, he traveled to France, where he was arrested for some slighting mention of the Queen-Mother, Louise of Savoy. He was soon released, however, and died at Grenoble in 1535.

Agrippa was a man of great talent and varied attainments. He was acquainted with eight languages and was evidently a talented physician, soldier, and theologian with many noble patrons. Yet, notwithstanding these advantages, he never seemed free from misfortune; persecution and financial difficulties dogged him and in Brussels he suffered imprisonment for debt. He frequently made enemies, and the persecution of the monks with whom he often came into conflict was bitter and increasing.

His principal works were a defense of magic, entitled De occulta philosophia, which was not published until 1531, though written some twenty years earlier; and a satirical attack on the scientific pretensions of his day, De incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum et Artium atque Excellentia Verbi Dei Declamatio, also published at Antwerp in 1531. His other works included a treatise De Nobilitate et Praecellentia Feminu Sexus, dedicated to Margaret of Burgundy out of gratitude for her patronage.

His interest in alchemy and magic dated from an early period of his life and gave rise to many tales of his occult powers. It was said that he was always accompanied by a familiar in the shape of a large black dog. There is a tradition that on his death he renounced his magical works and addressed his familiar thus: "Begone, wretched animal, the entire cause of my destruction!" The animal fled from the room and plunged into the Saone, where it perished. It was said that at the inns where he stayed, Agrippa paid his bills with money that appeared genuine enough at the time, but which afterward turned to worthless horn or shell, like the fairy money which turned to earth after sunset. He was also said to have summoned the spirit of Cicero (died 43 B.C.E.) to pronounce his oration for Roscius, in the presence of John George, elector of Saxony, the earl of Surrey, Erasmus, and other eminent people. Cicero duly appeared, delivered his famous oration, and left his audience deeply moved. Agrippa was supposed to have a magic glass in which it was possible to see objects distant in time or place.

One other story concerning the magician is worthy of record. About to leave home for a short time, he entrusted his wife with the key of his museum, warning her to permit no one to enter. But a curious boarder in their house begged for the key, till at length the harassed hostess gave it to him. The first thing that caught the student's attention was a book of spells, which he began to read. A knock sounded on the door. The student took no notice, but went on reading, and the knock was repeated. A moment later a demon entered, demanding to know why he had been summoned. The student was too terrified to make reply, and the angry demon seized him by the throat and strangled him. At the same moment Agrippa entered, having returned unexpectedly from his journey. Fearing that he would be charged with the murder of the youth, he persuaded the demon to restore him to life for a little while and walk him up and down the market place. The demon consented; people saw the student apparently alive and in good health, and when the demon allowed the semblance of life to leave the body, they thought the young man had died a natural death. However, an examination clearly showed that he had been strangled. The true state of affairs leaked out, and Agrippa was forced to flee for his life.

These fabrications of the popular imagination were probably encouraged rather than suppressed by Agrippa, who loved to surround his comparatively harmless pursuits of alchemy and astrology with an air of mystery calculated to inspire awe and terror in the minds of the ignorant. It is known that he had correspondents in all parts of the world, and that from their letters he gleaned the knowledge which he was popularly believed to obtain from his familiars.

Sources:

Agrippa, Henry. Three Books of Occult Philosophy. London: Chthonois Books, n.d.

Agrippa von Nettesheim, H. C. Philosophy of Natural Magic. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

———. Three Books of Occult Philosophy or Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

Federmann, Reinhard. The Royal Art of Alchemy. New York: Chilton Book, 1969.

Ahazu-Demon

(The Seizer). Little is known of this ancient Semitic demon unless it is the same ahazie told of in medical texts, where a man can be stricken by a disease bearing this name.

Ahmad ibn Sirin (ca. ninth century C.E.)

(Also known as Achmet). Arabian seer who wrote a book on dream interpretation, now known only in the Greek and Latin translations, which was published in Paris in 1603 titled Oneirocritica.

Aho, Wayne Sulo (1916–)

Wayne Aho, one of the 1950s flying saucer contactees, was the founder of a small New Age religion, the Cathedral of the Stars. Born on August 24, 1916 in Woodland, Washington, he dated the beginning of his religious career to a childhood experience. When he was only 12 he had heard a voice telling him that he would be able to do something great for humanity in his later life. He joined the Army as a young man and eventually rose to the rank of major during World War II (1939–45).

Several additional experiences similar to the one he had had in childhood occurred in the years after the war. Among the more vivid was a vision of a crack in the Earth as a result of an impending atomic war. Then in 1957, while attending the Giant Rock Interplanetary Spacecraft Convention, then the largest annual gathering of flying saucer buffs, he claimed he was lured away, and at a distance of some two miles from the convention site, a saucer landed. Once on the ground, the saucer, an object of another dimension, vanished, but Aho received telepathic messages presenting him with a mission in life. That evening he had an intense visionary experience that he described as a cosmic initiation. He founded Washington Saucer Intelligence and began to tell anyone who would listen of his knowledge of the flying saucer inhabitants. Numerous articles of his lectures appeared in newspapers and UFO periodicals.

In 1958 Aho became associated with Otis T. Carr, a man involved in selling shares in a free energy company. Aho believed that Carr could create a saucer that could fly to the moon, and joined him on the lecture circuit. The association proved disastrous when Carr was indicted and convicted of fraud. Charges were dropped against Aho when it was determined that he had also been hoaxed in by Carr. In 1961 Aho was committed to a mental hospital, an event he later attributed to Communist agents opposed to his flying saucer message.

After his brief hospitalization, Aho returned to the state of Washington and established the New Age Foundation, the precursor to the Cathedral of the Stars that opened in 1975. He published an account of his contacts with the space beings and remained the leader of his small group through subsequent years. By the 1980s he had faded into obscurity.

Sources:

Aho, Wayne S. Mojave Desert Experience. Eatonville, Wash.: The New Age Foundation, 1972.

Sachs, Margaret. The UFO Encyclopedia. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.

Ahrimanes

The name given to the chief of the Cacodaemons, or fallen angels, by the ancient Persians and Chaldeans. These Cacodaemons were believed to have been expelled from Heaven for their sins; they endeavored to settle down in various parts of the Earth, but were always rejected, and out of revenge they found their pleasure in injuring the inhabitants. Xenocritus thought that penance and self-mortification, though not agreeable to the gods, pacified the malice of the Cacodaemons. Ahrimanes and his followers finally took up their abode in all the space between the Earth and the fixed stars, and there established their domain, which is called Ahriman-abad. As Ahrimanes was the spirit of evil, his counterpart in Persian dualism was Ormuzd, the creative and benevolent being.

AIC See American Institutes for Research

Ailuromancy

Divination through superstitions concerning cats. For example, a black cat crossing your path is a bad omen in the United States and Germany, although usually regarded as lucky in Britain. Owning a black cat is also believed to be lucky. A cat washing its face or ears, or climbing up furniture, is said to indicate rain; if the cat washes its face in the parlor, it may indicate visitors. It is a widespread belief that killing or mistreating a cat will bring ill fortune. This may arise from ancient religious beliefs concerning the cat as a sacred animal.

Ainsarii

An Ishmaelite sect of the Assassins, who continued to exist after the stronghold of that society was destroyed. They held secret meetings for receptions and possessed signs, words, and a catechism. The Ainsarii are discussed in The Asian Mystery Illustrated in the Ansaireeh or Nusairis of Syria by Samuel Lyde, 1860.

Airaudi, Oberto (1950–)

Oberto Airaudi, the founder of Damanhur, an Italian esoteric community, was born in 1950 in Balangero, north of Turin, Italy. As a youth he became involved in the metaphysical community in Turin and found himself drawn to psychic healers, especially some that practiced what was termed pranotherapy, a form of healing that used prana, considered by Hindus the life force, to heal. He became a pranotherapist in the early 1970s and soon established offices in several towns in northern Italy. He also began to operate as a Spiritualist medium and eventually wrote a book on the subject. By 1974 he had attained a following that joined him in the formation of two organizations, the Horus Centre and an associated School of Pranotherapy.

Airaudi advocated the ideals of the communal life and in 1975 land was rented in the Valchiusella Valley north of Turin as a possible site for the community. The following year some two dozen people moved to what was called Damanhur, the name of an ancient Egyptian city. The land was eventually purchased and Damanhur was officially organized in 1979. Airaudi led in the writing of a constitution, first promulgated in 1981, that described the community as a separate state or nation. Members began to think of themselves as citizens of Damanhur and even issued their own money. As the community grew, and married couples with children moved in, a school system was established. Airaudi's attempts to structure a separate community brought initial tension with the local authorities, but these were slowly worked out.

Airaudi has watched the group grow steadily. By 1985 there were some 200 citizens resident at Damanhur. According to the constitution, a community could not exceed 220 members, so the original community was reorganized into several communities which were linked in a federation. The federation grew to approximately 400 citizens by the mid-1990s. To provide an economic base, a variety of small industries have been organized and their products sold to the outside world.

Airaudi has served as the guide of the community and has written a number of books that embody his vision of the world which has grown from Gnostic Theosophical roots. He also led in the creation of the new science of Selfica, the technology of accumulating and utilizing subtle energies, such as prana.

In 1992, it was revealed that soon after acquiring the land for Damanhur, Airaudi had begun directing the building of a large underground temple complex that the residents carved out of the hard mountain rock. Not only were large rooms carved inside the mountain, but each was beautifully decorated in a manner following themes that embodied the group's beliefs. The existence of the temple work had remained a secret in spite of visits by numerous outsiders and the defection of members who were aware of what was occurring. In the wake of the revelation concerning the temple, Airaudi was threatened with his violation of a variety of zoning, building, and tax laws, but as in the past, he was able to work through the issues with the authorities.

As the twentieth century comes to an end, Airaudi continues to lead the community, which has entered a new period of prosperity. Work on the already impressive temple continues. Airaudi has noted that the work is far from complete. The temple construction has been developed in such a way as to embody what has been learned from the selfic science, and structure that concentrate subtle energies may be found throughout the complex.

Sources:

Airaudi, Oberto. Tales from Damanhur. Translated by Esperide and Ileana Troni. Canavese, Italy: Damanhur Editrice, 1997.

Intrivigne, Massimo. "Damanhur: A Magical Community in Italy." Communal Studies 16 (1996) 71–84.

Merrifield, Jeff. Damanhur: The Real Dream. London: Thorsons, 1998.

Akasha (or Soniferous Ether)

One of the five elementary principles of nature according to Hindu mysticism. Akasha is the first of these principles, and out of it the others are created. These subtle principles, or tattvas, are related to the five senses of human beings and to basic elements of matter: earth (prithivi), water (apas), fire (tejas), and air (vayu). The all-pervading akasha is responsible for vibrations of light and sound.

Sources:

Prasad, Rama. The Science of Breath and the Philosophy of the Tattvas, Translated from the Sanskrit, with Introductory and Explanatory Essays on Nature's Finer Forces. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1897.

Akashic Records

A theosophical term denoting a kind of central filing system of all events, thoughts, and actions impressed upon an astral plane, which may be consulted in certain conditions of consciousness. Events are believed to make an impression upon the akasha, or subtle ether, which may be reanimated by mystics as if they are switching on a celestial television set.

The idea of akashic records was central to the work of seer Edgar Cayce. When Cayce went into trance, it was believed that he accessed the records, sometimes referred to as God's Book of Remembrance. The akashic records store the individual's thoughts and information on activities that may be read by certain gifted seers.

Sources:

Neimark, Anne E. With This Gift: The Story of Edgar Cayce. New York: William Morrow, 1978.

Puryear, Herbert B. The Edgar Cayce Primer. New York: Bantam Books, 1982.

Akathaso

Evil spirits that inhabit trees.

Akhnim

A town of Middle Thebais, which at one time possessed the reputation of being the habitation of the greatest magicians. The French traveler Paul Lucas (1664–1737), in his Second Voyage, speaks of the wonderful serpent of Akhnim, which was worshiped by the Muslims as an angel, and which the Christians believed to be the demon Asmodeus.

Akiba ben Joseph (ca. 50–135 C.E.)

A Jewish rabbi of the first century, who began as a simple shepherd, then became a learned scholar, spurred by the hope of winning the hand of a young lady he greatly admired. According to Jewish legend, he was taught by the elemental spirits, was a wonder worker, and at his peak had as many as 24,000 disciples. He was reputed to be the author of a famous work entitled Yetzirah (On the Creation), which is by some ascribed to Abraham, or to Adam. An early Hebrew edition of the Sepher Yetzirah was printed at Lemberg in 1680: a Latin version was printed in Paris in 1552.

Rabbi Akiba was a great teacher who developed a rabbinical school at Jaffu, and his Mishnah became the foundation of the religious code. He was involved in the revolt of Bar-Cochba against Hadrian in 132 C.E. and suffered martyrdom by being flayed alive.

Akita

In 1969, Akita, Japan, was the site of one of the more prominent modern series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary. While praying, Sister Agnes Sasagawa, a young postulate of the Order of the Handmaids of the Eucharist, a Roman Catholic order community, received a locution, a clairaudient message, concerning how she should pray. She ascribed this voice to an angel. The content of the prayer, she later discovered, was the same as that given to the three children who had seen the Virgin Mary at Fatima. Sister Mary was deaf.

Four years later she received another locution, which happened to coincide with the development of the stigmata, a mysterious cross-shaped wound on her hand that refused to stop bleeding. The inner voice directed her to the chapel, where she saw the Virgin for the first time. She also heard a series of accompanying messages from the Virgin calling for prayer and sacrifice. The words seemed to come from a wooden statue of the Virgin located in the chapel. She would see the Virgin two more times. The last of the three messages complained of problems of discord and compromise within the church reaching to the highest levels.

These apparitions would probably have gone unnoticed had it not been for the accompanying phenomena. During the period when the apparitions were being received, the statue oozed a reddish substance from its right hand. Analyzed, it proved to be type AB blood. Then the statue was noticed to perspire. Again the substance was analyzed and proved to be similar to human sweat. Then, several years later, the statue in the chapel began to emit tears from the eyes. All of the sisters saw the tears as did visitors to the convent. At one point, a Japanese film crew from the local television station filmed the phenomena. They also took samples of the tear drops, which upon analysis proved to be the same as human tears. Over the next six years the statue was recorded to weep more than a hundred times.

In 1981, the first miracle was recorded: a woman experienced a healing of what had been diagnosed as terminal brain cancer. Later, Sister Agnes was cured of her deafness.

The local diocese conducted an investigation, and in 1984 the bishop of Niigata announced a favorable conclusion and authorized the veneration of Our Lady of Akita. The messages are in accord with church doctrine and appear to be of mysterious or supernatural origin. This verdict was confirmed by the Vatican in 1984.

The events at Akita challenge the more common explanations of skeptics concerning weeping statues as the substance coming from the eyes was not water (as would have been the case if it was due to mere condensation). In like measure, explanations generally attributed to bleeding statues do not appear applicable.

Sources:

Catholic Apparitions of Jesus and Mary. http://www.frontier.net/Apparitions/akita.num. April 5, 2000.

Aksakof, Alexander N. (1832–1903)

Imperial councillor to the czar and the pioneer of Spiritualism in Russia, as well as a Swedenborg enthusiast. He was born in Repiofka, Russia, in 1832 and educated for civil duty at the Royal Lyceum, St. Petersburg. He was introduced to modern Spiritualism by Andrew Jackson Davis's Nature's Divine Revelations in 1855.

In order to form a correct judgment of both physiological and psychological phenomena, he studied medicine at the University of Moscow for two years. He translated Emanuel Swedenborg's Heaven and Hell, Count Szapary's Magnetic Healing, and the principal works of Robert Hare, William Crookes, J. W. Edmonds, Robert Dale Owen and the Report of the Dialectical Society. Because works on Spiritualism in Russian were suppressed by the censor but German publications were tolerated, his literary activity of necessity centered in Germany.

He founded the Psychische Studien which, under the new title Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie, was instrumental in provoking the first strictly scientific Russian investigation of Spiritualism.

Daniel D. Home, who visited Russia for the first time in 1861, became connected through marriage with Aksakof's family. In 1871 Aksakof introduced Home to Professor Boutlerof and to other professors of the University of St. Petersburg. However, the body of savants was left unconvinced of the reality of his phenomena.

In 1874 the French medium Camille Brédif paid a visit. Professor Wagner attended a seance and was deeply impressed. His article in the Revue de l'Europe aroused such a storm that the university felt impelled to delegate an investigating committee and asked Aksakof to make the necessary arrangements for them. Aksakof went to England in 1875 and engaged a nonprofessional medium, using the name of Mrs. Clayer (to whom he was introduced by Crookes) for presentation to the committee. The lady, who is mentioned in Crookes's Researches, produced strong physical phenomena in good light. The committee, however, refused to be impressed and Professor Mendeleyeff, its principal member, declared in his report Materials by Which to Judge Spiritualism that the medium had an instrument under her skirt and produced table movements and raps by this agency. To this report Aksakof published a caustic reply under the title A Monument of Scientific Prejudice.

In 1876 his request for permission to publish in St. Petersburg a monthly Review of Mediumship was refused. In 1881 he founded the publication Rebus, which was largely subsidized by Aksakof after funds dwindled. It popularized the teachings of Spiritualism.

Aksakof experimented with Henry Slade and Charles Williams when they visited St. Petersburg, and he made arrangements for Kate Fox-Jencken when the czar desired to consult her for the safe conduct of the coronation ceremonies. William Eglinton, Elizabeth d'Esperance, and Eusapia Palladino were the next mediums who engaged his attention. His wife was herself mediumistic and helped him in his work. In a Case of Partial Dematerialisation (1896), he recorded testimonies of an astounding occurrence with d'Esperance.

His most important book, Animismus und Spiritismus (1890), was published in answer to Dr. Edward von Hartmann's Spiritualism. F. W. H. Myers reviewed it in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, where he stated: "I may say at once that on the data as assumed I think that Mr. Aksakof has the better of his opponent." In the book Aksakof says that for the comprehension of mediumistic phenomena we have three hypotheses: 1. Personism (or change of personality) may stand for those unconscious psychical phenomena that are produced within the limits of the medium's own body, those intra-mediumistic phenomena whose distinguishing characteristic is the assumption of a personality changing to that of the medium. 2. Under the name animism we include unconscious psychical phenomena that show themselves outside the limits of the medium's body. Extra-mediumistic operation of objects without contact and finally materialisation. We have here the highest manifestation of the psychic duplication; the elements of personality overstep the limits of the body up to the point of complete externalisation and objectification. 3. Under the name spiritism we include phenomena resembling both personalisation and animism but which we much ascribe to some extra-mediumistic and extra-terrene cause. They differ from the phenomena of personalisation and animism in their intellectual content which affords evidence of an independent personality.

Spiritualism and Science (Der Spiritualismus und die Wissenschaft) [1872] was another of Aksakof's important works. His literary output was considerable, and during his lifetime he translated or wrote over 30 books relating to Spiritualism and psychic research. In 1874, he started a German monthly journal Psychische Studien (Psychic Studies). One of his last translations was Colonel De Rochas's Exteriorisation of Motricity. Under dreadful physical handicaps Aksakof kept on working to the last. His right hand became useless, his eye almost sightless. He died January 17, 1903, after an attack of influenza. Aksakof bequeathed a large sum of money to the British Society for Psychical Research. His own work as an experimenter and psychical researcher was well ahead of its time and not properly recognized.

Sources:

Aksakof, A. N. Animism and Spiritism. Leipzig: Oswald Mutze, 1980.

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Nineteenth-Century Miracles. New York: W. Britten, 1884.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. New York: Charles H. Doran, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1979.

Society for Psychical Research. Proceedings Vol. 6: 665.

Al

According to Éliphas Lévi, this forms part of the inscription on a pentacle that was a frontispiece to the published Grimoire of Honorius, an antipope of the thirteenth century. The letters, used to designate a name of God, were reversed on the pentacle, said to be part of a ritual for the evocation of evil spirits.

"AL" was also a word of considerable importance to magician Aleister Crowley. It was the name given to the revelation he received in 1904 that became the basis of his new system of thelemic magic, usually called The Book of the Law or Liber AL. Crowley placed great store in numerology. In his system, AL equated to 31, the number which he felt held the key to unlocking the meaning of Liber AL.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Law Is for All. Edited by Israel Regardie. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1975.

Lévi, Éliphas. The History of Magic. 1913. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1969.

Alain of Lille (ca. 1128–1203)

Also known as Alanus de Insulensis, Doctor Universalis (because of his universal knowledge), theologian and poet, presumed author of a treatise on alchemy entitled Dicta de Lapide Philosophico, published at Leyden in 1600. Alain de Lille entered the Cistercian order at Clairvaux, taught in Paris, and became bishop of Auxerre. His writings were praised for their clarity of style. However, there is some doubt as to whether he was really the author of the Dicta, since it appears to have been written first in German. The work bears the ascription "Alanus Insulensis," but this may have been due to a contemporary practice of ascribing anonymous works to some illustrious individual who had died and was therefore unable to deny authorship. It has been suggested that the real author was Albertus Cranzius, ca. 1430.

Alamut

A mountain in Persia, which became the stronghold of the sect of Assassins during the eleventh century C.E.

Sources:

Daraul, Akron. A History of Secret Societies. New York: Citadel Press, 1962.

Alary, François

A visionary who had printed at Rouen in 1701, Prophetie . . . sur la naissance miraculeuse de Louis le Grand . . . (The Prophecy of Count Bombaste, [Chevalier de la Rose-Croix], nephew of Paracelsus), published in 1609 on the birth of Louis the Great.

Alastor

A cruel demon, who, according to Johan Weyer, filled the post of chief executioner to the monarch of Hades. The conception of him somewhat resembles that of Nemesis. Zoroaster is said to have called him "The Executioner." Others identify him with the destroying angel. Evil genies were formerly called alastors. Plutarch says that Cicero, who bore a grudge against Augustus, conceived the plan of committing suicide on the emperor's hearth, and thus becoming his "alastor."

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Albertus Magnus (Albert of Cologne) (ca. 1206–1280)

Scholar, philosopher, and scientist traditionally believed to have been an alchemist. No fewer than 21 folio volumes are attributed to him, though it is highly improbable that all of them are really his. In several cases the ascription rests on slender evidence, but those that are incontestably written by him are numerous enough to label him a prolific writer. Tradition holds that he was the inventor of the pistol and the cannon, though the truth of this claim cannot be proven. This does indicate, however, that his scientific skill was recognized by a few of the men of his own time.

Born in Swabia, Germany, he entered the Dominican order in 1223, taught in Paris and Cologne, and became the teacher of Thomas Aquinas. The term Magnus, which is usually applied to him, is not the result of his reputation but is the Latin equivalent of his family name, de Groot. As with many other men destined to become famous, he was distinctly stupid as a boy, but from the outset he showed a predilection for religion. One night the Blessed Virgin appeared to him, which caused his intellect to metamorphose, acquiring extraordinary vitality. Albertus therefore decided that he must show his gratitude to the Madonna by entering the priesthood, and eventually he won eminence in the clerical profession. In 1260 he became bishop of Ratisbon. His books include Summa de Creaturis and Summa Theologiae.

Albertus was repeatedly charged by some of his contemporaries with holding communications with the devil and practicing the craft of magic. He was said to have invited some friends to his house at Cologne, among them William, count of Holland, and when the guests arrived they were amazed to find that, although the season was midwinter and the ground was covered with snow, they were expected to have a meal outside in the garden. Their host urged them to be seated, assuring them that all would be well. Though doubtful, they took their places, and had only begun to eat and drink when their annoyance vanished, for the snow around them melted away and the sun shone brightly.

The alchemist Michael Maier (author of Museum Chimicum), declared that Albertus had succeeded in evolving the philosophers' stone and passed it to his pupil Thomas Aquinas, who subsequently destroyed it, believing it to be diabolical. The alleged discoverer himself says nothing on this subject, but, in his De Rebus Metallicis et Mineralibus, he tells how he had personally tested some gold that had been manufactured by an alchemist, and it resisted many searching fusions. Whether this story is true or not, Albertus was certainly an able scientist, and it is clear that his learning ultimately gained wide recognition, for a collected edition of his vast writings was issued at Leyden as late as 1653.

Albertus died in 1280, was beatified in 1622, and canonized by Pius XI in 1932. There is no firm evidence that Albertus was author of the ever popular occult work ascribed to him under the title Albertus Magnus . . . Egyptian Secrets; or, White and Black Art for Man and Beast.

Sources:

Albertus Magnus. The Book of Secrets of Albertus Magnus: Also, A Book of the Marvels of the World. Edited by M. R. Best and F. H. Brightman. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1973.

Federmann, Reinhard. The Royal Art of Alchemy. New York: Chilton, 1969.

Kovech, F. J., and R. W. Shahan, eds. Albert the Great: Commemorative Essays. Norman Okla.: University of Oklahoma Press, 1980.

Sighart, J. Albert the Great. London: Washbourne, 1876.

Albigenses

A sect that originated in the south of France in the twelfth century. They were named for one of their territorial centers, that of Albi, and were a branch of the Cathari heresy. It is probable that the heresy came originally from Eastern Europe, since they were often designated "Bulgarians" and undoubtedly kept up relations with such sects as the Bogomils and the Paulicians. It is difficult to form any exact idea about their doctrines, as Albigensian texts are rare and contain little concerning their ethics, but we know that they were strongly opposed to the Roman Catholic Church and protested the corruption of its clergy.

Their opponents claimed that they admitted two fundamental principles, good and bad, saying that God had produced Lucifer from himself; that Lucifer was indeed the son of God who revolted against him; that he had carried with him a rebellious party of angels who were driven from Heaven along with him; that Lucifer in his exile created this world with its inhabitants, where he reigned, and where all was evil. It is alleged that the Albigenses further believed that, for the reestablishment of order, God produced a second son, Jesus Christ. Furthermore the Catholic writers on the Albigenses charged them with believing that the souls of men were demons lodged in mortal bodies in punishment of their crimes.

Following the murder of the legate of Pope Innocent III, who was sent to root out the heresy, a crusade was brought against them, resulting in wholesale massacres. The Inquisition was also set upon them, and they were driven to hide in the forests and among the mountains, where, like the Covenanters of Scotland, they met secretly. The Inquisition so terrorized the district in which they lived that the very name of Albigenses was practically blotted out, and by the year 1330, the records of the Holy Office show no further writs issued against the heretics.

It seems possible that such heresies as the Albigenses and the Cathari, with their belief in Lucifer as lord of the world, may have sometimes merged with the pagan folklore that went to form the witchcraft heresy, which was also ruthlessly persecuted by the Inquisition. (See also Gnostics; Arthur Guirdham)

Sources:

Holmes, E. G. A. Albigensian or Catharist Heresy. London: William & Norgate, 1925.

Lea, Henry C. A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages. 3 vols. London: Sampson Low, 1888.

Warner, H. J. The Albigensian Heresy. 2 vols. London: SPCK, 1922–28.

Albigerius (ca. 400 C.E.)

A Carthaginian soothsayer mentioned by St. Augustine. He would fall into strange ecstasies in which his soul, separated from his body, would travel abroad and find out what was taking place in distant places. He could read people's thoughts and discover anything he wished to learn. These wonders were ascribed to the agency of the Devil. St. Augustine also speaks of a time when the possessed man was ill of a fever. Though not in a trance, he saw the priest who was coming to visit him while he was yet six leagues away, and Albigerius told the company assembled around him the exact moment when the priest would arrive.

Albumazar (or Abu-Maaschar) (805–885 C.E.)

Arabian astrologer of the ninth century. Born in Balkh, he lived in Baghdad and was known principally for his astrological treatise entitled Thousands of Years, in which he declares that the world could only have been created when the seven planets were in conjunction in the first degree of Aries, and that the end of the world will take place when these seven planets (the number has now risen to twelve) will be together in the last degree of Pisces. His treatises include De Magnis Conjunctionibus (Augsburg, 1489), Introductorium in Astronomian (Venice, 1506), and Flores Astrologici (Augsburg, 1488). He died at Wasid, Central Asia.

Sources:

McIntosh, Christopher. The Astrologers and Their Creed: An Historical Outline. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1969.

Alchemy

The art and science by which the chemical philosophers of medieval times attempted to transmute the baser metals into gold and silver. Alchemy is also the name of the Gnostic philosophy that undergirded the alchemical activity, a practical philosophy of spiritual purification. There is considerable disagreement as to which, the scientific or the philosophical, is the dominant aspect and the manner in which the two were integrated (which to some extent varied tremendously from alchemist to alchemist).

There is also considerable divergence of opinion as to the etymology of the word. One highly possible origin is the Arabic al (the) and kimya (chemistry), which in turn derived from late Greek chemeia (chemistry), from chumeia (a mingling), or cheein (to pour out or mix). The Aryan root is ghu, (to pour), whence comes the modern word gush. E. A. Wallis Budge, in his Egyptian Magic, however, states that it is possible that alchemy may be derived from the Egyptian word khemeia, "the preparation of the black ore," or "powder," which was regarded as the active principle in the transmutation of metals. To this name the Arabs affixed the article al, resulting in al-khemeia, or alchemy.

History of Alchemy

From an early period the Egyptians possessed the reputation of being skillful workers in metals, and, according to Greek writers, they were conversant with their transmutation, employing quicksilver in the process of separating gold and silver from the native matrix. The resulting oxide was supposed to possess marvelous powers, and it was thought that there resided within it the individualities of the various metals—that in it their various substances were incorporated. This black powder was mystically identified with the underworld god Osiris, and consequently was credited with magical properties. Thus there grew up in Egypt the belief that magical powers existed in fluxes and alloys. It is probable such a belief existed throughout Europe in connection with the bronze-working castes of its several races. (See Shelta Thari)

It was probably in the Byzantium of the fourth century, however, that alchemical science received embryonic form. There is little doubt that Egyptian tradition, filtering through Alexandrian Hellenic sources, was the foundation upon which the infant science was built, and this is borne out by the circumstance that the art was attributed to Hermes Trismegistus and supposed to be contained in its entirety in his works.

The Arabs, after their conquest of Egypt in the seventh century, carried on the researches of the Alexandrian school, and through their instrumentality the art was carried to Morocco and in the eighth century to Spain, where it flourished. During the next few centuries Spain served as the repository of alchemical science, and the colleges at Seville, Cordova, and Granada were the centers from which this science radiated throughout Europe. The first practical alchemist was probably the Arabian Geber, who flourished in the early to mid-eighth century C.E. His Summa Perfectionis implies that alchemical science had already matured in his day, and that he drew his inspiration from a still older unbroken line of adepts. He was followed by Avicenna, Meisner, and Rhasis; in France by Alain of Lisle, Arnaldus de Villanova, and Jean de Meung the troubadour; in England by Roger Bacon; and in Spain by Raymond Lully.

Later, in French alchemy, the most illustrious names are those of Nicolas Flamel (fourteenth century), and Bernard Trévisan (fifteenth century), after which the center of interest changes in the sixteenth century to Germany and in some measure to England, in which countries Paracelsus, Heinrich Khunrath, Michael Maier, Jakob Boehme, Jean Van Helmont, the Brabanter, George Ripley, Thomas Norton, Thomas Dalton, Jean Martin Charnock, and Robert Fludd kept the alchemical flame burning brightly. In Britain, the great scientist Sir Isaac Newton conducted alchemical research.

It is surprising how little alteration is found throughout the period between the seventh and the seventeenth centuries, the heyday of alchemy, in the theory and practice of the art. The same sentiments and processes put forth by the earliest alchemical authorities are also found expressed by the later experts, and a unanimity regarding the basic canons of the art is expressed by the hermetic students of all periods, thus suggesting the dominance of the philosophical teachings over any "scientific" applications. With the introduction of chemistry as a practical art, alchemical science fell into disuse, already having suffered from the number of charlatans practicing it. Here and there, however, a solitary student of the art lingered, and the subject has to some extent been revived during modern times.

The Theory and Philosophy of Alchemy

The grand objects of the alchemical art were (1) the discovery of a process by which the baser metals might be transmuted into gold and silver; (2) the discovery of an elixir by which life might be prolonged indefinitely; and there is sometimes added (3) the manufacture of an artificial process of human life (see Homunculus). Religiously, the transmutation of metals can be thought of as a symbol of the transmutation of the self to a higher consciousness and the discovery of the elixir as an affirmation of eternal life.

The transmutation of metals was to be accomplished by a powder, stone, or elixir often called the philosophers' stone, the application of which would effect the transmutation of the baser metals into gold or silver, depending on the length of time of its application. Basing their conclusions on the examination of natural processes and metaphysical speculation concerning the secrets of nature, the alchemists arrived at the axiom that nature was divided into four principal regions: the dry, the moist, the warm, the cold, from which all that exists must be derived. Nature was also divisible into the male and the female. She is the divine breath, the central fire, invisible yet ever active, and is typified by sulphur, which is the mercury of the sages, which slowly fructifies under the genial warmth of nature.

Thus, the alchemist had to be ingenuous, of a truthful disposition, and gifted with patience and prudence, following nature in every alchemical performance. He recalled that like attracts like, and had to know how to obtain the "seed" of metals, which was produced by the four elements through the will of the Supreme Being and the Imagination of Nature. We are told that the original matter of metals was double in its essence, being a dry heat combined with a warm moisture, and that air is water coagulated by fire, capable of producing a universal dissolvent. These terms the neophyte must be cautious of interpreting in their literal sense, for it is likely that alchemists, other than the several frauds, were speaking about the metaphysics of inner spirituality. Great confusion exists in alchemical nomenclature, and the gibberish employed by the scores of charlatans who in later times pretended to a knowledge of alchemical matters did not tend to make things any more clear.

The neophyte alchemist also had to acquire a thorough knowledge of the manner in which metals "grow" in the bowels of the earth. They were said to be engendered by sulphur, which is male, and mercury, which is female, and the crux of alchemy was to obtain their "seed"—a process the alchemistical philosophers did not describe with any degree of clarity. The physical theory of transmutation is based on the composite character of metals, and on the presumed existence of a substance which, applied to matter, exalts and perfects it. This substance, Eugenius Philalethes and others called "The Light." The elements of all metals were said to be similar, differing only in purity and proportion. The entire trend of the metallic kingdom was toward the natural manufacture of gold, and the production of the baser metals was only accidental as the result of an unfavorable environment. The philosophers' stone was the combination of the male and female "seeds" that form gold. The composition of these was so veiled by symbolism as to make their precise identification impossible.

Occult scholar Arthur Edward Waite, summarized the alchemical process once the secret of the stone was unveiled:

"Given the matter of the stone and also the necessary vessel, the processes which must be then undertaken to accomplish the magnum opus are described with moderate perspicuity. There is the calcination or purgation of the stone, in which kind is worked with kind for the space of a philosophical year. There is dissolution which prepares the way for congelation, and which is performed during the black state of the mysterious matter. It is accomplished by water which does not wet the hand. There is the separation of the subtle and the gross, which is to be performed by means of heat. In the conjunction which follows, the elements are duly and scrupulously combined. Putrefaction afterwards takes place, 'Without which pole no seed may multiply.'

"Then, in the subsequent congelation the white colour appears, which is one of the signs of success. It becomes more pronounced in cibation. In sublimation the body is spiritualised, the spirit made corporeal, and again a more glittering whiteness is apparent. Fermentation afterwards fixes together the alchemical earth and water, and causes the mystic medicine to flow like wax. The matter is then augmented with the alchemical spirit of life, and the exaltation of the philosophic earth is accomplished by the natural rectification of its elements. When these processes have been successfully completed, the mystic stone will have passed through three chief stages characterised by different colours, black, white, and red, after which it is capable of infinite multication, and when projected on mercury, it will absolutely transmute it, the resulting gold bearing every test. The base metals made use of must be purified to insure the success of the operation. The process for the manufacture of silver is essentially similar, but the resources of the matter are not carried to so high a degree.

"According to the Commentary on the Ancient War of the Knights the transmutations performed by the perfect stone are so absolute that no trace remains of the original metal. It cannot, however, destroy gold, nor exalt it into a more perfect metallic substance; it, therefore, transmutes it into a medicine a thousand times superior to any virtues which can be extracted from it in its vulgar state. This medicine becomes a most potent agent in the exaltation of base metals."

Other modern authorities have denied that the transmutation of metals was the grand object of alchemy, and from reasons highlighted earlier, among others, inferred from the alchemistical writings that the object of the art was the spiritual regeneration of mankind. Mary Ann Atwood, author of A Suggestive Inquiry into the Hermetic Mystery, and Civil War General Ethan Allen Hitchcock, author of Remarks upon Alchemy and the Alchemists, were perhaps the chief protagonists of the belief that, by spiritual processes akin to those of the chemical processes of alchemy, the soul of man may be purified and exalted. Both somewhat overstated their case in their assertion that the alchemical writers did not claim that the transmutation of base metal into gold was their grand object. While the spiritual quest may have been dominant, none of the passages that Atwood and Hitchcock quote was inconsistent with the physical aspect of alchemy. Eugenius Philalethes, for example, in his work The Marrow of Alchemy, argues forcefully that the real quest is for gold. It is constantly impressed upon the reader, however, in the perusal of esteemed alchemical works, that only those who are instructed by God can achieve the grand secret. Others, again, state that while a novice might possibly stumble upon it, unless guided by an adept the beginner has small chance of achieving the grand arcanum.

The transcendental view of alchemy, however, rapidly gained ground through the nineteenth century. Among its exponents was A. E. Waite, who argued, "The gold of the philosopher is not a metal, on the other hand, man is a being who possesses within himself the seeds of a perfection which he has never realized, and that he therefore corresponds to those metals which the Hermetic theory supposes to be capable of development. It has been constantly advanced that the conversion of lead into gold was only the assumed object of alchemy, and that it was in reality in search of a process for developing the latent possibilities in the subject man."

At the same time, it must be admitted that the cryptic character of alchemical language was probably occasioned by a fear on the part of the alchemical mystic that he might lay himself open through his magical opinions to the rigors of the law.

Meanwhile, several records of alleged transmutations of base metals into gold have survived. These were reportedly achieved by Nicholas Flamel, Van Helmont, Martini, Richthausen, and Sethon. In nearly every case the transmuting element was said to be a mysterious powder or the "philosophers' stone."

Modern Alchemy

A correspondent writing to the British newspaper Liverpool Post in its Saturday, November 28, 1907, edition gave an interesting description of a veritable Egyptian alchemist whom he had encountered in Cairo not long before:

"I was not slow in seizing an opportunity of making the acquaintance of the real alchemist living in Cairo, which the winds of chance had blown in my direction. He received me in his private house in the native quarter, and I was delighted to observe that the appearance of the man was in every way in keeping with my notions of what an alchemist should be. Clad in the flowing robes of a graduate of Al Azhar, his long grey beard giving him a truly venerable aspect, the sage by the eager, far-away expression of his eyes, betrayed the mind of the dreamer, of the man lost to the meaner comforts of the world in his devotion to the secret mysteries of the universe. After the customary salaams, the learned man informed me that he was seeking three things—the philosophers' stone, at whose touch all metal should become gold—the elixir of life, and the universal solvent which would dissolve all substances as water dissolves sugar; the last, he assured me, he had indeed discovered a short time since. I was well aware of the reluctance of the medieval alchemists to divulge their secrets, believing as they did that the possession of them by the vulgar would bring about ruin of states and the fall of divinely constituted princes; and I feared that the reluctance of the modern alchemist to divulge any secrets to a stranger and a foreigner would be no less. However, I drew from my pocket Sir William Crookes's spinthariscope—a small box containing a particle of radium highly magnified—and showed it to the sheikh. When he applied it to his eye and beheld the wonderful phenomenon of this dark speck flashing out its fiery needles on all sides, he was lost in wonder, and when I assured him that it would retain this property for a thousand years, he hailed me as a fellow-worker, and as one who had indeed penetrated into the secrets of the world. His reticence disappeared at once, and he began to tell me the aims and methods of alchemical research, which were indeed the same as those of the ancient alchemists of yore. His universal solvent he would not show me, but assured me of its efficacy. I asked him in what he kept it if it dissolved all things. He replied 'In wax,' this being the one exception. I suspected that he had found some hydrofluoric acid, which dissolves glass, and so has to be kept in wax bottles, but said nothing to dispel his illusion.

"The next day I was granted the unusual privilege of inspecting the sheikh's laboratory, and duly presented myself at the appointed time. My highest expectations were fulfilled; everything was exactly what an alchemist's laboratory should be. Yes, there was the sage, surrounded by his retorts, alembics, crucibles, furnace, and bellows, and, best of all, supported by familiars of gnome-like appearance, squatting on the ground, one blowing the fire (a task to be performed daily for six hours continuously), one pounding substances in a mortar, and another seemingly engaged in doing odd jobs. Involuntarily my eyes sought the pentacle inscribed with the mystic word 'Abracadabra,' but here I was disappointed, for the black arts had no place in this laboratory. One of the familiars had been on a voyage of discovery to London, where he bought a few alchemical materials; another had explored Spain and Morocco, without finding any alchemists, and the third had indeed found alchemists in Algeria, though they had steadily guarded their secrets. After satisfying my curiosity in a general way, I asked the sage to explain the principles of his researches and to tell me on what his theories were based. I was delighted to find that his ideas were precisely those of the medieval alchemists namely, that all metals are debased forms of the original gold, which is the only pure, non-composite metal; all nature strives to return to its original purity, and all metals would return to gold if they could; nature is simple and not complex, and works upon one principle, namely, that of sexual reproduction. It was not easy, as will readily be believed, to follow the mystical explanations of the sheikh. Air was referred to by him as the 'vulture,' fire as the 'scorpion,' water as the 'serpent,' and earth as 'calacant'; and only after considerable cross-questioning and confusion of mind was I able to disentangle his arguments. Finding his notions so entirely medieval, I was anxious to discover whether he was familiar with the phlogistic theory of the seventeenth century. The alchemists of old had noticed that the earthy matter which remains when a metal is calcined is heavier than the metal itself, and they explained this by the hypothesis, that the metal contained a spirit known as 'phlogiston,' which becomes visible when it escapes from the metal or combustible substance in the form of flame; thus the presence of the phlogiston lightened the body just as gas does, and on its being expelled, the body gained weight. I accordingly asked the chemist whether he had found that iron gains weight when it rusts, an experiment he had ample means of making. But no, he had not yet reached the seventeenth century; he had not observed the fact, but was none the less ready with his answer; the rust of iron was an impurity proceeding from within, and which did not affect the weight of the body in that way. He declared that a few days would bring the realisation of his hopes, and that he would shortly send me a sample of the philosophers' stone and of the divine elixir; but although his promise was made some weeks since, I have not yet seen the fateful discoveries."

That alchemy has continued to be studied in relatively modern times there can be no doubt. Louis Figuier in his L'Alchimie et les Alchimistes (1854), dealing with the subject of modern alchemy, as expressed by the initiates of the first half of the nineteenth century, states that many French alchemists of his time regarded the discoveries of modern science as merely so many evidences of the truth of the doctrines they embraced. Throughout Europe, he said, the positive alchemical doctrine had many adherents at the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth.

Reportedly, a "vast association of alchemists" called the Hermetic Society, founded in Westphalia in 1790, continued to flourish in the year 1819. In 1837 an alchemist of Thuringia presented to the Société Industrielle of Weimar a tincture he averred would effect metallic transmutation. About the same time several French journals announced a public course of lectures on hermetic philosophy by a professor of the University of Munich.

Figuier further stated that many Hanoverian and Bavarian families pursued in common the search for the grand arcanum. Paris, however, was regarded as the alchemistical Mecca. There lived many theoretical alchemists and "empirical adepts." The first pursued the arcanum through the medium of books; the others engaged in practical efforts to effect transmutation.

During the 1840s Figuier frequented the laboratory of a certain Monsieur L., which was the rendezvous of the alchemists of Paris. When Monsieur L's pupils left the laboratory for the day the modern adepts dropped in one by one, and Figuier relates how deeply impressed he was by the appearance and costumes of these strange men. In the daytime he frequently encountered them in the public libraries, buried in the study of gigantic folios, and in the evening they might be seen pacing the solitary bridges with eyes fixed in vague contemplation upon the first pale stars of night. A long cloak usually covered their meager limbs, and their untrimmed beards and matted locks lent them a wild appearance. They walked with a solemn and measured gait, and used the figures of speech employed by the medieval illuminés. Their expression was generally a mixture of the most ardent hope and a fixed despair.

Among the adepts who sought the laboratory of Monsieur L., Figuier noticed especially a young man in whose habits and language he could see nothing in common with those of his strange companions. He confounded the wisdom of the alchemical adept with the tenets of the modern scientist in the most singular fashion, and meeting him one day at the gate of the observatory, M. Figuier renewed the subject of their last discussion, deploring that "a man of his gifts could pursue the semblance of a chimera." Without replying, the young adept led him into the observatory garden and proceeded to reveal to him the mysteries of modern alchemical science.

The young man recognized a limit to the research of the modern alchemists. Gold, he said, according to the ancient authors, has three distinct properties: (1) resolving the baser metals into itself, and interchanging and metamorphosing all metals into one another; (2) curing afflictions and the prolongation of life; and (3) serving as a spiritus mundi to bring mankind into rapport with the supermundane spheres. Modern alchemists, he continued, rejected the greater part of these ideas, especially those connected with spiritual contact. The object of modern alchemy might be reduced to the search for a substance having power to transform and transmute all other substances one into another—in short, to discover that medium known to the alchemists of old as the philosophers' stone and now lost to us. In the four principal substances of oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, and azote, we have the tetractus of Pythagoras and the tetragram of the Chaldeans and Egyptians. All the sixty elements are referable to these original four. The ancient alchemical theory claimed that all the metals are the same in their composition, that all are formed from sulphur and mercury, and that the difference between them is according to the proportion of these substances in their composition. Further, all the products of minerals present in their composition complete identity with those substances most opposed to them. For example, fulminating acid contains precisely the same quantity of carbon, oxygen, and azote as cyanic acid, and "cyanhydric" acid does not differ from formate ammoniac. This new property of matter is known as "isomerism." Figuier's friend then proceeded to quote in support of his thesis the operations and experiments of M. Dumas, a celebrated French savant, as well as those of William Prout and other English chemists of standing.

Passing on to consider the possibility of isomerism in elementary as well as in compound substances, he pointed out to Figuier that if the theory of isomerism can apply to such bodies, the transmutation of metals ceases to be a wild, unpractical dream and becomes a scientific possibility, the transformation being brought about by a molecular rearrangement. Isomerism can be established in the case of compound substances by chemical analysis, showing the identity of their constituent parts. In the case of metals it can be proved by the comparison of the properties of isomeric bodies with the properties of metals, in order to discover whether they have any common characteristics.

M. Dumas, speaking before the British Association, had shown that when three simple bodies displayed great analogies in their properties, such as chlorine, bromide, and iodine, barium, strontium, and calcium, the chemical equivalent of the intermediate body is represented by the arithmetical mean between the equivalents of the other two. Such a statement well showed the isomerism of elementary substances and proved that metals, however dissimilar in outward appearance, were composed of the same matter differently arranged and proportioned. This theory successfully demolished the difficulties in the way of transmutation.

If transmutation is thus theoretically possible, it only remains to show by practical experiment that it is strictly in accordance with chemical laws, and by no means inclines to the supernatural.

At this juncture, the young alchemist proceeded to liken the action of the philosophers' stone on metals to that of a ferment on organic matter. When metals are melted and brought to red heat, a molecular change may be produced analogous to fermentation. Just as sugar, under the influence of a ferment, may be changed into lactic acid without altering its constituents, so metals can alter their character under the influence of the philosophers' stone. The explanation of the latter case is no more difficult than that of the former. The ferment does not take any part in the chemical changes it brings about, and no satisfactory explanation of its effects can be found either in the laws of affinity or in the forces of electricity, light, or heat. As with the ferment, the required quantity of the philosophers' stone is infinitesimal.

The alchemist then averred that medicine, philosophy, every modern science was at one time a source of such errors and extravagances as are associated with medieval alchemy, but they are not therefore neglected and despised. Why, then, should we be blind to the scientific nature of transmutation? One of the foundations of alchemical theories was that minerals grow and develop in the earth, like organic things. It was always the aim of nature to produce gold, the most precious metal, but when circumstances were not favorable the baser metals resulted. The desire of the old alchemists was to surprise nature's secrets, and thus attain the ability to do in a short period what nature takes years to accomplish. Nevertheless, the medieval alchemists appreciated the value of time in their experiments as modern alchemists never do.

Figuier's friend urged him not to condemn these exponents of the hermetic philosophy for their metaphysical tendencies, for, he said, there are facts in our sciences that can only be explained in that light. If, for instance, copper is placed in air or water, there will be no result, but if a touch of some acid is added, it will oxidize. The explanation is that "the acid provokes oxidation of the metal, because it has an affinity for the oxide which tends to form"—a material fact almost metaphysical in its production, and only explicable thereby.

Alchemy in the Twentieth Century

Since the nineteenth-century speculations of Figuier, the modern view of alchemy has primarily regarded it as a mystical approach to chemistry. With the development of subatomic physics and nuclear fission, the transmutation of elements became a reality, culminating in the atomic bomb and atomic power stations, but the vast apparatus and energy needed to transmute elements has increased skepticism that the old alchemists ever succeeded in their dreams.

The alchemical work gave way to ceremonial magic, which today carries most of what is left of the alchemical hermetic tradition. However, there have been a few contemporary figures who followed the alchemical metaphor. Among these was Frater Albertus, who emerged in the 1970s as head of the Paracelsus Research Society in Salt Lake City, Utah. He wrote a number of books about his work, however these only hinted at any alchemical success.

Sources:

Albertus, Frater. The Alchemist of the Rocky Mountains. Salt Lake City, Utah: Paracelsus Research Society, 1976.

———. The Alchemist's Handbook: Manual for Practical Laboratory Alchemy. Rev. ed. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.

Atwood, Mary Anne. A Suggestive Inquiry Into the Hermetic Mystery. London, 1850. Rev. ed. Belfast, 1918. Reprint, New York: Julian Press, 1960. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Bacon, Roger. The Mirror of Alchemy. London, 1597. Los Angeles: Press of the Pegacycle Lady, 1975.

Barbault, Armand, Gold of a Thousand Mornings. London: Neville Spearman, 1975.

Boyle, Robert. Works. 5 vols. London, 1744. Rev. ed. 6 vols. London, 1772.

Cummings, Richard. Alchemists: Fathers of Practical Chemistry. New York: David O. McKay, 1966.

De Givry, Grillot. Witchcraft, Magic & Alchemy. London, 1931. Reprinted as Illustrated Anthology of Sorcery, Magic & Alchemy. New York: Causeway, 1973.

De Rola, Stanislaw K. Alchemy: The Secret Art. Bounty Books/ Crown, 1973. Reprint, London: Thames & Hudson, 1973.

Doberer, Kurt K. The Goldmakers: Ten Thousand Years of Alchemy. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1948.

Dobbs, Betty Jo T. Foundations of Newton's Alchemy; or, The Hunting of the Greene Lyon. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge University Press, 1975.

Eliade, Mircea. The Forge and the Crucible. London, 1962.

Federmann, Reinhard. The Royal Art of Alchemy. New York: Chilton, 1969.

Ferguson, J. Bibliotheca Chemica; a Bibliography of Books on Alchemy, Chemistry and Pharmaceutics. 2 vols. London, 1954.

Figuier, Louis. L'Alchimie et les Achimistes. Paris, 1856.

Hitchcock, C. A. Remarks Upon Alchemy and the Alchemists. Boston: Crosby, Nichols, 1857. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Journal of the Alchemical Society 3 vols., London, 1913–15.

Jung, C. G. Psychology and Alchemy. Volume 12 of the Collected Works. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1968.

Laoux, Gaston. Dictionnaire Hermetique. Paris, 1695.

Lapidus. In Pursuit of Gold: Alchemy in Theory and Practice. London: Neville Spearman, 1976.

Lenglet, Dufresnoy N. Histoire de la Philosophie Hermetique. 2 vols. Paris, 1792.

Read, J. Prelude to Chemistry. London, 1936. Reprint, Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1957.

Redgrove, H. Stanley. Alchemy: Ancient and Modern. London: Rider, 1922. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

———. Bygone Beliefs. London, 1920. Reprinted as Magic & Mysticism: Studies in Bygone Beliefs. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1971.

Sadoul, Jacques. Alchemists and Gold. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1972. Reprint, London: Neville Spearman, 1972.

Silberer, Herbert. The Hidden Symbolism of Alchemy and the Occult Arts. New York: Dover Books, 1971. Reprint, Magnolia, Mass.: Peter Smith, 1972.

Thompson, Charles J. Alchemy: Source of Chemistry & Medicine. London, 1897. Reprint, Sentry Press, 1974.

Valentine, Basil. Triumphal Chariot of Antimony. London, 1656.

Waite, A. E. The Alchemical Writings of Edward Kelly. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

———. Alchemists Through the Ages. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1970.

———. Azoth, or the Star in the East. London, 1893. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

———. The Occult Sciences. London, 1923. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

Waite, A. E., ed. The Hermetical & Alchemical Writings of Paracelsus. 2 vols., London, 1894. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

———. The Works of Thomas Vaughan, Mystic and Alchemist. London, 1919. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

Zetznerus, L., ed. Theatrum Chimicum. 6 vols. Strasbourg, France, 1659–61.

Alchindus (or Alkindi) (ca. ninth century C.E.)

Arabian doctor and philosopher of the ninth century regarded by some authorities as a magician but by others as merely a superstitious writer. He used charmed words and combinations of figures in order to cure his patients. Demonologists maintained that the devil was responsible for his power, and based their statements on the fact that he had written a work entitled The Theory of the Magic Arts. He was probably, however, nothing more formidable than a natural philosopher at a time when all matters of science and philosophy were held in suspicion. Some of his theories were of a magical nature, as when he attempted to explain the phenomena of dreams by saying that they were the work of the elementals, who acted their strange fantasies before the mind of the sleeper as actors play in a theater. But on the whole there is little to connect him with the practice of magic.

Aldinach

An Egyptian demon, who, according to demonologists, presides over tempests, earthquakes, rainstorms, and hailstorms and sinks ships. When he appears in visible form, he takes the shape of a woman.

Alectorius (or Alectoria)

This stone is about the size of a bean, clear as crystal, sometimes with veins the color of flesh. It is said to be taken from the cock's stomach. According to ancient belief, it renders its owner courageous and invincible, brings him wealth, assuages thirst, and makes the husband love his wife, or, as another author has it, "makes the woman agreeable to her husband." Its most wonderful property is that it helps to regain a lost kingdom and acquire a foreign one.

Alectromancy (or Alectryomancy)

An ancient method of divination with a cock. In practicing it, a circle must be made and divided equally into as many parts as there are letters in the alphabet. Then a wheat-corn must be placed on every letter, beginning with A, during which the depositor must repeat a certain verse. This must be done when the sun or moon is in Aries or Leo. A young cock, all white, should then be taken, his claws cut off and the cock forced to swallow them together with a little scroll of parchment made of lambskin upon which has been written certain words. Then the diviner holding the cock should repeat a form of incantation. Next, on placing the cock within the circle, he must repeat two verses of the Psalms, which are exactly in the middle of the 72 verses cited in the entry on onimancy.

With the cock inside the circle, it must be observed from which letters he pecks the grains, and upon these letters new grains must be placed. The letters, when written down and put together will reveal the name of the person concerning whom inquiry has been made.

According to legend the magician Iamblicus used this art to discover the person who should succeed Valens Caesar in the empire, but the bird picking up four of the grains, those which lay on the letters "T h e o," left it uncertain whether Theodosius, Theodotus, Theodorus, or Theodectes, was the person designated. Valens, however, learning what had been done, put to death several individuals whose names unhappily began with those letters, and the magician, to avoid the effects of his resentment, took a draught of poison.

A kind of Alectromancy was also sometimes practiced upon the crowing of the cock, and the periods at which it was heard. Ammianus Marcellinus (fourth century C.E.) describes the ritual that accompanied this act rather differently. The sorcerers commenced by placing a basin made of different metals on the ground and drawing around it at equal distances the letters of the alphabet. Then whoever possessed the deepest occult knowledge, advanced, enveloped in a long veil, holding in his hand branches of vervain, and emitting dreadful cries, accompanied by hideous convulsions. He would stop before the magic basin, and become rigid and motionless. He struck on a letter several times with the branch in his hand, and then upon another, until he had selected sufficient letters to form a heroic verse, which was then given out to the assembly.

The details of an operation in Alectromancy are described in the fourth song of the Caquet Bonbec, of Jonquieres, a poet of the fourteenth century.

Sources:

Waite, A. E.. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Aleuromancy

An ancient kind of divination practiced with flour. Sentences were written on slips of paper, each of which was rolled up in a little ball of flour. These were thoroughly mixed up nine times and divided among the curious who were waiting to learn their fate. Apollo, who was supposed to preside over this form of divination, was surnamed Aleuromantis. The custom lingered in remote districts as late as the nineteenth century.

Sources:

Waite, A. E. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Alexander ab Alexandro (Alexandro Alessandri) (ca. 1461–1523)

A Neapolitan lawyer, who published a dissertation on the marvelous entitled De Rebus Admirabilibus, in which he recounts miracles that happened in Italy, dreams that were verified, and the circumstances connected with many apparitions and phantoms, which he claims to have witnessed. He followed this dissertation with his celebrated work Genialium Dierum, which contains many fantastic accounts.

For instance, one evening he set out to join a party of several friends at a house in Rome said to have been haunted for a long time by specters and demons. In the middle of the night, when all of them were assembled in one room, a frightening specter appeared who called to them in a loud voice and threw about the ornaments in the room. One of the friends approached the specter bearing a light, whereupon it disappeared. Several times afterward the same apparition reentered through the door. Alexander found that the demon had slid underneath the couch he was lying on, and on rising from it, he saw a black arm appear on a table in front of him. By this time several of the company had retired, and the lights were out, but torches were brought in answer to their cries of alarm when the specter opened the door, slid past the advancing domestics, and disappeared.

Alexander of Tralles (ca. sixth century B.C.E.)

A physician born at Tralles in Asia Minor, with a leaning toward medico-magical practice. He prescribed for his patients amulets and charmed words, as, for instance, when he stated in his Practice of Medicine that the figure of Hercules strangling the Nemean lion, graven on a stone and set in a ring, was an excellent cure for colic. He also claimed that charms and phylacteries were efficacious remedies for gout and fevers.

Alexander the Paphlagonian (ca. second century C.E.)

The oracle of Abonotica, an obscure Paphlagonian town, who for nearly twenty years held absolute supremacy in the empirical art. Born about the end of the second century, a native of Abonotica, he possessed little in the way of worldly wealth. His sole capital consisted in his good looks, fine presence, exquisite voice, and certain talent for fraud, which he was soon to profit from in an extraordinary manner. His idea was to institute a new oracle, and he chose Chalcedon as a suitable place to begin operations. Finding no great encouragement there, he spread a rumor to the effect that Apollo and his son Aesculapius intended shortly to take up residence at Abonotica. The rumor at length reached the ears of his fellow townsmen, who promptly set to work making a temple for the gods. The way was thus prepared for Alexander, who proceeded to Abonotica, diligently advertising his skill as a prophet, so that on his arrival people from many neighboring towns consulted him, and his fame soon spread as far as Rome. We are told that the Emperor Aurelius himself conferred with Alexander before undertaking an important military enterprise.

Lucian gives a possible explanation of the Paphlagonian prophet's remarkable popularity. Alexander, he says, came in the course of his early travels to Pella in Macedon, where he found a unique breed of serpents, large, beautiful, and so tame and harmless that they were allowed by the inhabitants to enter their houses and play with children. A plan took shape in his brain that would help him attain the fame he craved. Selecting the largest and finest specimen of the Macedonian snakes that he could find, he carried it secretly to his destination. The temple that the credulous natives of Abonotica had raised to Apollo was surrounded by a moat, and Alexander, ever ready to seize an opportunity wherever it presented itself, emptied a goose egg of its contents, placed within the shell a newly hatched serpent, and sunk it in the moat. He then informed the people that Apollo had arrived. Making for the moat with all speed, followed by a curious multitude, he scooped up the egg, and in full view of the people, broke the shell and exposed to their admiring eyes a little, wriggling serpent. When a few days had elapsed, he judged the time ripe for a second demonstration. Gathering together a huge crowd from every part of Paphlagonia, he emerged from the temple with the large Macedonian snake coiled about his neck. The head of the serpent was concealed under the prophet's arm, and an artificial head, somewhat resembling that of a human being, allowed to protrude. The assembly was astonished to find that the tiny serpent of a few days ago had already attained such remarkable proportions and possessed the face of a human being, and they appeared to have little doubt that it was indeed Apollo come to Abonotica.

By means of ingenious mechanical contrivances, the serpent was apparently made to reply to questions put to it. In other cases sealed rolls containing the questions were handed to the oracle and returned with the seals intact and an appropriate answer written inside.

His audacity and ready invention enabled Alexander to impose at will upon the credulous people of his time, and these, combined with a strong and attractive personality, won and preserved for him his remarkable popularity, as they have done for other "prophets" before and since.

Alfarabi (ca. 870–950 C.E.)

An adept of remarkable gifts with an extensive knowledge of all the sciences. Born at Othrar (then called Faral) in Asia Minor, he was named Abou-Nasr-Mohammed-Ibn-Tarkaw, but he was better known as Farabi, or Alfarabi, from the town of his birth. Though he was of Turkish extraction, he desired to perfect himself in Arabic, so he went to Baghdad and studied the Greek philosophers under Abou Bachar Maltey. He next stayed for a time in Hanan, where he learned logic from a Christian physician. Having far surpassed his fellow scholars, he left Hanan and drifted at last to Egypt. During his wanderings he came in contact with the learned philosophers of his time, and he wrote books on philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, and other sciences, acquiring proficiency in 70 languages. His treatise on music, proving the connection of sound with atmospheric vibrations and mocking the Pythagorean theory of the music of the spheres, attained some celebrity.

He gained the goodwill and patronage of the sultan of Syria in a somewhat curious fashion. While passing through Syria he visited the court of the sultan, who was at that moment discussing abstruse scientific points with doctors and astrologers. Alfarabi entered in his stained and dusty traveling attire (he had been on a pilgrimage to Mecca), and when the sultan bade him be seated, he, either unaware of or indifferent to the etiquette of court life, sat down boldly on a corner of the royal sofa. The monarch, unused to such informality, spoke in a little-known tongue to a courtier, and asked him to remove the presumptuous philosopher. The latter, however, astonished him by replying in the same language: "Sire, he who acts hastily, in haste repents."

The sultan, interested in his unconventional guest, questioned him and learned of the accomplishments of Alfarabi. The sages who were present were also astounded at his wide learning. When the prince eventually called for some music, Alfarabi accompanied the musicians on a lute with such marvelous skill and grace that the entire company was charmed.

The sultan wished to keep such a valuable philosopher at his court, and some say that Alfarabi accepted his patronage and died peacefully in Syria. Others maintain that he informed the sultan that he would never rest till he had discovered the secret of the Philosophers' Stone, which he believed himself on the verge of finding. They say that he set out but was attacked and killed by robbers in the woods of Syria.

Alford, Alan F. (1961–)

Alan Alford, an independent researcher on ancient mysteries, was born and raised in England. He attended the University of Birmingham, where he earned a degree in commerce (1982) and later completed his MBA at Coventry University (1993). Though trained as an accountant, his major interest has been the alternate view of ancient history first proposed by Erich von Däniken and then as developed by Zecharia Sitchin. He focused his own research, which he traces to the mid-1970s when he initially visited Egypt, on the "gods" mentioned so prominently in ancient mythological writings. Both von Däniken and Sitchin had identified these gods as extraterrestrials.

Alford published the fruits of his initial research in 1996, when he self-published his first book, Gods of the New Millennium, that generally supported Sitchin's hypothesis that Earth had been visited in the past by a race of people from a planet (called Nibiru or Marduk) in this solar system as yet undetected by astronomers. These extraterrestrials, the Anunnaki, came to Earth some 445,000 years ago. They enslaved humans, whom they put to work mining gold. They then became the source of human civilization. The year after Gods of the New Millennium appeared, Hodder and Stoughton republished it and gave Alford a three-book contract to write sequels, which they hoped would tap the same support given to Sitchin.

Alford shifted his attention from ancient Sumer and the Holyland, upon which Sitchin had concentrated, to Egypt, hoping to find further evidence of the Anunnaki. However, he concluded that the Egyptian myths did not support Sitchin's thesis; rather, they suggested what he came to call the exploded planet hypothesis. The gods were not extraterrestrial beings, they were meteors that rained down as meteorites. The Egyptian deities were the personifications of celestial powers, such as Ra, the Sun god. The ancient mythological references to the gods descending referred to the coming of fragments of the exploded planet. He also concluded that the Sumerian myths also referred to the exploded planet. This exploded planet hypothesis became the subject of Alford's second book, The Phoenix Solution (1998).

The Phoenix Solution alienated Alford from Sitchin's readers, though he has insisted that he did not depart from his commitment to the idea of the ancient intervention of extraterrestrials in human affairs, only that the gods mentioned in the ancient mythological literature of the Middle East do not provide the support that Sitchin proposed. That alienation was deepened in his third book, When the Gods Came Down (2000), which concentrated upon the Sumerian texts and further expounded upon the exploded-planet theory. Sitchin asked Alford not to criticize him directly, and Alford has followed that request, though the implicit destructive critique of Sitchin's ideas are not lost on anyone who reads Alford's books.

Alford has an extensive Internet site at http://www.eridu.co.uk/ericu.

Sources:

Alford, Alan F. Gods of the New Millennium. 1996. Reprint, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1997.

———. The Phoenix Solution. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1998.

———. When the Gods Came Down. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 2000.

Alfridarya

A belief resembling astrology, which claims that all the planets in turn influence the life of man, each one governing a certain number of years.

Alis de Tésieux (ca. sixteenth century C.E.)

Spirit of a Spanish nun, as recorded in a book published in Paris in 1528: La merveilleuse histoire de l'esprit qui, depuis naguère, s'est apparu au monastère des religieuses de Saint Pierre de Lyon, laquelle est pleine de grande admiration, comme on pourra vois par la lecture de ce prèsent livre, par Adrien de Montalembert, aumonier du roi François Ier. This work dealt with the appearance in the monastery of the spirit of Alis de Tésieux, a nun who had lived there before the reformation of the monastery in 1513. It seems Alis led a rather worldly life, following pleasure and enjoyment in a manner unbecoming to a nun, finally stealing the ornaments from the altar and selling them. She left the monastery and for a time continued her disgraceful career outside, but before she died she repented of her sins and, through the intercession of the Virgin, received pardon. However, she was refused Christian burial and was interred without the usual prayers and funeral rites.

A number of years later, when the monastery was occupied by other nuns, one of their number, a girl of about eighteen years, was aroused from her sleep by the apparition of Sister Alis. For some time afterward the spirit haunted her wherever she went, continually rapping on the ground near where she stood and even communicating with the other nuns. The spirit who entered the monastery seemed good and devout, but the good sisters, well versed in the wiles of the devil, had their doubts. The bishop of Lyons and the narrator, Adrien de Montalembert, were called in to deal with the evil spirit.

After many prayers and formalities, the spirit of Alis was found to be an innocent one, attended by a guardian angel. She answered a number of questions regarding her present state and her desire for Christian burial, and confirmed the doctrines of the Catholic Church, notably that of purgatory. The remains of Sister Alis were conveyed to consecrated ground, and prayers made for the release of her soul from purgatory, but she continued to follow the young nun for a time, teaching her, on her last visit, five secret prayers composed by St. John the Evangelist.

The Alister Hardy Research Centre See Religious Experience Research Centre

Allat (or Ellat)

Goddess of the ancient Arabs of pre-Islamic times, associated with the god Dhu-shara, known as Allah (supreme god), worshiped in the form of a rectangular stone, reminiscent of the later Kaaba of Mecca. Allat is mentioned in the Koran as a pagan goddess. She is said to have been joint ruler with Allah and judge of the afterlife.

Allegro, John (Marco) (1923–1988)

British scholar who assisted in the deciphering of the Dead Sea Scrolls, and created a sensation with his book The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross (1970), which suggested that the New Testament was written in a secret code for the use of a sect built around the hallucinatory properties of a sacred mushroom drug. According to Allegro, Jesus never existed and the crucifixion story was a myth, symbolic of the ecstasy of a drug cult.

In support of this extraordinary theory, Allegro strained philology, comparative linguistics, and semantics in a manner that recalled the eccentricities of John Belleden Ker in the nineteenth century, who wrote several volumes to "prove" that all British proverbs and nursery rhymes were assonantal equivalents of High Dutch invectives against the Roman Catholic Church.

Sources:

Allegro, John. The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Allen, James (1864–1912)

British writer of self-improvement books that present a very individual blend of mysticism and New Thought. Like his contemporary Ralph Waldo Trine in America, Allen helped popularize New Thought in Great Britain with his numerous popular inspirational books. According to his wife, Allen "wrote when he had a message, and it became a message only when he had lived it in his own life and knew that it was good."

Born in Leicester, England, on November 28, 1864, he suffered much ill-health as a child. His father died when he was 14, and he had to earn his living and help support his mother. He worked hard at various jobs and studied poetry, drama, philosophy, and religion in his spare time. At the age of 24, he experienced what he described as "the Cosmic Vision" after reading Sir Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia (1879), a famous poem based on the teaching of Buddha. This transient illumination returned in a more permanent form ten years later and led to the writing of his first book, From Poverty to Power (1901), which went into seven editions. After the success of this book, Allen found it possible to live by his writings. With his wife, Lily, he moved to Ilfracombe, Devon.

Allen was not ambitious, avoided publicity, and lived simply on a modest income from his writings. He derived inspiration for his books from solitary meditation. He published 19 books and edited two journals: The Epoch and The Light of Reason. Some of his books were quite short in length but influential in their succinct inspiration. His best-known work, As a Man Thinketh, went into six editions and influenced many thousands of readers. It remains a classic of its kind and has been frequently reprinted. Allen died January 24, 1912.

Sources:

Allen, James. As a Man Thinketh. 1890. Reprint, Philadelphia: David O. McKay, n.d.

———. By-Ways of Blessedness. Libertyville, Ill.: Sheldon University Press, 1909.

———. From Poverty to Power. New York: R. F. Fenno, 1907.

———. The Life Triumphant. Libertyville, Ill.: Sheldon University Press, 1908.

"Alleyne, John"

Pseudonym of Captain John Allen Bartlett (1861–1933), retired British marine officer, who was the psychic medium of part of the Glastonbury Scripts in the experiments of Frederick Bligh Bond (1864–1945), detailed in Bond's book Gate of Remembrance (1918).

All Hallow's Eve

One of the ancient four great Fire festivals in Britain, supposed to have taken place on November 1, when all fires, save those of the Druids, were extinguished, from whose altars the holy fire had to be purchased by the householders for a certain price. The festival is still known in Ireland as Samhein, or La Samon, i.e., the Feast of the Sun, while in Scotland, it has been given the name of Hallowe'en.

All Hallow's Eve, as observed in the Church of Rome, corresponds with the Feralia of the ancient Romans, when they sacrificed in honor of the dead, offered up prayers for them, and made oblations to them. In ancient times, this festival was celebrated on February 21, but the Roman church transferred it to November 1. It was originally designed to give rest and peace to the souls of the departed.

In some parts of Scotland, it is still customary for young people to kindle a fire, called a "Hallowe'en bleeze," on the tops of hills. It was customary to surround these bonfires with a circular trench symbolic of the sun.

In Perthshire, the Hallowe'en bleeze is made in the following fashion. Heath, broom, and dressings of flax are tied upon a pole. The torch is lit; a youth takes it and carries it upon his shoulders. When the torch is burned out, a second is tied to the pole and kindled. Several of these blazing torches are often carried through the villages at the same time.

Hallowe'en is believed by the superstitious to be a night on which the invisible world has peculiar power. Further, it is thought that there is no such night in all the year for obtaining insight into the future. His Satanic Majesty is supposed to have great latitude allowed him on this anniversary, in common with witches, who are believed to fly on broomsticks. Others less aerially disposed ride over by-road and heath, seated on the back of cats that have been transformed into coal-black steeds for the journey. The green-robed fairies are also said to hold special festive meetings at their favorite haunts.

There are many folk customs relating to this eve of mystic ceremonies:

The youths, who engage in the ceremony of Pulling the Green Kail, go hand-in-hand, with closed eyes, into a bachelor's or spinster's garden, and pull up the first "kail stalks" that come in their way. Should the stalks prove to be straight in stem, and with a good supply of earth at their roots, the future husbands (or wives) will be young, good looking, and rich in proportion. If the stalks are stunted, crooked, and have little or no earth at their roots, the future spouses will be found lacking in good looks and fortune. The stem's taste (sweet or sour) indicates the temper of the future partner. The stalks are afterward placed above the doors of the respective houses, and the Christian names of those persons who first pass underneath will correspond with those of the future husbands or wives.

Eating the Apple at the Glass: Provide yourself with an apple, and, as the clock strikes twelve, go alone into a room where there is a looking glass. Cut the apple into small pieces, throw one piece over your left shoulder, and advancing to the mirror without looking back, eat the remainder, combing your hair carefully all the time before the glass. It is said that the face of the person you are to marry will be seen peeping over your left shoulder. This Hallowe'en game is supposed to be a relic of that form of divination with mirrors that popes condemned as sorcery.

The Burning Nuts: Take two nuts and place them in the fire, giving one of them your own name; the other that of the object of your affections. Should they burn quietly away, side by side, then the issue of your love affair will be prosperous; but if one starts away from the other, the result will be unfavorable.

Sowing Hemp Seed: Steal forth alone toward midnight and sow a handful of hemp seed, repeating the following rhyme:

"Hemp seed, I sow thee, hemp seed, I sow thee;

And he that is my true love, come behind and harrow me." Then look over your left shoulder and you will see the person.

Winnowing Corn: This ceremony must also be performed alone. Go to a barn and open both doors, taking them off the hinges if possible. Then take the instrument used in winnowing corn, and go through the motions of letting it down against the wind. Repeat the operation three times, and the figure of your future partner will appear passing in at one door and out at the other. Should those engaging in this ceremony be fated to die young, it is believed that a coffin, followed by mourners, will enter and pursue the too adventurous youth around the barn.

Eating the Bean Stack: Go three times round a bean stack with outstretched arms, as if measuring it, and the third time you will clasp in your arms the shade of your future partner.

Eating the Herring: Just before retiring to rest, eat a raw or roasted salt herring, and in your dreams your future husband (or wife) will come and offer you a drink of water to quench your thirst.

Dipping the Shirt Sleeve: Go alone, or in company with others, to a stream where "three lairds' lands meet," and dip in the left sleeve of a shirt; after this is done not one word must be spoken, otherwise the spell is broken. Then put your sleeve to dry before your bedroom fire. Go to bed, but be careful to remain awake, and you will see the form of your future helpmate enter and turn the sleeve in order that the other side may get dried.

The Three Plates: Place three plates in a row on a table. In one of these put clean water, in another dirty water, and leave the third empty. Blindfold the person wishing to try his or her fortune, and lead him or her up to the table, left hand forward. Should it come in contact with the clean water, then the future spouse will be young, handsome, and a bachelor or maid. The dirty water signifies a widower or a widow, and the empty dish, no spouses. This ceremony is repeated three times, and the plates must be differently arranged after each attempt.

Throwing the Clue: Go alone at night to the nearest limekiln and throw in a ball of blue yarn, winding it off on to a fresh ball. As you come near the end, someone will grasp hold of the thread lying in the kiln. You then ask, "Who holds?" and the name of your future partner will be uttered from beneath.

In modern Britain, Halloween customs have merged with the bonfire ceremonies of Guy Fawkes day, on November 5th, when effigies of the conspirator who tried to blow up the Houses of Parliament are burnt all over the country and fireworks set off.

In the United States, Halloween has become one of the most celebrated holidays of the year. It combines a harvest festival with the ancient associations of Halloween with demons and the souls of the dead. Today almost totally secularized, it has become a society-wide costume party. The practice of "Trick or Treat" has lost all conscious associations with the older practice, when fruit or candies were gained from neighbors, a relic of the custom of food offerings for the dead.

Modern Wiccans and Neo-Pagans have revived the eve of November 1 as the pagan New Year, which they term Samhein (pronounced "Sav-en"). It is the beginning of winter, and during the evening hours, the spirits of the departed seek the warmth of the Samhein fire. The day is a time of communing with the dead, but also a time of feasting and drinking in defiance of the approaching days of increasing darkness and cold.

Sources:

Farrar, Janet, and Stewart Farrar. Eight Sabbats for Witches. London: Robert Hale, 1981.

Halloween and Other Festivals of Death and Life. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1994.

Alli Allahis

A continuation of the old sect of the Magi, priests of ancient Persia.

Alliance of Solitary Practitioners

During the 1990s, especially in the wake of several books calling attention to the situation within the larger Pagan community, various people began to address the problem of the solitary practitioner. The contemporary Wicca/Pagan community had developed around small groups generally called covens or groves. Most practitioners have been members of such groups, for many years the only place where knowledge of the religion was available. However, with the publication of numerous books on Pagan practice beginning in the 1970s, the solitary practitioner who was self-initiated and practiced alone began to emerge and the number steadily and rapidly grew through the rest of the twentieth century. Such solitary practitioners generally made themselves known by their attendance at the large Pagan gatherings.

Initial attempts to provide networking for solitary Pagans began in the early 1990s, but the spread of the Internet has provided a means for solitary Pagans to relate to the larger Pagan world that both protects their anonymity while providing a source for information and contact. The Alliance of Solitary Practitioners (ASP) was formed in January of 1998 to provide such a means of networking and communication. It was founded by Reverend Graywolfe and LVG. Graywolfe was attracted to Paganism through the writings of Amber K and Scott Cunningham and with a fellow Pagan formed a coven called the Sacred Grove. He eventually left the Sacred Grove and founded the Circle of the Sacred Garden. LVG began with the ouija board and tarot cards that led to widespread reading on Witchcraft. She eventually joined the Circle of the Sacred Garden.

Though operating in a coven, Graywolfe remembered his days as a solitary and wanted to do something for other solitary practitioners and LVG possessed the technical knowledge to make ASP possible. Its web site, located at http://www.witchcraft.net/ASP/, provides both information and a means for solitaries to communicate with each other. Solitaries may also become formal members of ASP. By the end of the 1990s, ASP reported more than 1,300 members in more than 40 countries. While agreeing on a few basics concerning Paganism, solitary practitioners manifest the widest possible variation in belief and practice.

Sources:

Alliance of Solitary Practitioners. http://www.witchcraft.net/ASP/. February 15, 2000.

Allingham, Cedric

Elusive author of the book Flying Saucers from Mars (1954), published a year after the remarkable claims of George Adamski in his influential book, written with Desmond Leslie, Flying Saucers Have Landed (1953).

Cedric Allingham's book claimed that while the author was on a caravan holiday near Lossiemouth, Scotland, in February 1954, he saw a flying saucer and met its Martian pilot. The book included a soft focus photograph of a back view of the alien moving away. Coming so soon after Adamski's book, both books initiated scores of similar "contactee" claims. While flying saucer fans welcomed Allingham's book, skeptics denounced it as a hoax.

The case against the genuineness of the book was strengthened by the fact that attempts to contact the author by other investigators proved fruitless. At the time the book was published in October 1954, Allingham was said to be touring the United States planning to meet Adamski. His publisher then claimed that Allingham was suffering from tuberculosis in a Swiss sanitarium. A few months later, Allingham was said to have died.

Apart from Allingham's publishers, the only other named human contactee was said to have been a fisherman named James Duncan, however Duncan proved just as elusive as Allingham. In 1969 Robert Chapman, a perceptive critic, claimed in his own book Unidentified Flying Objects that Allingham never existed and that the story was "probably the biggest UFO leg-pull ever perpetrated in Britain." Chapman discovered that Allingham was supposed to have lectured to a flying saucer group in Kent, England, and a photograph purporting to be of Allingham standing by "his 10-inch reflecting telescope" appeared as frontispiece to Flying Saucers from Mars.

The hoax was finally resolved in 1986 by journalists Christopher Allan and Steuart Campbell in an article in the journal Magonia. Allan and Campbell claimed that Allingham's book was a hoax perpetrated by a British astronomer Patrick Moore, who presents the popular television series "The Sky at Night." Moore had claimed to know Allingham and to have met him at a lecture on UFOs given at a club in Tunbridge Wells, Kent. Allan and Campbell conducted a careful comparison between the Allingham book and the writings of Moore. They found significant similarities of words, phrases, and references, but also some puzzling differences. They concluded that more than one individual was involved in the writing of the book.

Although the publishers refused to disclose the identity or whereabouts of "Allingham," they agreed to forward a letter from Allan and Campbell, asking for details of identity. The letter was returned with the remark on the envelope "not known here for at least twelve years." However, the envelope itself identified the name and address to which the letter had been sent! Allan and Campbell were thus able to contact the individual, Peter Davies, who had been living only nine miles from the home of Patrick Moore in East Grinstead, Sussex. When contacted at a later address, Davies admitted that he had been involved with the book Flying Saucers from Mars, that it was written by someone else whom he would not name, but that his task had been to revise the book to conceal the style, and that the frontispiece photograph of "Allingham" was actually of himself in disguise. He also admitted that he had given the lecture to the flying saucer group in Kent, in company with a knowledgeable "assistant" (i.e., Moore) whom he would not name. It also transpired that Davies was an old friend of Patrick Moore.

Allan and Campbell compared the photograph of "Allingham" standing by the side of the 10-inch reflecting telescope with a photograph of the 1½-inch reflector telescope belonging to Patrick Moore, taken in his garden in East Grinstead, Sussex. The telescope and the background of trees, shrub, and a garden seat matched.

The question of Allingham's identity was finally resolved; however, Moore never acknowledged his role in the hoax. Immediately after the 1986 article exposing his initiation of the affair, he tried to refute the idea and threatened to sue any who perpetuated it. He soon lapsed into silence and ufologists discovered that his authorship of the Allingham book was somewhat of an open secret among British scientists. Moore in fact had a long history of poking fun at contactee claims and had written many letters to Cosmic Voice, the periodical of the Aetherius Society, which included mention of scientists with names such as L. Puller or Dr. Huizenass.

Sources:

Allen, Christopher, and Steuart Campbell. "Flying Saucer from Moore's?" Magonia vol. 23 (July 1986): 15–18.

Allingham, Cedric [Patrick Moore]. Flying Saucer from Mars. London: Frederick Muller, 1954.

Chapman, Robert. Unidentified Flying Objects. London: Arthur Barker, 1969.

Allison, Dorothy (1925–1999)

Dorothy Allison, a psychic most known for assisting police departments in the solving of criminal cases, was born in Jersey City, New Jersey, where she grew up in a Roman Catholic family. Her mother was a seer and Dorothy had visions as a child, though her first meaningful psychic experience did not occur until she was 14. She saw that her father, in spite of his seeming good health, would die in two weeks. He subsequently came down with pneumonia and passed away as she had envisioned it.

Allison lived quietly through the mid-twentieth century. She married and had three children, two sons and a daughter, and settled in Nutley, New Jersey. She sporadically had precognitive visions dealing with family and friends that led to her career as a professional psychic. She jumped out of obscurity in 1968 after approaching the local police concerning a missing child. Though the child's body was eventually found by accident, the facts of the case as they eventually came out fit her vision in many respects, including the boy having his shoes on the wrong feet.

Allison became involved in a number of homicide and missing persons cases that the police were having trouble solving. Among her many police supporters was Robert DeLitta, chief of police in Nutley. One of the high profile cases she dealt with was the Patty Hearst case. She predicted that Hearst would become involved in a bank robbery and eventually join forces with her kidnappers. She also gave information in the "Son of Sam" serial killer case. Among the accurate data was her description of David Berkowitz, the man eventually arrested, and the fact that a parking ticket would be a key item leading to his downfall.

As she became well known, Allison came under scrutiny by skeptics who questioned both the value that she (and other psychics) had in solving cases, and the accuracy of the information shared with police. Critics complained that after cases were solved, a few accurate predictions would be highlighted while a mass of inaccuracies would be suppressed and forgotten. Regardless of such criticisms, Allison continued to be called upon by police right to the end of her life. The last case in which she offered information was the murder of Jon Benet Ramsey, a child killed in her home in Boulder, Colorado, in 1996.

Allison died on December 1, 1999, in Nutley, New Jersey.

Sources:

Allison, Dorothy, and Jacobson Scott. Dorothy Allison: A Psychic Story. N.p., n.d.

McGraw, Seamus. "Noted Psychic Dorothy Allison of Nutley, 74." Bergen (NJ) Record (December 3, 1999).

Truzzi, Marchello. The Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime. New York: The Mysterious Press, 1991.

Allison, Lydia W(interhalter) (1880–1959)

Founding member of the Boston Society for Psychic Research in 1925, trustee of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) (1941–59), chairman of committee on publication (1943–59), and a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and the International Committee for the Study of Parapsychological Methods.

Allison was born September 14, 1880, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. She married Edward Wood Allison in 1905. Dealing with his death led her to psychic research in 1920. During the early 1920s she visited the famous medium Mrs. Osborne Leonard. Her report on these sittings established her place in the history of psychic research. In 1925, a controversy within the ASPR over the organization's vehement defense of the medium Mina S. Crandon ("Margery") led to a schism. Allison, along with Episcopal minister and researcher Elwood Worcester, established the Boston Society for Psychic Research. Allison was in charge of the new society's publications. She also assisted in the negotiations that led to the eventual healing of the schism in 1941. She worked with the ASPR's publications committee for the rest of her life.

While her sittings with Leonard are most remembered, along the way Allison also sat with Minne M. Soule, and investigated the mediumship of "Margery," Rudi Schneider, and Eileen J. Garrett. In 1953 she attended the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies in Utrecht, Holland.

Her careful objective investigations elicited the following tribute from parapsychologist Gardner Murphy: "Her combination of unfailing enthusiasm for the highest quality research and solid skepticism regarding unsound methods made her a precious collaborator."

Sources:

Allison, Lydia W. "The American Society for Psychical Research: a Brief History." SPR Proceedings vol. 52, no. 1 (1958).

———. Leonard and Soule Experiments in Psychical Research. Boston, 1929.

———. "Proxy Sittings with Mrs. Leonard." SPR Proceedings vol. 42 (1934).

———. "Telepathy or Association." SPR Proceedings vol. 35 (1941).

"Obituary and Tributes to Mrs. E. W. Allison." Journal of the ASPR vol. 53 (1959): 81.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Almanach du Diable

A French almanac containing predictions for the years 1737 and 1738 and purported to be published from hell. The book, which was a satire against the Jansenists, was suppressed on account of some over-bold predictions and became very rare. The authorship was ascribed to Quesnel, an ironmonger at Dijon. The Jansenists replied with a pamphlet directed against the Jesuits, which was also suppressed. Entitled Almanac de Dieu and dedicated to M. Carré de Montgeron, it was published in 1738 and claimed satirically to be printed in heaven.

Almoganenses

The name given to certain Spanish people who, by the flight and song of birds, meetings with wild animals, and various other means, foretold coming events. According to the fifteenth-century humanist Laurentius Valla, "They carefully preserve among themselves books which treat of this science, where they find rules of all sorts of prognostications and predictions. The soothsayers are divided into two classes, one, the masters or principals, the other the disciples and aspirants."

Another kind of knowledge is also attributed to them, that of being able to indicate the way taken by horses and other beasts of burden which are lost, and the road followed by one or more persons. They can specify the kind and shape of the ground, whether the earth is hard or soft, covered with sand or grass, whether it is a broad road, paved or sanded, or narrow, twisting paths, and tell also how many passengers are on the road. They can follow the track of anyone and cause thieves to be apprehended. Those writers who mention the Almoganenses, however, do not specify either the period when they flourished or the country or province they occupied, but it seems possible from their name and other considerations that they were Moorish. (See also Ornithomancy)

Almusseri

A nineteenth-century secret society resembling African associations, with secret rites akin to those of the Cabiric and Orphic Mysteries. Their reception took place once a year in a wood, where the candidate pretended to die. The initiates surrounded the neophyte and chanted funeral songs. He was then brought to the temple erected for the purpose and anointed with palm oil. After 40 days of probation, he was said to have obtained a new soul, was greeted with hymns of joy, and conducted home.

Alocer

According to Johan Weyer, Alocer is a powerful demon, Grand Duke of Hades. He appears in the shape of a knight mounted on an enormous horse. His face has leonine characteristics; he has a ruddy complexion and burning eyes, and speaks with much gravity. He is said to give family happiness to those whom he takes under his protection and to teach astronomy and liberal arts. Thirty-six legions are controlled by him.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Alomancy

Divination by means of salt, of which process little is known. From this ancient practice comes the saying that misfortune is about to fall on the household when the salt cellar is overturned.

Alopecy

A species of charm by the aid of which one can bewitch an enemy whom one wishes to harm.

Alper, Frank (1930–)

Frank Alper, Spiritualist channel and founder of the Arizona Metaphysical Society, was born on January 22, 1930, in Brooklyn, New York. Alper moved to Phoenix in 1970. He founded the society three years later, and in 1979 he aligned the society with the Church of Tzaddi, a Spiritualist denomination headquartered in Boulder, Colorado.

Alper first emerged as a channel in 1975 and has subsequently channeled many volumes of material from "Moses" and "the Christos." However, he is most known for the three volumes he channeled and published in 1982 as Exploring Atlantis. According to Alper, one of the masters who periodically spoke through him requested that he channel several sessions on Atlantis. The several entities channeled during these sessions claimed to have lived there. According to Alper's volumes, the Atlanteans were extraterrestrials. When their planet became uninhabitable, they used their advanced technology to come to Earth. They settled in Atlantis, but their island kingdom was destroyed by a natural catastrophe following the tilting of the Earth's axis.

While Exploring Atlantis provided some interesting development of thought about the ancient continent, the volumes especially developed a new occult perspective on crystals. Alper described Atlantis as a crystal-oriented culture that relied on a power system based on natural symmetrical—flawless—crystals said to concentrate massive amounts of energy. While these crystals could absorb and store electrical energy to be used at a later date, they were most useful in storing universal energy to be used for healing. Crystals of different shapes and colors have different healing uses. During the 1980s crystal power became the subject of numerous books and the starting point of a debate on the power-storing capacity of crystals. Through the early 1990s, the emphasis within the New Age community on crystals has considerably waned in the face of a strong critique of Alper's theories.

Sources:

Alper, Frank. Exploring Atlantis. 3 vols. Farmington, N.Y.: Coleman Publishing, 1982.

Webster, Sam. "Dr. Frank Alper: Interview with a Metaphysician." Whole Life Monthly (March 1987): 20–22.

Alpert, Richard (1931–)

With Dr. Timothy Leary, Alpert became a controversial figure in the psychedelic revolution of the l960s. Born April 6, 1931, in Boston, he received his Ph.D. in psychology at Stanford University in 1957, then taught at Stanford, University of California at Berkeley, and Harvard University. Leary and Alpert were both dismissed from Harvard for their experiments with psilocybin. They subsequently obtained financing to conduct experiments and to publicize the use of such drugs as LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) in producing altered states of consciousness, thus launching the psychedelic revolution.

In propagating the belief that mystical experience could be obtained from a drug, Leary and Alpert were expanding upon suggestions made earlier in Aldous Huxley's book The Doors of Perception (1954), which cited the sacramental use of peyote by certain North American Indians. However, the motivations and cultural values of those closely knit groups were left behind in what became a popular movement. The psychedelic revolution contributed to the popularization of mystical experiences in an otherwise materialistic society but at the same time led many into meaningless despair and helped legitimize the widespread use of addictive narcotics drugs, now widely recognized as a major social problem.

In 1967, in a state of spiritual despair, Alpert went to India in search of meaning through mysticism. He studied for a few months under Neem Karoli Baba in the Himalayas, then returned to the United States as "Baba Ram Dass," or "God's servant." Having abandoned psychedelic drugs, he emerged as a disciple of Hindu spirituality and commenced a career of lecturing and writing. In 1969 Ram Dass gave a course on raja yoga (meditation) at Esalen Institute, near San Francisco, California, launching his new role as a transpersonal psychologist speaking on spiritual issues. His first book as Baba Ram Dass, Be Here Now, made him a popular figure in what was to become the New Age movement. He followed it with a series of books, including Seed (1972), The Only Dance There Is (1974), and Grist for the Mill (1977).

Ram Dass has lectured widely on his present spiritual position and on personality problems of Western life. Royalties from his book The Only Dance There Is supported the Journal of Transpersonal Psychology, and his activities are conducted under the auspices of the Hanuman Foundation, which distributes his books and lecture tapes. The foundation may be reached at PO Box 478, Sante Fe, NM 87504. On land near Taos, New Mexico, Baba Ram Dass built the Neem Karoli Baba Hanuman Temple in memory of his guru.

In 1997 Ram Das had a stroke which left him largely incapacitated but in the past three years he has been improving greatly through rehabilitation. He has returned to a limited number of talks and public appearances.

Sources:

Ram Dass, Baba [Richard Alpert]. Be Here Now. Christobal, N.Mex.: Lama Foundation, 1972.

———. Grist for the Mill. Santa Cruz, Calif.: Unity Press, 1977.

———. Journey to Awakening. New York: Bantam Books, 1976.

———. The Only Dance There Is. New York: Aronson, 1976.

Alphabiotics

Alphabiotics is a new holistic health treatment established in 1971 by Dr. Virgil Chrane, Jr., and grew out of his years of concern with the overarching negative role that stress was playing in the life of contemporary humanity. Chrane came to feel that most adults, due to many years of incorrect responses to stressful situations, were now "brainlocked" in an unbalanced stress state. He assumed that coming out of this state can enhance all of one's life, and proposed Alphabiotics is the answer to the problem. He offered Alphabiotics as an alternative to other therapies that were more symptom oriented, rather than dealing with the root cause of the problem.

The solution to the stress problem Chrane found in New Age metaphysics. The lack of balance leads to a diminution of the Life Energy (also called prana or qi in other systems of thought). The practice of Alphabiotics allows the free flow of Life Energy. Such energy appears to have an intelligence of its own and quickly flows to those places in the body where it is most needed. The technique of Alphabiotics has the appearance of great simplicity, the patient lying on their back on a table while the practitioner gently manipulates their neck area. The entire treatment takes less that 30 seconds.

While appearing simple, the process requires training to properly perform, and Chrane (and his son Michael Chrane) train practitioners through the International Alphabiotics Association. The association may be reached at HCR 83, Box 18-A, Menard, Texas 76859. It has an Internet site at http://www.alphabiotics.com/. Practitioners can now be found across North America, and in Australia, the United Kingdom, and countries of continental Europe.

Sources:

Alphabiotics. http://www.alphabiotics.com/. June 12, 2000.

Alpha Magazine

British journal devoted to parapsychology, earth mysteries, and ancient arts (astrology, dowsing, numerology, psychic healing, and divination). Edited by David Harvey and Roy Stemman, Alpha was published by Pendulum Publishing. Last known address: 20 Regent St., Fleet, Hampshire GU13 9NR, England.

The first issue was dated March–April 1979, but in issue No. 9 (October 1980), the editors stated that the journal was expected to cease publication through lack of financial support. The nine issues maintained a high standard of presentation, including valuable contributions by authoritative writers.

Alpha Wave

A brain wave with a frequency of between 14 and 50 cycles per second, related to relaxation and dream states. Through biofeedback machines, subjects can learn to produce alpha waves and induce altered states of consciousness. During the 1970s, many thought alpha waves to be especially associated with ESP and worked on producing them as a means of assisting people with psychic development. Today, that enthusiasm has waned.

Sources:

Lawrence, Jodi. Alpha Brain Waves. New York: Avon, 1972.

Stern, Jess. The Power of Alpha Thinking: Miracle of the Mind. New York: William Morrow, 1976.

Tart, Charles T. States of Consciousness. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.

Alphitomancy

An ancient method of divination used to prove the guilt or innocence of a suspected person with a loaf of barley. When many persons were accused of a crime and it was desired to find the true culprit, a loaf of barley was made and a portion given to each of the suspects. The innocent people suffered no ill-effects, but criminals were said to betray themselves by an attack of indigestion. This practice gave rise to the oath: "If I am deceiving you, may this piece of bread choke me." By means of this method, a lover might know if his mistress were faithful to him, or a wife, her husband.

The procedure was a follows: A quantity of pure barley flour was kneaded with milk and a little salt, without any leaven. It was then rolled up in a greased paper, and cooked among the cinders. It was afterward taken out and rubbed with verbena leaves and given to the person suspected of deceit, who, if the suspicion was justified, would be unable to digest it.

In ancient times, there was said to be a sacred wood at Lavinium, near Rome, where Alphitomancy was practiced in order to test the purity of women. The priests kept a serpent or a dragon in a cavern in the wood. On certain days of the year the young women were sent there, blindfolded, and carrying a cake made of barley flour and honey. Those who were innocent had their cakes eaten by the serpent, while the cakes of the others were refused.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Alpiel

An angel or demon who, according to the Talmud, presides over fruit trees.

Alraun

Images shaped from the roots of mandrake (see Mandragoras) or from ash or briony. The term was popular in Germany, where it was also used to indicate a witch or a magician. An alraun had to be treated with great care because of its magical properties. It was wrapped or dressed in a white robe with a golden girdle, bathed every Friday, and kept in a box, otherwise it was believed to shriek for attention. Alrauns were used in magic rituals and were also believed to bring good luck. But possession of them carried the risk of witchcraft prosecution, and in 1630 three women were executed in Hamburg on this charge.

The alraun was difficult to get rid of because there was a superstition that it could only be sold at a higher price than bought, and there are legends that owners who tried to throw an alraun away found it returned to their room.

According to German folklore, an alraun assisted easy childbirth, and water in which it had been infused prevented swellings in animals. Because of the large demand for alrauns, they were often carved from the roots of briony when genuine mandrakes were difficult to find. They were exported from Germany to various countries and sold in England during the reign of Henry VIII.

Sources:

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mystic Mandrake. London: Rider, 1934.

Alrunes

Female demons or sorceresses, the mothers of the Huns in ancient Germany. They took all sorts of shapes, but without changing their sex. The name was also given by Germans to little statues of old sorceresses, about a foot high. To these they attributed great virtues, honoring them as fetishes; clothing them richly, housing them comfortably, and serving them with food and drink at every meal. They believed that if these little images were neglected, they would bring misfortunes upon the household.

Alruy (or Alroy), David (ca. 1147– ?)

A Jewish false Messiah, born in Kurdistan ca. 1147. Alruy boasted that he was a descendant of King David. Educated in Baghdad, he received instruction in the magic arts and came to be more proficient than his masters. His false miracles gained so much popularity for him that many Jews believed him to be the Messiah who was to restore their nation to Jerusalem.

According to legends, the king of Persia imprisoned him, but no bolts and bars could hold so formidable a magician. He escaped from his prison and appeared before the eyes of the astonished king, though the courtiers saw nothing. In vain the king called angrily for someone to arrest the imposter. While they groped in search of him, Alruy slipped from the palace with the king in pursuit and all the courtiers running after him. They reached the sea shore, and Alruy turned and showed himself to all the people. Spreading a scarf on the surface of the water, he walked over it lightly, before the boats which were to pursue him were ready. This tale confirmed his reputation as the greatest magician within the memory of man.

It is said that a Turkish prince, a subject of the Persian king, bribed the father-in-law of the sorcerer to kill him, and one night, when Alruy was sleeping peacefully in his bed, a dagger thrust put an end to his existence.

Alruy was the subject of a novel by the politician-author Benjamin Disraeli (1804–1881): Alroy: A Romance (1846).

Alternate Perceptions

Alternate Perceptions, formerly UFO Perceptions, was founded in 1986 by White Buffalo-Eagle Wing, Inc., as a UFO periodical serving the Mid-South region of the United States. In the late 1990s it broadened its area of concern and has emerged as a newsstand magazine covering UFOs, paranormal events, and their links to the Native American community. This latter aspect gives the magazine its uniqueness.

White Buffalo-Eagle Wing, Inc., published the books of Alternate Perceptions' associate editor, Dr. Greg L. Little, that have argued for a connection between such paranormal occurrences as the near-death experience, UFO abductions, and ghostly apparitions on the one hand, and Native American spiritualism and ancient rituals on the other. Underlying all is a spectral reality. Ancient Native Americans located specific places to hold their rituals that had electromagnetic anomalies. Rituals performed at such sacred sites caused a spectrum of mental and visual manifestations. Such electromagnetic anomalies hold the answer to recent phenomena experienced in the general population.

While the unique perspective guides the magazine's editorial policy, each issue includes a wide selection of articles written by a variety of authors not connected with the editorial staff. Articles touch on UFOs, Native American archeology, holistic health, and human potentials. There are also a set of columns covering recent news of UFOs and paranormal experiences and a book review section. Significant space is given to letters-to-the-editor. There is a minimum of advertising. Alternate Perceptions appears quarterly from its publishing offices at P.O. Box 830, Memphis, TN 38485. White Buffalo-Eagle Wing, Inc., has an Internet presence at http://www.eaglewingbooks.com. White Eagle Books also publishes a line of psychological counseling texts.

Sources:

Alternate Perceptions. Memphis, Tenn., n.d.

Little, Greg L. Grand Illusions: The Spectral Reality Underlying Sexual UFO Abductions, Crashed Saucers, Afterlife Experiences, Sacred Ancient Sites, and Other Enigmas. Memphis, Tenn.: White Eagle Books, 1984.

———. People of the Web: What Indian Mounds, Ancient Rituals and Stone Circles Tell Us About Modern UFO Abductions, Apparitions, and the Near—Death Experience. Memphis, Tenn.: White Eagle Books, 1990.

Alternative Medicine Exhibition

Sponsored in Britain July 1985 by the journal Here's Health and organized by Swan House Special Events, with exhibitors and workshops in a wide range of subjects, including acupressure and acupuncture, Alexander Technique, Aromatherapy, Bach Flower Remedies, biofeedback, herbalism, homeopathy, hypnotism, iridology, Kirlian photography, osteopathy, and reflexology. During the year there was significant interest in alternative medicine, with the formation of the Council for Complementary and Alternative Medicine and the Confederation of Healing Organizations. The British Medical Association, with interests vested in orthodox medical practice, undertook a major investigation into alternative medicine, and a pilot project was also undertaken to provide alternative healing on the National Health Service. For information on the exhibition, contact: Swan House Special Events, Thames Meadow, Walton Bridge, Shepperton, Middlesex TW17 8LT, England.

Althotas (ca. eighteenth century C.E.)

The presumed "master" and companion of Cagliostro. Considerable doubt has been expressed regarding his existence. The French writer Louis Figuier, author of L'alchimie et les alchimistes (Paris, 1854), stated that Althotas was no imaginary character, that the Roman Inquisition collected many proofs of his existence, but none regarding his origin or end. "But," stated Figuier, "he was a magician and doctor as well, possessed divinatory abilities of a high order, was in possession of several Arabic manuscripts, and had great skill in chemistry."

The French writer on occultism Éliphas Lévi stated that the name Althotas is composed of the word "thot" with the syllables "al" and "as," which if read cabalistically are sala, meaning messenger or envoy; the name as a whole therefore signifies "Thot, the Messenger of the Egyptians."

Althotas has also been identified with Kolmer, the instructor of Adam Weishaupt (a German leader of the Illuminati) in magic, and at other times with the Comte de Saint Germain. The accounts concerning him are certainly conflicting, for whereas Cagliostro stated at his trial in Paris that Althotas had been his lifelong preceptor, another account says that he met him first on the quay at Messina.

Alu-Demon

Ancient Babylonian demon, said to owe his parentage to a human being; he hides himself in caverns and corners and slinks through the streets at night. He also lies in wait for the unwary, and at night enters bed-chambers and terrorizes people, threatening to pounce on them if they shut their eyes.

Amadeus

A visionary who experienced an apocalypse and revelations, in one of which he learned the two psalms composed by Adam, one a mark of joy at the creation of Eve, and the other the dialogue he held with her after they had sinned. Both psalms are printed in the Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti of Johann Albert Fabricius, published at Hamburg, 1713–33.

Amadou, Robert (1924–)

French writer and editor in the field of parapsychology. Born February 16, 1924, at Bois-Colombes (Seine), he studied at Sorbonne, University of Paris, where he earned his licencié des lettres and diplôme d'études supérieures de philosophie. From 1952 to 1955 he edited Revue métapsychique, and from 1955 to 1959 La Tour Saint-Jacques. He was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and attended the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies, Utrecht, 1953, the Conference on Philosophy and Parapsychology, Saint Paul de Vence, France, 1954, and the International Symposium on Psychology and Parapsychology, Asnières-sur-Oise, France, 1956. He edited La Science et le paranormal (proceedings of the first three International Symposia of Parapsychological Studies), 1955.

Amadou was both ordained as a priest and consecrated as a bishop in the Église Gnostique Universelle, an independent French gnostic church, in 1944; he took the name Tau Jacques. In 1988 he was elevated as archbishop and assumed the additional role of archbishop of Europe for the Philippine Independent Catholic Church. He contributed numerous articles on parapsychology to various parapsychological journals and several books, including La Parapsychologie: Essai historique et critique (1954), Les Grands Médiums (1957), and La Télépathie (1958).

Sources:

Amadou, Robert. Les Grands Mediums. Paris: Editions Denoel, 1957.

———. La Parapsychologie: Essai historique et critique. Paris: Editions Denoel, 1954.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Amaimon (or Amaymon)

One of the four spirits who preside over the four parts of the universe. Amaimon is the governor of the eastern part, according to the grimoire, or magic manual, of the Lemegeton of Solomon, also known as the Lesser Key or Little Key.

Sources:

The Lesser Key of Solomon. Chicago: De Laurence, Scott, 1916.

Amalgamated Flying Saucer Clubs of America

Founded in 1959 by Gabriel Green (b. 1924), Amalgamated Flying Saucer Clubs of America (AFSCA) grew out of the Los Angeles Interplanetary Study Groups, which Green had started in 1956. That same year Green also began issuing a magazine, Thy Kingdom Come. A photographer, Green became interested in flying saucers after his own sighting of a UFO. He also claimed to have made telepathic contact with the Space Masters and the Great White Brotherhood.

Green intended the AFSCA to create public acceptance of flying saucers, and to further his aims he planned petitions to Congress and held national conventions. At its peak in the early 1960s the AFSCA had 5,000 members in 24 countries. In 1959 Thy Kingdom Come was renamed World Report (1959–61), then UFO International (1962–65). A second periodical, Flying Saucers International, began in 1962 and continued until 1969. Green assumed that the flying saucers were manned by friendly extraterrestrials and had a plan for imparting their advanced knowledge to the people of the Earth in order to resolve present world problems. AFSCA was quite active through the 1960s, but after 1969 became a paper organization and for all practical purposes ceased to exist.

Sources:

Biographical Sketch of Gabriel Green. Northridge, Calif.: Amalgamated Flying Saucer Clubs of America, 1974.

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959; The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 2. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Green, Gabriel, and Warren Smith. Let's Face the Facts about Flying Saucers. New York: Popular Library, 1967.

Amandinus

A variously colored stone, said to enable the wearer of it to solve any question concerning dreams or enigmas.

Amaranth

A flower that is one of the symbols of immortality. It has been said by occult magicians that a crown made with this flower has supernatural properties and will bring fame and favor to those who wear it. It was also regarded in ancient times as a symbol of immortality and was used to decorate images of gods and tombs. In ancient Greece, the flower was sacred to the goddess Artemis of Ephesus, and the name "amaranth" derives from Amarynthos, a hunter of Artemis and king of Euboea.

There are many species of Amaranth, some with poetic folk names such as "prince's feather" and "love-lies-bleeding."

"The Amazing Randi"

Stage name of professional conjuring magician James Randi (or Randall Zwinge), who is the self-appointed archenemy of psychics and the paranormal.

Amduscias

Grand Duke of Hades. According to Johan Weyer, Amduscias has the form of a unicorn, but when evoked, appears in human shape. He gives concerts, at the command of men, where one hears the sound of all kinds of musical instruments but can see nothing. It is said that the trees themselves bend to his voice. He commands 29 legions.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

AMERICA, UNITED STATES OF

This entry treats Native American and European American contributions to parapsychology and the occult. See also related items on Mexico, Central America, and South America. For the history of Spiritualism in America, see the entry on Spiritualism, where a summary of the subject will be found.

Native Americans

Among the various native races of the American continent, the supernatural has flourished as universally as in other parts of the world. The oldest writers (of European and Christian background) on Native Americans agreed that they practiced sorcery and the magic arts, and were quick to attribute their prowess to Satan. For example, the Rev. Peter Jones, writing as late as the first decade of the nineteenth century, stated: "I have sometimes been inclined to think that if witchcraft still exists in the world, it is to be found among the aborigines of America."

The early French settlers called the Nipissing Jongleurs because of the surprising expertness in magic of their medicine men. Some writers observed the use of hypnotic suggestion among the Menominee and Lakota (Sioux) about the middle of the last century, and it is generally admitted that this art, which is known to Americanists as orenda, was familiar among most Indian tribes, as James Mooney noted in his Ghost Dance Religion (1896). D. G. Brinton, alluding to Indian medicine men and their connection with the occult arts, observed:

"They were also adept in tricks of sleight of hand, and had no mean acquaintance with what is called natural magic. They would allow themselves to be tied hand and foot with knots innumerable, and at a sign would shake them loose as so many wisps of straw; they would spit fire and swallow hot coals, pick glowing stones from the flames, walk with naked feet over live ashes, and plunge their arms to the shoulder in kettles of boiling water with apparent impunity.

"Nor was this all. With a skill not inferior to that of the jugglers of India, they could plunge knives into vital parts, vomit blood, or kill one another out and out to all appearances, and yet in a few minutes be as well as ever; they could set fire to articles of clothing and even houses, and by a touch of their magic restore them instantly as perfect as before. Says Father Bautista: 'They can make a stick look like a serpent, a mat like a centipede, and a piece of stone like a scorpion.' If it were not within our power to see most of these miracles performed any night in our great cities by a well-dressed professional, we should at once deny their possibility. As it is they astonish us but little.

"One of the most peculiar and characteristic exhibitions of their power, was to summon a spirit to answer inquiries concerning the future and the absent. A great similarity marked this proceeding in all northern tribes, from the Eskimos to the Mexicans. A circular or conical lodge of stout poles, four or eight in number, planted firmly in the ground was covered with skins or mats, a small aperture only being left for the seer to enter. Once in, he carefully closed the hole and commenced his incantations. Soon the lodge trembles, the strong poles shake and bend as with the united strength of a dozen men, and strange, unearthly sounds, now far aloft in the air, now deep in the ground, anon approaching near and nearer, reach the ears of the spectators.

"At length the priest announces that the spirit is present, and is prepared to answer questions. An indispensable preliminary to any inquiry is to insert a handful of tobacco, or a string of beads, or some such douceur under the skins, ostensibly for the behalf of the celestial visitor, who would seem not to be above earthly wants and vanities. The replies received, though occasionally singularly clear and correct, are usually of that profoundly ambiguous purport which leaves the anxious inquirer little wiser than he was before.

"For all this, ventriloquism, trickery, and shrewd knavery are sufficient explanations. Nor does it materially interfere with this view, that converted Indians, on whose veracity we can implicitly rely, have repeatedly averred that in performing this rite they themselves did not move the medicine lodge; for nothing is easier than in the state of nervous excitement they were then in to be self-deceived, as the now familiar phenomenon of table-turning illustrates.

"But there is something more than these vulgar arts now and then to be perceived. There are statements supported by unquestionable testimony, which ought not to be passed over in silence, and yet I cannot but approach them with hesitation. They are so revolting to the laws of exact science, so alien, I had almost said, to the experience of our lives. Yet is this true, or are such experiences only ignored and put aside without serious consideration? Are there not in the history of each of us passages which strike our retrospective thought with awe, almost with terror? Are there not in nearly every community individuals who possess a mysterious power, concerning whose origin, mode of action, and limits, we and they are like, in the dark?

"I refer to such organic forces as are popularly summed up under the words clairvoyance, mesmerism, rhabdomancy, animal magnetism, physical spiritualism. Civilized thousands stake their faith and hope here and hereafter, on the truth of these manifestations; rational medicine recognizes their existence, and while she attributes them to morbid and exceptional influences, confesses her want of more exact knowledge, and refrains from barren theorizing. Let us follow her example, and hold it enough to show that such powers, whatever they are, were known to the native priesthood as well as the modern spiritualists and the miracle mongers of the Middle Ages.

"Their highest development is what our ancestors called 'second sight.' That under certain conditions knowledge can pass from one mind to another otherwise than through the ordinary channels of the senses, is shown by the examples of persons en rapport. The limit to this we do not know, but it is not unlikely that clairvoyance or second sight is based upon it."

In his autobiography, the celebrated Sac chief, Black Hawk, related that his great grandfather "was inspired by a belief that at the end of four years he should see a white man, who would be to him a father." Under the direction of this vision he travelled eastward to a certain spot, and there, as he was forewarned, met a Frenchman, through whom the nation was brought into alliance with France.

An anecdote related by Captain Jonathan Carver, an English trader, in his little book of travels, describes his travels among the Killistenoes. In 1767 they were in great straits for food, and depending upon the arrival of the traders to rescue them from starvation. They persuaded the chief priest to consult the divinities as to when the relief would arrive. After the usual preliminaries, their magnate announced that the next day, precisely when the sun reached the zenith, a canoe would arrive with further tidings. At the appointed hour, the whole village, together with the incredulous Englishman, was on the beach, and sure enough, at the minute specified, a canoe swung round a distant point of land and brought the expected news.

More spectacular is an account by Col. John Mason Brown published in the Atlantic Monthly (July 1866). Some years earlier as the head of a party of voyagers, he set forth in search of a band of Indians somewhere on the vast plains along the tributaries of the Copper-mine and Mackenzie rivers. Danger, disappointment, and the fatigues of the road induced one after another to turn back, until of the original ten only three remained. They were also on the point of giving up the apparently hopeless quest when they were met by some warriors of the very band they were seeking. The leader of these warriors had been sent out by one of their medicine men to find three whites whose horses, arms, attire, and personal appearance he minutely described, which description was repeated to Col. Brown by the warriors before they saw his two companions. Afterward, when the priest, a frank and simple-minded man, was asked to explain this extraordinary occurrence, he could offer no other explanation than that "he saw them coming, and heard them talk on their journey." Many additional tales such as these were recorded by later travelers.

Those nervous conditions associated with the name of Franz A. Mesmer were also nothing new to the Native American magical practioners. Rubbing and stroking the sick, and the laying on of hands, were very common parts of their clinical procedures, and at the initiations to their societies they were frequently exhibited. Observers have related that among the Nez Percés of Oregon, the novice was put to sleep by songs, incantations, and "certain passes of the hand," and that with the Dakotas he would be struck lightly on the breast at a preconcerted moment, and instantly "would drop prostrate on his face, his muscles rigid and quivering in every fibre."

White observers also saw magicians working magical tricks, a fact that supported the general distrust of Indians pervading the white culture. In Bulletin 30 of the Bureau of American Ethnology, Washington Mathews stated:

"Sleight-of-hand was not only much employed in the treatment of disease, but was used on many other occasions. A very common trick among Indian charlatans was to pretend to suck foreign bodies, such as stones, out of the persons of their patients. Records of this are found among many tribes, from the lowest in culture to the highest, even among the Aztecs. Of course, such trickery was not without some therapeutic efficacy, for, like many other proceedings of the shamans, it was designed to cure disease by influence on the imagination. A Hidatsa, residing in Dakota, in 1865, was known by the name of Cherry-in-the-mouth, because he had a trick of producing from his mouth, at any season, what seemed to be fresh wild cherries. He had found some way of preserving cherries, perhaps in whiskey, and it was easy for him to hide them in his mouth before intending to play the trick; but many of the Indians considered it wonderful magic.

"The most astonishing tricks of the Indians were displayed in their fire ceremonies and in handling hot substances, accounts of which performances pertain to various tribes. It is said that Chippewa sorcerers could handle with impunity red-hot stones and burning brands, and could bathe the hands in boiling water or syrup; such magicians were called 'fire-dealers' and 'fire-handlers.' There are authentic accounts from various parts of the world of fire-dancers and fire-walks among barbarous races, and extraordinary fire acts are performed also among widely separated Indian tribes. Among the Arikara of what is now North Dakota, in the autumn of 1865, when a large fire in the center of the medicine lodge had died down until it became a bed of glowing embers, and the light in the lodge was dim, the performers ran with apparently bare feet among the hot coals and threw these around in the lodge with their bare hands, causing the spectators to flee. Among the Navaho, performers, naked except for breechcloth and moccasins, and having their bodies daubed with a white infusorial clay, run at high speed around a fire, holding in their hands great faggots of flaming cedar bark, which they apply to the bare backs of those in front of them and to their own persons. Their wild race around the fire is continued until the faggots are nearly all consumed, but they are never injured by the flame. This immunity may be accounted for by supposing that the cedar bark does not make a very hot fire, and that the clay coating protects the body. Menominee shamans are said to handle fire, as also are the female sorcerers of Honduras.

"Indians know well how to handle venomous serpents with impunity. If they can not avoid being bitten, as they usually can, they seem to be able to avert the fatal consequences of the bite. The wonderful acts performed in the Snake Dance of the Hopi have often been described.

"A trick of Navaho dancers, in the ceremony of the mountain chant, is to pretend to thrust an arrow far down the throat. In this feat an arrow with a telescopic shaft is used; the point is held between the teeth; the hollow part of the handle, covered with plumes, is forced down toward the lips, and thus the arrow appears to be swallowed. There is an account of an arrow of similar construction used early in the eighteenth century by Indians of Canada, who pretended a man was wounded by it and healed instantly. The Navaho also pretend to swallow sticks, which their neighbors of the pueblo of Zuñi actually do in sacred rites, occasionally rupturing the oesophagus in the ordeal of forcing a stick into the stomach. Special societies which practice magic, having for their chief object rainmaking and the cure of disease, exist among the southwestern tribes. Swallowing sticks, arrows, etc., eating and walking on fire, and trampling on cactus, are performed by members of the same fraternity.

"Magicians are usually men; but among the aborigines of the Mosquito Coast in Central America, they are often women who are called sukias, and are said to exercise great power. According to Hewitt, Iroquois women are reported traditionally to have been magicians.

"A trick of the juggler among many tribes of the North was to cause himself to be bound hand and foot and then, without visible assistance or effort on his part to release himself from the bonds. Civilized conjurers who perform a similar trick are hidden in a cabinet, and claim supernatural aid; but some Indian jugglers performed this feat under observation. It was common for Indian magicians to pretend they could bring rain, but the trick consisted simply of keeping up ceremonies until rain fell, the last ceremony being the one credited with success. Catlin describes this among the Mandan, in 1832, and the practice is still common among the Pueblo tribes of the arid region. The rain-maker was a special functionary among the Menominee.

"To cause a large plant to grow to maturity in a few moments and out of season is another Indian trick. The Navaho plant the root stalk of a yucca in the ground in the middle of the winter, and apparently cause it to grow, blossom, and bear fruit in a few moments. This is done by the use of artificial flowers and fruit carried under the blankets of the performers; the dimness of the firelight and the motion of the surrounding dancers hide from the spectators the operations of the shaman when he exchanges one artificial object for another. In this way the Hopi grow beans, and the Zuñi corn, the latter using a large cooking pot to cover the growing plant."

European Settlers

The occult history of the European races that occupy the territories now known as the United States of America begins with their initial settlement of North America. The early English, German, and Dutch settlers brought with them an active belief in magic, witchcraft, and sorcery (malevolent magic). Settlers were aware of a range of magical practices such as image magic, and had a particular fear of curses aimed at them. Should such curses come to pass they would often attribute it to the sorcery of the person pronouncing the course. As early as 1638 in Massachusetts, Jane Hawkins was indicted for practicing witchcraft, though no record of a trial survived. Less than a decade later, however, Alice Young was tried and executed in Connecticut. Hers was the first of a steady stream of trials and a number of executions prior to the famous outbreak at Salem.

The numerous accusations of witchcraft prepared the way for the events at Salem Village (now Danvers), Massachusetts, as did the writings of two leading ministers, Increase Mather (1639–1723) and his son, Cotton Mather (1662–1728). As president of Harvard Increase Mather collected numerous accounts of what today would be called psychic occurrences as evidence of supernatural actions operating in the life of people and published these in An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences. Cotton, a brilliant child who entered Harvard at the age of twelve, was only 25 years old when he was placed in charge of North Church, Boston, the largest congregation in the colony. During the early years of his pastorate, he followed his father's interests and collected accounts of some unusual negative experiences of his parishioners which he viewed as the actions of supernatural forces among the people. He argued for the reality of witchcraft, both because the Bible declared it a reality and because he saw instances of it in the deranged behavior of Boston citizens. His conclusions were published in a widely read book published in 1689, Memorable Provinces Relating to Witchcraft and Possessions.

The strong belief in the power and presence of negative magic in Salem Village, supported by the writings of the Mathers, emerged in the context of a deep community division between the wealthier landowners and the poorer elements in the village as well as the threat of a war with the natives. For a generation Salem Village had been afflicted by economic tensions and the entire colony faced the threat of open hostilities breaking out as colonists continually expanded into Indian lands.

It began in the depths of winter when the daughters of parish minister the Rev. Samuel Parris began to play games of fortunetelling using the white of an egg as a crystal ball. Panic ensued when one of the girls saw a coffin in the egg. The fearfulness soon found expression in unexplained fits, which disrupted the household and on occasion the church services. A physician suggested witchcraft and while that suggestion was under consideration, a young woman in the village suggested to Tituba and John Indian, a Caribbean Indian couple (not African as is often alleged) who were slaves in the Parris household that they prepare a witch cake (rye meal mixed with the urine of the afflicted girls) to determine if in fact witchcraft was at work. When this plan came to light Tituba and two other women were arrested.

Unfortunately, the girls' fits did not end. They began to name residents of the village who were subsequently arrested. Through the spring months the jails were filled with the accused who could not be tried as the colony was in the midst of a crisis—their charter had expired and had not been renewed. A court was finally and hastily established in June 1692 and the trials began. The first woman tried, Briget Bishop, was sentenced to death. There was little evidence to support the cases against the accused beyond the claims of the girls that spectres of the accused afflicted them and caused their fits. During the trials, when the accused appeared, they would often react as if their mere presence caused them harm. And, as the trials and executions continued and the number of accused grew, the situation in Salem became a matter of colony-wide concern.

Cotton Mather played an active role in the trials. He believed the Devil was at work in Salem, and authored the response of the Boston ministers on the necessity of the trials. However, he warned against a too ready acceptance of spectral evidence. Additionally, he spoke on the occasion of the hanging of former parish minister George Burroughs. When Burroughs flawlessly spoke the Lord's Prayer, which supposedly a witch could not do, Mather rose to quiet the crowd and allowed the execution to continue. However, it was Mather who personally called upon Governor Phelps, who had spent much of the summer away from Boston fighting the Indians, to stop the trials which had reached such large proportions.

In the end, the court sentenced 31 (including 25 women) to death. Nineteen who pleaded not guilty were hanged. One Giles Cory refused to plead, thus making use of a legal provision that would prevent his property from being confiscated. One escaped jail and left the colony; two died in jail, and two who were pregnant survived and were freed. Five joined the 55 people who confessed and were later freed.

Reaction to the trials was widespread. Among the most vehement detractors was Thomas Brattle, an educated citizen of Boston, who attacked the proceedings and termed the whole affair utter nonsense. Mather published a reply, defending the court and the idea of witchcraft, The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693), but the tide of public opinion was slowly turning against the complex of ideas underlying the trials. Mather continued the debate in his later writings, but his reputation was severely damaged by Robert Calef's attack in More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700). Eventually, on January 15, 1697, the jurors who had brought in the guilty verdicts joined in a day of fasting and repentance for the injustices of the trials. In 1702, Samuel Sewell, the judge who presided, publicly confessed his guilt and asked pardon for his role in the proceedings.

Calef's view of Mather and the trial was largely adopted by later generations who came to deny the reality of witchcraft. His reputation was only resurrected when a vigorous reappraisal of witchcraft in seventeenth-century New England occurred by such scholars as Chadwick Hansen, Paul Boyer, Stephen Nissenbaum, and John Putnam Demos.

The whole magical supernatural world present during the Salem trials is also evident in the consideration of alchemy. For example, while condemning witchcraft, Cotton Mather praised John Winthrop, Jr., and his son Wait Still Winthrop (1642–1717), both prominent citizens and both also alchemists. While governor of Connecticut, the elder Winthrop conducted alchemical experiments in the governor's mansion. He built one of the largest alchemical libraries in America and on occasion hosted visiting alchemists from Europe. Both the Winthrops joined the debates then going on in medical circles over the introduction of nonorganic substances, i.e., chemical preparations, for the treatment of illnesses.

The Occult in the Nineteenth Century

Post-Revolutionary America is extremely rich in occult history as evidenced in the writings of Spiritualist, magical, and metaphysical teachers such as Thomas Lake Harris, Andrew Jackson Davis, William Q. Judge, Mary Baker Eddy, and the people who followed them into Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Christian Science. Hundreds of occult and metaphysical movements have either originated in, or found a home in the United States from the nineteenth century onward.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons) had undoubtedly a semi-occult origin. Its founder, Joseph Smith, Jr. claimed to discover tablets of gold upon which was engraved the new revelation, the Book of Mormon, which he translated by a process similar to modern channeling. Smith also tied the church loosely to Freemasonry.

Theosophy became firmly rooted in America through the efforts of William Q. Judge, and his successor Katherine B. Tingley, the founder of the theosophical colony at Point Loma, California. In recent years, however, the American society formerly led by Judge declined and most theosophists now adhere to the Theosophical Society headquartered in Adyar, India.

Modern American Occultism and Parapsychology

Throughout the twentieth century, old and new religious movements have appeared, and a few have flourished. Ceremonial magic and Neo-pagan Witchcraft have been imported from England and both have enjoyed their greatest success in the United States. One noteworthy aspect of the American scene has been the association of revivalist evangelism with paranormal healing, an association begun in the holiness movement but finding its greatest expression in Pentecostalism.

Interestingly enough, Spiritualism (which had grown from the Hydesville rappings association with the Fox Sisters in the nineteenth century) took a firmer hold in Great Britain, Europe, and Brazil, than in America. While Spiritualism swept across America, claimed many cultural leaders, and developed into a large organizational structure, it remained a relatively minuscule movement in the midst of a large population. It did become, as in Europe, the subject of a much public scrutiny, but declined in the wake of the discovery of widespread fraud. However, the National Spiritualist Association of Churches, founded in 1893, still has more than a hundred affiliated congregations.

The emergence of Spiritualism eventually led in 1885 to the formation of the American Society for Psychical Research as a branch of the London-based Society for Psychical Research. It investigated the mediumship and the phenomena associated with that movement over the next several generations and included in its leadership a number of outstanding scientists including William James, Walter Franklin Prince, James H. Hyslop and Hereward Carrington. In 1930, American biologist/psychologist J. B. Rhine gave a new direction to the whole of psychical research as director of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University, North Carolina. Whereas psychical research was largely concerned with the phenomena associated with Spiritualist mediums, Rhine and his associates moved research from the séance-room into the laboratory and, under systematic control conditions, began testing the unknown or "extra-sensory" faculties (ESP for short) of ordinary individuals.

The new term, parapsychology, with its experimental methodology has now largely superseded the earlier approach of psychical research. Organizations also founded in the United States to pursue parapsychological research include the Psychical Research Foundation and the Parapsychology Foundation in New York, linked with the work and paranormal talents of Eileen Garrett. Rhine also led in the foundation of the Parapsychological Foundation, now the international professional association of parapsychologists.

At a popular level, belief in divination, especially astrology, has experienced a steady increase throughout the twentieth century, and is now widespread. More than 20 percent of the population express some acceptance of belief in astrology.

A major occult explosion took place in the 1960s, marked by an increased interest in psychic and occult phenomenon. This phenomenon merged into the New Age movement of the 1970s and 1980s, and earned a new respectability for those involved in the psychic movement, despite the concurrent interest in the more sinister aspects of occultism symbolized by the new Satanism.

The 1960s revival built upon earlier, if less intense, waves of interest, most notably those occurring during the 1920s and 30s. These earlier activities were of specialized coterie interest in line with the more structured society of the period, constituting a kind of occult underground of the kind described in books like Witchcraft: Its Power in the World Today by William Seabrook (1940). The witch craze of the colonial period had long ago died out, although magical practices and beliefs could be found throughout the country's rural areas and in the poorer sections of the urban centers. The last of the witchcraft trials was held in the early eighteenth century, when there were a few cases in Virginia. The twentieth-century revival of witchcraft and Satanism owed more to the freedom of the cities and the new climate of religious and cultural pluralism of the post-World War II era, undoubtedly strengthened by the widespread use of psychedelic drugs.

One of the most widespread popular preoccupations has been the phenomena of flying saucers or unidentified flying objects (UFOs), mysterious aerial objects of a disk-like shape. Such sightings had been reported for many centuries, but during the emerging space age of the 1950s, the idea that these UFOs might be spacecraft from other planets captured the popular imagination. In addition, many individuals (who in earlier generations would have become Spiritualist mediums) claimed to have met the occupants of these spacecrafts, taken trips in their crafts, and/or received psychic communications from space intelligences. With many thousands of claimed sightings, UFO groups sprang up all over the United States and interest spread to other countries of the world. At its lowest level, the flying saucer phenomenon has become something of a new mythology, comparable with other modern preoccupations such as near-death experiences. At a more responsible level, there remains a residuum of inexplicable phenomena that deserves closer investigation.

The emergence of a post-Enlightenment occult belief has been opposed at every level by leaders in the scientific community. The ongoing controversy has most recently led to the formation of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal, which is devoted to debunking occult and related claims and publishes a journal, Skeptical Inquirer.

The United States remains home to a vital popular interest in matters psychical and occult. Fate, the oldest of the occult-related periodicals, is but one of hundreds. The occult forms the basis for numerous books, movies, and television shows, and provides the substance for hundreds of religious groups and spiritual organizations, all of which provide the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal with an endless agenda.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Boyer, Paul, and Stephen Nissenbaum. Salem Possessed. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1974.

———. Salem-Village Witchcraft. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth Publishing, 1972.

Brinton, Daniel G. The Myths of the New World. Leypoldt and Holt, 1868.

Calef, Robert. More Wonders of the Invisible World. London, 1700.

Christopher, Milbourne. ESP, Seers and Psychics. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970.

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 2. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Demos, John Putnam. Entertaining Satan: Witchcraft and the Culture of Early New England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Ebon, Martin, ed. The Signet Handbook of Parapsychology. New York: New American Library, 1978.

Ellwood, Robert S., Jr. Religious and Spiritual Groups in Modern America. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1973.

Freelands, Nat. The Occult Explosion. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons/London: Michael Joseph, 1972.

Fritscher, John. Popular Witchcraft: Straight from the Witch's Mouth. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1972.

Godwin, John. Occult America. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Hansen, Chadwick. Witchcraft at Salem. New York: George Braziller, 1969. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1970.

Hohman, Johann George. Der lange vernorgene Freund. Reading, Pa., 1819. English edition as The Long Lost Friend. Harrisburg, Pa., 1850.

Jack, Alex. The New Age Dictionary. Brookline Village, Mass.: Kanthaka Press, 1976.

Jacobs, David M. The UFO Controversy in America. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1975. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1976.

Khalsa, Parmatma Singh, ed. Spiritual Community Guide No. 4, California: Spiritual Community Publications, 1979.

Kittredge, G. L. Witchcraft in Old and New England. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1929.

La Barre, Weston. Ghost Dance: The Origins of Religion. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Mather, Cotton. Wonders of the Invisible World. Boston, 1693. Reprint, Anherst, Wis.: Amherst Press, n.d.

Mather, Increase. Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits. Boston, 1693.

Melton, J. Gordon, and Isotta Poggi. Magic, Witchcraft, and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Mooney, James. "The Ghost-Dance Religion." In Annual Report of Bureau of American Ethnology. 14, 2, (1893).

Needleman, Jacob. The New Religions. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Rhine, J. B. and Associates. Parapsychology from Duke to FRNM. Durham, N.C.: Parapsychology Press, 1965.

Sladek, John. The New Apocrypha: A Guide to Strange Sciences & Occult Beliefs. New York: Stein and Day, 1974.

Starkey, Marion L. The Devil in Massachusetts. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1952. Reprint, New York: Time, 1949.

Upham, Charles W. Salem Witchcraft with an Account of Salem Village and a History of Opinion on Witchcraft and Kindred Subjects. 2 Vols. Boston, 1867. Reprint, New York: Ungar, 1959.

White, Rhea A., and Laura A. Dale. Parapsychology: Sources of Information. Metheun, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1973.

American Academy of Astrologians

An early attempt to bring together the more intellectually and research-oriented astrologers for regular sessions at which serious scientific and philosophical discussions would be held. It was fashioned after some of the early eighteenth-century academies in Europe. The prime mover in the academy's formation was John Hazelrigg, a New York astrologer, who with three colleagues called the first meeting, held in New York in 1916. It was limited to 30 members. The membership was self-perpetuating and elected new members to replace any who died or withdrew. Members had to be citizens of the United States. Although most of the members came from the New York City metropolitan area, some came from around the country, such as Inez Perry (Los Angeles), Llewellyn George (Los Angeles), and J. U. Giesy (Salt Lake City).

The academy flourished through the 1920s. Hazelrigg, one of the more capable scholars to take up consideration of astrology, was inclined toward the occult and for several years issued a yearbook that included some of the more esoteric papers presented by the academy's members.

Sources:

Hartman, William C. Who's Who in Occultism, New Thought, Psychism, and Spiritualism. Jamaica, N.Y.: Occult Press, 1927.

Hazelrigg, John. Astrosophical Principles. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1917.

Yearbook of the American Academy of Astrologians. 2 vols. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1917, 1918.

American Association—Electronic Voice Phenomena

The American Association—Electronic Voice Phenomena was founded in 1972 by Sarah Estep to collect objective evidence of survival after death. It describes itself as "a metaphysical organization interested in spiritual evolvement." Research is primarily centered around what are called Raudive voices, voices that seem to appear spontaneously on recording tapes and purport to be the communications of the dead. Such voices, first noticed in the late 1960s, became a well-known phenomenon following the 1971 English publication of Latvian psychologist Konstantin Raudive's book, Breakthrough, in which he claimed hundreds of such contacts with the deceased. The association formed in direct response to the popularity of Raudive's findings. The group enjoyed great popularity in the 1980s and by the end of the decade had approximately 200 members. The association supports conferences and publishes a quarterly newsletter. It may be contacted at 816 Midship Ct., Annapolis, MD 21401.

Sources:

Ellis, D. T. The Mediumship of the Tape Recorder. Pulborough, U.K.: The Author, 1978.

Raudive, K. Breakthrough. New York: Taplinger, 1971.

American Association of Meta-Science

Organization founded in 1977 to study, explore, and observe paranormal phenomena, including UFOs, to develop and use instruments to detect and stimulate "subtle, unseen energies," and assisted members and others in developing psychic and spiritual abilities. It aimed to provide a channel for bringing paranormal discoveries into everyday life. It published the quarterly journal Specula. Last known address: PO Box 1182, Huntsville, AL 35807.

American Astrological Society

Among the earliest attempts to form a national association of astrologers and astrological organizations, the American Astrological Society was founded on September 22, 1915, with the goal of championing the cause of astrology among the public in North America. It had a five-member board. For many years

Gustave W. Ekstrome of Minneapolis, Minnesota, was its corresponding secretary. Members came from across the United States and Canada. The society survived into the 1950s.

Sources:

Hartman, William C. Who's Who in Occultism, New Thought, Psychism, and Spiritualism. Jamaica, N.Y.: Occult Press, 1927.

American Astrology (Magazine)

Founded in 1923 by Paul G. Clancy, this monthly magazine for general readers is the longest-running astrological periodical in the United States. Each issue includes articles, reflections on world news events, day-by-day guides for signs, and horoscopes of public figures. Address: Starlog Group Inc., 475 Park Ave., New York, NY 10016.

American Dowser (Magazine)

Quarterly publication for members of the American Society of Dowsers, a long-established organization concerned with water witching, discovery of lost articles or persons, and related parapsychological phenomena. Address: The American Society of Dowsers, Danville, VT 05828.

American Federation of Astrologers

Founded in 1938 as a federation of local associations and individuals in 20 countries interested in the advancement of astrology through research and education. The association conducts examinations of individuals interested in astrology, maintains a specialized library, publishes educational and research texts as well as the monthly AFA Bulletin, and sponsors an annual convention. They have a web site at http://www.astrologers.com. Address: P.O. Box 22040, Tempe, AZ 85283.

American Folklore Society (AFS)

Long-established American society, founded in 1888, concerned with the scholarly study, collection, and publication of folklore throughout the world. It works to establish public policy to honor diverse cultures and their traditions. The society holds an annual convention and publishes the quarterly Journal of American Folklore and other studies as well as the American Folklore Newsletter (six issues per year). Address: 4350 N. Fairfax Dr., Ste. 640, Arlington, VA 22203. Website: http://afsnet.org/.

Sources:

About the American Folklore Society. http://www.afsnet.org/. March 8, 2000.

American Healers Association

Founded April 1977 in association with the Psychical Research Foundation. The association attempted to upgrade the status of healers, educate the public in availability of unconventional healers, provide training courses in healing, investigate and certify reliable healers, and protect legitimate healers from the risk of legal harassment. Last known address: 2015 Erwin Rd., Durham, NC.

American Institute for Scientific Research

The American Institute for Scientific Research was established in 1904 by James Hervey Hyslop (1854–1920), a former professor of logic and ethics at Columbia University. Hyslop was drawn into psychical research in the 1880s and within a short time was stripped of his skepticism and came to believe that such research was actually probing the afterlife. Shortly after the turn of the century, his health failed and Hyslop was forced to resign his university appointment. He then turned his attention to psychical research full time and founded the institute as an instrument to raise money for psychical research. He established two branches, one that focused on abnormal psychology and one that centered on psychical research. He received the immediate support of such scientists as psychologist William James and physiologist Charles Richet.

In 1905, the president of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR), Richard Hodgson, died, as did his society shortly thereafter. Previously the ASPR had existed as a branch of the British Society for Psychical Research, but in 1906 the ASPR was reborn through the psychical research branch of the American Institute for Scientific Research. Afterward Hyslop discontinued the institute and it survived as a new, independent ASPR. For the rest of his life Hyslop headed the new organization, through which he was able to pursue his primary interest in mediumship and its possible use for contacting the dead.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hyslop, James H. Contact with the Other World. New York: Century, 1919.

———. Life after Death: Problems of the Future Life and its Nature. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1918.

American Institutes for Research (AIC)

American Institutes for Research (AIC) is an independent not-for-profit corporation founded in 1946 by John C. Flanagan that conducts research in the behavioral and social science. Over the years it has become a large operation with several offices on both coasts. Though not known for any participation in psychical research or parapsyhcology, in 1995 AIC was plunged into the middle of a major controversy when it was asked to assemble a panel for a review of Project STAR GATE, the program of government-sponsored research on parapsychology.

AIC invited Ray Hyman, a respected psychologist from the University of Oregon with a long history of statements critical of parapsychological research, and Jessica Utts, a statistician from the University of Califrornia-Davis, who had written favorably on psychic phenomena. In addition, Dr. Lincoln Moses an Emeritus Professor at Stanford University, AIC president David A. Goslin, and two senior scientists from AIC participated in the review. The panel were given a variety of research data on remote viewing, the major technique utilized and investigated by Project STAR GATE. Utts prepared a report suggesting that a statistically significant demonstration of a psychic effect was revealed in the study. Hyman critiqued that reports suggesting that the positive results had not been shown to be from the operation of psychic phenomena. They then looked at the gathering of intelligence data through remote viewing that was seen as quite different than the laboratory experiments. The panel concluded that the use of remote viewing in intelligence gathering had, at best, limited applications. These ambiguous results were considered negative enough that Operation STAR GATE was closed and much of the material accumulated made public.

The AIC report was criticized by Edwin May, a physicist who have overseen much of the actual research, who complained that the best material had been withheld form the panel.

Sources:

Operation Star Gate. http://www.parascope.com/articles/starGateDocs.htm. April 19, 2000.

American Meditation Institute for Yoga Science and Philosophy

The American Meditation Institute was established in the mid-1990s by Leonard and Jenness Cortez Perlmutter, both students of the late Swami Rama (1925–1996), founder of the Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy, known for his demonstration of extraordinary skills while being tested by Western scientists. The Perlmutters began their study of yoga and meditation in 1975. Leonard Perlmutter is a graduate of American University and George Washington University School of Law. Following completion of his schooling, from 1971–1975 he published and edited the Washington Park Spirit, a newspaper in Albany, New York. In 1976 he became the president of Classic Gallery. Jenness Cortez Perlmutter is a landscape artist who studied at the Herron School of Art and the Art Students League.

The American Meditation Institute offers a broad range of courses in meditation and yoga and has a correspondence course in meditation. Groups of the Permutter's students gather in various locations around the Northeast and Midwest. The material they learned as students of Swami Rama forms the backbone of the institute's teachings, though material from other Eastern teachers, especially Eknath Easwaran (d. 1999) of the Blue Mountain Center for Meditation, has been integrated into the curriculum. Cordial relationships have also been established with the Kripalu Yoga Center in Albany.

The American Meditation Institute for Yoga Science and Philosophy is located at 60 Garner Rd., P.O. Box 430, Averill Park, NY 12018. It has an Internet site at http://www.americanmeditation.org/. It publishes a newsletter, Transformation.

Sources:

American Meditation Institute. http://www.americanmeditation.org/. April 23, 2000.

Transformation. Averille, N.Y., n.d.

American Museum of Magic

Established in 1978 by Robert Lund, a collector of books, movies, recordings, posters, and apparatus associated with conjuring magic and magicians. The collection includes some of the apparatus of the great magician Harry Houdini. The museum also issues a periodic newsletter. Address: 107 E. Michigan Ave., Marshall, MI 49068.

American National Institute for Psychical Research

Publishers of VISIONS, monthly magazine of psychic phenomena and related subjects. Last known address: 30423 Canwood St., No. 125, Agoura Hills, CA 91301.

American Parapsychological Research Foundation

Organization founded in 1971 to encourage interest in the expanding field of parapsychology, to promote an interchange of knowledge between the public and those in the field, to bridge the gap between academic parapsychology and the experimental ESP participation among laymen, and to stimulate interest in scientific research and encourage public involvement in future research. The foundation offered a complete course in parapsychology, including basic theories, principles, and histories of phenomena involving telepathy, clairvoyance, hypnosis, and sensory awareness, and psychometry, psychokinesis, and the human aura. It maintained a consultation and advisory service and awards a certificate after completion of the prescribed course of study in the advancement of psychic research and human understanding. Last known address: PO Box 5395, 15446 Sherman Way, Sherman Oaks, CA 91413.

American Psychical Institute and Laboratory

A short-lived parapsychology facility organized in New York in 1920 by Hereward Carrington for specialized research. It existed for two years. In 1933 it was reorganized and incorporated at 20 W. 58th St., New York. Carrington became its director, and his wife, Marie Sweet Carrington, became secretary. A long list of scientific men of international repute made up the advisory council. The institute published Bulletins.

American Psychical Society

Founded in Boston in 1882. It issued seven quarterly journals, then ceased after two years of existence.

American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR)

Founded in 1885 in Boston, Massachusetts, on the initiative of Prof. W. F. Barrett. Its initial officers included president Prof. Simon Newcomb; secretary N. D. C. Hodges; and, four vice-presidents, Profs. Stanley Hall, George S. Fullerton, Edward C. Pickering, and Dr. Charles S. Minot. Those involved in the controversial field found it difficult to maintain support, even with renowned advocates such as Harvard Psychologist and Professor of Philosophy, William James, a member of the illustrious Boston family that included his brother, novelist Henry James. In 1889, for financial considerations, then-president S. P. Langley affiliated the ASPR to the English Society for Psychical Research. The research work of the American Society for Psychical Research was conducted by Dr. Richard Hodgson from 1887 until his death in 1905. The society, never strong, was dissolved the following year. It continued as a branch of James Hervey Hyslop's American Institute for Scientific Research, and was the only active part of Hyslop's institute to develop a program.

When Hyslop died in 1920, the ASPR regained its independent status. Dr. Walter Franklin Prince became the society's director of research and editor of its publications. He carried on a variety of investigations prior to his observations of Mina S. Crandon, better known as "Margery." The ASPR board was strongly behind Margery; but Prince believed her to be a fraud. When J. Malcolm Bird, former assistant editor of the Scientific American and author of several items favorable to Margery, was appointed co-research officer with Prince in 1925, Prince was infuriated. He resigned along with other disaffected members, including Gardner Murphy, William McDougall, Elwood Worcester, and Lydia Allison. Together this group founded the rival Boston Society for Psychic Research.

Bird served as research officer for the ASPR, but suddenly resigned from his position in 1930. Later it came to light that he had second thoughts on Margery. Bird had submitted a confidential report to the board suggesting that Margery had approached him to become a confidant in producing some phenomena for magician Harry Houdini. Subsequently, Bird disappeared along with his last manuscript on Margery. He was succeeded by B. K. Thorogood (1930–39).

Following the merger of the Boston SPR back into the ASPR in 1941, George Hyslop, the son of J. H. Hyslop, became president. Since 1925 he had been a lone voice decrying the slippage of research standards. Hyslop demanded the full exposure of Margery's fraudulent activity. He reestablished the standards demanded during his father's years of leadership He was succeeded by Gardner Murphy, who served as president of the ASPR for 20 years. Murphy, a distinguished psychologist, was a dominating figure, who brought new prestige to the organization and recruited talented researchers to carry out its program. During this period, laboratory parapsychology as developed by J. B. Rhine at Duke University emerged as the cutting edge of psychic investigations. The Parapsychology Association was established (1957) as the major professional association for scholars engaged in psychic research.

By the end of the twentieth century the ASPR remained one of the most stable organizations in American psychic research and the organizational home of many leading people in the field, including Gertrude Schmeidler, Rhea White, and Karlis Osis. Publication of the society's Journal and Proceedings commenced in 1907 and have remained in publication without interruption.

The nonprofit society located in New York City exists "to advance the understanding of phenomena alleged to be paranormal: telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, psychokinesis, and related occurrences that are not at present thought to be explicable in terms of physical, psychological and biological theories." In the years following World War II, the society's concern stayed focused on the need to integrate subjects such as paranormal phenomena with a wide range of behavioral and physical sciences. This has demanded major revisions of theoretical constructs. In addition to laboratories and offices, the ASPR is home to a unique library and archives. The resources include over 10,000 volumes, over 300 periodicals, and publications in over 14 languages. Rare books, case reports, letters and manuscripts, with some material dating back to the 18th century enhances the collection.

The ASPR has an active research department and houses a large library for the members use. Membership includes the ASPR Newsletter and The Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research, which are issued quarterly; information services and access to the research library and archives. In addition, the society provides special events including lectures, symposia and meetings held at the headquarters around the country. There are no special requirements for membership. The society welcomes members of the general public, as well as professionals, active researchers, and students. Membership does not imply acceptance of any particular phenomena. Address: 5 W. 73rd St., New York, New York 10023. Website: http://www.aspr.com/.

Sources:

American Society for Psychical Research, Inc. http://www.aspr.com/. April 11, 2000.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Moore, R. Laurence. In Search of White Crows. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Rogo, D. Scott. Parapsychology: A Century of Inquiry. New York: Dell, 1975.

American Society of Dowsers

A nonprofit corporation founded in Vermont in 1961 to disseminate knowledge of dowsing (water witching, discovery of lost articles or persons, and related parapsychological phenomena), development of its skills, and recognition for its achievements. The society issues the quarterly journal the American Dowser. Christopher Bird, a trustee of the society, has written a comprehensive survey of the practice. Address: American Society of Dowsers, Danville, VT 05828. Website: http://dowsers.new-hampshire.net/.

Sources:

Bird, Christopher. The Divining Hand. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Stark, Erwin E. A History of Dowsing and Energy Relationships. North Hollywood, Calif.: BAC, 1978.

Wyman, Walker D. Witching for Water, Oil, Pipes, and Precious Minerals. River Falls: University of Wisconsin Press, 1977.

American Vinland Association

The American Vinland Association (AVA), founded in the 1980s, is a fellowship of Pagan folk following the traditions of Northern and Central Europe. It is based upon the ancient Paganism, popularly termed Norse, that was practiced from Iceland across Scandinavia to Poland, Russia, and Siberia. Practitioners are united in following the same deities, the old gods of the Aesir and Vanir (the Asatru), but have a wide range of beliefs and practices and use some very different terminology.

The AVA promotes the reestablishment of the old religions of Northern and Central Pagan Europe. It has a broad and inclusive approach that welcomes people who claim to follow Asatru, Vanatru, Finnish, Swedish, Polish, and indigenous Siberian traditions, among others that could be in Northern and Central Europe. The AVA has no official Holy Book, "accepted" sacred catechism, or infallible authority. It does adhere to the noble virtues and strive for the sixfold goal of Right, Wisdom, Might, Harvest, Frith (Peace), and Love.

The association is headed by a board of directors, the Jafner. It functions as a licensing board for priests, priestesses, and elders. The current Jafnar consists of Andy Biggers (Canada), Gamlinginn (New Mexico), Prudence Priest (California), and Dan Proulx (Canada). Regional coordinators have been appointed for Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Oregon, and New Mexico. International headquarters is at 537 Jones, San Francisco, CA 94102. At the end of the century, the AVA had some 100 members in the United States and 20 members in Canada. The AVA Internet site is at http://www.freyasfolk.org/.

American Yoga Association

Originally founded in 1971 as the Light of Yoga Society by Alice Christensen, a disciple of Swami Rama of Haridwar, India (1900–1972) (not to be confused with Swami Rama of the Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy). Swami Rama left his home in the 1920s to practice yoga and wander through the Himalayas. After three decades as a recluse, he settled in Haridwar as a yoga teacher.

Alice Christensen's yoga practice began with a vision of bright light that she experienced in 1953. She subsequently corresponded for many years with Swami Sivananda (1887–1963), founder of the Divine Life Society in Rishikesh, India. The year after Swami Sivananda's death, she met her own guru, Swami Rama, and spent a year in India studying with him. After he appointed her his representative in the West, Christensen returned to the U.S. in 1965 to lecture and teach yoga and to gather a group of students.

The Light of Yoga Society transmitted the teachings of Swami Rama, who simplified the complex wisdom of the Vendanta and developed it as a practical tool for Western practitioners. The society's program started with hatha yoga asanas and meditation, both to be practiced daily. Other practices recommended were vegetarianism, the restrained use of sex, the practice of ahimsa (nonviolence), and the avoidance of alcohol, tobacco, and drugs. During the life of Swami Rama, he guided eleven centers in India, Australia, and the U.S.

In 1982 the society was renamed the American Yoga Association, and has since functioned out of two centers, one in Cleveland Heights, Ohio, and another in Sarasota, Florida. the association produces instructional books, videos as well as meditation tapes. One of their most unique program is "Easy Does It Yoga" for seniors and those with physical challenges. The program is known for helping the elderly and handicapped regain independence through strengthening their bodies. Address P.O. Box 19986, Sarasota, FL 34276. Website: http://www.americanyogaassociation.org/.

Sources:

American Yoga Association. http://www.americanyogaassociation.org/. April 19,2000.

Christensen, Alice, and David Rankin. The Light of Yoga Society Beginner's Manual. Cleveland Heights, Ohio: Om Ram Production, 1972. Revised edition as: The American Yoga Association Beginner's Manual. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.

American Zen College

A Zen center derived from the eclectic Chogye Buddhist sect of Korea and the activities of Zen Master Gosung Shin. Shin had been abbot of several large temples in southeastern Korea when he was invited to continue the work begun by Bishop Seo Kyung-Bo, who had previously established the World Zen Center at Spruce Run Mountain, Virginia.

Shin first came to the U.S. in 1970 as a student at Harvard University. In 1971 he moved to Philadelphia and taught religion at Lehigh University. He was offered space for a Zen center at Easton, Pennsylvania, and founded the Hui-Neng Zen Temple. After several years the Temple outgrew its space, and Shin moved to Woodhull, New York, where he established the Kwan Yin Zen Center.

Continued growth led to the closing of the Woodhull center and the creation of two new centers: the Zen Center of Washington (1977), which primarily serves Koreans living in the Washington, D.C. area, and the Seneca Lake Zen Center (1978) at 16815 Germantown Rd., Route 18, Germantown, Maryland 20767. The name "American Zen College" was adopted as an inclusive designation in the early 1980s. The college publishes the journal Buddha World.

Sources:

Shin, Gosung. Zen Teachings of Emptiness. Washington, D.C: American Zen College Press, 1982.

Amethyst

Gemstone believed to have occult properties, described by sixteenth-century writer Camillus Leonardus as "reckoned among the purple and transparent stones, mixed with a violet colour, emitting rosy sparkles." The Indian variety is the most precious. When made into drinking cups or bound on the navel, it was claimed to prevent drunkenness. It was also believed to sharpen the wit, turn away evil thoughts, and give a knowledge of the future in dreams. Drunk in a potion, it was thought to expel poison and render the barren fruitful. In ancient times it was frequently engraved with the head of Bacchus and was a favorite with Roman women.

Amiante

A species of fireproof stone, which Pliny and the ancient demonologists recommended as excellent against the charms of magic.

The Amityville Horror

A well-publicized case of a modern haunting that turned out to be an elaborate hoax. On November 13, 1974, a large colonial house at 112 Ocean Ave., Amityville, Long Island, New York, was the scene of a mass murder. Twenty-four-year old Ronald DeFeo shot his parents, two brothers, and two sisters with a high-powered rifle. At his trial, DeFeo claimed that he had been obsessed by voices who told him to kill, and his attorney entered a plea of insanity. The plea was not accepted, and DeFeo was sentenced to six consecutive life terms.

In view of this horrific tragedy, the spacious Dutch colonial house was offered for sale at a relatively low price, and was purchased by George Lee Lutz of Long Island. He and his wife, Kathleen, and three children moved into their new home on December 18, 1975. They stayed in the house, which had been named "High Hopes" by a previous owner, only 28 days, then fled in terror, claiming they had been plagued by spirits. The hauntings reported were many and varied. Kathy Lutz was levitated one night and her face transformed into the appearance of an aged hag. One of the children talked to the spirit form of an enormous pig named Jodie. There were plagues of flies in the dead of winter, unearthly loud voices, music and footsteps, unpleasant smells, and a green slime that oozed through ceiling, walls, and keyholes. A Catholic priest who attempted to bless the house was commanded by a mysterious voice shouting "Get out!" After the Lutzes left the house, various mediums held seances but became ill afterward.

Mrs. Lutz's story to the press was analyzed on a truth-detecting Psychological Stress Evaluator of a type used in legal proceedings as court evidence. The investigator claimed that the results indicated Mrs. Lutz was telling the truth or what she believed to be the truth. The story of the Amityville hauntings was the subject of a telecast on Channel 5 Ten O'Clock News on February 5, 1976, with reporter Steve Bauman. The story was also told at length by author Jay Anson in his book The Amityville Horror: A True Story (1977). Anson's book became a best-seller, with paperback editions in the U.S. and Britain, and was turned into a highly successful movie with six sequels.

It now appears that the Lutzes abandoned the house, not because of any hauntings, but because they realized that they had gotten in over their heads financially. They abandoned their furniture when they left because it was so worn it was not worth moving. The idea of the haunting seems to have come from DeFeo's attorney's attempt to have DeFeo's conviction overturned. When insanity proved unacceptable, he tried to blame the murders on the voices.

When Anson began his book on the story, he was not allowed into the house and he never interviewed the Lutzes. He had only several tapes they had made from which to work. He seems to have borrowed heavily from his own screenplay of The Exorcist to fill in the gaps and make an entertaining story. Many of the strange events mentioned in the book simply never occurred: there was no levitation, no marching band, no door torn off its hinges, no tracks in the snow (as it had not snowed during the Lutzes' time in the house), no pig's face, etc. In the court hearing in September 1979 on the DeFeo case, the Lutzes admitted under oath that almost everything in the book was fiction. Because of the powerful impact of the movies, few are aware of the fictional nature of the story, which was presented to the public as fact.

The Amityville house was subsequently occupied by new owners, who stated that there were no unusual phenomena whatsoever except extensive harassment from tourists. They sued the Lutzes, the publisher Prentice-Hall, and Jay Anson for $1.1 million damages. (See also Poltergeist)

Sources:

Anson, Jay. The Amityville Horror: A True Story. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1977.

Morris, Robert L. "The Amityville Horror." The Skeptical Inquirer Vol. 2, no. 2 (Spring/Summer 1978): 95–102.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Amniomancy

Divination by means of the caul, or membrane that sometimes envelopes the head of a child at birth. From an inspection of this caul, wise women predicted the sort of future the baby would have. If it were red, happy days were in store for the child, or if lead-colored, he would have misfortunes.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Amon

According to an ancient grimoire, Amon is the great and powerful marquis of the infernal empire. He is represented as a wolf with a serpent's tail, vomiting flame. When he appears in human form, his head resembles that of a large owl with canine teeth. He is the strongest of the princes of the demons, knows the past and the future, and can reconcile friends who have quarreled. He commands 40 legions.

Amorah Quan Yin (1950–)

Amorah Quan Yin is the spiritual name of a contemporary channel of entities from the Pleiades, who currently resides in Mt. Shasta, California. Amorah Quan Yin was born on November 30, 1950, in rural Kentucky. From her childhood she reported clairvoyant psychic experiences and healings, but these were abandoned during her school years. They only manifested again after her 16th birthday. In 1977, she was diagnosed with an incurable illness and given two years to live. In response, she began a regimen of vegetarianism and meditation, and quit smoking.

Her health gradually improved and she experienced a spiritual awakening that included her adopting a New Age perspective. In 1979, she underwent some past-life therapy. In her first session she experienced herself sitting on a mountain listening to Jesus teach. As she watched, several spaceships flew above him. She experienced a direct contact with Jesus through her third eye and was flooded with light. When she came out of the session, she saw the aura of the regressionist and her own reflected in a mirror. She later came to understand the vision and the empowerment she felt in the light of extraterrestrials. She believed her healing had been overseen by the Pleiadians and the spaceships she saw from Sirius.

She began to teach classes and workshops and became a full-time teacher in 1985. She also began to make jewelry and sell gemstones, workshops on crystals having become a part of her curriculum. In 1988 she moved her work to Mt. Shasta. At Mt. Shasta, she developed her awareness of the Pleiadians and Sirians, and began channeling from the former. In 1993 she changed her name to Amorah Quan Yin. Her channeling has resulted in several books that have added to the growing literature credited to beings from the Pleiades, but she has also emerged as one of the new generation of post-New Age channelers who are in contact with a wide range of both ascended masters and extraterrestrials.

In her channeled material, Amorah Quan Yin offers an alternative view of the origin of the human race detailed to her from the Pleiadian Emissaries of Light. Humans have an origin in the deeps of space, and Earth inhabitants have a history that includes the former cultures of Venus, Mars, and Maldek (the destruction of which created the present asteroid belt). The purpose of the Pleiadian manifestation at present is the release of the patterns of restriction that are carryovers from these earlier connections. They hope to bring about the Second Coming of Christ en masse, a time when many earthlings become actualized Christed (blessed or anointed) beings. One instrument for that is the Pleiadian Lightwork described at great length in Amorah Quan Yin's The Pleiadian Workbook. The Lightwork opens up the body's Ka channels, invisible channels of light energy similar to the meridians described in Chinese medicine.

Sources:

Amorah Quan Yin. Pleiadian Perspectives on the Human Evolution. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bear & Co., 1996.

———. The Pleiadian Workbook: Awakening Your Divine Ka. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bear & Co., 1996.

AMORC See Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis

Amoymon

According to an ancient grimoire, Amoymon is one of the four kings of Hades, of which the eastern part falls to his share. He may be invoked in the morning from nine o'clock till midday and in the evening from three o'clock till six. He has been identified with Amaimon (or Amaymon). Asmodeus is his lieutenant and first prince of his dominions.

Amphiaraus

A famous soothsayer of classical mythology, son of Oicles and Hypermnestra. He hid himself so that he might not have to go to the war of Thebes, because he had foreseen that he should die there. This indeed happened, but he came to life again. A temple was raised to him in Attica, near a sacred fountain by which he had left Hades. He healed the sick by showing them in a dream the remedies they must use. He also founded many oracles. After they sacrificed, those who consulted the oracle slept under a sheep skin and dreamed a dream, which usually found plenty of interpreters after the event. Amphiaraus was an adept in the art of explaining dreams. Some prophecies in verse, which are no longer extant, were attributed to him.

Amulets

The charm, amulet, or mascot, derives from fetishism, the belief of people that a small object or fetish could contain a spirit. Amulets are said to be of two classes: those which are worn as (1) fetishes, i.e., the dwelling place of spiritual entities who are active on behalf of the wearer; or (2) mascots to ward off bad luck or such influences as the evil eye. The amulet, a protective device, is thus distinguished from a talisman, a magical charm used to accomplish some end.

There is little doubt that charms were worn by prehistoric peoples, because objects similar in appearance and general description to amulets have been discovered in neolithic tombs. The ancient Egyptians possessed a bewildering variety of amulets, worn by both the living and the dead. Indeed, among the latter, every part of the body had an amulet sacred to itself. These were, as a rule, evolved from various organs of the gods; for example, the eye of Isis, the backbone of Osiris, and so forth. Among savage and semicivilized peoples, the amulet usually took the form of necklaces, bracelets, or anklets, and where belief in witchcraft and the evil eye was strong, the faith in these and in charms was always most intense.

Stones, teeth, claws, shells, coral, and symbolic emblems were favored amulets. These item were seen to carry specific characteristics of the animal from which they were taken or to correspond to reality specific to the culture. For example, the desert goat is a sure-footed animal; accordingly, certain Malay tribes carried its tongue as a powerful amulet against falling. Beads resembling teeth were often hung around the necks of Kaffir children in Africa to assist them in teething, and the incisor teeth of the beaver were frequently placed around the necks of Native American girls to promote industriousness.

Certain plants and minerals were believed to indicate by their external character the diseases for which nature intended them as remedies. Thus the euphrasia, or eyebright, was supposed to be good for the eyes because it contains a black pupil-like spot, while the blood-stone was employed for stopping the flow of blood from a wound.

When prehistoric implements, such as arrowheads, were found, they were thought by the peasants of the locality to be of great virtue as amulets. Some light is cast on this custom by the fact that stone arrowheads were in use among medieval British witches. But in most countries they were thought to descend from the sky and were therefore kept to preserve people and cattle from lightning.

Certain roots, which have the shape of snakes, were kept by Malays to protect them against snakebite. This correspondence of root to animal likeness is known as the doctrine of signatures.

The Celts used many kinds of amulets, such as the symbolic wheel of the sun god found frequently in France and Great Britain, pebbles, amulets of the teeth of the wild boar, and pieces of amber. The well-known serpent's egg of the Druids was also probably an amulet of the priests. Indian amulets are numerous, and in Buddhist countries their use was universal, especially where that religion had degenerated. In northern Buddhist countries, it was common to wear an amulet around the neck. These generally represented the leaf of the sacred fig tree and were made in the form of a box that contained a scrap of sacred writing, prayer, or a little picture. Women of position in Tibet wore a chatelaine containing a charm or charms, and the universal amulet of the Tibetan Buddhist priests is the thunderbolt, supposed to have fallen direct from Indra's heaven. This is usually imitated in bronze or other metal and is used for exorcising evil spirits.

Many Muslims wear amulets, and it is said that the prophet Mohammed believed in the evil eye. The Koran is sometimes carried as an amulet, or extracts from it are copied out for that purpose. Suras 113 and 114 are directed against witchcraft. Other powerful charms for amulets include the names and attributes of gods, the names of the suras in the Koran, names of prophets, planets, angels, and magic squares.

Amulets were also widespread among Jewish people, particularly from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries. The phylacteries still worn in certain rituals are believed to be a protection against evil. One, derived from the legend of Lilith, bearing the name of three angels, is given to babies to protect them from her. In Jewish folklore, names of God, biblical verses and names of angels were regarded to be powerful amulets. Such amulets have been copied by non-Jewish occultists and used in ritual magic.

With the magical revival of the nineteenth century and the belief in occult powers being directed to various goals by magical practitioners, amulets once again came into widespread use. They were a necessary side effect of the development of talismanic magic, an important part of magical practice featured in the writings of Francis Barrett and Éliphas Lévi. Today, magicians and Wiccans learn the preparation of amulets as part of their basic magical training.

Sources:

Budge, E. A. W. Amulets and Talismans. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Lippman, Deborah, and Paul Colin. How to Make Amulets, Charms, and Talismans. New York: M. Evans, 1974.

Pavitt, William T., and Kate Pavitt. The Book of Talismans, Amulets, and Zodiacal Gems. Detroit: Gale Research, 1972.

Amy

According to an ancient grimoire, Amy is Grand President of Hades and one of the princes of the infernal monarchy. He appears there enveloped with flame, but on Earth, he is in human form. He teaches the secrets of astrology and liberal arts. He reveals to those who possess his favor the hiding place of treasures guarded by demons. Thirty-six of the infernal legions are under his command. The fallen angels acknowledge his orders, and he hopes that, at the end of 200,000 years, he shall return to heaven to occupy the seventh throne.

Anachitis

A stone used in divination to call up spirits from water; another stone, called synochitis, obliged them to remain while they were interrogated.

Anahata Nada (Magazine)

Monthly magazine presenting the teachings, essays, and poems of Hindu spiritual leader Sri Chinmoy. Address: Sri Chinmoy Centers, PO Box 32433, Jamaica, NY 11431.

Anamelech

An obscure demon, the bearer of ill news. In ancient times he was worshiped at Sepharvaün, a town of the Assyrians. He always revealed himself in the figure of a quail. His name, it is said, signified a "good king," and some authorities declare that this demon was the Moon, as Andramelech is the Sun.

Anancithidus

The sixteenth-century physician Camillus Leonardus described this as "a necromantic stone, whose virtue is to call up evil spirits and ghosts."

Ananda Ashram

Founded to promote the teachings of Dr. Rammurti S. Mishra, the ashram presented yoga in a modern context. Mishra was born in India in a Brahmin family and studied traditional yoga teachings along with his professional vocation as endocrinologist, neurosurgeon, and psychiatrist, practicing in India, Canada, and the United States. He is the author of Fundamentals of Yoga, a reliable guide to hatha yoga and yoga philosophy, first published in 1959, which has gone through a number of editions. He has also published The Textbook of Yoga Psychology: A New Translation and Interpretation of Patanjali's Yoga Sutras for Meaningful Application in All Modern Psychologic Disciplines. Mishra traveled widely, teaching a synthesis of traditional hatha, karma, and raja yoga in terms acceptable to modern sciences. Ananda Ashram is a branch of ICSA (Inter Cosmic Spiritual Association), with branches in various countries. The ashram may be contacted at RD 3, Box 141, Monroe, New York 10950.

Sources:

Mishra, Rammurti. Dynamics of Yoga-Mudras and Five Successive Suggestions for Meditation. Pleasant Valley, N.Y.: Kriya Press, 1967.

———. Fundamentals of Yoga. New York: Lancer Books, 1969. Reprint, Yoga Sutras: The Textbook of Yoga Psychology. New York, 1973.

———. Isha Upanishad. Dayton, Ohio: Yoga Society of Dayton, 1962.

———. Self Analysis and Self Knowledge. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1978.

Ananda Church of Self-Realization

An international group formed by J. Donald Walters (also known as Swami Kriyananda). The church has its base at the Ananda World Brotherhood Village (formerly known as the Ananda Cooperative Village). Ananda is based upon the teachings of Paramahansa Yogananda, with whom Walters studied. After Yogananda's death in 1952, Walters served as a minister in the Self-Realization Fellowship (SRF), the organization Yogananda had founded, and eventually became SRF's vice president. He left SRF in 1962 and in 1968 founded Ananda Village in the Sierra Mountains in response to Yogananda's admonition to "Cover the earth with world-brotherhood colonies, demonstrating that simplicity of living plus high thinking lead to the greatest happiness."

Kriyananda emerged as a talented leader of a successful cooperative colony, the author of numerous books, musician and composer, and yoga teacher. He followed the system of kriya yoga taught by Yogananda, the exact content of which is taught only to initiated disciples.

Four branch communities are located along the West Coast of the United States with an additional community in Italy. Approximately 50 centers and meditation groups exist worldwide. Some 250 people live at the Ananda World Brotherhood Village, and Ananda Church, which was established in 1990, numbers about 3,000 members. Kriyananda has ordained over one hundred ministers. Clarity Newsletter and Crystal Clarity Publishers serve the movement. Ananda may be contacted as 14618 Tyler Foote Blvd., Nevada City, California 95959. Website: http://www.ananda.org.

Sources:

Nordquist, Ted A. Ananda Cooperative Village. Upsala, Sweden: Borgstroms Tyckeri Ab, 1978.

Walter, J. Donald [Kriyananda]. Cities of Light. Nevada City, Calif.: Crystal Clarity Publishers, 1987.

———. Cooperative Communities: How to Start Them and Why. Nevada City, Calif.: Ananda Publications, 1968.

———. Crises in Modern Thought. Nevada City, Calif.: Ananda Publications, 1972.

———. The Path. Nevada City, Calif.: Ananda Publications, 1977.

Ananda Cooperative Village See Ananda Church of God-Realization

Ananda Marga Yoga Society

Controversial Hindu religious group with branches in many Western countries. It was founded in January 1955 in Railway Quarters No. 339, Jamalpur, India, by Probhat Ranjam Sarkar (b. 1921), a former railway accounts clerk and journalist known by his religious name, Shrii Shrii Anandamurti. Above and beyond his yoga teachings, Sarkar also taught a political philosophy known as "Prout" (progressive utilization theory), claiming that capitalism makes men slaves and communism makes them beasts; Prout offered a middle way of socialist autocracy. The meditation and yoga materials are generally released under Sarkar's religious name, and his political writings under his birth name, Phabhat Rainjan Sarkar. The two movements are officially independent of each other, though informally they are closely associated.

Initiates to Ananda Marga are instructed in the "path of bliss" by a teacher (guru). Included in the instructions are the traditional yogic disciplines of yama and niyama, the do's and don'ts of yoga. The disciple is admonished to abstain from violence, falsehood, theft, incontinence, and acquisitiveness, and to follow a path of purity, contentment, austerities, study, and dedicated activity. They are told to meditate twice daily and work toward bringing all to the path of perfection. Social service is also emphasized.

Both Ananda Marga and the Proutist party developed through the 1960s. In 1967 and 1969 the Proutists ran candidates for office in India. Then in 1971 Sarkar was accused by a former follower of conspiracy to murder, and he was arrested and left in jail awaiting trail. In the meantime, Prime Minister Indira Ghandi proclaimed a national emergency in 1975 and banned Ananda Marga. Members of the organization were involved in several violent incidents, some growing out of their public protests of their leader's imprisonment without a trial. Brought to trial under the emergency, he was not allowed to bring any witnesses in his behalf and was convicted. In 1978 he was retried and found not guilty, and there was general agreement that Sarkar was the victim of political persecution. Since that time the movement has spread worldwide, and the era of social conflict seems to have ended.

Ananda Marga was brought to the United States in September 1969 by Acharya Vimalananda. By 1973 there were more than one hundred centers, three thousand members, and a monthly periodical, Sadvipra. Ananda Marga was established in Great Britain under the leadership of an American disciple known as Acharya Bharadwaja. Branches teach meditation and yoga allied with a program of popular social activities such as food cooperatives, prison work, disaster relief, and projects with migrant farm workers. The address of the main headquarters is at Eastern Metropolitan By-Pass, V.I.P. Nagar, Tiljala, Calcutta 700039, India. The U.S. headquarters are found at 97-38 42nd Ave., 1-F, Corona, New York 11368. There are also British centers at 14 Hendrick Ave., London SW12 and 8 Ullet Rd., Liverpool 8.

Sources:

Anandamurti, Shrii Shrii. The Great Universe: Discourses on Society. Los Altos, Calif.: Ananda Marga Publishers, 1971.

Sarkar, P. R. Ideas and Ideology. Calcutta: Acarya Pranavananda Avadhuta, 1978.

The Spiritual Philosophy of Shrii Shrii Anandamurti. Denver: Ananda Marga Publications, 1981.

Anandamayi Ma, Sri (1896–1982)

Prominent Indian mystic, revered as a living saint and noted for her spiritual insight and perceptive instructions to devotees. She was born Nirmala Bhattachari on April 30, 1896, of devout Brahmin parents, in Kheora, a small village in the Comilla district of Bangladesh. The name "Nirmala" means "Pure." She began primary school at the age of five and showed unusual facility in learning. However, she preferred devotional songs to books and would often lose consciousness during the singing of hymns or the chanting of names of Hindu deities. At the age of 12, she was married to Ramani Mohan Chakravarty, but her trances continued, and her husband eventually concluded that she was to be his guru rather than a traditional wife. She renamed him "Bholanath," and thereafter their relationship was of guru and disciple rather than wife and husband.

At the age of 18, Nirmala went to the village of Bajitpur in East Bengal. During some five years there she spontaneously assumed yogic postures and recited mantras. For a year and a half she remained silent, then continued the period of silence for another year and a half on returning to her husband's home in 1923. Bholanath had her examined by various holy men and exorcists, but all believed her condition to be a spiritual one.

At the age of 27, Nirmala manifested a profound knowledge of spiritual teachings, although she had no formal training in scriptures, and she was able to fluently discuss spiritual matters with learned professors. One of her followers named Hara Kumar started calling her "Ma" (Mother) and revered her as a saint. In 1924, Jyotish Chandra Roy, a distinguished officer of the Bengal government, renounced his worldly life to become her disciple and attendant. She named him "Bhaiji," and he gave her the name of "Anandamayi" (spiritual bliss).

In 1932, Ma Anandamayi, Bholanath (now known as "Pitaji," or Father), and Bhaiji went to Dehra Dun in the Himalayan foothills and established an ashram there. Subsequently a second ashram (later to become the headquarters) was established at Varanasi (Benares). In time, a number of other ashrams were established throughout India, some with hospitals, high schools, orphanages, and charitable dispensaries. As her fame spread, Anandamayi Ma acquired devotees from Britain, Germany, France, and the U.S.

She never left India and visited her various ashrams without any special schedule, as the spirit moved her. She had remarkable presence, and many testified to her spiritual influence on them. She answered questions succinctly, with great spiritual insight. Her disciples in the United States were organized into the Matri Satsang.

Sources:

Anandamayi, Ma Sri. Matri Vani. 2 vols. Varnasi, India: Shree Shree Annandamayee Charitable Society, 1977.

———. Sad Vani. Calcutta, India: Shree Shree Anandamayi Charitable Society, 1981.

Lipski, Alexander. Life and Teachings of Sri Anandamayi Ma. Delhi, India: Motilial Banaridass, 1977.

Ananda Metteya

Religious name assumed by occultist Allan Bennett (1872–1947) after becoming a Buddhist monk.

Anandamurti, Shri

Religious name assumed by Probhat Ranjan Sarkar (b. 1921), founder of the controversial international socio-spiritual sect Ananda Marga.

Ananda World Brotherhood See Ananda Church of God-Realization

Ananisapta

A kabalistic word made up from the initial letters of the prayer Antidotum Nazareni Auferat Necene Intoxicationis; Sanctificet Alimenta, Poculaque Trinitas Alma. When written on virgin parchment, it is said to be a powerful talisman to protect against disease. (See also Kabala)

Anarazel

According to ancient superstition, Anarazel is one of the demons charged with the guardianship of subterranean treasures, which he carries about from one place to another to hide them from men. It is he who, with his companions Gaziel and Fécor, shakes the foundations of houses, raises the tempests, rings the bells at midnight, causes specters to appear, and inspires a thousand terrors.

Anathema

The name was given by the ancients to certain classes of votive offerings, to the nets that the fisherman laid on the altar of the sea nymphs, to the mirror that Laïs consecrated to Venus, and to offerings of vessels, garments, instruments, and various other articles.

The word was also applied to the victim devoted to the infernal gods, and it is this sense that is found among Jews and Christians, referring either to the curse or its object. The man who is anathematized is denied communication with the faithful, and he is delivered to the demon if he dies without absolution. Through the centuries the church often lavished anathemas upon those considered heretics and enemies, though many such as St. John Chrysostom taught that while it was well to anathematize false doctrine, people who have strayed should be pardoned and prayed for. The use of anathemas has largely dropped out of contemporary Christianity.

Magicians and sorcerers once employed a sort of anathema to discover thieves and witches. Some limpid water was brought, and in it were boiled as many pebbles as there were persons suspected. The pebbles were then buried under the doorstep over which the thief or the sorcerer was to pass, and a plate of tin was attached to it, on which was written the words "Christ is conqueror; Christ is king; Christ is master." Every pebble must bear the name of one of the suspected persons. The stones are removed at sunrise, and the one representing the guilty person is hot and glowing. The seven penitential psalms must then be recited, with the Litanies of the Saints, and the prayers of exorcism pronounced against the thief or the sorcerer. His name must be written in a circular figure, and a triangular brass nail driven in above it with a hammer, the handle of which is of cypress wood, while the exorcist declares, "Thou are just, Lord, and just are Thy judgments." At this, the thief would betray himself by a loud cry.

If the anathema has been pronounced by a sorcerer, and one wishes merely to escape the effects of it and cause it to return to him who has cast it, one must take, on Saturday, before sunrise, the branch of a one-year-old hazel tree and recite the following prayer: "I cut thee, branch of this year, in the name of him whom I wish to wound as I wound thee." The branch is then laid on the table and other prayers said, ending with "Holy Trinity, punish him who has done this evil, and take him from among us by Thy great justice, that the sorcerer or sorceress may be anathema, and we safe." Harrison Ainsworth's famous novel, The Lancashire Witches, deals with the subject and the Pendleton locality in England.

Ancient and Mystical Order of Seekers

The Ancient and Mystical Order of Seekers was founded in the 1950s by Clifford Bias (d. 1986), the founder of the Universal Spiritualist Association, as a society for the clergy and the more serious lay students in the association. The order explores the esoteric arts and sciences, those areas generally part of the work of occult orders and magical groups. Bias produced a series of manuals, The A.M.O.S. Path of Light, for the order's members. The order may be contacted c/o Universal Institute for Holistic Studies, 4905 W. University Ave., Muncie, Indiana 47304-3460.

Sources:

[Bias, Clifford]. The A.M.O.S. Path of Light. 19 vols. Muncie, Ind.: Ancient and Mystical Order of Seekers, n.d.

Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC)

The largest of the several Rosicrucian organizations operating in North America and Europe, the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC) was founded in 1915 in New York City by H. Spencer Lewis (1883–1939). Lewis dates efforts to found the order to 1909 when he met with French Rosicrucians at Toulouse for his original initiation. Upon his return to America, he began holding meetings. AMORC headquarters moved to Florida and then in the early 1920s to San Jose, California, where it is now located. Here Lewis and the order, which were becoming well known due to a publicity campaign, were sued by the Rosicrucian Fraternity under the leadership of R. Swinburne Clymer. The courts, as an outcome of the case, acknowledged the AMORC as the legitimate Rosicrucian Order and since then the phrase has been trademarked by the group.

The AMORC teaches that God created the universe according to a set of immutable laws. Human beings succeed in this life through attaining mastership, the ability to bring into material expression the things which one mentally images. The techniques taught to students are presented through a correspondence course, leading to mastery. As each level is successfully completed, the student is admitted to a higher degree and given a more advanced set of lessons. Members may, but are by no means required to, attend local gatherings of students variously designated as lodges, chapters, or pronaoi, depending upon their strength.

The AMORC sees itself as the continuation of the ancient mystery schools of the Middle East, once headed by Solomon and Amenhotep. According to its own history, the group works in 180-year cycles in which public activity is followed by a period of secrecy and silence. Thus is explained the broken history of the order. A new public cycle began in 1909. Among the famous people claimed as Rosicrucians are Isaac Newton, Rene Descartes, Benjamin Franklin, and Francis Bacon.

H. Spencer Lewis was succeeded by his son, Ralph M. Lewis (1904–1987), who headed the order for almost half a century. He was followed by Gary L. Stewart, which proved to be a disastrous choice, as it was discovered that Stewart was quietly moving the order's money into a bank account in the tiny kingdom of Andorra. He was removed from office, and Christian Bernard was selected as the new Grand Imperator.

The AMORC has attained a relatively high profile due to its continuing mass publicity campaign, making it a large international organization with members in 85 countries around the world. In 1990 there were over 250,000 members, 163 chartered groups in the United States, and 44 in Canada. Its Egyptian Museum and headquarters complex located in San Jose are popular tourist attractions. The order publishes two magazines, Rosicrucian Digest and Rosicrucian Forum, the latter for members only. Website: http://www.amorc.org/.

Sources:

Lewis, H. Spencer. Rosicrucian Manual. San Jose, Calif.: Rosicrucian Press, 1941.

———. Rosicrucian Questions and Answers. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1969.

Lewis, Ralph M. Yesterday Has Much to Tell. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1973.

"Special Ralph M. Lewis Memorial Issue." Rosicrucian Digest (1987).

Ancient Astronauts (Magazine)

Short-lived bimonthly magazine concerned with the ancient astronaut hypothesis, the possibility that Earth was visited in prehistoric times by extraterrestrial beings, and that advanced civilizations existed on Earth prior to recorded history. The magazine also covered other unexplained events and Fortean phenomena. It was published by Countrywide Publications in New York.

Ancient Astronaut Society

Founded in 1973 to bring together individuals who desired to determine whether Earth was visited in prehistoric times by extraterrestrial beings and whether advanced civilizations existed on Earth prior to recorded history. Its founder was Gene M. Phillips, who headed the organization until the group became defunct. The society was established largely out of the popular response to the writings of Erich von Däniken who, in his 1969 book, Chariots of the Gods?, developed ideas first expressed in the 1950s by writers such as George Hunt Williamson, M. K. Jessup, and Desmond Leslie. Unlike the earlier texts, however, von Däniken's book became an international best-seller.

The society was inaugurated with a conference in Chicago and held annual conferences and conducted expeditions to locations around the world, from Yugoslavia to Brazil, where members could see firsthand the sites discussed in the ancient astronaut literature. The ancient astronaut hypothesis was found unconvincing by ufologists, and was quickly segregated from UFO studies.

Sources:

Sitchin, Zecharia. The Stairway to Heaven. New York: Avon, 1980.

———. The 12th Planet. New York: Avon, 1976.

Story, Ronald. The Space Gods Revealed: A Close Look at the Theories of Erich Von Däniken. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

Von Däniken, Erich. Chariots of the Gods? New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1969.

———. In Search of Ancient Gods: My Pictorial Evidence for the Impossible. London: Souvenir, 1974.

Ancient Mysteries

Secret rituals of pagan religions, known only to select initiates who had qualified for higher spiritual development. Such mysteries were kept apart from popular worship, and initiates had to take a binding oath of secrecy, so that even today our knowledge of the mysteries is partly conjectural. Typical mystery cults were those of Eleusis in Greece from about 1500 B.C.E., in turn deriving from the mystery religions of ancient Egypt and the mysteries of Mithras, a Persian deity. Traces of Mithraism existed in Britain. Many secret societies in modern times have claimed that their rituals are a descent of an ancient tradition.

Sources:

Ulansey, David. The Origins of the Mithraic Mysteries: Cosmology and Salvation in the Ancient World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Ancitif

A little-known demon, who, during the possession of the nuns of Louviers in 1643, was said to have occupied the body of Sister Barbara of St. Michael.

Anderson, Margaret (1920–1986)

Parasychologist fellow and professor of education at the University of Pittsburgh. She became interested in parapsychology in the 1950s when she began working with Rhea White on testing ESP in children. They predicted that good relations between teachers and pupils would produce ESP, and bad relations would inhibit it, then conducted tests of clairvoyance and precognition to test their theory.

Anderson moved on and began to create situations that would yield ESP results. Her work led to a series of important papers, and in 1961 she was joint winner (with R. A. McConnell) of the McDougall Award for the article "Fantasy Testing for ESP in a Fourth and Fifth Grade Class." She was treasurer of the Parapsychological Association in 1961, president in 1962. That year she received her Ph.D. in education and began a career teaching at the University of Pittsburgh. She gradually withdrew from parapsychological circles. She retired from the university in 1985 and died the following year of lung cancer.

Sources:

Anderson, Margaret L. "The Use of Fantasy in Testing for Extrasensory Perception." Journal of the ASPR Vol. 60 (1966): 150.

Anderson, Margaret L., and R. A. McConnell. "Fantasy Testing for ESP in a Fourth and Fifth Grade Class." Journal of Psychology Vol. 52 (1961): 491.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Anderson, Rodger I(van) (1943–)

Writer on parapsychology, with special interest in survival, history of Spiritualism and psychic research, and so-called "spirit teachings." He was born in 1943 in Springville, Utah, and educated at the University of Utah (B.S., English, 1971; M.S., philosophy, 1974). Anderson grew up with a strong belief in the occult and the supernatural and was drawn to writings in parapsychology. He became involved in psychic research because of the uncritical acceptance of psychic events he found in many writers. His own interests have centered in the history of Spiritualism, possibilities of demonstrating survival of death, and experimental research. He has authored a number of articles, including philosophical and theological reflections on parapsychological studies, and co-authored two books with Rhea A. White: On Being Psychic: A Reading Guide (2nd ed., 1989) and Psychic Experiences: A Bibliography (1990). In 1983 he won the Robert H. Ashby Memorial Award offered annually by the Academy of Religion and Psychical Research.

Sources:

Anderson, Roger I. "Cahagnet's Contribution to Psychical Research." Theta 12, 4 (1983): 74.

———. "Channeling." Journal of Religion and Psychical Research Vol. 19 (1988): 5.

———. "Contemporary Survival Research: A Critical Review." Parapsychology Review Vol. 12 (1981): 5.

———. "Reincarnation: Can Christianity Accommodate It?" Journal of Religion and Psychical Research Vol. 9 (1985): 189.

———. "Swedenborg on the Modus Operandi of Spirit Communication." Parapsychology Review Vol. 13 (1982): 6.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Andrae, Johann Valentin (1586–1654)

Johann Valentin Andrae, the German Lutheran pastor who developed the legend of the Rosicrucian occult orders, came from a line of ministers that included a grandfather who had been among Martin Luther's original supporters. Andrae was born August 7, 1586, in Herrenburg, Württemberg. He attended Tübingen University, and after graduation he became chaplain at Stüttgart. In 1607, due to ill health, he returned to Tübingen, where he was introduced to mysticism as a member of the informal circle around Christoph Besold, a local devotee of the occult, especially the Kabala, the Jewish mystical system. During his last days in Tübingen he finished and anonymously published the Fama Fraternitatis, the first of his Rosicrucian publications. The following year he published the Confessio, soon to be followed by the Chemical Marriage. By this time he had moved to Vaihingen as the church's deacon.

Andrae's three volumes announced the existence of a secret fraternity founded by Christian Rosencreutz, a high occult initiate. The order had supposedly been founded a century earlier and was only now being made public. The documents further invited inquiries from interested readers but failed to give an address or location for the fraternity. Over the next decades, many would look in vain for the group. In 1619 Andrae published a short work, The Tower of Babel, in which he confessed his authorship and told his readers that the Rosicrucian order did not exist. He apparently derived the basic symbolism of the order from Martin Luther's coat of arms, which had a rose and a cross on it. However, by this time the original writings had spread far and wide, and many did not believe Andrae's confession.

Andrae essentially left his Rosicrucian ideas behind and moved to Stüttgart as court prelate to the king of Württemberg. He wrote prolifically (over a hundred books) and became a leader of the Fruit-Bringing Society, one of several German revivalist movements of the seventeenth century. He ended his career at Babenhausen, Bavaria, where he moved in 1650 to become the local abbot. He died on January 27, 1654, at Stüttgart.

Andrae's writings have become the source of intense controversy in the centuries since his death. Some came to believe that he wrote about the society as a hoax, while others just as firmly believed that he was exposing a real organization. Frustrated at their inability to locate the fraternity, people responded to various occultists who came forward as representatives of the Rosicrucians, a practice which has continued into the twentieth century. Rosicrucian orders have been founded in every century, and beginning with the founding of the Rosicrucian Fraternity in the mid-nineteenth century, no fewer than ten currently existing Rosicrucian groups have been founded. In 1968 an English edition of the Rosicrucian works of Andrae, edited by Paul M. Allen, made them generally available to the public again.

Sources:

Allen, Paul M. A Christian Rosenkreutz Anthology. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1968.

McIntosh, Christopher. The Rose Cross Unveiled. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1980.

Waite, A. E. The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. London: Rider, 1924.

Yates, Frances A. The Rosicrucian Enlightenment. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

Andreasson, Betty

Betty Andreasson, who in 1967 claimed she experienced an encounter with UFO beings, became the subject of one of the first controversies over the claimed contact with extraterrestrials that engaged the whole community of UFO researchers. In 1979, Raymond Fowler wrote the first of four books discussing what became known as the "Andreasson Affair."

Andreasson's story began on the evening of January 25, 1967, in South Ashburnham, Massachusetts. The lights went out in her home, and her seven children and her parents, who were visiting, gathered in the kitchen. Her father looked out the back window, attracted by a pink light that was shining, and he saw several little creatures which he thought of as Halloween-like entities. He made a passing note of them, but did not do anything. The next morning, all appeared to be back to normal, except Andreasson had a strange feeling that something out of the ordinary had happened. Over the next few weeks she had flashbacks of humanoid creatures and an otherworldly environment, but it was not until 1977 when she underwent some hypnosis sessions that the entire story surfaced. It appears that soon after her father saw the creatures, all of the family was placed in a state of paralysis and several small gray beings entered the house and addressed her telepathically. They took her aboard their spaceship, an action requiring Andreasson to pass through the closed door of her house and to float toward the disc-shaped craft.

On board the ship she was run through a series of tests that included probes of her body with a needle and the removal of a small object from her head by a needle inserted into her nostril. She next had a visionary experience of traveling into another world where she met a being whom she, a Christian, saw as God. The voice told her that she was a chosen one. The events aboard the ship closed with a final lecture by an entity earlier identified as Quazgaa, who told her that she would forget what had occurred for a while, but that he and his companions loved humanity and had come to help. Humans needed to study nature to rid themselves of their self-destructive tendencies. They left her with a book, which she examined several days later, but again only remembered in 1977.

Her complex story mixed elements of what came to be known as UFO abduction accounts with contactee themes of a religious-like mission. While UFO investigators would study abductions intensely through the 1980s, they avoided contactee accounts (previously denounced as hoaxes or products of delusion) until a number of the abductee stories began to add contactee-like content. As her full story unraveled, Andreasson told of a series of encounters with the saucer entities that went back to her childhood. Following her marriage in 1978 to Bob Luca, she settled in Connecticut, where her home became the scene of a variety of psychic and unusual occurrences. Luca himself would undergo hypnosis to tell of a similar set of encounters to those already described by his new bride. New experiences continued into the 1990s.

The Andreasson Affair was integrated into the whole study of abductions during the 1980s, a study that continues. Though a number of leading UFO researchers have gone on record as believing the abduction stories, their work has yet to produce consensus or what many would see as hard evidence. Final evaluation of the Andreasson encounters awaits a final resolution of the issue of abductions. Skeptics have offered variant explanations from lying (the least credible hypothesis) to subconscious fantasy. Andreasson has continued to integrate her experiences, which she sees as evidence of the government of God over the world, into her Christian beliefs.

Sources:

Fowler, Raymond. The Andreasson Affair. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979.

———. The Andreasson Affair, Phase Two. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1982.

———. The Watchers: The Secret Design Behind UFO Abduction. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1990.

———. The Watchers II: Exploring UFOs and the Near Death Experience. Newberg, Ore: Wild Flower Press, 1995.

Taves, Ernest H. "Betty through the Looking-Glass." Skeptical Inquirer 4, no. 2 (winter 1979/1980): 88–95.

Andrews, Lynn W.

New Age teacher and author Lynn W. Andrews suddenly emerged in 1981 with the publication of her first book, Medicine Woman, which told the story of her transformation from Beverly Hills socialite and Native American art collector into a New Age shaman. The process centered upon her search for a particular marriage basket. During the search she encountered two Cree Indian medicine women, Agnes Whistling Elk and Ruby Plenty Chiefs, had a variety of encounters with several spirit guides, and experienced a number of vivid dreams, all of which led to her initiation into the Sisterhood of the Shields. She described the sisterhood as an international secret society that seeks to share the ancient traditions of Native American women across national and ethnic boundaries. Andrews was admitted as the first white member, a step toward opening the sisterhood to women of all races.

American Indian scholars have criticized Andrews for presenting a somewhat fictional picture of whatever encounters with Native Americans she had and of not clearly distinguishing between elements of her teachings that came from traditional Native American sources and those that came from contemporary metaphysical writings and her own creative endeavors. Nevertheless, her writings struck a responsive chord among many women in the New Age, and her original book was followed by Flight of the Seventh Moon, which expanded her account of work with the Sisterhood of the Shields, and more than a dozen others. She also became a popular speaker and seminar leader. She now presents herself as the spokesperson of sisterhood and her workshops offer instructions and initiation in its shamanistic teachings and experiences.

A prominent element in Andrews' system is the medicine wheel, a model for organizing the spiritual life first introduced to the non-Indian and new Age community by Sun Bear, an Ojibwa Indian who became a popular teacher in New Age circles prior to his death in 1992. As presented by Sun Bear, and by Andrews who studied with him, the medicine wheel bears some resemblance to traditional Western astrology teachings. Andrews also studied the writings of Hyemeyohsts Storm, who emphasized another prominent teaching in Andrews' books, the acquisition of a personal spirit helper.

In the 1980s, Andrews began to meet with a group of her readers in an annual four-day retreat that provided a more intensive environment for study and spiritual work that than possible in occasional workshops. Building upon that retreat, in 1994, Andrews founded the Lynn Andrews Center for Sacred Arts and Training that provides a two- and a four-year curriculum for those interested in a more structured program in shamanism. Her website can be found at http://www.lynnandrews.com.

Sources:

Andrews, Lynn. Dark Sisters: A Sorcerers Love Story. New York: Harper Perennial Library, 1999.

———. Flight of the Seventh Moon. New York: Harper & Row, 1984.

———. Love and Power: Awakening to Mastery. New York: Harper Perennial Library, 1998.

———. Medicine Woman. New York: Harper & Row, 1981.

———. Teachings around the Sacred Wheel. New York: Harper & Row, 1990.

Storm, Hyemeyohsts. Seven Arrows. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Sun Bear. The Medicine Wheel. New York: Prentice Hall, 1980.

Andrews, Mary (ca. 1871)

One of the earliest mediums for materialization. She was a plain, uneducated woman of Moravia, near Auburn, New York. Her seances were held in the house of a farmer named Keeler. In the dark seances, questions were answered by spirit lights, the piano was sounded, water was sprinkled into the faces of the sitters, they were touched by phantom hands, and spirit voices were heard. In the light seances, the second part of the exhibition, the medium sat in a cabinet, and busts, arms, and hands materialized, the lips of phantom faces were seen in motion, and, despite the dim light, many departed relatives were recognized.

T. R. Hazard, Epes Sargent, and Eugene Crowell provided accounts of Andrews's sittings, while John W. Truesdell offered a very critical appraisal of her seances.

Sources:

Crowell, Eugene. The Identity of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism. N.p., 1874.

Hazard, T. R. Eleven Days in Moravia. N.p., n.d.

Sargent, Epes. Proof Palpable of Immortality. N.p., 1875.

Truesdell, John W. The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism. 1883. Reprint, New York, 1884.

Androdamas

According to ancient belief, the androdamas is a stone resembling the diamond, said to be found in the sands of the Red Sea, in squares or dies. Its name denotes the virtue belonging to it, namely, to restrain anger, mitigate lunacy, and lessen the gravity of the body.

Android

A man made by other means than the natural mode of reproduction. The automaton attributed to Albertus Magnus, which St. Thomas destroyed with his stick because its answers to his questions puzzled him, was such an android. Some have attempted to humanize a root called the mandrake, which bears a fantastic resemblance to a human being. In modern times, androids or robots have become commonplace in science fiction stories and films. (See also Mandragoras)

Angel of North America

The Angel of North America is a spiritual entity who speaks through Virginia housewife Patricia Ann Meyer. Meyer, born in Virginia in the 1960s, was raised a devout Roman Catholic. She married during her college years and the first of her two children was born in 1985. In 1986 she received her Ph.D. from the College of William and Mary and settled in the Tidewater area of Virginia. Three years later she took a job in Richmond, Virginia.

In 1991, Meyer's husband, Jerry, began to hear voices. He did not let anyone know what was happening for two years. Only after he read James Redfield's book, The Celestial Prophecy, which discussed the phenomenon of increased communications from the spirit world, did he relax his fears and seriously listen. Subsequently he told his wife the story that three angels had come to him as messengers of God. They said that the world's wickedness was leading to a punishment through which God would cleanse the wickedness from the Earth (through a series of natural disasters). He was a chosen survivor who would assist other survivors to recover what was left after the punishment. The angels spoke for some four months.

After Jerry shared the message he had received with his wife, she asked to be part of what could be done to possibly prevent the disasters. Soon afterwards, a single angel called the Teacher, or the Angel of North America, began to speak to her, and she recorded the messages on her computer. During the next two years, the angel told Meyer that society no longer accepted the existence of evil and had allowed it to become part of its life. However, God would not send the punishment without also offering an opportunity for people to exercise their free will and to choose what is good. The angel came to give the warning. Meyer related the Angel of North America coming to her with the 1990s emphasis on angel contact, but her angel denied such an interpretation. Rather, her angel pointed to the necessity of prayer and adherence to the Ten Commandments as the means of saving ourselves. The angel spoke against what was defined as the liberal spirit of the age that lost a sense of moral right and wrong in the attempt to allow all to act and think as they will.

The initial selection of messages from the Angel of North America was published in 1996, and Meyer invited assistance in spreading the words of the angel. The message is for the 20-year period (1995–2015). If people continue to ignore the evil and refuse to change their ways, the punishment (such as occurred in Egypt when Moses warned the Pharaoh) will come. The Meyers continue to circulate the angel's message, though to date a second volume of messages has not been released.

Sources:

Meyer, Patricia. The Teachings of the Angel of North America. Book 1: How to Save Your Soul and Your Society. Richmond, Va.: Oaklea Press, 1996.

Angels

The word "angel" ("angelos" in Greek, "malak" in Hebrew) means a person sent or a messenger. It is a name not of nature but of office, and is applied also to humans in the world who are ambassadors or representatives. In another sense, the word denotes a spiritual being employed in occasional offices; and lastly, men in office as priests or bishops. The "angel of the congregation" among the Jews was the chief of the synagogue. This later usage is also found in Revelation 1 and 2, where the"angel of the church" is regularly addressed. Today, the term is now limited to its principal meaning, and pertains only to the inhabitants of heaven.

Biblical Angels

Mark, the apostle of the Gentiles, speaks of the angels as "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation," in strict keeping with the import of the term itself. In Mark 1:2, it is applied to John the Baptist: "Behold I send my messenger (i.e., angel) before my face," and the word is the same ("malak") in the corresponding prophecy of Malachi. In Hebrews 12: 22, 24, we read: "Ye have come to an innumerable company of angels, to the spirits of the just," and this idea of their great number is sustained by the words of the Lord, where, for example, he declares that "twelve legions" of them were ready upon his demand. In the Revelation of St. John, a vast idea of their overwhelming number is indicated. Their song of praise is described as "the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings."

The angels form the armies of heaven, and military terms are commonly quoted. It is mentioned in the Bible that the angel host or army will fight God's cosmic battle. For example, an angel destroyed Sennacherib's army encamped around Jerusalem. They appeared to the shepards to announce the birth of Jesus, and Jesus will lead the armies of God in the final conflict at the end of time (Revelation 19:14). The idea of angelic armies would come to the forefront during World War I in the myth of the Angels of Mons.

As to the nature of angels, it is essentially the same as that of humans, for not only are understanding and will attributed to them, but they have been mistaken for humans when they appear, and seem capable of disobedience (Hebrews 2:7, 16). The latter possibility is exhibited in its greatest extent by Jude, who speaks of the "angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation," and upon this passage would later lay the foundation of the differences and definitions concerning angels and demons. The former term limited its meaning only to the obedient ministers of the will of the Almighty, and the influence of evil angels is concentrated only on the devil or Satan. These ideas were common to the whole Eastern world, and were probably derived by the Jewish people from the Assyrians. The Pharisees charged Jesus with casting out devils "by Beelzebub the prince of the devils." The idea that evil spirits acted in multitudes under one person appears in Mark 5:9, where, when he is asked his name, the evil spirit answers: "My name is 'Legion' for we are many."

In the Bible two orders are mentioned in scripture, "angels" and "archangels;" but the latter only occurs twice, namely, in Jude, where Michael is called "an archangel," and in I Thessalonians 4:16, where it is written: "the Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God."

Gabriel and Michael are the only angels mentioned by name. The archangel Michael appeared to Daniel and will lead his angelic army against the people of God (Revelation 12:7). The mention of Michael by name occurs five times in scripture, and always in the character of a chief militant. In Daniel, he is the champion of the Jewish church against Persia; in the Revelation, he overcame the dragon; and in Jude he is mentioned in a personal conflict with the devil about the body of Moses. He is called by Gabriel, "Michael, your prince," meaning the prince of the Jewish church. Gabriel first appeared as an angel to give Daniel an interpretation of a dream (Daniel 8:16–27) but earned his lasting fame as the one to announce both the birth of John the Baptist to Zachariah and the coming birth of Jesus to the Virgin Mary (Luke 1:11–38).

Developing Notions about Angels

In the intertestimental period (the centuries just prior to the Christian era) as the Jewish notion of angelic orders developed, Michael and Gabriel were named as two of the seven archangels. The alleged prophecy of Enoch states, "Michael, one of the holy angels who, presiding over human virtue, commands the nations." The same volume notes that Raphael, "presides over the spirits of men." And other angels who will become integral to Western angelic and magical lore appear: Uriel, who reigns "over clamor and terror"; and Gabriel, who reigns "over Paradise, and over the cherubims."

As the Roman Catholic mass evolved, Michael, now a saint, was invoked as a "most glorious and warlike prince," "the receiver of souls," and "the vanquisher of evil spirits." His symbol is a banner hanging on a cross; he is armed and represents victory, with a dart in one hand and a cross on his forehead. It may be noted that God himself is called the angel of the Covenant, because he embodied in his own person the whole power and representation of the angelic kingdom, as the messenger, not of separate and temporary commands, but of the whole word in its fullness.

Dionysius, or St. Denis, the supposed Areopagite (sixth century C.E.), describes three hierarchies of angels in nine choirs: Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers, Virtues, Angels, and Archangels. These were created by assembling various biblical passages (such as Exodus 25:18–20; Isaiah 6:2–3; Ephesians 3:10) and the book of Enoch. Vartan (or Vertabied), the thirteenth-century Armenian poet and historian, described them under the same terms, but expressly stated: "these orders differ from one another in situation and degree of glory, just as there are different ranks among men, though they are all of one nature."

This description, and all others resembling it (the twelve heavenly worlds of Plato, and the heaven of the Chinese, for example), can be understood as landmarks serving to denote the heights human intelligence has reached at various times in the attempt to represent the eternal and infinite in precise terms. Seventeenth-century mystic Jakob Boehme recognized the "whole deep between the stars," as the heaven of one of the three hierarchies, and placed the other two above it; "in the midst of all which," he says, "is the Son of God; no part of either is farther or nearer to him, yet are the three kingdoms circular about him." The visions of Emanuel Swedenborg date a century later, and describe his intimacy with the angelic world. The angels described to him in great detail a level of spiritual existence qualitatively different from the visible world of sensation.

Angelic Realms in Jewish Thought

Jewish teachers have developed an elaborate doctrine of a heavenly hierarchy. Some, such as Bechai and Joshua, teach that "every day ministering angels are created out of the river Dinor, or fiery stream, and they sing an anthem and cease to exist; as it is written, they are new every morning." This idea appears to be a misunderstanding of biblical intent—to be "renewed" or "created" in the scriptural sense is to be regenerated. Thus, to be renewed every morning is to be kept in a regenerate state; the fiery stream is the baptism by fire or divine love.

In later doctrine, the angelic hierarchies were understood in correspondence to the ten divine names. Both Christian and astrological elements eventually could be discerned in the presentation that reached its height in the teachings of the Kabala.

The following represents the angelic hierarchies answering to the ten divine names:

1. Jehovah, attributed to God the Father, being the pure and simple essence of the divinity, flowing through Hajoth Hakados to the angel Metratton and to the ministering spirit, Reschith Hajalalim, who guides the primum mobile, and bestows the gift of being on all. These names are to be understood as pure essences, or as spheres of angels and blessed spirits, by whose agency the divine providence extends.

2. Jah, attributed to the person of the Messiah or Logos, whose power and influence descends through the angel Masleh into the sphere of the Zodiac. This is the spirit or word that actuated the chaos and ultimately produced the four elements and all creatures, by the agency of a spirit named Raziel, who was the ruler of Adam.

3. Ehjeh, attributed to the Holy Spirit, whose divine light is received by the angel Sabbathi, and communicated from him through the sphere of Saturn. It denotes the beginning of the supernatural generation, and hence of all living souls.

The ancient Jews considered the three superior names to be those above, to be attributed to the divine essence as personal or proper names, while the seven noted below denote the measures (middoth) or attributes that are visible in the works of God. But modern Jews, in opposition to the tripersonalists, consider the whole as attributes. The higher three denote the heavens, and the succeeding ones the seven planets or worlds, to each of which a presiding angel is assigned.

4. El, strength, power, and light, through which flows grace, goodness, mercy, piety, and munificence to the angel Zadkiel, and passing through the sphere of Jupiter, fashions the images of all bodies, bestowing clemency, benevolence and justice on all.

5. Elohi, the upholder of the sword and left hand of God. Its influence penetrates the angel Geburah (or Gamaliel) and descends through the sphere of Mars. It imparts fortitude in times of war and affliction.

6. Tsebaoth, the title of God as Lord of hosts. The angel is Raphael, through whom its mighty power passes into the sphere of the sun, giving motion, heat, and brightness to it.

7. Elion, the title of God as the highest. The angel is Michael. The sphere to which he imparts its influence is Mercury, giving benignity, motion, and intelligence, with elegance and consonance of speech.

8. Adonai, master or lord, governing the angel Haniel, and the sphere of Venus.

9. Shaddai. The virtue of this name is conveyed by Cherubim to the angel Gabriel and influences the sphere of the moon. It causes increase and decrease, and rules the jinn and protecting spirits.

10. Elohim, the source of knowledge, understanding, and wisdom, received by the angel Jesodoth, and imparted to the sphere of the Earth.

The division of angels into nine orders or three hierarchies, as derived from Dionysius Areopagus, was made in the Middle Ages, which gave the prevalent division much of its symbolism. With it was held the doctrine of their separate creation; the tradition of the rebellious hierarchy, headed by Lucifer, was rendered familiar to society by the epic poetry of John Milton. The medieval development of angelology was passed on to occultists and a description of the angelic orders became integral to magic and in the practices of magical rituals.

Angels and Giants

Another leading belief, not so much interwoven with the popular theology, was that of angels' intercourse with women, producing the race of giants. The idea derived from Genesis 4:2, in the adoption of which the Christian fathers followed the opinion of ancient Jewish interpreters, Philo-Judaeus, and Josephus. A particular account of the circumstances is given in the book of Enoch, which makes the angels—Uriel, Gabriel, and Michael—the chief instruments in the subjugation of the adulterers and their formidable offspring. The classic writers have perpetuated similar beliefs of the "hero" race, all of them born either from the love of the gods for women, or of the preference shown for a goddess by some mortal man.

The Persian, Jewish, and Muslim accounts of angels all evince a common origin, and they alike admit a difference of sex. In the latter, the name of Azazil is given to the hierarchy nearest the throne of God, to which the Mohammedan Satan (Eblis or Haris) is supposed to have belonged; also Azreal, the angel of death, and Asrafil (probably the same as Israfil), the angel of the resurrection. The examiners, Moukir and Nakir, are subordinate angels who are armed with whips of iron and fire, and interrogate recently deceased souls as to their lives.

The parallel belief in the Talmud is an account of seven angels who beset the paths of death. The Koran also assigns two angels to every man—one to record his good and the other his evil actions. They are so merciful that if an evil action has been done, it is not recorded until the man has slept, and if at that time he repents, they place on the record that God has pardoned him. The Siamese, besides holding the difference of sex, imagine angels have offspring; but their beliefs concerning the government of the world and the guardianship of the human race are similar to those of other nations.

The Christian fathers, for the most part, believed angels possessed bodies of heavenly substance (Tertullian calls it "angelified flesh"), and, if not, they could assume a corporeal presence at their pleasure. In fact, all the actions recorded of angels in Scripture imply human bodies and attributes.

Some Theosophists regard angels as related to fairy life, part of the "Devic" kingdom (from the Sanskrit term "deva," or "divine being"). Reports of encounters with visitors from flying saucers often suggest a secular form of angel life.

Contemporary Interest in Angels

The existence of angels, especially guardian angels, has been a common theme of popular Western lore. It has been the subject of numerous Christian texts and been championed in metaphysical lore by the likes of Flower A. Newhouse, founder of Christward Ministry in Escondido, California. In the late 1980s a significant revival of interest in angels occurred and a number of new books and reprints of old books began to appear. While many of these repeated traditional themes, the majority flowed out of the New Age movement and concerned present contact and channeling of messages from angelic beings—a source more acceptable and familiar to many with a Christian background than communication with spirits of the deceased.

One interesting variation on the current interest in angels are the writings of artist Leilah Wendell, who has written a series of books concerning her communications with Azrael, the angel of death, and who created a popular museum built around artistic representations of death in New Orleans.

Sources:

Clayton, Rev. George. Angelology; Agency & Ministry of Holy Angels. New York, 1851.

Davidson, Gustav. A Dictionary of Angels: Including the Fallen Angels. New York: Free Press, 1967.

Duke, H. H. The Holy Angels: Their Nature & Employments. London, 1875.

Hodson, Geoffrey. The Kingdom of Faerie. London, 1927.

Miller, C. Leslie. All About Angels: The Other Side of the Spirit World. Glendale: G/L Regal Books, 1973.

Newhouse, Flower A. Natives of Eternity. Vista, Calif.: The Author, 1950.

O'Kennedy, Rev. R. Book of the Holy Angels. London, 1887.

Swedenborg, Emanuel. Earths in Planets & in Starry Heavens: Inhabitants, Spirits & Angels. London, 1758.

Wendell, Leilah. The Book of Azrael. New York: Westgate Press, 1988.

Angelseaxisce Ealdriht

Angelseaxisce Ealdriht is one of several Norse Pagan groups to emerge as Paganism has become established anew among people of Northern European descent residing in North America. Members venerate the deities that were popular in pre-Christian Scandinavia and Germany, referred to collectively as the Aesir and Vanir. They include Woden (or Odin), Ing Frea (Freyr), Tiw (Tyr), Frige (Frigg), and Thunor (Thor). Members value beliefs (or thoth) that build loyalty to the deities, one's ancestors, and fellow Heathen. The swearing of holy oaths and the making of sacred vows are key activities seen as building thoth. Members of Angelseaxisce Ealdriht also see themselves as very modern Pagans. They esteem the past and the values extolled in ancient Pagan society, and they seek to reestablish those values in a modern context.

The basic building block of the Ealdriht is the maethel, a relatively small grouping of Pagans who live in close proximity to one another and who can gather regularly for services and fellowship. Each member of the Ealdriht is a member of only one maethel. Those individuals who live geographically distant from other members are assigned to a maethel until enough members are found who allow a functional maethal to be organized. When a person joins the Ealdriht, a maethel accepts him/her and assumes the responsibility for teaching the Heathen ways. Members with a special interest, be it constructing weapons, learning magic, or creating wine, may join with like-minded individuals in a guild. Guilds provide a place for advancement in the organization as they offer opportunities for the demonstration of knowledge and skills, or for service to the Ealdriht.

Leadership of the Ealdriht is vested in the Witangemot, a council composed of the leader of all the maethels and officers elected by the body of members. Members are currently drawn from across North America, and a headquarters has been established in Missouri. More detailed information may be found at the group's website, http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/6909/, or from its headquarters at 202 E. Mulbury, Huntsville, MO 65259.

Sources:

Angelseaxisce Ealdriht. http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/6909/. November 1, 1999.

Angel's Hair

A fine, filmy substance observed falling from the sky, sometimes extensively. It has been explained as cobwebs from airborne spiders, but the strands of angel's hair may vary in length from a few inches to over a hundred feet, and often dissolve in contact with the ground. Possibly the earliest account of angel hair occurred in 1741 when it was reported that "flakes or rags about one inch broad and five or six inches long" fell on the towns of Bradly, Selborne, and Alresford in England. In 1881 Scientific American carried an account of huge falling spider webs (one as large as 60 feet, over Lake Michigan). Other falls have been reported over the years, and accounts were collected by Charles Fort, famous for his assemblage of accounts of anomalous natural events.

In the 1950s angel hair became associated with UFOs. A famous case occurred in France in 1952 during which a local high school principal reported seeing a cylindrical-shaped UFO and a circular one. The flying objects left a film behind them, which floated to the earth and fell to the ground covering trees, telephone wires, and roofs of houses. When the material was picked up and rolled into a ball, it turned gelatinous and vanished. Occasional additional accounts have appeared in the literature over the years, though angel hair is by no means a common element of UFO reports. Analysis of angel hair has proved elusive as the material seems to dissolve very quickly. (See also Devil's Jelly; Falls)

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Corliss, William R., ed. Handbook of Unusual Natural Phenomena. Glen Arm, Md.: Sourcebook Project, 1977.

Angels of Mons

A story by British author Arthur Machen, first published in the London Evening News for September 14, 1915, on the apparition of phantom English bowmen from the field of Agincourt during the terrible retreat from Mons in World War I. The story quoted the testimony of an officer as follows:

"On the night of the 27th I was riding along the column with two other officers. . . . As we rode along I became conscious of the fact that in the fields on both sides of the road along which we were marching I could see a very large body of horsemen. . . . The other two officers had stopped talking. At last one of them asked me if I saw anything in the fields. I told them what I had seen. The third officer confessed that he, too, had been watching these horsemen for the past twenty minutes. So convinced were we that they were really cavalry, that at the next halt one of the officers took a party of men out to reconnoitre and found no one there. The night then grew darker and we saw no more.''

Confirmations poured in. Similar visions of phantom armies were related from different battle fronts. Books were written on the occurrence. Harold Begbie, in On the Side of the Angels (1915), quoted testimonies of soldiers. A dying prisoner spoke of the reluctance of the Germans to attack the English lines ''because of the thousands of troops behind us.'' Machen continued to reiterate that the story was complete fiction. A claim in 1930 added another feature to the story. Friedrich Herzenwirth, a director of the German espionage system, published his memoirs in February 1930 and declared that the Angels of Mons were motion pictures, projected by German flyers on the clouds to make the English troops believe that even God was on the German side. No firm evidence has been produced to support this explanation.

Sources:

Machen, Arthur. The Angel of Mons: The Bowmen and Other Legends of the War. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1915.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Angel Therapy

Angel Therapy is a form of psychological counseling that integrates traditional counseling techniques with a belief in the reality of angels and the ability of patients to become aware of them. Angel therapy was developed by Doreen Virtue. Through the 1980s and early 1990s, Virtue had led a rather normal life as a psychologist. She had received her masters and doctorate in counseling psychology and subsequently headed various counseling programs, was an administrator at Woodside Women's Hospital in the San Francisco Bay Area and founded WomanKind Psychiatric Hospital at Cumberland Hall Hospital in Nashville, Tennessee.

While to all outward appearances she was a mainstream psychologist, she had also had ongoing experiences as a clairvoyant. During her childhood she has seen and conversed with invisible friends. Teased for her clairvoyant experiences, she denied them as an adult, although they periodically resurfaced. During counseling sessions, for example, she occasionally received information that allowed her to assist her patient. Everything changed in 1995, however, when the angelic voices warned her that her car would soon be stolen. She did not heed the voices, and before the day was out found herself in the midst of an attempted car jacking. With two men attempting to take her car, she finally listened to the voice that told her to scream. She did and the two men were scared off by a person attracted to the situation by her scream.

As a result of this experience, she began to listen to the voices, which she saw as coming from angelic sources, and began to reevaluate her life. He natural psychic abilities returned and Angel Therapy resulted from her conscious mixing of her psychological training with her psychic abilities. She also left her position at the hospital and went into private practice. As Angel Therapy matured, she began to lecture, write books, and give workshops. She made a number of natural media interviews and was especially popular on daytime television shows oriented toward women.

In the five years following her life-changing experience, she authored a number of books including Angel Therapy: Healing Messages for Every Area of Your Life (1997); Divine Guidance: How to Have a Dialogue with God and Your Guardian Angeles (1998); Chakra Clearing (1998); and Healing with the Angels: How the Angels can Assist You with Every Area of Your Life (1999). She has also released a 44-card Angel Oracle Deck (1999) and a variety of cassette tapes.

Virtue's workshops and appearances are handled through Wing and a Prayer Productions, which may be contacted through her expansive Internet site at http://www.angeltherapy.com/. Virtue is also a vegetarian and animal rights activist, and recommends products that were produced without causing any pain or death to animal life.

Sources:

Virtue, Doreen. Angel Therapy: Healing Messages for Every Area of Your Life. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1997.

———. Chakra Clearing. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1998.

———. Divine Guidance: How to Have a Dialogue with God and Your Guardian Angeles. Los Angeles: Audio Renaissance, 1998.

———. Healing with the Angels: How the Angels can Assist You with Every Area of Your Life. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1999.

Angelucci, Orfeo (1912–1993)

Orfeo Angelucci, one of the original group of men who claimed to have made contact with the extraterrestrial entities who came to earth following World War II (1939–45) and the explosion of atomic weapons, was born and raised in New Jersey. However, he was working in an aircraft plant in Oakland, California, when he initially made contact.

According to his story, on May 24, 1952, he was driving home from work when he saw a saucer, sensing a force a few minutes before seeing the large red ovoid object. As he approached it, two small green objects came from it. A voice spoke some word assuring him of their benign intent, reminded him of his first having seen a saucer some six years previously, and told him that they had been watching him through the years. They also materialized a cup full of a liquid that Angelucci drank. This mystical-like experience ended with a message of the extraterrestrial's love of humanity and Angelucci's primacy as the first human they had contacted.

Two months later a second contact occurred, and this time Angelucci actually entered the saucer, which he described as appearing like a large soap bubble. The interior was iridescent and he felt as if he were in a dream state. His visit ended in another mystical-like experience during which a blinding light projected him beyond time and space and his life became crystal clear. He came to understand the mystery of life and found himself lost in a timeless sea of bliss.

On August 3, Angelucci had a third encounter, a face-to-face meeting with some of the space people during which he was told of an impending war that would be followed by a New Age of brotherhood. Later that month he would tell his story at the flying saucer convention held in Los Angeles, California, but the mystical states and additional messages would continue. They became the subject of his 1955 book, The Secret of the Saucers.

Though, like all of the contactees, he was dismissed by the larger community of saucer buffs who were searching for a more nuts-and-bolts explanation of the flying saucers (soon to be dubbed unidentified flying objects), Angelucci became a celebrity among those people who responded to the accounts put forth by the contactees. They had no problem with reports of direct extraterrestrial encounters integrated with paranormal and mystical elements, and stories such as Angelucci's became the foundation of a set of new flying saucer religions.

After a decade on the lecture circuit, Angelucci faded into obscurity. His death on July 24, 1993, was briefly noted in the UFO community.

Sources:

Angelucci, Orfeo. The Secret of the Saucers. Amherst, Wis.: Amherst Press, 1955.

———. Son of the Sun. Los Angeles: DeVorss and Co., 1959.

Flammonde, Paris. The Age of Flying Saucers: Notes on a Projected History of Unidentified Flying Objects. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1971.

"Orfeo 'Orville' Angeleucci. Obituary." Trenton Times (August 4, 1993).

Anger, Kenneth (1930–)

Avant-garde filmmaker and writer with a special interest in the occult. Born February 3, 1930, in Santa Monica, California, he was educated at Beverly Hills High School and also attended a school for expressive dancing. At the age of four he played the part of the changeling prince in Max Reinhardt's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" for Warner Brothers. It was the beginning of Anger's fascination with filmmaking.

He grew up in Hollywood and collected a great deal of film memorabilia along with stories and gossip of the film industry, which formed the basis of his book Hollywood Babylone, first published in Paris, 1959, and reissued as Hollywood Babylon in 1965 and revised in 1975.

On graduation from high school, Anger's grandmother, who had happy memories of Paris, sponsored Anger's visit to Paris, where he met Jean Cocteau. Cocteau was impressed by Anger's first film, "Fireworks," and introduced Anger to writer Anaïs Nin.

In 1955 Anger paid a visit to Cefalù, Sicily, and rediscovered the Abbey of Thelema, the occult community established by Aleister Crowley in 1920. Anger uncovered a variety of magical paintings, many with sexual themes, on the abbey walls and doors, hidden by whitewash 37 years earlier by order of the Italian police. Dr. Alfred C. Kinsey, compiler of the famous report Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (1948), visited Cefalù, where Anger showed him the unique murals. The story of Anger's discovery was featured in a two-part article in the journal Picture Post (November 26–December 3, 1955), illustrated with striking photographs by Fosco Maraini.

Anger did a number of films, among which are those with occult themes, stemming from Anger's fascination with the writings and philosophy of Aleister Crowley. Notable among these are "Thelema Abbey" (1955); "Lord Shiva's Dream" (1954), released as "Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome" (1958); "Scorpio Rising" (1963); "Invocation of My Demon Brother" (1969); and "Lucifer Rising" (1970–80). Anaïs Nin played the part of the goddess Astarte in "Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome," concerned with Crowley-esque rituals. Margorie Cameron, a member of the Ordo Templi Orientis, who was famous for her participation in some magical child rituals with Jack Parsons, also appeared in the movie. Rock singer Mick Jagger provided a soundtrack on Moog synthesizer for "Invocation of My Demon Brother," in which Anton LaVey played the part of Satan and hippie musician Bobby Beausoleil played Lucifer. Beausoleil also provided music (performed by the Freedom Orchestra of Tracy Prison) for "Lucifer Rising." Beausoleil, a member of Charles Manson's Family, had by that time been convicted for the 1969 murder of Gary Hinman.

During the preoccupation with occultism of the 1960s, Anger attended some of the Magic Circle discussion group meetings organized by colorful Satanist Anton LaVey in San Francisco. However, Anger has remained something of a loner, following his own individual avant-garde film themes of motorcycle gang mystique, sadomasochistic homosexual encounter, and Crowley's thelemic magick.

Sources:

Robertson, Sandy. The Aleister Crowley Scrapbook. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1988.

Anglieri

A Sicilian writer of the seventeenth century, who is known by a work of which he published only two volumes (after promising twenty-four) entitled Magic Light; or, The Origin, Order, and Government of All Things Celestial, Terrestial, and Infernal, etc. The antiquary Antonino Mongitore (1663–1743) mentioned it in his Sicilian Library.

Angoff, Allan (1910–1998)

Editor and librarian in the field of parapsychology. Angoff was the editor of Tomorrow for the Parapsychology Foundation and a frequent contributor to the Journal of Parapsychology. He was a major advocate of establishing a central parapsychological library.

Born July 30, 1910, in Boston, Massachusetts, he studied at both Boston University and Columbia University. He was a journalist and book critic for Boston Evening Transcript (1934–39) and assistant editor of North American Review (1940–42). Following the bombing of Pearl Harbor, he joined the U.S. Army and served as a staff sergeant (1942–45). After the war he became an associate editor at Creative Age Press (1945–46). He joined the staff of Tomorrow magazine as managing editor in 1946. After five years with the Parapsychology Foundation, he moved on successively to be editor-in-chief of Emerson Books, New York (1951–52); editor-in-chief, New York University Press (1953–57); chairman of Evaluation Committee, Adult School of Montcalm, N.J. (1958–59); readers' adviser at Montclair Public Library (1957–60); and since 1960 assistant director of Fair Lawn (N.J.) Public Library. He also served as book review editor of Tomorrow (1958–62) and as administrative secretary of the Parapsychology Foundation, New York.

Sources:

Angoff, Allan. Eileen Garrett and the World Beyond the Senses. New York: William Morrow, 1974.

Angoff, Allan, ed. Parapsychology and the Sciences. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1972.

———. Parapsychology Today: A Geographic View. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1971.

Angoff, Allan, and Diana Barth, eds. Parapsychology and Anthropology. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1973.

Angoff, Allan, and Betty Shapin, eds. Proceedings of an International Conference: A Century of Psychical Research. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1971.

Angstadt, L(aura) Jean (1931–)

Parapsychologist who has conducted experiments on teachers and pupils in ESP. She was born April 10, 1931, in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and studied at Pennsylvania State University (B.S., 1953) and St. John's University, Jamaica, New York (M.S., education, 1961). Angstadt, for a time, was a teacher, then became a guidance counselor to Westbury High School on Long Island, in 1960.

Sources:

Angstadt, L. Jean, and Rhea White. "Student Performance in Two Classroom GESP Experiment with Two Students-Agents Acting Simultaneously." Journal of the ASPR 57 (1963): 32.

Angurvadel

The sword, possessing magical properties, which was inherited by Frithjof, the hero of a thirteenth-century Icelandic saga. It had a golden hilt and shone like the Northern Lights. In times of peace, certain characters on its blade were dull and pale, but during a battle they became red.

Animal Magnetism

Alternative term for mesmerism. It appears to have been first used by Michel A. Thouret in his Recherches et doutes sur le magnétisme animal (1784) with the intention of disassociating the phenomena from the name of its popularizer Franz Anton Mesmer (1733–1815). Thouret reviewed similar phenomena throughout the ages, and the name "animal magnetism" was intended to disassociate it from ferro-magnetism, indicating that the mesmeric or magnetic fluid was associated with unusual phenomena in living organisms.

Animal magnetism became a preferred term for experimenters and writers like J. P. F. Deleuze (1753–1835), and William Gregory (1803–1858), translator of Baron von Reichenbach's works on the "od," or "odic force"(associated with animal magnetism). Animal magnetism embraced such paranormal phenomena as clairvoyance, transposition of the senses, and sympathy (rapport between operator and subject). A number of reputable scientists took a serious interest in animal magnetism and conducted numerous experiments, and for many years during the nineteenth century the subject formed a bridge between mesmerism, Spiritualism, and hypnotism. From time to time various alternative terms were proposed, largely in order to give the subject some scientific dignity. These included "psycodunamy" (Theodore Leger), "electropsychology," and "electro-biology." Animal magnetism was eventually supplanted by hypnotism, which discarded many of the claimed paranormal aspects of the subject.

Sources:

Binet, Alfred, and Charles Fere. Animal Magnetism. London, 1887.

Deleuze, J. P. F. Practical Instruction in Animal Magnetism. Providence, RI: B. Cranston, 1837. Reprint, New York: Samuel R. Wells, 1879.

DuPoteat, Jules. Magnetism and Magic. New York: F. Stokes, n.d.

Gregory, William. Animal Magnetism or Mesmerism and Its Phenomena. London, 1909.

Townshend, Chauncy Hare. Facts in Mesmerism, with Reasons for a Dispassionate Inquiry into It. London, 1844.

Animals

Animals are believed to exhibit psychic faculties similar to human beings. In her account of a case of haunting in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, Vol. 8, R. C. Morton mentions two dogs who saw a ghost. The medium Mrs. J. H. Conant believed that her pet dog and cat saw the spirits she described clairvoyantly. The dog barked and snarled; the cat arched its back, spat, and ran to hide. Sir William Barrett recorded the case of the Montgomery sisters who saw a ghost floating across the road; their horse stopped and shook with fright. The watchdog of the Rev. Samuel Wesley crouched in terror during the poltergeist manifestations at Epworth Vicarage (see Epworth Phenomena). In a poltergeist case on the Baltic Island of Oesel in 1844 a number of horses were frightened by thunderous noises coming from a nearby underground vault. The case is described in Robert Dale Owen's Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World (1860).

Ernesto Bozzano collected many cases (published in the Annals of Psychic Science in 1905 and in Animaux et manifestations metapsychiques in 1926) in which animals as agents induce telepathic hallucinations; in which they act as percipients simultaneously with, or previously to, human beings; in which they see human or animal phantoms, collectively with human beings in which phantom animals are seen in haunted spots or periodically appear as a premonition of death. Out of a total of 69 cases, in 13 the animals were subject to supernormal psychic perceptions in precedence to humans, and in 12 they perceived things that the persons present were unable to see. In more than one-third of the cases, therefore, the animals' perception had precedence to humans. Bozzano pointed out that animals, "besides sharing with man the intermittent exercise of faculties of supernormal psychic perception, show themselves furthermore normally endowed with special psychic faculties unknown to men, such as the so-called instincts of direction and of migration, and the faculty of precognition regarding unforeseen atmospheric disturbances, or the imminence of earthquakes, or volcanic eruptions. Although man is destitute of such superior faculties of instinct, nevertheless these same faculties exist in the unexplored recesses of his subconsciousness." (See also Earthquake Prediction)

In the case of avalanches, the presentiments, especially attributed to horses, are still more mysterious. The deathhowl of dogs in anticipation of the death of their master or a member of the household is a well documented phenomenon. Gustave Geley recorded a personal experience of this in From the Unconscious to the Conscious (1920).

Supernormal perception may also work in a lower scale of life. Sir William Barrett suggested that the color changes of insect life to suit the environment might be due to causes of stigmata, i.e., suggestion unconsciously derived from the environment.

That there may be latent high faculties in animals which vie with the powers of genius was demonstrated by the famous case of the Elberfeld Horses, although many scientists have been skeptical of the evidence. An Italian horse, Tripoli, showed similar talent after a course in mathematics. The dog Rolf, of Mannheim, learned to calculate by attending the lessons given to a child. (See Proceedings of the ASPR, Vol. 13 [1919]). Rolf sired Lola who attained considerable fame as narrated in Henry Kindermann's Lola; or, The Thought and Speech of Animals (1922). She could calculate, tell the time, and phonetically spell out answers to questions. When she was asked what was the name of the Mannheim dog, she replied "mein fadr" (Mein Vater) i.e., "my father." All present had expected her to answer "Rolf."

Carita Borderieux's Les Nouveaux Animaux Pensants (Paris, 1927) tells the story of Zou, the author's calculating dog. In Proceedings of the ASPR Vol. 38, Theodore Besterman described his personal encounter with Borderieux's dog and claims to have discovered that the dog interpreted unconscious movements of Borderieux's hand. Unconscious movements were also put forward to explain the phenomena of the Elberfeld Horses, but they often gave correct answers to mathematical problems when the answer was not known by the questioner.

Unconscious signals or secret code falls far short as a theory of explanation in the case of Black Bear, the Briarcliff pony, who not only solved mathematical problems and spelled answers by selecting letters from a rack, but, according to narratives in the journal Psychic Research (April 1931), exhibited clairvoyant or telepathic powers by correctly describing playing cards which were turned face down. Black Bear either answered correctly or refused to venture an answer at all. He was never at fault and solved his problems with a supreme indifference. Mrs. Fletcher, one of his visitors, whose birthday was to occur shortly—a fact which could not normally have been known to either Black Bear or Mr. Barrett (his trainer)—asked these questions: "Black Bear,—there is an anniversary coming soon. Can you tell me what it is?" The pony spelled out "Birthday." Mrs. Fletcher then said "That is right, now, can you tell me when it will be?" and Black Bear replied "Friday." "What date will it be?" was the next question, and Black Bear at once spelled out "August 3rd."

Regarding the survival of animals, no definite proof is available. Materialization seances in which animals are seen do not offer evidence in themselves of survival. It is the continuation of personality and memory of which proof is demanded. Obviously, the barking of dogs is not sufficiently expressive for the purpose. After-death communications, however, do assert that animals also survive. Nevertheless, as an interesting speculation, the direct voice communication given to H. Dennis Bradley should be registered. According to Bradley, animals such as tigers and snakes, etc., go to an animal kingdom, there to be redrawn upon for physical life on Earth. Animals, such as dogs and cats, that are capable of love and loyalty live with the spirits in their plane. Said Andrew Lang, "Knowing cases in which phantasms of dogs have been seen and heard collectively by several persons simultaneously, I tend to agree with the tribes of North-West Central Queensland that dogs, like men, have khoi—have spirits."

In various countries of the world, the special sensory abilities of animals have been used in war and defense situations. Robert Lubow, professor of psychology at Tel Aviv University, Israel, revealed various extraordinary developments in the use of animals in his book The War Animals (1977). The Russians trained porpoises and dolphins to recognize different kinds of metal plates in warships in order to lay mines beside enemy ships, rather like the story in the film Day of the Dolphin. In Hong Kong, police tested the use of rats to sniff out heroin. In Britain, the Royal Air Force devised a system of coating aircraft flight detectors ("black boxes") with a special substance odorless to human beings but detectable by trained dogs, who can locate the recorders after a crash. During the Vietnam war, Prof. Lubow successfully trained nearly one hundred dogs to find mines and booby-traps. Insects were used at military establishments to detect the presence of intruders. Pigeons were trained for aerial reconnaissance to identify man-made objects from natural features of the landscape; a radio direction finder would be triggered by the pigeon's landing, transmitting the information to a remote patrol. In Israel, dogs have been used successfully to detect letter-bombs in the mail. The scent of the explosive is apparently perceptible to a dog even in a sack of 600 letters. (See also Anpsi)

Sources:

Boone, J. Allen. Kinship with All Life. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954.

Bozzano, Ernesto. "Animals and Psychic Perceptions." Annals of Psychic Science (August 1905).

Burton, Maurice. The Sixth Sense of Animals. New York: Taplinger, 1973; London: Dent, 1973.

Gaddis, Vincent, and Margaret Gaddis. The Strange World of Animals and Pets. 1970. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1971.

Kindermann, Henny. Lola; or, the Thought and Speech of Animals. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1923.

Lilly, J. Man and Dolphin. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1961.

Lorenz, Konrad. King Solomon's Ring. New York: Time, 1962.

Lubow, Robert. The War Animals. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.

Maeterlinck, Maurice. The Unknown Guest. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.

Schul, Bill. The Psychic Power of Animals. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1977.

Selous, Edmund. Thought-Transference (or What?) in Birds. London: Constable & Co. Ltd., 1931.

Anima Mundi

The soul of the world, a pure ethereal spirit that some ancient philosophers said was diffused throughout all nature. Plato is considered to be the originator of this idea, but it is of more ancient origin and prevailed in the systems of certain eastern philosophers. The Stoics believed it to be the only vital force in the universe. Similar concepts have been held by hermetic philosophers like Paracelsus and have been incorporated in the philosophy of more modern philosophers like Friedrich Schelling (1775–1854).

Animism

An obsolete term used by anthropologists and scholars of comparative religions to designate a doctrine of spiritual being, or the concept that a great part, if not the whole, of inanimate nature, as well as of animate beings, is endowed with reason and volition similar to that of man. The idea, originally proposed by E. B. Taylor in his influential text, Primitive Cultures, was soon accepted by his colleagues and remained popular into the mid-nineteenth century.

Sources:

Durkheim, Emile. The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. New York: Collier, 1961.

Ankh

The Egyptian symbol of life, perhaps the life which remains after death. It takes the form of a cross with a loop instead of an upper vertical arm. It is conjectured that it symbolizes the union of the male and female principles, the origins of life, and that like the American cross, it typifies the four winds, the rainbringers and fertilizers. It is usually carried in the right hand by Egyptian divinities. This symbol of a cross with a handle is also known as crux ansata.

Annales des Sciences Psychiques

Monthly magazine founded in 1891 by Charles Richet and Dr. X. Dariex, and edited from 1905 by Count Cesar Baudi De Vesme, having absorbed his Revue des etudes psychique. It ran until 1919, when it was replaced by the Revue metapsychique, the official organ of the Institut Mètapsychique International. An English edition under the title Annals of Psychic Science was published between 1905 and 1910 and was edited by Laura L. Finch.

Annali dello Spiritismo (Annals of Spiritualism)

The first representative spiritualist journal in Italy. It was started in Turin in 1863 by Signor Niceforo Filalete (pseudonym of Prof. Vincenzo Scarpa) and ran until 1898.

Anneberg (or Aunabergius)

A demon of the mines, in German folklore. On one occasion he killed with his breath 12 miners who were working in a silver mine. He was sometimes represented as a large goat, sometimes as a horse, with an immense neck and frightful eyes.

Annius de Viterbo (1432–1502)

Preaching friar born at Viterbo who published a collection of manuscripts known as The Antiquities of Annius, full of fables and absurdities, and falsely attributed to Berosus, Fabius Victor, Cato, Manettio, and others. He was also responsible for the treatise The Empire of the Turks and the book Future Triumphs of the Christians over the Turks and the Saracens. These two works are explanations of the Apocalypse. The author claimed that Mahomet was the antichrist, and that the end of the world would take place when the Christians overcome the Jews and the Muslims.

Annwyn (or Annwfn)

The Celtic other-world. According to ancient belief, it might be located either on or under the earth or the sea, or might be a group of islands or a revolving castle surrounded by sea, and was variously known as "Land Over Sea," "Land Under Wave," or Caer Sidi (revolving castle). It was said to be a land of strange beauty and delight, with a magic caldron having miraculous powers. It is described in such works as the Book of Taliesin and the Mabinogion. (See also Hell)

Sources:

The Mabinogion. London: J. M. Dent, 1949.

Anomalous Cognition Section, University of Amsterdam

The Anomalous Cognition Section of the faculty of Psychology at the University of Amsterdam is a research structure that emerged in the 1990s primarily as a tool to help sharpen the students' facility with methodology and empirical research. The research in parapsychology was initiated by Dick J. Bierman, a member of both the faculty at Amsterdam and at the University of Utrecht, which has a formal program in parapsychology. Traditionally, as part of their graduate training, students in psychology at Amsterdam had to set up and run a research project. In the 1980s, two students, one in 1982 and one in 1986, carried through on a project involving the Gansfeld random generator, the object being the determination of possible anomalous cognition. Anomalous cognition is another name used by some parapsychologists for what is commonly termed telepathy, clairvoyance, and precognition.

Some members of the faculty were hostile to such research until the publication of a paper on Gansfeld-related research by D. J. Bem and Charles Hororton in 1994 and the subsequent appearance of Bem on a video hook-up before the faculty. A significant shift of opinion among the faculty led to a variety of students choosing to do their project in anomalous cognition or the related field of anomalous perturbation, also known as psychokinesis.

The project has also generated an Internet-based periodical, the electronic Journal for Anomalous Phenomena, designed to give both scientists and the general public access to information about empirical, field, and theoretical research in parapsychology. The peer-reviewed journal gives students a place to initially publish their research, but has also become an experiment in publishing the often very technical data produced in empirical research for what potentially is a lay audience.

Access to the project and the journal is best acquired through the psychology department's Internet site at http://www.psy.uva.nl/pn/res/ANOMALOUSCOGNITION/anamol.shtml.

Sources:

Anomalous Cognition Section, University of Amsterdam. http://www.psy.uva.nl/pn/res/ANOMALOUSCOGNITION/anamol.shtml. February 15, 2000.

Anomalous Thoughts (Newsletter)

Newsletter concerned with unusual and anomalous data. Last known address: Box 94, Beaumont, TX 77704.

Anomaly

Journal of unusual events of a Fortean kind, such as UFOs, sea monsters, mysterious disappearances, and strange coincidences. Founded in 1969 by researcher John A. Keel. Last known address: PO Box 351, Murray Hill Station, New York, NY 10016.

Anomaly Research Bulletin

Bimonthly publication with reports on UFOs, mysterious animals and other Fortean phenomena. Last known address: 7098 Edinburgh, Lambertville, MI 48144.

Anonymous Adept

Alchemist alluded to in the two-volume work entitled Mundus subterraneus (Amsterdam, 1665), published by the learned German Jesuit of the seventeenth century with Athanasius Kircher (1602–1680).

This alchemist long endeavored to discover the philosophers' stone and met with no success. One day he encountered a venerable individual who said to him: "I see by these glasses and this furnace that you are engaged in search after something very great in chemistry, but, believe me, you will never attain your object by working as you are doing." These words led the alchemist to suspect that his visitor was learned in alchemy, so he begged him to display his knowledge. The unknown took a quill and wrote down a formula for making a transmutatory powder, including specific directions for using it.

"Let us proceed together," said the great unknown, and in a little while a fragment of gold was made; however, the wise teacher disappeared immediately afterward. The alchemist now believed himself on the verge of a dazzling fortune, and he immediately tried to manufacture nuggets, but his solo attempts proved futile.

Enraged, he went to the inn where the unknown teacher was staying, but the teacher was gone.

"We see by this true history," remarked Athanasius, "how the devil seeks to deceive men who are led by a lust of riches." He related further that, as a result of this incident, the alchemist destroyed his scientific equipment and renounced alchemy forever.

Anpiel

In ancient Hebrew mysticism, Anpiel is one of the angels charged by rabbis with the government of birds, for every known species was put under the protection of one or more angels.

Anpsi

Psi faculty in animals. The term "Psi-trailing" is used to indicate a form of Anpsi in which a pet may trace its owner in a distant location it has not previously visited. (See also Earthquake Prediction; Elberfeld Horses)

Sources:

Gaddis, Vincent, and Margaret Gaddis. The Strange World of Animals and Pets. 1970. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1971.

Kindermann, Henny. Lola; or, The Thought and Speech of Animals. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1923.

Maeterlinck, Maurice. The Unknown Guest. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.

Schul, Bill. The Psychic Power of Animals. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1977.

Selous, Edmund. Thought-Transference (or What?) in Birds. London: Constable & Co. Ltd., 1931.

Anselm de Parma (d. 1440)

An astrologer born in Parma, where he died in 1440. He wrote Astrological Institutions, a work that has never been printed. Johan Weyer and some other demonologists classed Anselm with sorcerers, because certain charlatans, who healed sores by means of mysterious words, had taken the name of "Anselmites." It has been noted by Naudé, however, that, in fact, sorcerers claimed to have received their gift of healing not from Anselm of Parma, but from St. Anselm of Canterbury.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Ansuperomin

A sorcerer of the time of St. Jean de Lus, who, according to information supplied by Pierre Delamere, a councillor of Henry IV, was seen several times at the "sabbath" mounted on a demon in the shape of a goat and playing on the flute for the witches' dance.

Answerer (or Fragarach)

A magical sword belonging to the Irish Sea-God Lir. It was brought from the Celtic otherworld by Lugh, the Irish Sun-God, and was believed that it could pierce any armor.

Anthony, St.

A great demon of enormous stature is said to have approached Anthony one day to offer his services. In response, the saint looked at him sideways and spat in his face. The demon vanished without a word and did not dare to appear on Earth for a long time afterward. In response to this encounter St. Anthony once said: "I fear the demon no more than I fear a fly, and with the sign of the cross I can at once put him to flight."

St. Athanasius, who wrote the biography St. Anthony, mingled his hero's adventures with the devil and certain other incidents that contrast strangely. Some philosophers, astonished at the great wisdom of Anthony, asked him in what book he had discovered his doctrine. The saint pointed with one hand to the Earth, and the other to the sky. "There are my books," said he, "I have no others. If men will design to study as I do the marvels of creation, they will find wisdom enough there. Their spirit will soon soar from the creation to the Creator."

Anthropological Research Foundation

The Anthropological Research Foundation was a short-lived channeling group that formed in the early 1970s during the period of discord within Cosmic Awareness Communications following the death of William Ralph Duby, the primary channel for the group. The group was organized in San Diego, California, by Jack T. Fletcher and Pat Fletcher and built around the work of a new channel, trance medium Danton Spivey. Spivey claimed to be the continuing voice of "Conscious Awareness," the universal mystical entity who had spoken through Duby.

The organization took its name from its goal of discovering a new culture characterized by wholeness and overcoming the forces that divided humans from each other. They felt that the resources for such wholeness could be found in the ancient cultures of Atlantis and Lemuria.

The organization announced its existence with a magazine, Aware, but it soon faded from the scene and disbanded.

Anthropology of Consciousness

Quarterly publication (formerly the AASC Newsletter) of the Society for the Anthropology of Consciousness (formerly the Association for the Anthropological Study of Consciousness), covering such topics as multiple personality, shamanism, "past-life regression," psi-related processes, altered states of consciousness, healing, and symbolism of mythology. Address: 4350 N. Fairfax Dr., Ste. 640, Arlington, VA 22203.

Anthropomancy

Ancient practice of divination by the entrails of men or women. Herodotus said that Menelaus, detained in Egypt by poor winds, sacrificed two children of the country to discover his destiny by means of anthropomancy. Heliogabalus practiced this means of divination. It is said that in his magical operations, Julian the Apostate caused a large number of children to be killed so that he might consult their entrails. During his last expedition at Carra, in Mesopotamia, he shut himself in the Temple of the Moon. After completing his anthropomancy, he sealed the doors and posted a guard, whose duty it was to see that they were not opened until his return. However, he was killed in battle with the Persians, and those who entered the Temple of Carra, in the reign of Julian's successor, found there a woman hanging by her hair, with her liver torn out. The infamous Gilles De Laval may also have practiced this dreadful type of divination.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Anthroposophia Pacifica (Newsletter)

Bimonthly publication concerned with the teachings of Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925), including news of Anthroposophical branches. Address: 5906 Pacific Coast Highway No. 12, Redondo Beach, CA 90277.

Anthroposophic Press

Publishers and suppliers of books on the work of Rudolf Steiner and anthroposophy, Waldorf education, occult cosmology, self-development, and alternative therapies. The Press also issues a comprehensive mail-order catalog. Address: 3390 Rte. 9, Hudson, NY 12534. Website: http://www.anthropress.org.

Anthroposophical Society

Organization founded in 1924 by Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) to teach an occult philosophy relating man to his natural environment, with special emphasis on the significance of color and rhythm. The name, which derives from the book Anthroposophia Theomagica by seventeenth-century mystic Thomas Vaughan, implies wisdom relating to man. Anthroposophy covers a wide range of enlightened activity—education, music, painting, eurythmy, biodynamic farming, medicine, and architecture.

The society provides a foundation for over 10,000 anthroposophical institutions worldwide. Drawing largely upon the work and lectures of the late Rudolf Steiner, the society has established a high standard of enlightened community activity and culture. The Anthroposophical Press issues titles by Steiner and other writers in the English language. The society has an international headquarters building named the Goetheanum (acknowledging Steiner's debt to the writings of Goethe) at Postfach 134, CH-4143, Dornach/Switzerland. Website: http://www.goetheanum.ch/english.htm.

Sources:

Anthroposophical Society. http://www.goetheanum.ch/english.htm. March 8, 2000.

Davey, John, ed. Work Arising from the Life of Rudolf Steiner. London: R. Steiner Press, 1975.

Steiner, Rudolf. Knowledge of the Higher Worlds: How Is It Achieved? 1923. Rev. ed., London: R. Steiner Press, 1969.

———. The Story of My Life. London: Anthroposophical Publishing, 1928; New York: Anthroposophic Press, 1928.

Anthroposophical Society in America

Organization devoted to the teachings of theosophist and occult mystic Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) whose system of Anthroposophy is concerned with "wisdom relating to man." Steiner developed his system of thought to speak directly to issues of education, art, dance and body movement, natural foods, and the religious life. The society promotes Steiner's thinking through a number of local and a variety of specialized organizations such as the School of Eurythmy and the Waldorf Institute (260 Hungry Hollow Rd., Spring Valley, New York 10977), the Bio-Dynamic Association (PO Box 550, Kimberton, Pennsylvania 19442), the Rudolf Steiner Research Foundation (Presidio Bldg. 1002B, PO Box 29915, San Francisco, California 94129-0915), and Weleda USA (175 N. Rte. 9W, PO Box 769, Congers, New York 10920).

Headquarters of the society are at 1923 Geddes Ave., Ann Arbor, Michigan 48104-1797. It publishes the quarterly Journal of Anthroposophy. The numerous books by Steiner are published by the Anthroposophical Press (#3390 Rte. 9, Hudson, New York 12534). Website: http://www.anthroposophy.org.

Sources:

Directory of Activities and Services. New York: Rudolf Steiner Information Center, n.d.

Richards, M. C. Toward Wholeness: Rudolf Steiner Education in America. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1980.

Anthroposophical Society in Great Britain

Organization devoted to the teachings of occult mystic Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) whose system of Anthroposophy is concerned with a "wisdom relating to man." The London headquarters presents study groups, classes in artistic activities (painting, speech, drama), and performances of eurythmy. The Anthroposophical Society's publications include a newsletter for members, a quarterly journal, New View, and a catalog of works by Steiner and other writers. Steiner's work ranges across many fields, including education, art therapy, special care and training of children with mental retardation, and agricultural techniques. Address: 35 Park Rd., London NW1 6XT, England. Branches of the Anthroposophical Society and special schools are located in different areas in Britain.

Antichrist

According to early and medieval Christian belief, Antichrist is the universal enemy of human beings who in the latter days will scourge the world for its wickedness. He is only mentioned as a character in the Bible in two brief passages occurring in the First and Second Epistles of John (1 John 2:18, 22, and 4:3; and 2 John 7). However, the "man of Lawlessness" (2 Thessalonians 2:3–12) and the "beast" (Revelation 13) are also commonly thought to represent the Antichrist.

Abbot Bergier described the Antichrist as a tyrant, impious and excessively cruel, the arch enemy of Christ, and the last ruler of the Earth. The persecutions he will inflict on the elect will be the last and most severe ordeal that they will have to endure.

The Antichrist will pose as the Messiah and will perform things wonderful enough to mislead the elect themselves. The thunder will obey him, according to St. John, and Leloyer asserts that the demons below watch over hidden treasures with which he will be able to tempt many. Because of the miracles that he will perform, Boguet calls him the "Ape of God," and it is through this scourge that God will proclaim the final judgment.

Antichrist will have a great number of forerunners and will appear just before the end of the world. St. Jerome claimed that he will be a man fathered by a demon; others said that he will be a demon in the flesh. But, following the thinking of Saints Ireneus, Ambrose, Augustine and almost all of the church fathers, Antichrist will be a man similar to and conceived in the same way as all others, differing from them only in a malice and an impiety more worthy of a demon than of a man. More recently, however, Cardinal Bellarmin asserted that Antichrist will be the son of a demon incubus and a sorceress.

He will be a Jew of the tribe of Dan, according to Malvenda, who supported his view with the words the dying Jacob spoke to his sons, "Dan shall be a serpent by the way—an adder in the path": by those of Jeremiah, "The armies of Dan will devour the earth"; and by the seventh chapter of the Apocalypse, where St. John has omitted the tribe of Dan in his enumeration of the other tribes.

Elijah and Enoch will return to convert the Jews and will die by order of Antichrist. Then Christ will descend from the heavens, kill Antichrist with the two-edged sword, which will issue from his mouth, and reign on the earth for a thousand years.

It is claimed by some that the reign of Antichrist will last fifty years; but the opinion of the majority is that his reign will last three and a half years, after which the angels will sound the trumpets of the day of judgment, and Christ will come and judge the world. Boguet declared that the watchword of Antichrist will be "I abjure baptism." Many commentators foresaw the return of Elijah in these words of Malachi "I will send Elijah, the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." But it is not certain that Malachi referred to this ancient prophet, since Christ applied this prediction to John the Baptist when he said, "Elias is come already, and they knew him not"; and when the angel foretold to Zacharias the birth of his son, he said to him: "And he shall go forth before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias."

The word "Antichrist" probably refers to the persecutors of the church. Through the centuries, different groups of Christians declared that one or more of their contemporaries was the Antichrist. For example, sixteenth-century Protestants called the pope Antichrist. Even Napoleon was called Antichrist.

The third treatise in the History véritable et mémorable des trois possédees de Flandre (1613) by Father Sebastien Michaelis, a Dominican friar, described Antichrist:

"Conceived through the medium of a devil, he will be as malicious as a madman, with such wickedness as was never seen on earth. An inhuman martyr rather than a human one, he will treat Christians as souls are treated in hell. He will have a multitude of synagogue names, and he will be able to fly when he wishes. Beelzebub will be his father, Lucifer his grandfather."

According to Michaelis, exorcised demons revealed that Antichrist was alive in 1613 but had not yet attained his growth. "He was baptized on the Sabbath of the sorcerers, before his mother, a Jewess, called La Belle-Fleur. He was three years old in 1613." Louis Gaufridi is said to have baptized him, in a field near Paris. An exorcised sorceress claimed to have held the little Antichrist on her knees. She said that his bearing was proud and that even then he spoke many languages. But he had talons in the place of feet. His father is shown in the figure of a bird, with four feet, a tail, a bull's head much flattened, horns, and black shaggy hair. He will mark his own with a seal representing this in miniature. Michaelis added that things execrable will be around him. He will destroy Rome and the Pope with the help of the Jews. He will resuscitate the dead, and, at the age of 30 will reign with Lucifer, the seven-headed dragon. After a reign of three years, Christ will slay him.

Many such details might be quoted of Antichrist, whose coming has long been threatened but not yet realized (see End of the World). A volume by Rusand published many years ago at Lyons, Les Prècurseurs de l' Antechrist, stated that the reign of Antichrist, if it has not begun, is drawing near; that the philosophers, encyclopedists, and revolutionaries of the eighteenth century were only demons incarnated to precede and prepare the way for Antichrist. During World War I, there were people who were convinced that Antichrist was none other than the ex-kaiser of Germany.

Another way to recognize Antichrist is by the title "Beast 666," because Revelation describes the beast as a "false prophet." The title "Beast 666" was applied to modern occultist Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) by his mother, and he accepted it as a symbol of his break with the severe fundamentalism of his Plymouth Brethren father.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill & Wang, 1969.

Kirban, Salem. 666. Huntingdon Valley, Penn.: Salem Kirban, 1970.

McBirnie, William S. Anti-Christ. Dallas: International Prison Ministry, 1978.

Antipathy

Early astrologers claimed that the dislike one feels for another person or thing is caused by the stars. Thus, two persons born under the same aspect will be mutually attracted and will love without knowing why. Others born under opposite conjunctions will feel an unreasoning hate for each other.

But what is the explanation for the antipathy people sometimes have for the commonest things? Lamothe-Levayer could not bear to hear the sound of any musical instrument. Caesar could not hear the crowing of a cock without shuddering; Lord Bacon fell into despondency during the eclipse of the moon; Marie de Medicis could not bear to look on a rose, even in a painting, although she loved all other flowers. Cardinal Henry of Cardonne had the same antipathy toward the odor of roses; Marshal d'Albret became ill at dinner when a young wild boar or a suckling pig was served; Henry III of France could not remain in the same room with a cat; Marshal de Schomberg had the same weakness; Ladislas, king of Poland, was much disturbed at the sight of apples; Scaliger trembled at the sight of cress; Erasmus could not taste fish without having the fever; Tycho-Brahe felt his knees give way when he met a hare or a fox; the duke of Epernon fainted at the sight of a leveret; Cardan could not stomach eggs; Ariosto, baths; the son of Croesus, bread; Caesar of Lescalle, the sound of the vielle or violin.

The causes of these antipathies might be found in childhood impressions. A lady who was very fond of pictures and engravings fainted when she found them in a book. She explained her terror thus: When she was a child her father had one day seen her turning over the leaves of the books in his library, in search of pictures. He had roughly taken the book from her hand, telling her in terrible tones that there were devils in these books who would strangle her if she dared touch them. Such threats may have lingering effects that cannot be overcome.

Karl von Reichenbach (1788–1869) investigated human antipathies and their opposite, sympathies, as they relate to colors, metals, magnetic poles, right and left hand polarities, and heat and cold. He distinguished specific antipathies and sympathies that were characteristic of sensitives (mediumistic individuals) and related his findings to animal magnetism and mesmerism.

Antiphates

A shining black stone, used as an amulet in defending oneself against witchcraft.

Antracites (or Antrachas or Anthrax)

A stone, sparkling like fire and girdled with a white vein, supposed by Albertus Magnus to be the carbuncle. It was said to cure "imposthumes" (purulent swellings). If smeared with oil it loses its color but sparkles the more for being dipped in water.

Aonbarr

A horse belonging to Manaanan, son of the Irish Sea-God Lir. It was believed to possess magical gifts and could gallop on land or sea.

Apantomancy

Divination by means of any objects that happen to present themselves. To this class belong omens drawn from chance meetings with a hare or an eagle.

Apepi, Book of Overthrowing of An Egyptian work that forms a considerable portion of the funerary papyrus of Nesi-Amsu. It deals with the diurnal combat between Ra the Sun-God and Apepi the great serpent and personification of spiritual evil. Several chapters (notably 31, 33, and 35–39) are obviously borrowed from the Book of the Dead, or Papyrus of Ani. Its 15 chapters contain a great deal of repetition and details concerning various methods for the destruction of Apepi, including many magical directions.

It stipulates that the name of Apepi must be written in green on a papyrus and then burnt. Wax figures of his attendant fiends were to be made, mutilated, and burnt, in the hope that, through the agency of sympathetic magic, their prototypes might be injured or destroyed.

Another portion of the work details the creative process and describes how men and women were formed from the tears of the god Khepera. This portion is known as The Book of Knowing the Evolutions of Ra. The work is evidently very ancient, as is shown by the circumstance that many variant readings occur, and only one copy is known. The funeral papyrus in which it is contained was discovered at Thebes in 1860, purchased by the archaeologist A. H. Rhind, and sold to the trustees of the British Museum by David Bremner. The linen on which it is written is of very fine texture, measures 19 feet by 9 inches, and has been translated by Wallis Budge in Archaeologia (Vol. 52, Part 2).

Apollonius of Tyana

A Neo-Pythagorean philosopher of Greece who had a great reputation for magical powers. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana, written by Philostratus at the urging of Julia, mother of the Emperor Severus, is the only extant source of information concerning the sage, although other biographies, now lost, are known to have existed.

Born at Tyana in Asia Minor, Apollonius was contemporary with Christ. He was educated at Tarsus and at the Temple of Aesculapius in Aegae. At the temple he became an adherent of the sect of Pythagoras, to whose strict discipline he submitted himself throughout his life. In his desire for knowledge he traveled widely in eastern countries, and is said to have performed miracles wherever he went. At Ephesus, for instance, he warned the people of the approach of a terrible plague, but they paid no attention to him until the pestilence was actually in their midst; then they recalled the warning and summoned the potent magician who had uttered it. Apollonius identified a poor, maimed beggar as the cause of the plague and an enemy of the gods, and he advised them to stone the unfortunate wretch to death. The citizens were at first reluctant to comply with the cruel injunction, but something in the expression of the beggar confirmed the prophet's accusation, and the wretch was soon covered with a mound of stones. When the stones were removed, the man had disappeared. In his place was a huge black dog, the cause of the plague that had come upon the Ephesians.

In Rome Apollonius raised from death or apparent death (his biographer does not seem to know which) a young lady of a consular family who had been betrothed and was mourned by the entire city. Yet another story relates how Apollonius saved a friend of his, Menippus of Corinth, from marrying a vampire. The youth neglected all the earlier warnings of his counselor, and the preparations for the wedding proceeded. Just as the ceremony was about to begin, Apollonius appeared and caused the wedding feast, the guests, and all the evidences of wealth—which were but illusion—to vanish; then he wrung from the bride the confession that she was a vampire. Many other similar tales are told of the philosopher's clairvoyant and magical powers.

His death is wrapped in mystery, although he is said to have lived to be nearly one hundred years of age. His disciples were quick to say that he had not died at all, but had been caught up to heaven. When he had vanished from the Earth, the inhabitants of his native Tyana built a temple in his honor, and statues were raised to him in various other temples.

The account given by Philostratus was compiled from the memoirs of "Damis the Assyrian," a disciple of Apollonius, but Damis may be a literary fiction. The work seems largely a romance; fictitious stories are often introduced, and the whole account is mystical and symbolical. Nevertheless, it is possible to glimpse the real character of Apollonius beyond the literary artifices of the writer. The purpose of the philosopher of Tyana seems to have been to infuse into paganism practical morality combined with a transcendental doctrine. He himself practiced a very severe asceticism and supplemented his own knowledge by revelations from the gods. Because of his claim to divine enlightenment, some would have refused him a place among the philosophers, but Philostratus holds that this in no way detracts from his philosophic reputation. He points out that Pythagoras, Plato, and Democritus used to visit eastern sages, and they were not charged with dabbling in magic. Divine revelations had been given to earlier philosophers; why not also to the Philosopher of Tyana? It may be that Apollonius borrowed considerably from Oriental sources and that his doctrines were more Brahminical than magical.

Sources:

Eells, Charles P. Life and Times of Apollonius of Tyana, Rendered into English from the Greek of Philostratus the Elder. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1923.

Mead, G. R. S. Apollonius of Tyana: The Philosopher-Reformer of the First Century A.D. 1901. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Philostratus. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana. Translated by F. C. Conybeare. London: Macmillan, 1912.

Apollyon

The destroying angel or prince of the underworld (Rev. 9:11), synonymous with Abaddon.

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus. 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Apostolic Circle

A sectarian group of early American Spiritualists that claimed to be in communication (through the mediumship of Mrs. Benedict of Auburn) with the apostles and prophets of the Bible. The sect also believed in a second advent. James L. Scott, a Seventh Day Baptist minister of Brooklyn, joined the group in 1849. He delivered trance utterances in the name of St. John and edited, jointly with the Rev. Thomas Lake Harris, a periodical of the Apostolic Movement: Disclosures from the Interior and Superior Care for Mortals.

Not long after, the partnership was dissolved, and in October 1851 the remaining members of the group settled at Mountain Cove, Fayette County, Virginia. Scott declared himself medium absolute. Owing to strife and dissension, the settlement was given up in February 1852. Scott went to New York, and as Thomas Lake Harris succeeded in arousing the interest of several wealthy men for the movements, the surrendered property was repurchased. A new era began in which Scott and Harris, the first the mouthpiece of St. John, the second of St. Paul, acted as "the chosen mediums" through which "the Lord would communicate to man on earth."

Their house was called "the House of God," and Mountain Cove was "the Gate of Heaven." They proclaimed themselves to be the two witnesses named in Rev. 10 and claimed to possess the powers spoken of. In one of his prayers Harris said, "Oh Lord, thou knowest we do not wish to destroy man with fire from our mouths!" However, the two "perfect" prophets could not smother the growing discord against their autocratic rule, and soon the whole community dispersed.

Sources:

Cuthbert, Arthur. The Life Worldwork of Thomas Lake Harris, Written from Direct Personal Knowledge. Glasgow, Scotland, 1909.

Schneider, Herbert W., and George Lawton. A Prophet and a Pilgrim. New York: Columbia University Press, 1942.

Apparitions

An apparition, from Latin apparere (to appear), is in its literal sense merely an appearance—a sense perception of any kind, but as used in psychical research and parapsychology the word denotes an abnormal or paranormal appearance or perception, which cannot be explained by any mundane objective cause. Taken in this sense the word covers all visionary appearances, hallucinations, clairvoyance, and similar unusual perceptions. "Apparition" and "ghost" are frequently used as synonymous terms, though the former is, of course, of much wider significance. A ghost is a visual apparition of a deceased human being—the term implies that the ghost is the spirit of the person it represents. Apparitions of animals and even inanimate objects are also occasionally reported. All apparitions do not take the form of visual images; auditory and tactile false perceptions, although less common, are not unknown. For example, there is record of a house that was "haunted" with the perpetual odor of violets.

Evolution of the Belief in Apparitions

The belief that identifies an apparition with the spirit of the creature it represents—a worldwide belief widely affirmed in all cultures throughout history—has been traced to the ancient doctrine generally called animism, which endowed everything in nature, from human beings to the smallest insect, from the heavenly bodies to an insignificant plant or stone, with a separable soul. It is not difficult to understand how the conception of souls may have arisen. Nineteenth-century anthropologist James Frazer, in his classic work, the Golden Bough, states,

"As the savage commonly explains the processes of inanimate nature by supposing that they are produced by living beings working in or behind the phenomena, so he explains the phenomena of life itself. If an animal lives and moves, it can only be, he thinks, because there is a little animal inside which moves it. If a man lives and moves, it can only be because he has a little man or animal inside, who moves him. The animal inside the animal, the man inside the man, is the soul. And as the activity of an animal or man is explained by the presence of the soul, so the repose of sleep or death is explained by its absence; sleep or trance being the temporary, death being the permanent absence of the soul."

Sometimes the human soul was represented as a bird—an eagle, a dove, a raven—or as an animal of some sort, just as the soul of a river might be in the form of a horse or a serpent, or the soul of a tree in human shape; but among most peoples the belief was that the soul was an exact reproduction of the body resembling it in every feature, even to details of dress.

When a person saw another in a dream, it was thought either that the soul of the dreamer had visited the person dreamed of, or that the soul of the latter had visited the dreamer. By an easy process of reasoning, this theory was extended to include dreams of animals and inanimate things, which also were endowed with souls.

Telepathy and clairvoyance have been described as appearing in pre-industrial indigenous cultures and have a powerful effect in the development of a belief in apparitions. It is believed that the apparition of a deceased person suggested to some the continuance of the soul's existence beyond the grave; the apparition of a sick person, or one in some other grave crisis could also be regarded as the soul, which at such times was absent from the body.

There is a widely diffused opinion that ghosts are of a filmy, unsubstantial nature, a belief also present in the earliest speculations concerning apparitions. At a very early period (as, for example, in the early chapters of the biblical book of Genesis) we find "spirit" and "breath" identified with each other—an identification continued in the Latin spiritus and the Greek pneuma, as well as appearing in other languages. It is possible that the breath, which in some climates readily condenses in cold air to a white mist, might be regarded as the stuff that ghosts are made of.

The "misty" nature of the ghost may also have resulted from an early speculation that the shadow is related to soul. Thus "animistic" ideas of the soul offer an explanation of apparitions. Ancient religion also had a belief in a host of spirits that had never taken bodies—true supernatural beings, as distinct from souls, i.e., gods, elementary spirits, and those "evil" spirits to which were attributed disease, disaster, possession, and bewitchment. The ancient deities may have evolved into the fairies, elves, brownies, bogies, and goblins of popular folklore, of which many apparitions are recorded.

Primitive Concepts of Apparitions

It is only within the last few generations that scientific investigation of apparitions has begun, growing out of the new post-Enlightenment scientific mythologies, and resulting from the new level of skepticism towards paranormal occurrences that developed in the nineteenth century. There was an almost universal belief in ghosts, a belief which European explorers found among the peoples they encountered as they set out on their empire-building expansions.

One of the most noteworthy features of ghosts in indigenous cultures was the fear and antagonism with which many regarded them. The spirits of the deceased were frequently thought to be unfriendly towards the living, desirous of drawing their souls into the spirit-world. Sometimes, as with the Australian Aborigines, they were represented as malignant demons. Naturally, everything possible was done to keep such ghosts at a distance from the habitations of the living.

Barriers to ghosts were constructed of thorn bushes planted around the beds of surviving relatives. Persons returning from a funeral might pass through a cleft tree, or other narrow aperture, to free themselves from the ghost of the person they just buried. The same reason has been given for the practice, common among Hottentots, Hindus, Native Americans, and many other peoples, of carrying the dead out through a hole in the wall and closing the aperture immediately afterward. The custom of closing the eyes of the dead may have arisen from the fear that the ghost would find its way back again.

To the contrary, the Mayas of the Yucatan (Mexico), used to draw a line with chalk from the tomb to the hearth, so that the soul might return if it desired to do so.

Among many peoples, the names of the departed (in some mysterious manner bound up with the soul, if not identified with it) are not mentioned by the survivors, and any among them possessing the same name change it for another.

Apparitions appeared in many shapes; it might take a human form, or the form of a beast, bird, or fish. Animal ghosts were common among Native Americans in both North and South America. Certain African tribes believed that the souls of evil-doers became jackals (a scavenger animal) on the death of the body. The Tapuya Indians of Brazil thought the souls of the good entered into birds, and this belief was of rather wide diffusion.

When the apparition was in human shape it was generally an exact counterpart of the person it represented, and, like the apparitions reported in more recent times, its dress was that worn by the deceased in its lifetime. It was generally accepted in indigenous cultures that the spirits of the departed mingled with the living, coming and going with no particular object in view or, on occasion, with the special purpose of visiting the scene of his earthly life. It may be that the spirit was demanding its body be buried with the proper ceremonial rites, if this had not been done, for a spirit cannot have any rest until the burial rite has been duly performed.

In China, the most common ghost was that of a person who had been murdered, and sought revenge on his murderer. In Australia, the spirit of one who had been murdered, or had died a violent death, was also considered likely to walk abroad. In many lands, the souls of women who died in childbirth were supposed to become spirits of a particularly malignant type that dwelled in trees and tormented passers-by. The Eastern Europeans believed the neglect of proper burial procedures led the deceased to continued existence as a vampire.

Such attention to burial procedures had several very practical benefits. The family in charge of the burial of a deceased relative was provided the opportunity of completing any emotional business they had with the deceased—a process today generally termed grief work. Burial rites of today are designed for the living, not the deceased, and provide a means of affirming life in the community in the face of death.

In many cultures, it is thought that ghosts haunt certain localities. The favorite spot seems to be the burial place, of which there is an almost universal superstitious dread (an emotional reaction to the implied threat of death). However, the Indians of Guyana (South America) believed that every place where anyone had died was haunted. Among the Kaffirs and the Maoris of New Zealand, a hut where a death has occurred was taboo, and was often burned or deserted. Sometimes, even a whole village would be abandoned on account of a death.

In most ancient accounts of apparitions, as well as those from more recent indigenous peoples, ghosts seldom manifest articulate human speech. They chirp like crickets, for instance, among the Algonquin Indians, and their "voices" are only intelligible to the trained ear of the shaman. The ghosts of the Zulus and New Zealander Maoris speak to the magicians in thin, whistling tones. This idea of the semiarticulate nature of ghosts is not confined to anthropological treatises; in his play Julius Ceasar, William Shakespeare spoke of "the sheeted dead," who, "did squeak and gibber in the streets of Rome," and the "gibbering" ghost appeared in other connections.

Naturally an articulate apparition would be doubly convincing, since it appealed to two separate senses. Nineteenth-century anthropologist E. B. Tylor argued, "Men who perceive evidently that souls do talk when they present themselves in dream or vision, naturally take for granted at once the objective reality of the ghostly voice, and of the ghostly form from which it proceeds." Spirits that are generally invisible may appear only to selected persons and under certain circumstances. In the Antilles, it was believed that one person traveling alone could see a ghost that would be invisible to a number of people. The various religious functionaries—shamans, medicine men, and magicians—were often able to perceive apparitions that none but they could see. The induction of hallucinations by means of various techniques—fasts, rigid asceticism, solitude, the use of narcotics and intoxicants, dancing, and the performance of elaborate ceremonial rites—was known all over the world. These rituals are still performed today.

Ancient and Modern Ideas Concerning Apparitions

The belief in apparitions was very common in the ancient Middle East. The early Hebrews attributed them to angels, demons, and the souls of the dead, as is shown in the numerous Scriptural instances of apparitions. Dreams (see, for example Genesis 41) were regarded as apparitions if the predictions made in them were fulfilled, or if the dream-figure revealed anything unknown to the dreamer which afterwards proved to be true. That the Hebrews believed in the possibility of the souls of the dead returning is evident from the tale of the witch of Endor (I Samuel 28). In this connection, French biblical scholar Augustin Calmet wrote in his classic study, Dissertations upon the Apparitions of Angels, Demons & Ghosts (1759), "Whether Samuel was raised up or not, whether his soul, or only a shadow, or even nothing at all appeared to the woman, it is still certain that Saul and his attendants, with the generality of the Hebrews, believed the thing to be possible." Similar beliefs were held by other Mediterranean nations. Among the Greeks and Romans of the classic period apparitions of gods and men seem to have been fairly common. As Calmet further noted,

"The ancient Greeks, who had derived their religion and theology from the Egyptians and Eastern nations, and the Latins, who had borrowed theirs from the Greeks, were all firmly persuaded that the souls of the dead appeared sometimes to the living—that they could be called up by necromancers, that they answered questions, and gave notice of future events; that Apollo gave oracles, and that the priestess, filled with his spirit, and transported with a holy enthusiasm, uttered infallible predictions of things to come. Homer, the most ancient of all the Greek writers, and their greatest divine, relates several apparitions, not only of gods, but of dead men and heroes. In the Odyssey, he introduces Ulysses consulting Teresias, who, having prepared a pit full of blood, in order to call up the Manes, Ulysses draws his sword to hinder them from drinking the blood for which they were very thirsty, till they had answered the questions proposed to them. It was also a prevailing opinion that the souls of men enjoyed no repose, but wandered about near their carcasses as long as they continued unburied. Even after they were buried, it was a custom to offer them something to eat, especially honey, upon the supposition that after having left their graves, they came to feed upon what was brought them. They believed also, that the demons were fond of the smoke of sacrifices, of music, of the blood of victims, and the commerce of women; and that they were confined for a determinate time to certain houses or other places, which they haunted, and in which they appeared.

"They held that souls, when separated from their gross and terrestrial bodies, still retained a finer and more subtle body, of the same form with that which they had quitted; that these bodies were luminous like the stars; and they retained an inclination for the things which they had loved in their life time, and frequently appeared about their graves. When the soul of Patroclus appeared to Achilles, it had his voice, his shape, his eyes, and his dress, but not the same tangible body."

Calmet added of the early Christian church fathers,

"We find that Origen, Tertullian, and St. Irenaus, were clearly of this opinion. Origen, in his second book against Celsus, relates and subscribes to the opinion of Plato, who says, that the shadows and images of the dead, which are seen near sepulchres, are nothing but the soul disengaged from its gross body, but not yet entirely freed from matter; that these souls become in time luminous, transparent, and subtle, or rather are carried in luminous and transparent bodies, as in a vehicle, in which they appeal to the living. . . . Tertullian, in his book concerning the soul, asserts that it is corporeal, and of a certain figure, and appeals to the experience of those who have seen apparitions of departed souls, and to whom they have appeared as corporeal and tangible, though of an aerial colour and consistence. He defines the soul to be a breath from God, immortal, corporeal, and of a certain figure."

It is interesting to note that some of these widely read classic accounts of specters became the model of the melodramatic conceptions of more modern times. The younger Pliny tells of haunted houses whose main features correspond with those of later hauntings—houses haunted by dismal, chained specters, and the ghosts of murdered men who could not rest till their mortal remains had been properly buried.

In the early centuries of Christendom there was no diminution in the number of apparitions witnessed. Visions of saints were frequently seen; their appearances were stimulated by the fasts, rigid austerities, and severe penances practiced by Christian ascetics and penitents. The saints regularly saw visions, and were attended by guardian angels, as well as being harassed by the unwelcome attention of demons, or of their master, the devil.

These beliefs continued into the Middle Ages, when, without decreasing in vigor, they began to assume a more romantic aspect. The witch and werewolf superstitions led to many tales of animal apparitions. The poltergeist flourished in a congenial atmosphere. Vampires were familiar in Slavonic and African lands, and analogous beings such as the incubus and succubus were widespread throughout Northern and Western Europe.

In the northern countries, familiar spirits or goblins, similar to the Roman lares, or the wicked and mischievous lemures, haunted the domestic hearth, and bestowed well-meant, but not always desirable, attentions on the families to which they attached themselves. These beings were accountable for a vast number of apparitions, but the spirits of the dead also walked abroad. Generally they wished to unburden their minds of some weighty secret that hindered them from resting in their graves. The criminal came to confess his guilt, the miser to reveal the spot where he had hidden his gold. The cowled monk walked the dim aisles of a monastery, or haunted the passages of some Rhenish castle until the prayers of the devout won release for his tortured soul.

Tales of apparitions began to emerge in this period. For example, a maiden in white might flit through the corridor of an old mansion, moaning and wringing her hands, enacting in pantomime some long-forgotten tragedy. At the crossroads lingered the ghost of the poor suicide, uncertain which way to take. The old belief in the dread potency of the unburied dead continued to exercise sway. Another story, of German origin, tells of the Bleeding Nun. Many and ghastly had been her crimes during her lifetime, until finally she was murdered by one of her paramours, and her body was left unburied. The castle where she was slain became the scene of her nocturnal wanderings. One traditional story tells of a young woman who wished to elope with her lover and decided to disguise herself as this ghostly specter in order to facilitate their escape. But the unfortunate lover eloped with the veritable Bleeding Nun herself, mistaking her for his mistress!

This, and other traditional tales of apparitions—the Wild Huntsman, the Phantom Coach, and the Flying Dutchman, to mention a few of the more widespread and famous—either originated in this period or acquired in it a wildly romantic character which lent itself to treatment by ballad writers. It is in ballad form that many of these stories survived.

Such tales of the apparitions gave way in the eighteenth century to a skepticism among the more educated elements of Western society about the objective nature of apparitions—a skepticism that was destined two centuries later to assume almost universal proportions. Hallucinations, although not yet very well understood, began to be referred to as the "power of imagination." Many apparitions were also attributed to illusion. The belief in apparitions was sustained and given new strength by the clairvoyant powers demonstrated by magnetized subjects and somnambules. Emanuel Swedenborg, who had many disciples, did much to encourage the idea that apparitions were both objective and supernatural. To explain the fact that only the seer saw these beings and heard their voices, he argued,

"The speech of an angel or of a spirit with man is heard as sonorously as the speech of one man with another: yet it is not heard by others who stand near, but by the man himself alone. The reason is, the speech of an angel or of a spirit flows in first into the man's thought, and by an internal way into the organ of hearing, and thus actuates it from within, whereas the speech of man flows first into the air, and by an external way into the organ of hearing which it actuates from without. Hence, it is evident, that the speech of an angel and of a spirit with man is heard in man, and, since it equally affects the organ of hearing, that it is equally sonorous."

Ancient and modern ideas on apparitions differed very little in essential particulars, though they were colored by the culture in which they were reported and the time to which they belong. In times past they were thin, gibbering shadows; now they tend to be solid, full-bodied creatures, hardly to be distinguished from real flesh and blood, or again they are rich in romantic accessories; but the laws governing their appearance are the same, and the beliefs concerning them are not greatly different, in whatever culture or time period they may be found.

The belief in apparitions is as old as humanity, but modern culture tends to reduce the phantoms to human shapes. Rare indeed, though not unknown, are accounts like that Plutarch told of Brutus,

"A little before he left Asia he was sitting alone in his tent, by a dim light, and at a late hour. The whole army lay in sleep and silence, while the general, wrapped in meditation, thought he perceived something enter his tent; turning towards the door he saw a horrible and monstrous specter standing silently by his side. 'What art thou,' said he boldly. 'Art thou God or man, and what is thy business with me?' The specter answered, 'I am thy evil genius, Brutus! Thou wilt see me at Philippi.' To which he calmly replied, 'I'll meet thee there.' When the apparition was gone he called his servants, who told him they had neither heard any voice, nor seen any vision."

Types of Apparitions

Psychical research divided apparitions broadly into two classes—induced and spontaneous. To the former class belong hypnotic and post-hypnotic hallucinations and visions induced by the use of narcotics and intoxicants, fasts, ascetic practices, incense, narcotic salves, and various forms of hypnotism. The hallucinatory appearances seen in the mediumistic or somnambulistic trance are allied to those of hypnotism, but usually arise spontaneously, and are often associated with clairvoyance.

Crystallomancy or crystal gazing is a form of apparition that is believed to be frequently clairvoyant, and in this case the theory of telepathy is especially applicable. Crystal visions fall under the heading of induced apparitions, since gazing in a crystal globe induces in some persons an altered or slight dissociation of consciousness, without which hallucination is impossible.

Another form of clairvoyance is second sight, a faculty commonly reported among the Scottish Highlanders. Persons gifted with second sight often see symbolical apparitions; for instance, the vision of a funeral or a coffin when a death is about to occur in the community. Symbolical appearances are indeed a feature of clairvoyance and visions generally. Clairvoyance includes retrocognition and premonition—visions of the past and the future respectively—as well as apparitions of contemporary events happening at a distance. Clairvoyant powers are often attributed to the dying. Dreams are, strictly speaking, apparitions, but in ordinary usage the term is applied only to coincidental or genuine dreams, or to those "visions of the night," which are of peculiar vividness.

These subjective apparitions lead quite naturally to a consideration of the question of ghosts. The belief in ghosts has come to us, as has been indicated, from the remotest antiquity, and innumerable theories have been formulated to account for it, from older conceptions of the apparition as an actual soul to modern theories of which the chief are telepathy and spirit materialization. Apparitions of the living also offer a wide field for research, perhaps the most favored hypothesis being that of telepathic hallucination.

Another type of apparition is the wraith or double, of which the Irish fetch is a variant. The wraith is an exact facsimile of a living person, who may himself see it; Goethe, Shelley, and other famous men are said to have seen their own wraiths. The fetch makes its appearance shortly before the death of the person it represents, either to himself or his friends, or both. Another Irish spirit which foretells death is the banshee, a being which, according to legend, attaches itself to certain ancient families, and is regularly seen or heard before the death of one of its members.

To the same class of spirits belong the omens of death, in the form of certain animals or birds, which follow some families. The poltergeist, whose playful manifestations must certainly be included among apparitions is suggested as another classification of these as visual, auditory, and tactile, since poltergeist hauntings—or indeed hauntings of any kind—are not confined to apparitions touching any one sense.

Apparitions of the Virgin Mary

One characteristic type of apparition is the appearance of the Virgin Mary, who is usually seen by young girls in Catholic countries. Such appearances involve messages for mankind as a whole, usually admonitions against sin and exhortations to repentance. The apparitions are not sought by the children and youths concerned, and often the messages are well beyond their intellectual capacity. The visions occur in an ecstatic state.

Typical of such apparitions were those at Lourdes, in southern France, Fatima in Portugal, and Garabandal in Spain. Such apparitions have reinforced the faith of thousands of Catholics, though many have pointed out that similar visitations have been recorded widely within non-Catholic Christianity and among most or all of the world's religions and peoples. It is natural that sincere devotees envision a divine figure in the form familiar through the iconography of their own religion. The nineteenth-century Hindu mystic Sri Ramakrishna frequently had ecstatic visions of the goddess Kali.

While the unreligious might dismiss such visions as religious hysteria, contemporary psychology has rescued them from the realms of the abnormal and mapped their ecstatic nature along with other transpersonal psychological states, and religious scholars have noted the predominantly meaningful messages they deliver. One might also group such visitations with phenomena like the appearance of fairies, who are said to have a changeable aspect, taking on a form to suit the convention of the percipient. Additionally, in the twentieth century, there have been frequent reports by UFO contactees of "shining visitors from outer space" arriving in flying saucers.

Universality of Belief in Apparitions

It is clear that the belief in apparitions, and the varied forms under which this belief exhibits itself in various times and countries, is universal. Both ancient and modern peoples believe in hauntings and the basic principles of the phenomena—the existence of a spiritual world capable of manifesting itself in the sphere of matter, and the survival of the human soul after the dissolution of the body—are the same.

While the beliefs in ancient and medieval times may arouse interest and curiosity for their own sakes, psychical researchers have valued them chiefly as throwing light on modern occurrences and beliefs. The belief in apparitions, for example, has been a root principle of Spiritualism and is characteristic of religions that postulate the existence of a human soul. Many individuals who are not Spiritualists in the accepted sense have had experiences that render belief in apparitions inevitable.

Some Typical Examples of Apparitions

The true nature of apparitions is not really known. As Andrew Lang stated: "Only one thing is certain about apparitions, namely this, that they do appear. They really are perceived." How are they seen? When Lord Adare submitted this question to the control of the famous medium D. D. Home, he received the following answer:

"At times we make passes over the individual to cause him to see us, sometimes we make the actual resemblance of our former clothing, and of what we were, so that we appear exactly as we were known to you on earth; sometimes we project an image that you see, sometimes you see us as we are, with a cloudlike aura of light around us."

The perception is not restricted to the small hours of the night or to times of seclusion. It may occur publicly and at the most unexpected moments, a fact demonstrated by a ghost in evening dress seen one morning in a London street in 1878. As the Daily Telegraph reported: "A woman fled in affright, the figure had a most cadaverous look, but the next person the apparition encountered recognized it as that of a friend, a foreigner." Later, this next person, Dr. Armand Leslie, learned the his close friend was found dead in evening clothes in a foreign city at the time his phantasm was seen; but such occurrences are very rare. In the majority of cases there is some mediumistic intervention or some sufficiently potent driving motive to achieve the manifestation to nonsensitive people provided they happen to be in a receptive state.

An instance of the first is Cromwell Varley's oft-quoted testimony before the London Dialectical Society in 1869:

"In the Winter of 1864–5 I was busy with the Atlantic cable. I left a gentleman at Birmingham to test the iron wire. He had seen something of Spiritualism but he did not believe in it. He had a brother whom I had never seen in life. One night in my room there were a great number of loud raps. When at length I sat up in bed I saw a man in the air—a spirit—in military dress. I could see the pattern of the paper on the wall through him. Mrs. Varley did not see it. She was in a peculiar state and became entranced. The spirit spoke to me through her. He told me his name and said that he had seen his brother in Birmingham but that what he had to communicate was not understood. He asked me to write a message to his brother, which I did, and received an answer from Birmingham 'Yes, I know my brother has seen you, for he came to me and was able to make known as much.' The spirit informed me that when at school in France he was stabbed. This fact was only known to his eldest surviving brother and his mother. When I narrated this to the survivor he turned very pale and confirmed it."

Why Do They Appear?

Apparitions often occur because they possess an urgent message of extreme danger, worry, illness, or death on the part of the agent. But it is also often a warning of impending danger of death of someone closely connected to the percipient. The mode of delivery in the first group may disclose a confused, perturbed mentality. A phantom form may rush into a room and alarm individuals by its sudden appearance or by its noises. The purpose, nevertheless, is mostly clear and the apparition may come back more than once as if to make sure that the information of the fact of decease was duly understood. Sometimes more is conveyed, especially in cases of accidental or violent death. Successive pictures may arise as if in a vision of the state of the body or of subsequent steps taken in regard to it.

The announcement of death may be quite explicit, as in the case described in the Proceedings Society for Psychical Research (vol. 10, pp. 380–82),

"On June 5th, 1887, a Sunday evening, between eleven and twelve at night, being awake, my name was called three times. I answered twice, thinking it was my uncle, 'Come in, Uncle George, I am awake,' but the third time I recognized the voice as that of my mother, who had been dead sixteen years. I said 'Mamma!' She then came round a screen near my bedside with two children in her arms, and placed them in my arms and put the bedclothes over them, and said 'Lucy, promise me to take care of them, for their mother is just dead.' I said 'Yes, Mamma.' She repeated: 'Promise me to take care of them.' I replied 'Yes, I promise you,' and I added: 'Oh, Mamma, stay and speak to me. I am so wretched.' She replied: 'Not yet, my child.' Then she seemed to go round the screen again, and I remained, feeling the children to be still in my arms, and fell asleep. When I awoke, there was nothing. Tuesday morning, June 7th, I received the news of my sister-in-law's death. She had given birth to a child three weeks before which I did not know till after her death."

In a similar case a mother brought the news of the death of her grandson by drowning, the drowned man also appearing to the percipient. In an instance quoted by Camille Flammarion in The Unknown (1900), the percipient, whose brother was killed in the attack at Sedan, awoke suddenly during the night and saw,

". . . opposite to the window and beside my bed my brother on his knees surrounded by a sort of luminous mist. I tried to speak to him but I could not. I jumped out of bed. I looked out of the window and I saw there was no moonlight. The night was dark and it was raining heavily, great drops pattering on the window panes. My poor Oliver was still there. Then I drew near. I walked right through the apparition. I reached my chamber door, and as I turned the knob to open I looked back once more. The apparition slowly turned its head towards me, and gave me another look full of anguish and love. Then for the first time I observed a wound on his right temple, and from it trickled a little stream of blood. The face was pale as wax, but it was transparent."

A letter later received proved that the dead man had a wound corresponding to that shown by the apparition.

The warning of death is sometimes veiled, an account of which is well illustrated by the instance recorded by the American Society for Psychical Research of a salesman, who, in a distant city, had suddenly seen the phantasmal appearance of his sister, full of life and natural, with a bright red scratch on the right side of her face. Perturbed by the vision he immediately broke his journey. At home his mother nearly fainted when he mentioned the scar. She had accidentally scratched her daughter's face after her death and carefully obliterated all its traces with powder. A few weeks later the mother died; but for the vision her son would not have seen her in life again. It is known that Josephine appeared to Napoleon at St. Helena and warned him of his approaching death.

The message left by an apparition is usually brief, as if the power to convey it is limited. The apparition seems to be drawn to the spot by the personality of the percipient. The place may have been totally unknown to him in life. The pictorial and often symbolic nature of the communication has been suggestive of the more subjective explanations of apparitions. In a curious group of cases images are seen instead of the lifelike figure. Anna Blackwell testified to such an experience before the London Dialectical Committee in 1870. The face of a beloved relative, like a life-size daguerreotype, appeared on a window pane of the house opposite to her window. It faded away several times, and appeared again. There seemed to be upon the pane a sort of dark iridescence out of which the face evolved, each appearance lasting about eight seconds, and each being darker and fainter than the preceding one. She also quoted the case of a Mrs. M. G. who saw in the tortoiseshell handle of a new parasol the face of Charles Dickens soon after his death. The face was small but with every feature perfectly distinct; and as she gazed upon it in utter amazement, the eyes moved and the mouth smiled.

Such images usually appear on polished surfaces. They may be seen by several people and then disappear after a while. In volume 2 of Phantasms of the Living there is a record of an apparition of this kind, of one Capt. Towns, witnessed by eight people. His face was seen on the polished surface of a wardrobe six weeks after his death.

The explorer Ernest Shackleton's experience, recorded in his book South (1919), borders on abnormal perception,

"I know that during that long and racking march of thirty-six hours over the unnamed mountains and glaciers of South Georgia it seemed to me often that we were four, not three. I said nothing to my companions on the point, but afterwards Worsley said to me: 'Boss, I had a curious feeling on the march that there was another person with us.'"

Crean confessed to the same idea. Being interviewed by the Daily Telegraph (February 1, 1922) on this point, he said: "None of us cares to speak about that. There are some things which can never be spoken of. Almost to hint about them comes perilously near sacrilege. This experience was eminently one of those things."

Apparitions may be accompanied by bright light. A case in the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 1, p. 405) suggests the objectivity of the occurrence. A physician and his wife, sleeping in separate but adjoining rooms, were awakened by a bright light. The physician saw a figure, and his wife got up and went into her husband's room to see what the light was. By that time the figure had disappeared.

In the Rev. Charles Tweedale's house the disappearance of a phantom on November 14, 1908, was accompanied by a big flash of light and a cloud of smoke that filled the kitchen and the passage. The smoke had no ordinary smell. On another occasion the figure touched and spoke to his wife, then dissolved into a pillar of black vapor.

There are some cases in which the apparition is behind the percipient, yet clearly seen. Again, the phantom may appear quite solid, yet objects may be seen beyond it. Occasionally, it is a reflection only. As reported in Phantasms of the Living (vol. 2, p. 35), a Mrs. Searle fainted. Her husband saw her head and face white and bloodless about the same time in a mirror upon a window opposite him.

Meeting Cases

Apparitions seen at deathbeds are in a class of their own. In these so-called "meeting cases," a type of near-death experience, it appears as if deceased friends and relatives hasten to the borderland to extend a welcome to the dying.

In Peak in Darien (1882), Frances Power Cobbe writes,

"The dying person is lying quietly, when suddenly, in the very act of expiring, he looks up—sometimes starts up in bed—and gazes on what appears to be vacancy, with an expression of astonishment, sometimes developing instantly into joy, and sometimes cut short in the first emotion of solemn wonder and awe. If the dying man were to see some utterly unexpected but instantly recognized vision, causing him great surprise, or rapturous joy, his face could not better reveal the fact. The very instant this phenomenon occurs, death is actually taking place, and the eyes glaze even while they gaze at the unknown sight."

In many cases on record such paranormal perception and death are not simultaneous. "Among all the facts adduced to prove survival these seem to me to be the most disquieting," wrote Charles Richet, a psychical researcher who wished to explain all the Spiritistic occurrences by his theory of cryptesthesia. Hallucination is effectively barred out by those cases in which others in the room also perceive the phantom forms, but there is sufficient evidence for a genuine phenomenon if the person was not known to be dead to the dying at the moment of perception, or if independent evidence comes forth to prove that the perception was veridical. A striking illustration of the latter instance is the case of Elisa Mannors whose near relatives and friends, concerned in the communications received through Leonora Piper, were known to Richard Hodgson. His account, published in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research(vol. 13, p. 378), states:

"The notice of his [F., an uncle of Elisa Mannors] death was in a Boston morning paper, and I happened to see it on my way to the sitting. The first writing of the sitting came from Madame Elisa, without my expecting it. She wrote clearly and strongly, explaining that F. was there with her, but unable to speak directly, that she wished to give me an account of how she had helped F. to reach her. She said that she had been present at his deathbed, and had spoken to him, and she repeated what she had said, an unusual form of expression, and indicated that he had heard and recognized her. This was confirmed in detail in the only way possible at the time, by a very intimate friend of Mme. Elisa and myself, and also of the nearest surviving relative of F. I showed my friend the account of the sitting, and to this friend, a day or two later, the relative, who was present at the deathbed, stated spontaneously that F. when dying said that he saw Madame Elisa who was speaking to him, and he repeated what she was saying. The expression so repeated, which the relative quoted to my friend, was that which I had received from Madame Elisa through Mrs. Piper's trance when the death-bed incident was, of course, entirely unknown to me."

As Ernesto Bozzano pointed out, a curious feature of these visions is that the dying only claim to see deceased persons, whereas, if his thoughts alone would be concerned in it, he might be expected to see living persons as frequently as deceased ones. Again, even people who have been skeptical of survival all their lives sometimes have given evidence of such visions. The effect on those who witness such rending of the veil is very dramatic. A Dr. Wilson of New York who was present at the death of the well-known American tenor, James Moore, wrote:

"Then something which I shall never forget to my dying day happened, something which is utterly indescribable. While he appeared perfectly rational and as sane as any man I have ever seen, the only way that I can express it is that he was transported into another world, and although I cannot satisfactorily explain the matter to myself, I am fully convinced that he had entered the Golden City—for he said in a stronger voice than he had used since I had attended him: 'There is Mother. Why Mother, have you come here to see me? No, no, I'm coming to see you. Just wait, Mother, I am almost over. I can jump it. Wait, Mother.' On his face there was a look of inexpressible happiness, and the way in which he said the words impressed me as I have never been before, and I am as firmly convinced that he saw and talked with his mother as I am that I am sitting here."

In his Psychic Facts and Theories (1893), Minot J. Savage quoted the following instance in which the death in question was not known to the dying,

"In a neighbouring city were two little girls, Jennie and Edith, one about eight years of age, and the other but a little older. They were schoolmates and intimate friends. In June, 1889, both were taken ill with diphtheria. At noon on Wednesday Jennie died. Then the parents of Edith, and her physician as well, took particular pains to keep from her the fact that her little playmate was gone. They feared the effect of the knowledge on her own condition. To prove that they succeeded and that she did not know, it may be mentioned that on Saturday, June 8th, at noon, just before she became unconscious of all that was passing about her, she selected two of her photographs to be sent to Jennie, and also told her attendants to bid her goodbye. She died at half-past six o'clock on the evening of Saturday, June 8th. She had roused and bidden her friends goodbye, and was talking of dying and seemed to have no fear. She appeared to see one and another of the friends she knew were dead. So far it was like the common cases. But now suddenly, and with every appearance of surprise, she turned to her father and exclaimed: 'Why, papa, I am going to take Jennie with me!' Then she added 'Why, papa, why, papa, you did not tell me that Jennie was here.' And immediately she reached out her arms as if in welcome, and said: 'Oh, Jennie, I am so glad you are here. . . .'"

Stainton Moses was quoted by Richet as the source of the following case: Miss H., the daughter of an English clergyman, was tending a dying child. His little brother, aged three to four years, was in a little bed in the same room. As the former was dying, the child woke up, and pointing to the ceiling with every expression of joy, said: "Mother, look at the beautiful ladies round my brother. How lovely they are, they want to take him." The elder child died at that moment.

There is a group of cases in which only some sort of a presence is felt or a cloud of depression experienced, which becomes instantly relieved when the actual news of death arrives. Phenomena of sound are often recorded in place of a visual apparition. Sometimes they attempt to prove identity, imitating the professional work of the departed. They differ from poltergeist phenomena, as the latter do not coincide with death.

If no definite message is conveyed, the apparition may be explained by a spirit's continued interest in earthly occupations. Spiritualists often suggest that some spirits of the deceased apparently cannot adjust immediately to their new surroundings, and they may be seen for a while in favorite haunts or at their usual work, being somehow enabled, when recently freed from the body, to enjoy a fuller perception of earthly scenes than it is afterward possible to retain.

Knowledge and memory are the two main characteristics of after-death apparitions. Local apparitions that are not attached to persons seem to degenerate into mere spectral automations, as witnessed in haunted houses. Somewhat similar, yet belonging to a different class, is illustrated by a case of apparitions en masse originally reported by Eleanor Sidgwick in the Proceedings, of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 3, p. 76),

"Two ladies, Mrs. F. and her sister, saw in the street during a thick fog numerous human forms passing by. Some were tall persons who seemed to enter the body of one of the two sisters. The servant who was with the two ladies cried out in terror. In this crowd of phantoms there were men, women and dogs. The women wore high bonnets and large shawls of old fashion. Their faces were livid and cadaverous. The whole phantasmal troop accompanied Mrs. F. and her sister about three hundred yards. Sometimes they seemed to be lit up by a kind of yellow light. When Mrs. F., her sister and the servant reached their home, only one single individual of the crowd, taller than the others and hideous in appearance, remained. He then disappeared also."

Prolonged apparitions are very rare, and possibly serve some deeper purpose, as in the case of a sailor who saw his father beside him on the bridge of his ship during a storm for two hours. The message of the apparition is, as a rule, simple and appears to be chosen intelligently in the form that may best suit the percipient's power of understanding. An apparition with empty eye sockets perceived by a sailor's wife, the sound of a terrific storm, or the image of a coffin conveys the intended message nearly as efficiently as the spoken words. The percipient appears to be curiously receptive in such moments and seldom exhibits astonishment at the most unlikely things.

Death-compacts offer another field of study. There are cases on record when the apparition concerned was perceived not after death but before, at the moment of a dangerous accident. In Phantasms of the Living there are 12 such cases recorded; the apparitions having appeared within 12 hours of the death. In three cases the agent was still alive. It appears as if such a compact would act effectively both on the subconscious before death and on the spirit after death. How long the efforts as a result of such a compact may continue we cannot tell. It is usually fulfilled shortly after death, but in some cases after years. The living party to the compact may not be sufficiently sensitive to be successfully impressed and others may see a phantom of the departed much sooner than the party in question.

The Genesis of Apparitions

If one accepts a paranormal explanation of apparitions, the primary question then becomes, "Are apparitions objective, produced in space, or are they subjectively seen as the result of a telepathic impact from the agent?" The answer is a qualified one—the subjective nature of the apparition being often unquestionable. The medium Hélène Smith wrote to Theodore Flournoy in 1926 of an Italian spiritualist from whom she received a letter. She decided to ask him for details of his life. Suddenly, she heard a knock at the door, three sharp and distinct raps. The door opened and she saw a man, holding in each hand a small wickerwork basket, containing grain of different kinds. He made a sign, inviting her attention to the baskets. Two minutes afterwards he disappeared. The door was found shut. After sending off the intended letter, a photograph came, bearing the exact reproduction of the man seen, with the information that the writer was a dealer in corn still living in Genoa.

The objectivity of any apparition might best be decided by the means of the camera. Circumstances, however, are very seldom such that would make possible the acquisition of such evidence. There is, however, a well-authenticated case, furnished by Church of England minister Charles L. Tweedale, the vicar at Weston. He photographed in the breakfast room of the vicarage an old man who was clairvoyantly seen by his wife Violet Tweedale. (The photographs obtained by spirit photographers belong to quite a different class, as there is no perceptible apparition during the process.)

Nevertheless, the photograph of the Combermere ghost demands consideration. Lacy C. had rented Combermere Abbey, in Cheshire, Lord Combermere's country house, for the summer. The library in the house was a fine panelled room and the new tenant was anxious to secure a photograph of it. She placed her half-plate camera on its stand in a favorable position—fronting the unoccupied carved oak arm chair on which Lord Combermere always used to sit. On developing the plate by herself, she was amazed to find the figure of a legless old man seated in the carved oak arm chair. The curious coincidence that Lord Combermere was buried a few miles from his country house at the very time the photograph was taken led to the surmise that the ghostly figure resembled the late nobleman. Opinions of the family differed, but on the whole it was considered to be like him, especially in the peculiar attitude that was habitual to him when seated in his chair.

Sir William Barrett, who investigated the case and reported on it in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (December 1895), was not satisfied. Working on the theory that a manservant may have come in and seated himself in the chair, he took a test photograph and got a picture that was almost a duplicate of the Combermere photograph. With this the matter seemed ended, but, as he told in his book On the Threshold of the Unseen (1918), some time later he received a letter from Lord Combermere's daughter-in-law in which she said:

"The face was always too indistinct to be quite convincing to me, though some of his children had no doubt at all of the identity. I may add, none of the menservants in the house in the least resembled the figure and were all young men; whilst the outside men were all attending the funeral, which was taking place at the church four miles off, at the very time the photograph was being done."

This testimony induced Barrett to change his opinion.

The famous British conjurer J. N. Maskelyne in his account of his own experience of drowning (reported in Phantasms of Living) spoke about whether an objective apparition is simply an effigy or the actual presence of the person whom it represents. He stated:

"One thing, however, did appear to my mental vision as plainly as though it were actually before my eyes. That was the form of my mother, engaged upon her household duties. Upon returning home, I was utterly astonished to find that she had been as conscious of my danger as I had been, and at the moment when I was so near death."

It seems that when his past life flashed by in the moment of drowning the last thoughts of Maskelyne dwelt on his mother with the effect that he found his mental self gazing at her. Many other apparitions may be simply thought forms, reflections of intense mental anguish experienced in some time past in certain places which are now called haunted or, as F. W. H. Myers suggested, they may be visible dreams of the dead.

Edmund Gurney, writing in 1888, believed that there were three conditions that might establish a presumption that an apparition or other immediate manifestation of a dead person is something more than a subjective hallucination. Either (1) more persons than one might be independently affected by the phenomenon; or (2) the phantasm might convey information, afterwards discovered to be true, of something the percipient had never known; or (3) the appearance might be that of a person the percipient himself had never seen, and of whose aspect he was ignorant, and yet his description of it might be sufficiently definite for identification. Gurney also noted that the high number of phantasmal appearances shortly after death is also suggestive, as the calculation of probabilities for telepathic impressions from the living would not result in such a disproportionate number.

Telepathic explanations of apparitions present many difficulties. One has to suppose that a dying man can visualize himself and his condition sufficiently clearly to project a telepathic image as distinctly as perceived. In experimental thought transference it is always the idea on which the agent concentrates that is perceived by the percipients. On the other hand, in some experiments the agent always concentrates on the person to whom he wishes to appear and not on himself. But again in such cases the agent often sees the percipient and brings back an account that can be verified. Such experiences suggest the real presence of the agent and argue against the sufficiency of the telepathic impact theory.

Apparently, this telepathic impulse is first registered on the unconscious part of the mind. If so, the impression may be latent for a time. Strong preoccupation of the conscious mind with the business of life may prevent its emergence. This would explain why the vision of an apparition does not always coincide in time with the actual happening. In Phantasms of the Living, such deferred telepathic perceptions are accepted, if they occur within a period of 12 hours. On the other hand, the theory does not bar out the other, that there is an actual presence that does not always find the mind of the percipient sufficiently receptive to take cognition. Reciprocal perceptions are also on record. The telepathic theory has to be twisted and modified to cover the wide range of supernormal perceptions. In case of accidental death, the apparition is sometimes seen at the moment of death, sometimes after it.

Does the mind transform the picture of deadly danger into a picture of death? If this were true, it would suggest that we might come across many cases in which the vision of death was premature as the accident did not prove fatal. We do not see such cases. On the other hand, in cases of suicides the apparition is often found to precede the actual commission of the act. It would seem very credible that brooding over the fatal act and its possible effect on close relations produces a telepathic image.

By all means, the telepathic theory would account for the clothes apparently worn by the ghosts and would eliminate suggestions, like those of d'Assier, of the ghosts of garments. But it meets with difficulties in cases when animals are stricken with terror and register alarm before the man suspects anything unusual.

The greatest stumbling block in the way of the telepathic theory, as an all-inclusive explanation, is presented by those cases in which the apparition is collectively perceived. Gurney attempted to explain these cases by a telepathic transmission that takes place from the percipient's mind to the mind of his neighbors. This theory proved inadequate. There is nothing to prove its possibilities. The hallucinations of the insane or the visions seen in delirium tremens are never communicated to those around them. Why should such a communication take place in cases of apparitions, coinciding with the death of someone distant? What happens when the percipient appears to have traveled to a distant scene and he is actually perceived there?

As early as 1885 Myers began to feel the insufficiency of the telepathic theory. Gurney himself, by the time he died, was convinced of the genuine character of many an apparition. The trance phenomena of medium Leonora Piper led Myers to the belief that the evidence for communications from the departed is quite as strong as for telepathic communication between the living. Still there remained a large number of phantasmal manifestations that even communication from the departed could not explain. So Myers proposed a theory of psychical invasion—the creation of a "Phantasmogenetic centre" in the percipient's surroundings by some dissociated elements of the agent's personality, which in some way are potent enough to affect and modify space. He considered it a subliminal operation, resembling the continuous dream life which he supposed to run concurrently with the waking life, not necessarily a profound incident but rather a special idiosyncracy on the part of the agent that tends to make his phantasm easily visible.

From the Greek he coined the word "psychorrhagy" which means "to let the soul break loose." He believed he had discovered a new physiological fact, the psychorrhagic diathesis, essentially a psychical manifestation by some people born with an ability to produce phantasmogenetic effect either on the mind of another person or on a portion of space, in which case several persons may simultaneously discern the phantasm.

This theory enjoyed great support in the early years of psychical research. It was a half-way house between telepathic and Spiritualist explanations of apparitions. The supposition of the double easily explains many an apparition of the living: the "arrival cases" where a man's attention is fixed on his return home, the cases in which there is a strong link of emotion between agent and percipient and the phantom is collectively or repeatedly seen. But there are cases of phantasmal apparitions in which the theory of the double offers no satisfactory explanation. Such was case of Canon Bourne, reported in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 6, p. 129), as recounted by Lois Bourne,

"On February 5th, 1887, my father, sister, and I went out hunting. About the middle of the day my sister and I decided to return home with the coachman, while my father went on. Somebody came and spoke to us, and delayed us for a few moments. As we were turning to go home, we distinctly saw my father, waving his hat to us and signing us to follow him. He was on the side of a small hill, and there was a dip between him and us. My sister, the coachman and myself all recognized my father, and also the horse. The horse looked so dirty and shaken that the coachman remarked he thought there had been a nasty accident. As my father waved his hat I clearly saw the Lincoln and Bennett mark inside, though from the distance we were apart it ought to have been utterly impossible for me to have seen it. At the time I mentioned seeing the mark in the hat, though the strangeness of seeing it did not strike me till afterwards.

Fearing an accident, we hurried down the hill. From the nature of the ground we had to lose sight of my father, but it took us very few seconds to reach the place where we had seen him. When we got there, there was no sign of him anywhere, nor could we see anyone in sight at all. We rode about for some time looking for him, but could not see or hear anything of him. We all reached home within a quarter of an hour of each other. My father then told us he had never been in the field, nor near the field, in which we thought we saw him, the whole of that day. He had never waved to us, and had met with no accident. My father was riding the only white horse that was out that day."

Myers believes that Canon Bourne was subliminally dreaming of himself as having had a fall, and as beckoning to his daughters, an incoherent dream but of quite ordinary type. Being born with the psychorrhagic diathesis, a certain psychical element so far detached itself from his organism as to affect a certain portion of space near the daughters of whom he was thinking, to effect it not materially nor even optically, but yet in such a manner that to a certain kind of immaterial and non-optical sensitivity a phantasm of himself and his horse became discernible.

Myers suggested that hauntings by departed spirits may be similarly explained and that the modification of space into a phantasmogenetic center applies to a phantasmal voice as well.

If this alteration of space is more than a theory it may theoretically happen, so Myers thought, that a bystander may discern the alteration more clearly than the person for whose benefit it was made or that the bystander alone may perceive it. Such seems to be the case of Frances Reddell quoted in Phantasms of the Living,

"Helen Alexander (maid to Lady Waldegrave) was lying here very ill with typhoid fever, and was attended by me. I was standing at the table by her bedside, pouring out her medicine, at about 4 o'clock in the morning of the 4th October, 1880. I heard the call bell ring (this had been heard twice before during the night in that same week) and was attracted by the door of the room opening, and by seeing a person entering the room whom I instantly felt to be the mother of the sick woman. She had a brass candlestick in her hand, a red shawl over her shoulder, and a flannel petticoat on which had a hole in the front. I looked at her as much as to say 'I am glad you have come' but the woman looked at me sternly, as much as to say 'Why wasn't I sent for before?' I gave the medicine to Helen Alexander and then turned round to speak to the vision, but no one was there. She had gone. She was a short, dark person, and very stout. At about 6 o'clock that morning Helen Alexander died. Two days after her parents and a sister came to Antony, and arrived between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning; I and another maid let them in, and it gave me a great turn when I saw the living likeness of the vision I had seen two nights before. I told the sister about the vision, and she said that the description of the dress exactly answered to her mother's, and that they had brass candlesticks at home exactly like the one described. There was not the slightest resemblance between the mother and daughter."

The account was corroborated. Myers believes the vision was meant for the daughter by the mother who, in her anxiety, paid her a psychical visit and affected part of the space with an image corresponding to the conception of her own aspect latent in her mind. A bystander, a susceptible person, happened to see the image while the girl for whom it was meant died without leaving a sign of having perceived it.

A still more curious but, according to Myers, similarly explainable case is the sailor's (Phantasms of the Living (vol. 2, p. 144) who, watching by a dying comrade, saw figures around his hammock, apparently representing the dying man's family, in mourning clothes. The family was alarmed by noises, which they took as indication of danger to the dying. According to Myers the wife paid a psychical visit to her husband. The mourning clothes and the figures of the children were symbolical expressions of her thought that her children would be orphans.

Would the alteration of space theory account for changes in physical objects? While Myers is silent on this point, Andrew Lang considers it crucial. For if an apparition can thump, open a door, or pull a curtain, it must be a ghost—real, objective entity, filling space. Per contra, "no ghost who does not do this has any strict legal claim to be regarded as other than a telepathic hallucination at best." The statement is rather severe in view of his quotation from Edward Binn's Anatomy of Sleep (1842) of the case of the gentlemen who, in a dream, pushed so strongly against a door in a distant house that they could hardly hold it against him.

Apparitions may be produced experimentally by the projection of the double or powerful suggestion. The first attempts in the latter class are recorded from Germany in H. M. Wesermanns' Der Magnetismus und die allgemeine Weltsprache (1822). On four occasions he succeeded in inducing four separate acquaintances to dream on matters suggested by himself. On the fifth occasion he produced a collective apparition. The subject and a friend who happened to be in his company saw, in the waking state, the apparition of a woman in accordance with the operator's suggestion.

Theories Concerning Apparitions

Various complex and contradictory theories have already been cited in relation to specific cases of apparitions. From the late-nineteenth century on, apparitions have usually been ascribed to hallucination. Even those who advanced a Spiritualistic view of apparitions frequently inclined to this view, for it was argued that the discarnate intelligence might, by psychical energy alone, produce in the brain of a living person a definite hallucination, corresponding perhaps to the agent's appearance in life. Hallucinations might be either coincidental or noncoincidental. The former, also known as telepathic hallucinations, were those which coincided with a death, or with some other crisis in the life of the person represented by the hallucination.

The nineteenth-century psychical researcher Frank Podmore insisted that apparitions resulted from a telepathic impression conveyed from the mind of one living person to that of another, an impression which might be doubly intense in time of stress or exalted emotion, or at the moment of dissolution. Apparitions of the dead could be accounted for by a theory of latent impressions, conveyed to the mind of the percipient during the agent's lifetime, but remaining dormant until some particular train of thought aroused them to activity. This view still finds some support at the present day.

Hallucinations, whether coincidental or otherwise, may and do present themselves to persons who are perfectly sane and normal, but they are also reported by people who are suffering mental disorders, under hypnosis, or in a state of hysteria. Hallucinations are also symptomatic of certain pathological conditions of brain, nerves, and sense-organs. As mentioned earlier, Myers was of the opinion that an apparition represented an actual "psychic invasion," that it was a projection of some of the agent's psychic force. Such a doctrine was, as Myers himself admitted, a reverse animism.

Another theory of apparitions, particularly applicable to haunted houses, was related to psychometry. Sir Oliver Lodge, in his Man and the Universe (1908) wrote:

"Occasionally a person appears able to respond to stimuli embedded, as it were among psycho-physical surroundings in a manner at present ill understood and almost incredible:—as if strong emotions could be unconsciously recorded in matter, so that the deposit shall thereafter affect a sufficiently sensitive organism, and cause similar emotions to reproduce themselves in its subconsciousness, in a manner analogous to the customary conscious interpretation of photographic or phonographic records, and indeed of pictures or music and artistic embodiment generally."

Take, for example, a haunted house, where one room is the scene of a ghostly representation of some long past tragedy. On a psychometric hypothesis the original tragedy has been literally photographed on its material surroundings, even on the "ether" itself, by reason of the intensity of emotion felt by those who enacted it; and thenceforth in certain persons an hallucinatory effect is experienced corresponding to such impression. It is this theory that accounts for the feeling one has on entering certain rooms, that there is an alien presence therein, though it be invisible and inaudible to mortal sense.

The idea of connecting psychometry with apparitions might seem of considerable interest because of its wide possibilities, but in the end it belongs to the realm of romance rather than science; it is hardly to be considered as a serious theory. Not only is it unsupported by convincing evidence, but it again attempts to explain one unknown by another.

Spiritualistic theories of apparitions also vary, though they agree in referring such appearances to discarnate intelligences, generally to the spirits of the dead. The opinion of some Spiritualist authorities is that the surviving spirit is produced in the mind of the percipient by purely psychic means—an hallucination representing the agent's former bodily appearance.

Others believe that the discarnate spirit can materialize by taking ethereal particles from the external world, and building up a temporary physical organism through which it can communicate with the living. Still others believe that the materialized spirit borrows such temporary physical organism from the medium, and experiments were made which suggested that the medium lost weight during the materialization. [The various speculations based on apparitions observed at materialization seances has had to be discharged as the widespread involvement of materialization mediums in fraudulently produced phenomena became widely accepted.]

The ancient belief that the soul itself can become visible is not generally accepted, since it is thought that pure spirit cannot be perceptible to the physical senses. But a compromise has been made in the idea of a "psychic body," midway between soul and body, which theosophists and some spiritualists theorize clothes the soul at the dissolution of the physical body. The psychic body is said to be composed of very fine and subtle material particles, perceptible as a rule, only to the eye of the clairvoyant. It is this astral body, and not the soul, that is seen as an apparition.

Experimental evidence for these and various alternative theories has proven far from conclusive. Since its formation in 1882, the Society for Psychical Research and its sister organizations, have collected numerous instances of coincidental hallucinations, many of which were recorded in the monumental work Phantasms of the Living (1886) by Edmund Gurney, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore, from which various cases were cited above. Some 5,705 individuals, chosen at random, had been canvassed for phantasmal visions occurring within the previous 12 years. It concluded: "Between death and apparitions a connection exists not due to chance alone. This we hold a proved fact."

As the scientific world did not consider the evidence of 702 accepted cases sufficient for such a momentous conclusion, an international statistical inquiry named the Census of Hallucinations was decided upon in 1889. A sum of 32,000 answers were received, 17,000 in English. The report, published in 1894, fills almost the whole of volume 10 of Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. Chance coincidence was more powerfully ruled out than before, and the previous conclusion was confirmed. The inquiry of the American Society for Psychical Research and the census of Camille Flammarion in 1899 gave further confirmation.

With the emergence of parapsychology, which has now largely superseded psychical research, and the work of J. B. Rhine and associates in ESP (extrasensory perception) from 1935 on, experimental researches into paranormal phenomena have placed greater emphasis on telepathy and clairvoyance, and moved away from the study of survival phenomena including apparitions.

Surveys of apparitional or hallucinatory experiences have been carried out in recent decades by parapsychologists, but it is difficult to establish objective criteria for personal anecdotes, and the suspicion must remain that many stories of apparitions may have been consciously or unconsciously invented or embroidered by the percipients. Statistical evaluation of such censuses may establish general patterns of claimed phenomena, but the real meaning of any apparitional experience is primarily for the individual concerned, and even if the individual cannot offer objective evidence of such experience, the subjective aspect can be of great personal importance.

Although spontaneous phenomena like hauntings are not readily amenable to scientific validation, modern parapsychologists have shown some ingenuity in new approaches to such phenomena as apparitions. Besides collecting eyewitness accounts, several researchers have also made a systematic psychological investigation of locations at which apparitions occurred. In one experiment by Michaeleen Maher and Gertrude Schmeidler, different psychics have been taken to the location by an individual without knowledge of the claimed phenomena and therefore unable to color any impressions received. The accounts of the different psychics were collated and a total picture of the claimed haunting built up.

Theoretical models for apparitional experience remain somewhat speculative since early investigators like Frank Podmore claimed that apparitions resulted from a telepathic impression conveyed from the mind of one living person to that of another. More recently, British psychical researcher G. N. M. Tyrrell, in his monumental survey of Apparitions, suggested that the sensory apparatus (like the optic nerve) of the percipient is telepathically affected by other minds. However, from the variety of evidence and discussion, as well as the wide range of types of apparitions, it seems reasonable to believe that we are not dealing with a single phenomenon, and it would be unrealistic to claim one universal explanation that covers the diverse facts and claims.

Sources:

Barrett, William F. Death Bed Visions. London, 1926.

Beaumont, John. An Historical, Physiological & Theological Treatise of Spirits, Apparitions, Witchcraft & Other Magical Practices. London, 1750.

Bennett, Ernest W. Apparitions & Haunted Houses: A Survey of Evidence. London: 1939. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

Bozzano, Ernesto. Phénomènes Psychiques au Moment de la Mort. Paris, 1923.

Calmet, Dom Augustine. Dissertations sur les apparitions des anges des démons et des espits, et sur les revenants, et vampires de Hongrie, de Boheme, de Moravie, et de Silésie. Paris, 1746. Reprinted as The Phantom World. 2 vols. London: Richard Bentley, 1850.

Carrington, Hereward. True Ghost Stories. London, [1933].

Carrington, Hereward, and Nandor Fodor. Haunted People: Story of the Poltergeist Down the Centuries. New York: E. P. Dutton, New American Library, 1951. Reprinted as The Story of the Poltergeist Down the Centuries. London: Rider, 1953.

Clarke, Edward H. Visions: A Study of False Sight. Boston, 1878.

Cobbe, Frances Power. The Peak in Darien. London, 1882.

Crosland, Newton. Apparitions. London, 1873.

Crowe, Catherine. Ghosts and Family Legends. London, 1859.

———. The Night Side of Nature. 1848. Reprint, Philadelphia: R. West, 1978.

[Defoe, Daniel]. An Essay on the History & Reality of Apparitions. London, 1727.

Dingwall, Eric J., and Trevor H. Hall. Four Modern Ghosts. London, 1958.

Dingwall, Eric J., K. M. Goldney, and Trevor H. Hall. The Haunting of Borley Rectory. London: Duckworth, 1955.

Flammarion, Camille. Death & Its Mystery. 3 vols. New York: Century, 1921–23.

———. Haunted Houses. Paris, 1924. Reprint, New York: Appleton, 1924. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1971.

Garland, Hamlin. The Shadow World. New York, 1908.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. London: Trubner, 1886. Abridged ed. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Hamel, Frank. Human Animals. London, 1915. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Hibbert, Samuel. Sketches of the Philosophy of Apparitions. Edinburgh, 1825.

Lang, Andrew. Book of Dreams & Ghosts. London, 1898. Reprint, New York: Causeway, 1974.

MacKenzie, Andrew. The Unexplained; Some Strange Cases of Psychical Research. London, 1966. Reprint, New York: Popular Library, 1970.

Maher, Michaeleen, and Gertrude Schmeidler. "Confirmation of a Family's Report of an Apparition." In Research in Parapsychology 1974. Edited by J. D. Morris, W. G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

O'Donnell, Elliott. Animal Ghosts. London, 1913.

———. Byways of Ghostland. London, 1911.

———. Confessions of a Ghost Hunter. London, 1928.

———. Ghostly Phenomena. London, n.d.

———. Ghosts Helpful & Harmful. London, 1924.

———. Werewolves. London, 1912.

Pike, Richard. Life's Borderland and Beyond. London, n.d.

Podmore, Frank. Apparitions & Thought-Transference: An Examination of the Evidence for Telepathy. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1894.

———. Telepathic Hallucinations: The New View of Ghosts. London, 1909.

Pollock, James S. Dead and Gone. London, 1874.

Price, Harry. The End of Borley Rectory. London: Harrap, 1946.

———. The Most Haunted House in England. London: Longmans, Green, 1940.

Salter, W. H. Ghosts & Apparitions. London: G. Bell & Sons, 1938.

Savile, Bourchier W. Apparitions; A Book of Facts. London, 1874.

The Secrets of the Invisible World Laid Open, or an Universal History of Apparitions, Sacred & Profane. London, 1770.

Snell, Joy. The Ministry of Angels. London, 1918.

Stead, William T. Real Ghost Stories. London, 1892. Rev. ed. 1897. Reprinted as Borderland: A Casebook of True Supernatural Stories. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Tregortha, John. News from the Invisible World. U.K.: Burslem, 1808.

Tweedale, Violet. Ghosts I Have Seen. London, 1920.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Apparitions. London, 1953. Reissued in one volume with Tyrrell's Science & Psychical Phenomena. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Wickwar, J. W. The Ghost World. London, n.d.

Wright, Dudley. Vampires & Vampirism. London, 1914. Reprinted as The Book of Vampires. New York: Causeway, 1973.

Apparitions of the Virgin Mary

Within the larger consideration of apparition, a special place has been given to apparitions of one figure, the Virgin Mary, believed to be the mother of Jesus whom Christians worship as the Christ. Apparitions of the Virgin play an important role in doctrinal development and devotional life of the Roman Catholic Church, the largest religious organization in the world, and to a lesser extent are also acknowledged in the Eastern Orthodox and Coptic Churches. The apparitions of Mary are also important in terms of the diligent effort made by Roman Catholic authorities to investigate incidents that are brought to their attention, often by the attraction of large crowds to them, and the amount of energy spent on attempting to verify them. Some of the apparitions stand as among the most well-documented cases in the parapsychological realm.

In the modern cases of apparitions, especially where initial approval is given for church members to focus devotion around a particular apparition, the investigation may continue for many years, to the very death bed of people claiming to have had such apparitions to record their final words. Investigation is also made of associated "supernatural" phenomena such as the healings at Lourdes, France. While many in the highest levels of the Roman Catholic Church are eager to report on its claimed miraculous life, they are just as eager not to be trapped into offering their support to incidents that might better be explained by hoaxing, pathology, or other more mundane explanations.

In the Roman Church, apparitions are not part of what the church considers the deposit of faith and hence, no one is compelled to believe in them or to follow the devotions they suggest. However, the church does view them as helpful in encouraging devotion in general and confirming faith. The church grants permission for the veneration of Mary in a certain way and/or in a certain place. That permission may be relatively weak, as a letter from a bishop in whose diocese the apparition has occurred, or strong, as when the pope visited Fatima on the 50th anniversary of the apparition.

Many of the apparitions during the first centuries of Christianity were seen as purely personal revelations, but helped bolster the church's consideration of Mary and inclusion of her as an item on its theological agenda. However, over the centuries, several apparitions introduced a variety of new devotional practices into the church. The rosary, for example, first became popular when the Dominicans, following an apparition of Mary to their founder St. Dominic, began to spread its use in the twelfth century. Attention to Mary reached a high in the Middle Ages, but came under heavy attack from Protestant leaders in the sixteenth century (many considered it idolatry) and from the eighteenth-century Enlightenment that saw most supernaturalism as mere superstition.

From the eighteenth century one can see documented an attempt to revive interest in Marian devotion with the call for a definition of the Immaculate Conception (the belief that the Virgin Mary was born free of original sin) as official dogma (teachings). It also saw the publication of several massive works on Mariology, especially the eminently successful Glories of Mary (1876) by Alphonsus Liguori, which became one of the most highly circulated books on Mary in modern times.

Through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the role of Mary in theology and her place in the devotional life of the church has increased significantly. In 1854, Pope Leo IX issued the bull defining the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. Over the next century, there were to be numerous papal encyclicals on Mary that would culminate in 1950 with Pope Pius XII's definition of the Assumption of Mary (that at the end of her life she was taken body and soul into heaven) as dogma. Integral to this expansion of theological and devotional interest in Mary are a set of apparitions that began in 1820. In the last generation literally hundreds of apparitions of Mary have been documented, but of these less than 20 have received the approbation of the church and become part of its ongoing devotional life.

Mary in the Nineteenth Century

A new era in Marian apparitions began in 1820 in Paris, France, with a young visionary, Catherine Labouré. A peasant girl with visionary tendencies, Catherine entered the convent of the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in April of 1820. Soon after settling in, she began to experience visions. Then, on the evening of July 18th, at around 11:30 P.M., she was awakened by a child who told her to go to the chapel. There she saw the Virgin. That evening she received only some personal instructions. But in November she had a vision of the Virgin surrounded by an oval frame and was told to have a medal truck in the likeness of what she saw. This medallion, known as the Miraculous Medal, first appeared two years later but the wearing of it has now become a popular form of devotion worldwide.

Fourteen years later, in southern France, on the side of a mountain called La Salette, Mary appeared to two children, Maximim Gigaud (age 11) and Melanie Matthieu (age 15). The pair were tending some cattle when they saw Her. She relayed to them a message of warning concerning the neglect of attendance at Mass and the use of Christ's name in a profane manner. The continued impiety was destined to lead to crop failures and then famine, which in fact plagued the region for the next decade. Mary appeared next to a spring that had dried up. Several days later, when the villagers finally heard about the claimed apparition, they went out to the site and found that the spring was once again flowing.

Possibly the most famous of the modern apparitions occurred to young Bernadette Souberous, also in France, this time at the village of Lourdes not far from the Spanish border. Bernadette was the subject of a series of apparitions beginning February 11, 1858, just four years after the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. She had been sent out to gather firewood when she wandered close to a grotto of Massabielle. There she saw the Lady whom she originally described as something in the shape of a girl. During the ninth apparition on February 25, she was told to drink and wash with water from a spot that Mary pointed out to her. People dug around the spot that soon turned into a heretofore unknown spring. She would see the Virgin several times more in March and April. When asked her name, the Lady finally answered, "I am the Immaculate Conception."

The Virgin told Bernadette that she wanted a chapel built at the grotto. After a few ups and downs, the report of the bishop affirming a belief that the Virgin had appeared at Lourdes was issued in 1862. The place would become known for its healings and in 1884 a medical bureau was established to keep records of the miraculous cures. Bernadette was canonized in 1933.

A fourth officially approved apparition also occurred in France at Pontmain. It was during the closing days of the Franco-Prussian War in 1871 that Eugené and Joseph Barbadette (twelve and ten years old respectively) saw the Virgin. Their father, standing close by, saw nothing. As others gathered, the adults saw nothing, but two additional children, both female, immediately saw the apparition. The apparition closed with what resembled a set of tableux-like scenes of Mary in the same position as depicted on the Miraculous Medal, and then a red cross appeared and a white cross. As the priest who had arrived led the group in their evening prayers, the vision faded.

Twentieth Century Apparitions

The four French apparitions set the stage for what possibly were the most spectacular of the modern apparitions whose fame closely rivals that of Lourdes. The apparitions at Fatima, in central Portugal, began on May 13, 1917, and continued monthly into October. Here Mary offered the three children to whom she appeared a vision of hell as the consequences of impiety and unbelief, and called for reparations and prayers for the conversion of Russia. What set the apparitions apart, however, was the fulfilled promise of a miracle to complete the apparitions on October 13. Tens of thousands of people gathered at the site of the apparitions though the day was rainy. As the children were conversing with the Lady, whom none of others could see, Lucy, one of the children, suddenly cried out, "Look at the sun!" The clouds parted, and a bright silver disk appeared and began to rotate. It plunged downward toward the crowd and its heat dried out clothes soaked in the earlier rain. A mysterious white substance fell from the sky and after about 30 minutes of the "sun" dancing in the sky, the phenomenon ended. Not only did everyone see, including some prominent Freethinkers who had come to ridicule the children, but people from as far away as 30 miles witnessed it.

Besides the aerial phenomenon of the last day, Mary had also presented the children with a secret message, as had occurred at La Salette. While two parts of the secrets of Fatima would be revealed, the third part has remained unknown to the public at large, even though the initial indication was that it would be made public in 1960. It is known that the popes since John XXIII have read the secret message and there has been intense speculation as to the content of the secret among the millions who have adopted the devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary that was called for in 1917.

Since Fatima, two approved apparitions occurred at Beauraing (1932) and Banneax (1933), Belgium. Also, back in 1879, in the midst of the potato famine, there had been a reported apparition at Knock, Ireland. Though investigated immediately afterward and in 1936, approval from the church has been slow in coming. While pilgrimages to Knock were not forbidden, the succession of local bishops refused to rule on the matter of the apparition's credibility. Beginning in 1954, popes have honored the devotion of the people and recognized Knock as a major center of Marian devotion. Finally in 1979, on the hundredth anniversary of the apparition, Pope John Paul II himself visited Knock.

And not to be forgotten in the midst of the growth of Marian devotion in Europe, is the fifteenth-century apparition of Mary in Guadalupe, Mexico. This apparition centered upon an amazing image of the Virgin left behind on the cape of Juan Diego, the young man who saw the Virgin. The image became the focus of veneration of the Virgin throughout Latin America, and has during the last half of the twentieth century been integrated into the Marian devotion that swept through Europe and North America.

Other Apparitions

The number of apparitions of the Virgin have grown throughout the twentieth century. Most have had only local effect. Although a few have been the subject of books, the great majority have gone unreported except to the most dedicated of gatherers of Marian data. A few, however, became the objects of mass gatherings and pilgrimages that forced local bishops to act. In 1954, for example, Mary Ann van Hoof began to claim visions of the Virgin at a spot near Necedah, Wisconsin. She also began to circulate lengthy messages dictated from Mary, not unlike messages received through what is known as channeling. Through the late 1950s large crowds gathered at the site and a shrine was created. For a number of years the leaders of the shrine negotiated with the bishop of LaCross to approve the apparitions, but following several unfavorable rulings, he gave a final statement discounting the apparitions and calling Roman Catholics to abandon support of the shrine. The core of shrine supporters, however, reorganized and have continued as an independent group. A similar course has been followed by those around Mary Ann Lueken, who has claimed continuous visits by the Virgin in Bayside, Long Island, New York.

In Europe, the most prominent of the questionable apparitions began in the 1960s in Garabandal, Spain, in which solar phenomena not unlike that in Fatima was reported. However, the apparitions could not pass the scrutiny of church investigators and have now been abandoned. The more important apparitions began in 1981 at Medjugorje, then in Herzegovina. Since the first day, they have continued daily for almost 20 years and even at the height of fighting in the 1990s from the breakup of the country, pilgrims continued to flock to the area. The apparitions have been the source of a barrage of books supportive of the young people who have been the subject of Mary's attention. However, they have also acquired some strong critics within the church, both scholars and members of the hierarchy, who have condemned the phenomena. No definitive ruling has yet occurred.

In the midst of the ongoing debates concerning some of the recent apparitions, the most spectacular of Mary's appearances occurred in Cairo, Egypt, where not only thousands saw her, but pictures were taken. Investigations have been filed to offer reasonable alternative mundane explanations. However, Mary appeared on the roof of a Coptic (not a Roman Catholic) cathedral. While Roman Catholic scholars have investigated and written about the sightings, the fact that Mary chose to appear in a Muslim country in a non-Roman Catholic setting has kept this apparition from being integrated into the body of material considered relevant by Western Mariologists.

The Meaning of the Apparitions

For conservative Roman Catholics, the apparitions are a major building block of faith in God's activity in the world. They, in effect, prove the existence of the supernatural and allow participation in it while living in an otherwise secular world. Many liberal Roman Catholics see in the apparitions a form of devotion that is quite foreign to the secularized outlook they have adopted. Critics approach the apparitions in much the same way as other psychic phenomena, as a threat to the worldview that they have adopted that has no space for such occurrences. The most vehement of critics, over the last 200 years, have seen the apparitions as supportive of a return to pre-scientific superstition. Also critical are conservative Evangelical Christians who view Roman Catholicism as a distorted form of Christianity, and attack the apparitions as a counterfeit supernaturalism. In the middle are people who believe that such phenomena occur, but do not tie the phenomena to Roman Catholic theology.

In fact, the Marian apparitions do supply a vast amount of data for contemporary parapsychology, and the ongoing apparitions provide an interesting set of data for those concerned about the phenomenon of channeling. The material channeled by van Hoof, Lueken, and their peers is structurally like that from New Age channelers, but its content could not be more different.

Sources:

Connor, Edward. Recent Apparitions of Our Lady. Fresno, Calif.: Academy Guild Publishers, n.d.

Delaney, John J. A Woman Clothed with the Sun: Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady. Garden City, N.Y.: Hanover House, 1960.

McClure, Kevin. The Evidence for Visions of the Virgin Mary. Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1983.

Sharkey, Don. The Woman Shall Conquer. Kenosha, Wis.: Franciscan Marytown Press, 1976.

Applewhite, Jr., Marshall Herff (1931–1997)

In March 1997, Marshall Applewhite gained some degree of infamy when 39 members of the small communal group he led committed suicide together. The group, known by various names including Human Individual Metamorphosis and Heaven's Gate, had first emerged in the 1970s when he and the group's cofounder, Bonnie Lu Truesdale Nettles, traveled throughout the United States recruiting people to join them on a flying saucer.

Applewhite was born on March 17, 1932, in Spur, Texas, and grew up the son of a Presbyterian minister. After finishing college he entered the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia to study for the Presbyterian ministry, but did not finish his degree. His talent appeared to be music and he obtained a position as the music director of a church in North Carolina. He served in the Army for two years (1954–56) and after holding several different jobs landed a position as head of the music department at the University of St. Thomas in Houston, Texas. He taught there through the 1960s, but lost his position in 1971.

Soon after his departure from St. Thomas, Applewhite met Nettles, a nurse who was knowledgeable of occult matters, especially astrology and channeling. As their relationship grew, they became convinced that they were the "Two Witnesses" spoken of in the Bible (Rev. 11:1–14). Shortly thereafter they began to tour the country searching for some people who would join them in a movement to transcend their earthly containers (bodies) and ascend to a higher level of existence. Several hundred people responded. During this period Applewhite and Nettles referred to themselves as Bo and Peep.

The group that gathered around the pair fully expected to be taken off the Earth in a flying saucer shortly after they joined the group. When that did not occur, Applewhite, Nettles, and their followers settled first in Denver and then in Fort Worth, Texas, where they lived quietly for the next two decades. Nettles died in 1985, and Applewhite emerged as the leader of the group. He had previously taught that death would cut people off from moving to the higher level and only the living would be taken aboard the saucer. However, he suggested that Bonnie was in fact the one referred to in the Bible as the Father who had gone on before the rest to prepare a place for them.

About this same time, Applewhite underwent surgery to have his sexual organs removed and suggested that the men in the group follow his example. Several did, though castration is not routine surgery, they found it difficult to locate a doctor who would agree to do it. Over the following decade Applewhite kept the group focused upon the approaching Endtime and the need to renounce all earthly attachments.

During the early 1990s, Applewhite came back into the public eye as he led new efforts to recruit members to the dwindling group in what he saw as a final push. These efforts included some programs on public access television and the production and distribution of several video tapes and a book. In the mid-1990s he began to inject the idea that the movement to the higher level might include what was generally thought of as suicide. A short time later he led the group to California, where a large house was rented in an exclusive section of Ranch Santa Fe, a suburb of San Diego. They were there in early 1997 when Applewhite heard of the newly discovered Hale Bopp Comet and of rumors that a spaceship was following it on its approach to Earth. Believing this to be the sign they were waiting for, he prepared the group for their leaving the planet. Finally, as the comet came closest to Earth in March 1997, over a several-day period (March 23–25), Applewhite and the remaining group members committed suicide using vodka and phenobarbital. Because the bodies were not discovered for several days, the exact time of death remains unknown. In the wake of the deaths, Applewhite has joined the list of religious leaders known for the destructive twist they gave to their original vision and the multiple deaths that resulted.

Sources:

Balch, Robert W. "Waiting for the Ships: Disillusionment and the Revitalization of Faith in Bo and Peep's UFO Cult." In James R. Lewis, ed. The Gods Have Landed. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Henry, William. The Keeper of Heaven's Gate: The Religion Behind the Rancho Santa Fe Suicides. Anchorage, Alaska: Earthpulse Press, 1997.

Applied Psi

Applied Psi, a term coined in the early 1980s by parapsychologist Jeff Mishlove, refers to the technological aspect of psychic phenomena as opposed to the purely scientific study of it. Assuming that psychic phenomena (telepathy, clairvoyance, psychometry, etc.) exists, one should be able not only to describe it and predict its behavior, but to learn to control it to some extent and use it in practical situations. The idea was announced in a new periodical, Applied Psi, the first issue of which appeared in 1982. Mishlove called for parapsychology to refocus its attention, then almost exclusively oriented (in the face of skeptical critics) to the accumulation of proof that psychic phenomena existed, to study ways to develop psi application to business and daily life. Shortly thereafter, E. Douglas Dean issued a book-length study of his observations of business executives who used their psychic talents in making crucial (and successful) business decisions. If psi could be made operative, one could imagine application in almost every field of endeavor.

Applied psi was an integral part of pre-scientific cultures. Practitioners, who went under a variety of names from witch to shaman, were called upon to predict the future, control the weather, heal the sick, and locate lost objects. While attempts at such uses of psi are still common in Spiritualist and New Age circles, their general application in society has been replaced by more successful scientific methods. Unbeknownst to most people at the time, during the Cold War the United States government had, as had the Soviet government earlier, initiated experiments in the use of remote viewing. Other experiments were carried out in a more or less controlled manner on the use of precognition to make money gambling or in the stock market. While the government experiments yielded some impressive results, ultimately, they were not reliable enough to use for spy operations. In like measure, the gambling and stock market results, which included some impressive successes, such as the ability to predict rising stocks demonstrated by psychic Bevy Jaegers, eventually leveled out.

Possibly the most extensive possibility of the observation of psychic powers in a practical situation came in the field of crime detection. Through the 1980s and 1990s, a number of police departments have either invited or allowed the participation of a psychic in the attempt to gather clues in an otherwise dead-end case. The widely publicized work of Dutch clairvoyant Gerard Croiset had placed this option before police departments around the world. While a few departments, in the wake of some apparent successes, such as the efforts of psychic Dorothy Allison, continue to use psychics, the practice remains controversial. Psychics are also employed by lawyers for use in the selection of jurists in important court cases.

Thus, while the major observation of Dean—that successful executives often demonstrate an intuition that appears to be psychic rather than simply good judgment—may stand, the application of psi to practical situations have yet to yield the results hoped for by the exponents of applied psi in the early 1980s.

Applied psi has also been called psionics, but has to be distinguished from the use of that term in radionics as initiated by John W. Campbell.

Sources:

Dean, E. Douglas, et al. Executive ESP. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

Mishlove, Jeffrey. Psi Development Systems. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1983.

———, and William H. Kautz. "An Emerging New Discipline!" Applied Psi 1, no.1 (March/April 1982): 1.

Pease, Marshall. "Intuition and the Stock Market." Applied Psi 3, no.3 (fall 1984). 7–9.

Apports

The name given to various objects, such as flowers, jewelry, and even live animals, reportedly materialized in the presence of a medium. During the first hundred years of Spiritualism, the production of apports was one of the most prominent and effective features of Spiritualistic seances. Sometimes apports flew through the air and struck the faces of sitters; sometimes they appeared on the table, or in the laps of those present. A favorite form was the scattering of perfume on the company. In the last half century, however, as standards for observing seances improved, and the number of fake mediums exposed increased, the appearances of apports steadily decreased and today can only be found in the small circles of fake mediums that still exist on the fringes of the Spiritualist community.

Systematic experiments conducted in a purely scientific spirit exposed fraud in numerous instances where ordinary precautions would not have sufficed for its detection. Frequently it was found that the medium had skillfully concealed the apports in the room or about his or her person. Spiritualists have often argued that even though apports were often produced by obviously unscrupulous means, it does not follow that all materializations were performed with fraudulent intent. There are cases where, so far as can be judged, the character of the medium was beyond reproach, as in the case of Hélène Smith. The idea has been advanced that any preparations made beforehand, such as the secreting of flowers, must result from a process of activity of the subliminal consciousness. Spiritualists generally believe that apports are actually conveyed to the séance by spirits, or that they are drawn there by magnetic power. Branches of trees, armfuls of fruit and flowers, money, jewels, and live lobsters are among the more extraordinary apports.

Today, however, it is difficult to find anyone making a serious case for the existence of genuine apports. After a century and a half of observation, there is no single case of apports to which one can point as even a highly probable incident of the materialization of an object as a result of a medium's activity.

Were apports genuine, they would constitute one of the most baffling phenomena of Spiritualism. The objects produced in seances differed in size, were both inanimate and living, and appeared none the worse for their strange journey. The phenomenon was first observed by Dr. G. P. Billot. In Recherches psychologique ou correspondence sur le magnetisme vital entre un Solitaire et M. Deleuze (Paris, 1839) he describes a session on March 5, 1819, with three somnambules and a blind woman. He writes: "Towards the middle of the séance, one of the seeresses exclaimed: 'There is the Dove, it is white as snow, it is flying about the room with something in its beak, it is a piece of paper. Let us pray.' A few moments later she added: 'See, it has let the paper drop at the feet of Madame J.'" Billot saw a paper packet at the spot indicated. He found in it three small pieces of bone glued onto small strips of paper, with the words: "St. Maxime, St. Sabine and Many Martyrs" written beneath the fragments.

With the same blind woman on October 27, 1820, he witnessed flower apports. J. P. F. Deleuze, to whom Billot communicated his experience in 1830, answered that he had just received a visit from a distinguished physician who had had similar experiences. His somnambule, however, never professed to have interviews with spirits. Deleuze suggested that the power of animal magnetism might better explain the phenomena than the intervention of spirits.

In the history of the curious occurrences in the household of Dr. Larkin of Wrentham, Massachusetts, around his servant girl, Mary Jane, about 1844, it is recorded:

"On one occasion, the whole family being assembled round the couch of the magnetized sleeper and every door being shut, a heavy flat-iron, last seen in the kitchen—quite a distance away—was suddenly placed in their midst, and, at the request of Mrs. Larkin, as suddenly disappeared, and was next found in the kitchen, every door of communication having remained closed."

The apport of a white dove into "The Olive Branch of Peace" circle of Boston was attested, in the early years of American Spiritualism, in an account published in the New Era by 11 respectable citizens of Boston. The room was hermetically sealed for 24 hours prior to the promised presentation. In quoting this and similar accounts in her Modern American Spiritualism (1870), Emma Hardinge Britten remarks on the singular docility of apported birds and says: "Numerous other instances can be cited in which spirits have manifested their power of influencing birds with a degree of readiness and intelligence as unaccountable as it is interesting."

Theories of Explanation

Ever since Britten's report of Larkin's experience, the dove has remained a favorite apport object of the invisible operators. The average apport manifestation, however, is less impressive, though, from the viewpoint of experimental research, the appearance of the smallest object in a closed space to which there is no normal access is of immense import. Unfortunately, observations under strict test conditions are all but nonexistent, and psychical research has classified the phenomenon as among the least attested. Besides the lack of observable data, the chief reason is that the phenomenon itself is exceptional and is considered so contrary to scientific observation to date that even those few great minds who admitted the phenomena of materialization as genuine shied away from apports. It also has to be admitted that the production of tame doves (and other items) from thin air is a common trick of the stage magician.

There are two theories that attempted to bring the phenomena of apports within understanding, on the assumption that genuine cases did occur. One is the fourth dimension, and the other, generally favored by Spiritualists, the disintegration and reintegration of the apported objects. The former was first advocated by German psychical researcher Johann Zöllner to explain the phenomenon of interpenetration of matter, which he claimed to observe with Henry Slade. It was accepted by Cesare Lombroso and Camille Flammarion and later endorsed by W. Whateley Carington in Britain and Malcolm Bird in the United States.

Zöllner's theory implies that there is a higher form of space of which we are not normally cognizant. The objects to be apported are lifted into this dimension, brought to the desired spot and then precipitated into our three-dimensional space, much as we can lift out something which is enclosed in a circle and place it outside. For two-dimensional beings, who experience only length and breadth, and live in a plane, this act of ours would constitute an apport phenomenon.

The other theory has been put forward in séance room communications. According to it, the spirits, by an act of willpower, disintegrate the matter to be transported into its molecular elements without altering its form. In this state the object may pass through the interstices of intervening matter and become reintegrated by a second act of willpower. René Sudre believes the medium's mind works upon a molecular scale, so that it can dematerialize and rematerialize objects at ordinary temperatures.

This theory essentially means there is another aggregation of matter. It is proposed that beyond the solid, liquid, and gaseous state is a fourth, fluidic state in which matter becomes invisible and impalpable and possesses, conjointly with an expansion of volume, great molecular malleability. From various observations one would have to suppose the state is one of inertia and that it requires strong thermo-dynamic efforts on the part of the operators to effect the return to the former solid state.

If the disintegration theory is correct, in consonance with the law of the transmutation of energy, a thermic reaction should be expected. Spiritualists have suggested that just such a reaction exists. Stone and metallic apports, especially bigger objects, are often burning or scorching hot on arrival. This sudden increase of heat was noticed by Zöllner in the claimed passage of matter through matter. Other objects were nevertheless found cold. In answer the invisible operators replies that they sometimes prefer to disintegrate a portion of the wood of the door or part of the ceiling to facilitate the entrance of the object in its original state. One would have had to suppose that this is the procedure employed when living things are brought in.

Some spirit operators make no claim for the unobstructed passage of matter through matter. They say a crack in the wall or roof is required for a dematerialized object to pass through to the place where a séance was being held. Julien Ochorowicz received this explanation from Stanislawa Tomczyk. It is very significant that the apport of a key was described by her as something long and whitish. It did not become a key with its peculiar color and shape until it dropped. She also stated in trance that metals became hot because of the friction of the particles in contracting. Paper, leather, and wood are not sensibly heated because they are not so hard and dense. In darkness an apport can be accomplished without dematerialization if the passage is free. In this case the spirit hand holding it would have to be solidified. In light the object had to be dematerialized.

There is one instance on record which suggests the disintegration and reintegration theory. To quote Ernesto Bozzano in Luce e Ombra (August–October, 1927):

"In March, 1904, in a sitting in the house of Cavaliere Peretti, in which the medium was an intimate friend of ours, gifted with remarkable physical mediumship, and with whom apports could be obtained at command, I begged the communicating spirit to bring me a small block of pyrites which was lying on my writing table about two kilometres (over a mile) away. The spirit replied (by the mouth of the entranced medium) that the power was almost exhausted, but that all the same he would make the attempt. Soon after the medium sustained the usual spasmodic twitchings which signified the arrival of an apport, but without hearing the fall of any object on the table, or on the floor. We asked for an explanation from the spirit-operator, who informed us that although he had managed to disintegrate a portion of the object desired, and had brought it into the room, there was not enough power for him to be able to reintegrate it. He added 'Light the light.' We did so, and found, to our great surprise, that the table, the clothes, and hair of the sitters, as well as the furniture and carpet of the room, were covered by the thinnest layer of brilliant impalpable pyrites. When I returned home after the sitting I found the little block of pyrites lying on my writing table from which a large fragment, about one third of the whole piece, was missing, this having been scooped out of the block."

Again, as an instance speaking for the fourth dimensional explanation, it is mentioned by Malcolm Bird that "Walter," the control of Margery (Mina Crandon), cracked a joke at his expense during the Boston investigation on behalf of the Scientific American and promised to get a mate for "Birdie." On November 26, 1923, a live carrier pigeon, showing no resemblance to the pigeons found freely about Boston, appeared in the closed dining room of the house. "Walter," when previously asked where he would deposit the living apport, answered, "I can't say, I have to take a run and leap, and I can't tell where I shall land."

Apports in the Course of Arrival

One might expect that sometimes the circumstances of the arrival of the apport would be noticed. This has indeed happened. A pair of modest earrings, a present from the spirit guide to the Marquise Carlo Centurione Scotto, was seen to arrive in the Millesimo seances as described: "We all saw the trumpet (having a phosphorescent band) rise towards the ceiling and turn upside down so as to place the large end uppermost, then we heard something fall heavily into the trumpet, as though the object had dropped from the ceiling."

The arrival of a jar of ointment in full visibility is recorded in Rev. Charles L. Tweedale's Man's Survival After Death (1909). He writes:

"Sunday, 13th November, 1910. Mother had sustained a cut on the head, and she, my wife, and I were all in the dining room at 9:20 P.M. We were all close together, mother seated in a chair, self and wife standing. No one else was in the room. My wife was in the act of parting mother's hair with her fingers to examine the cut and I was looking on. At that instant I happened to raise my eyes and I saw something issue from a point close to the ceiling in the corner of the room over the window, and distant from my wife (who had her back to it) three and a quarter yards, and four and a quarter yards from myself, facing it. It shot across the room close to the ceiling and struck the wall over the piano, upon which it then fell, making the strings vibrate, and so on to the floor on which it rolled. I ran and picked it up, and found, to my astonishment, that it was a jar of ointment which mother used specially for cuts and bruises, and which she kept locked up in her wardrobe. The intention was evident, the ointment was for the wound. I saw it come apparently through the wall, near the ceiling, and this with no one within three and a quarter yards of the place. The room is over nine feet high and was brilliantly lighted by a 100 candle-power lamp, and the door and window were shut, the latter fastened, and incapable of being opened from the outside."

Tweedale recorded several other similar observations.

"We were talking about the mysterious disappearance of the keys. Suddenly I saw something bright coming swiftly through the air from the direction of the corner opposite the door and high up towards the ceiling, and so from that part of the room where there is neither door, nor window, nor any opening in the wall. The bright thing rushed through the air and struck my wife on the coil of hair at the back of her head. It came with such a force that it bounced from her head to a distance of nearly three and a half yards from where she stood. My wife uttered a loud cry of alarm, due to the shock and surprise, but owing to the thick mass of hair intervening, she was not hurt in the least. I instantly ran and picked the object up, when, to our amazement, we found it was the bunch of keys missed from my mother's pocket since noon, and of which we had been talking when they were thus projected into the room.

"On another occasion (17th January 1911) a shower of articles came apparently through the ceiling and fell upon the tea-table, in the presence of six witnesses, and in good light. On 11th November 1913, a stick three feet ten inches long came slowly through the solid plaster ceiling in the presence of my daughter Marjorie and the servant in full lamplight, and fell on the table, leaving no trace of its passage; and again, on 29th January 1911, a solid article came apparently through the ceiling in our bedroom, in presence of myself and wife, in broad daylight and slowly descended on to the pillow. All these objects proved to be objective and real when we came to pick them up."

Writing of an earlier occurrence, Tweedale noted,

"At 2 p.m. the door once more opened, and from the top of the door there shot a long stream of white cloudy stuff. This was projected towards mother, who was lying in bed, the distance from the door to her pillow being four and a quarter yards. This extraordinary phenomenon looked like a tube of cloudy material and floated in the air. As it drew near to mother's pillow it slowed down, and when close to her she shrank away from it. At this moment something dropped from the end of the tube, which was close to her, on to the pillow and the tube of cloudy material then floated back to the top of the door and vanished. Thinking that the article which had dropped from it was a ball of wool, mother picked it up, and found to her amazement that it was an egg. She instantly sprang to the door, but found no one upstairs."

Henry Sausse in his book Des Preuves? En Voila observed many instances of his medium forming her hand into a cup, in trance and in full light, in the cavity of which a small cloud was seen to form, transforming itself instantly into a small spray of roses, with flowers, buds and leaves complete.

The gradual progress of an apported object was recorded by Stainton Moses in his account of August 28, 1872.

"In the dining room there was a little bell. We heard it commence to ring, and could trace it by its sound as it approached the door which separated us from it. What was our astonishment when we found that, in spite of the closed door, the sound drew nearer to us. It was evidently within the room in which we sat, for the bell was carried round the room, ringing loudly the whole time. After completing the circuit of the room, it was brought down, passed under the table, coming up close to my elbow. It was finally placed upon the table."

One must suppose that in this case a hole must have been made through the door to open a free passage to the bell. Naturally, the disintegration could not have occurred in a manner similar to atomic disintegration; otherwise we would have to ask as did W. W. Smith a whole series of questions: what becomes of the enormous quantity of energy that must be liberated; how is it prevented from being dissipated; and how is it collected again and recondensed into matter. Spiritualists suggested one way out, to suppose that in some mysterious manner the liberated energy was stored in a reservoir, so to speak, which is not situated in ordinary space at all. Such a conclusion leads back to Zöllner's fourth dimensional theory.

Mediums offered no other explanation of apports, but did complain of the difficulties they had to overcome. "I wanted to bring you a photograph in its frame with the glass but I cannot manage it. I will bring it to you without the glass," opined "Cristo d'Angelo" in the séance of July 8, 1928, at Millesimo. On another occasion a large ivy plant, about one meter fifty centimeters in height, was apported in three parts. First came the earth, then the plant with clods sticking to it, and finally the pot. The operators seemingly could not have managed the three things at once. That preparation in advance is often necessary seems to be suggested by similar experiences in Elizabeth d'Esperance's mediumship.

The Wonders of Flower, Fruit and Living Apports

The flower apports of "Yolande," d'Esperance's control, were generally very impressive. On her instructions white sand and plenty of water were always held in readiness in the cabinet. On August 4, 1880, in the presence of William Oxley of Manchester, she directed a Mr. Reimers to pour sand into a water carafe, which he did until it was about half full. Then he was instructed to pour in water. "Yolande" took it, placed it on the floor, covering it lightly with the drapery she took from her shoulders. The circle was directed to sing. While singing they observed the drapery to be rising from the rim of the carafe. "Yolande" several times came out of the cabinet to examine the thing growing under the drapery. Finally she raised the drapery altogether and disclosed a perfect plant, its roots firmly grown and packed in the sand. She presented it to Oxley. Through raps, instructions were given not to discuss the matter but sing something and be quiet. They obeyed. More raps came and told them to examine the plant again. To their great surprise they observed a large circular head of bloom, forming a flower fully five inches in diameter, that had opened while the plant stood on the floor at Oxley's feet. The plant was 22 inches in height, with a thick woody stem that filled the neck of the water carafe. It had 29 leaves, each smooth and glossy. It was impossible to remove the plant from the water bottle, the neck being too small to allow the roots to pass; indeed the comparatively slender stem entirely filled the orifice. The plant was a native of India, an "Ixora Crocata." It had some years of growth. "We could see where other leaves had grown and fallen off, and wound-marks which seemed to have healed and grown over long ago. But there was every evidence to show that the plant had grown in the sand in the bottle as the roots were naturally wound around the inner surface of the glass, all the fibres perfect and unbroken as though they had germinated on the spot and had apparently never been disturbed." The plant was photographed. It lived for three months under the care of Mr. Oxley's gardener and then shrivelled up.

It was a favorite feat of "Yolande" to put a glass of water into the hand of one of her particular friends and tell him to watch it. She would then hold her slender tapered fingers over the glass and while her eyes were closely scrutinizing the water within it a flower would form itself upon it and fill the glass.

Patterns of ferns were often handed to her. She always matched them with others to please the sitters. Roses were frequently produced in the water pitcher she carried on her shoulder. If a special color was required it was obtained. D'Esperance once asked for a black rose. "Yolande" dipped her fingers into the pitcher and instantly brought out a dark object, dripping with moisture. It was a rose of distinctly blue-black color the like of which neither d'Esperance nor any of those assembled had seen.

On June 28, 1890, an overpowering scent was followed by the appearance in a water carafe, which was previously prepared with sand and water, of a golden lily, a foot and a half taller than d'Esperance. From root to point it measured seven feet. It bore eleven large blossoms, and the flowers were perfect, five fully blown. After it was photographed by one Professor Boutleroff, "Yolande" tried to take it back. Her efforts of dematerialization were unsuccessful. "Yolande" was in despair as—according to a message from "Walter," another control—she had gotten the plant on condition of returning it. "Walter" gave instructions to keep the plant in darkness until she could come again and take it. On July 5 the plant vanished as mysteriously as it came. At 9:23 P.M. it stood in the midst of the company, and at 9:30 P.M. it was gone. Not a vestige remained except the photographs and a couple of flowers, which had fallen off. The scent seemed for a moment to fill the room almost overpoweringly, and then it was gone.

Addressing inquiries to "Walter" at the time of the lily's appearance, the sitters were told that the plant was in the room before the sitters came in and "was ready for being put together" at least an hour before they saw it. Alexander N. Aksakof also witnessed this apport. On the night of its disappearance a piece of grey cloth was found on its stem. The stem passed through a hole in the center of the cloth. The cloth could not be removed. When, however, "Yolande" instructed Aksakof to remove it, it came off, without a rent, and still showing the round hole through which the stem had passed. She said that she got the piece of cloth from the same country as the flower. On examination the piece of cloth was found to be a scrap of mummy cloth, still aromatic with the perfumes used for embalming. It contained 2,584 meshes to the square inch.

It speaks for the previous preparation of apports that the British medium Kathleen Barkel saw in the room of the British College of Psychic Science in which Heinrich Melzer was to hold an apport séance in 1926, the shadow of a bunch of violets near the electric light bulb. At the séance that evening a quantity of violets did, indeed, appear. However, as Melzer was once detected in fraud, a more practiced explanation would be that the flowers had indeed been prepared and hidden near the light bulb, throwing a shadow.

Another early medium, famous for her flower and fruit apports, was Agnes Guppy-Volckman. In her seances the operators honored the requests of the sitters. Alfred Russel Wallace wrote that a friend of his asked for a sunflower, and one six feet high fell upon the table, having a large mass of earth around its roots. Georgina Houghton testified before the committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869 of a sitting with Guppy-Volckman with 18 ladies and a gentleman present. Everybody could wish for a fruit. The list of the various things brought was a banana, two oranges, a bunch of white grapes, a bunch of black grapes, a cluster of filberts, three walnuts, about a dozen damsons, a slice of candied pineapple, three figs, two apples, an onion, a peach, some almonds, four very large grapes, three dates, a potato, two large pears, a pomegranate, two crystallized greengages, a pile of dried currants, a lemon, and a large bunch of raisins. They were brought in the order they had been wished for.

Signor G. Damiani made the curious observation of Guppy-Volckman's apports before the Dialectical Committee that the ends of the stems of the flowers presented a blackened and burnt appearance. When the reason was asked, the invisible intelligences answered that electricity was the potent "nipper" employed.

In her séance before the Florence Spiritual Society, "a sudden noise was heard as if the chandelier had fallen down; a light was struck, and a thick block of ice, of about a square foot in size, was found upon the table." Henry Wadsworth Longfellow had a sitting with her at Naples. He held both her hands, and while he did so several orange boughs were brought. Longfellow considered this manifestation to be one of the most conclusive he had ever witnessed.

Houghton, in her Evenings at Home in Spiritual Séance (1881), described a farewell séance held by Samuel Guppy and his mediumistic wife before their departure from England.

"By and by Mrs. Guppy exclaimed that there were creeping creatures about, and begged to be allowed to light the candle. Upon her request being granted there was a quantity of butterflies travelling about among us and the flowers, some of which were caught and put away in a box; altogether we reckoned that there were about forty of them."

Guppy-Volckman also obtained apports in a lighted room. A tray was placed on her knee, it being touched by the sitter's knee. A large shawl pinned to their necks covered the tray. The objects were then deposited on the tray. It is open to speculation whether the darkness under the tray was necessary for the rematerialization of the object or whether it only served the purpose of excluding the human gaze. Apports were peculiar in this respect. They did not appear before the eye but waited until attention was for a moment diverted, additional reason to suppose their production the result of trickery.

This curious fact was often noticed in the seances of Charles Bailey, the well-known Australian apport medium. From a description in Light (November 26, 1910), it was noted that "the apports included an Indian blanket containing a human scalp and tomahawk, a block of lead said to be found in Roman strata at Rome and bearing the name of Augustus, a quantity of gravel alleged to have come from Central America and quite unlike anything seen in Australia, two perfect clay tablets covered with cuneiform inscriptions and several thousands of years old, said to have been brought direct from the mounds at Babylon, and finally, a bird's nest containing several eggs and the mother bird undoubtedly alive." He was famous for living apports, jungle sparrows, crabs, turtles. Once an 18-inch-long shark, at another time a 30-inch snake appeared mysteriously in the séance room. The apport of jungle sparrows passed the test of a committee of investigation in Milan. Six years later, however, Bailey got into trouble in Grenoble. The investigators claimed that he smuggled in the birds in his intestinal opening, and they found a local dealer who identified Bailey as the man to whom he sold them. Discredit was also attached to his archaeological objects when the British Museum found the clay tablets were fake.

Where do apports come from? If one eliminated any consideration of fraud, it would be a difficult question. Flowers were sometimes traced to nearby gardens. During his visit to the British College of Psychic Science in 1926, Heinrich Melzer suddenly fell into a semitrance condition out of doors and in his hands appeared sprays of flowers similar to those in a coster's barow on the other side of the street. Once in a séance with Mary Baker Thayer, Henry Steel Olcott received, on a mental request, the leaf of a rare plant which he marked in a garden. The question of source is pertinent as in some cases the apport of precious stones was also recorded. Semiprecious stones of little value often appeared in Bailey's seances. The bringing of pearls as apports is recorded in Georgina Houghton's book. They came in veritable showers in the seances of Stainton Moses. They may not have had any value, but that must have been different with his ruby, sapphire, and emerald apports. Small as they were, great commercial value must have been attached to them. Once he woke up from his sleep and saw a luminous hand near the ceiling, under it a little ball of fire as big as a pea. As he looked, the fingers were unclasped, the hand opened and the little ball of fire fell on his beard. It was a small opalescent stone about the size of a large pea, called sapphirium. Two similar stones were later delivered during a séance, the arrival being preceded by a fit of violent convulsion.

Apports, if real, would therefore raise a moral question. Who do they belong to? On being asked an opinion of fruit and flower apports, "John Watts," Mrs. Thomas Everitt's control, said in a séance on February 28, 1868, recorded in Catherine Berry's Experiences in Spiritualism (1876), "I do not approve of bringing them, for they are generally stolen."

In discussing apports, Spiritualists surmised that space appears to be uniformly accessible to the spirit operators. Dr. L. Th. Chazarain, in his pamphlet Scientific Proofs of the Survival of the Soul told the story of the placing of two chaplets in the coffin of a child, in the presence of a medium very easily hypnotizable, and of their being returned two days after the burial. He made special marks on the chaplets, did not lose sight of them until the coffin was screwed down, and followed it to the church and to the cemetery. Two days later the mother of the child and Mme. D. suddenly saw something white detach itself from the ceiling and descend slowly, to the ground, in a spiral course. They immediately picked up the little white mass. It was the first chaplet, surrounded with a little wadding which smelled of the corpse, and still having the metallic button (the secret mark) attached. The child's body had been wrapped in wadding. Two days later the second chaplet was returned in the same manner.

Distance, however, appears to be of some consequence. The precipitation of the object was often heralded by a spasmodic seizure of the medium. Sometimes she cried out in agony. Fabian Rossi, in a séance on May 20, 1929, in Genoa, Italy, in which two small stones were apported, complained of great pains after she regained consciousness and said that she had been crushed between two enormous stones. At the time of this statement she did not know the nature of the apported objects. In the case of Maria Silbert, a light effect, similar to lightning, accompanied the delivery of the object. The bigger it was the greater the nervous tension. The medium always appeared to suffer more keenly if a greater distance was involved. The objects usually fell with a heavy thud. Breakage, it was noted, seldom occurred.

An alarm clock that was seen to fall at least 16 feet down the well of the stairs on to the flagstones in the hall of Tweedale's house was found to be undamaged and still going. The precipitation is usually effected from the direction of the ceiling. Catherine Berry writes in her Experiences in Spiritualism: "I saw coming from the ceiling, at the extreme end of the room, the branch of a tree about three feet in length. At the end was a large branch of white blossoms. I should perhaps say it appeared, in descending, like a flash of lightning."

Objects of unusual dimension and variety were apported at the Millesimo Castle seances with Marquise Centurione Scotto and Fabian Rossi. They were too large to hide about anybody's person, a halberd over six feet long, a plant in its pot over four feet high, large pistols, and swords and dolls of great size. The room was nearly bare of furniture and examined at the beginning of every sitting by Ernesto Bozzano. The story of one of these apport cases is notable. "Cristo d'Angelo," the control, told La Marquise Luisa that a very near relative of hers was destined to die. On her entreaty to tell who it was, "Cristo d'Angelo" replied, "I will bring you his portrait." Soon after the framed photograph of the doomed relative fell at La Marquise Luisa's feet. The last news of the relative had been excellent. Two days later he relapsed, and afterward died as predicted.

It was also observed in the Millesimo seances that the objects that were apported from a neighboring room had sometimes vanished days earlier (suggesting that they had been stolen at an opportune moment). Often they were returned to the room from which they were taken. This return, at least in one case, was only partially successful. A squire appeared and executed a "dance of the lance" in the July 8, 1928, séance in total darkness. Two mailed fists squeezed the hands of some of the sitters. The lance, at the end of the séance, was found in the room, but the mittens of mail were discovered in a distant room beneath the suit of mail, from the sleeves of which they were detached. The detachment of the mittens suggests that the rest of the armor was not apported.

One experiment is on record to test the theory that heavy apports brought about no variation in the weight of the medium. It was done in W. H. Terry's house in Melbourne in 1876 with Mrs. Paton, a medium who specialized in apporting her personal property. Sometimes it was a cup of tea she had forgotten to drink before leaving home, once a burning hot flat iron, at another time a glass of wine and a plate of eggs. Her phenomena were mostly recorded between 1872 and 1878.

There could hardly be anything to surpass in wonder the accounts of the apports said to be experienced by General "Lorrison" (Major-General A. W. Drayson) at Portsmouth. The medium was a Mrs. Maggs, the wife of a local editor and a writer herself. In a strictly private circle, apports arrived by the thousand. The household was supplied with eggs straight from Brooklyn from a spirit circle and return gifts were sent through similar means to countries as distant as Spain, Australia, India, and China. It is claimed that once a letter was apported, was read, a corner torn off for identification and then reapported. Ten days later it arrived, addressed to General Drayson. The torn-off piece fitted in and the contents were identical.

In experiments with Lajos Pap at the Budapest Metapsychical Museum, Chengery Pap often obtained living insects, frogs, and butterflies. Often they were completely dazed and motionless on arrival but recovered completely after a few minutes. Apports have also frequently been noticed in poltergeist cases. In stone throwing the stones may arrive apparently through the window without breaking the glass. In the case reported in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 12), stones seemed to pass through the roof of a Mr. Grottendieck's hut in the jungle of Sumatra without making a hole. They were so hot that Grottendieck at first believed them to be meteorites.

Apport Mediums Observed

That the actions of apport mediums require careful attention before the séance is well illustrated. Such was the case of a patient of Pierre Janet, a 26-year-old woman called Meb, who had visions of Saint Philomena and claimed to receive apports from her. Philomena was later removed from the Roman Catholic Church's list of saints as a nonexistent person. The apports were pebbles, feathers, flowers, and small pieces of cheap jewelry found lying about on the stairs or in other unlikely spots, or discovered in the patient's bedroom in the morning. On one occasion she found several small objects arranged in the shape of a cross, another time a pair of wings was stretched out on the eiderdown quilt. On one occasion feathers floated down from the ceiling upon the family assembled at their evening meal. In hypnotic sleep, the patient confessed the apports were arranged by herself in a state of somnambulism, that she put a stool on the table, mounted it and fastened small feathers with paste to the ceiling so that the heat of the lamp might bring them fluttering down. In her waking state she had no knowledge of these manipulations. It should be added that Meb was a hysteric.

A number of psychic researchers came to believe in apports. A comprehensive monograph on apports was published by Ernesto Bozzano in Luce e Ombra (1930), and subsequently in book form. It deals specifically with apports requested by experimenters, which reduces the possibility of a secret introduction. Of Eusapia Palladino's apports, Enrico Morselli said, "This phenomenon was repeated two or three times during our sittings, but I frankly confess I was not convinced by it, which does not imply that under better observation it might not also be real in the case of Paladino, as it seems to have been through the agency of other mediums."

Striking experiments were carried out at the British College of Psychic Science in 1929 with Thomas Lynn. He was searched, stripped, and put in a bag. Many small objects, a cheap pearl necklace, a small reel of cotton, a button, a shell and a screw nail were apported and photographed at the moment of their arrival. During the sitting the medium lost 10–12 ounces in weight. The objects appeared to grow out of the body of the medium. The same phenomenon was reported upon by Karl Blacker, of Riga University, with the Medium B. X. (Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie, June 1933).

One of the more renowned twentieth-century psychics who produced apports was Roberto Campagni in Italy. The Genoanese physicist Alfredo Ferraro stated that he had seen 30 apports materialized by Campagni and had established beyond doubt that no trickery was involved. An interesting aspect is that the apports were often preceded by a blue light emanating from the medium's hands.

In spite of these passing recommendations, by the mid-twentieth century, it became obvious that apports were the product of mediumistic fraud, and consideration of them dropped completely from the literature of psychical research and slowly moved to the edge of Spiritualist claims.

Sources:

D'Esperance, Elizabeth. Shadow Land or Light from the Outer Side. London: George Redway, n.d.

Hack, Gwendolyn K. Modern Psychic Mysteries: Millesimo Castle, Italy. London: Rider, [1929].

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science and Philosophy Collated and Discussed. London, 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research: Being a Treatise on Metaphysics. New York: Macmillan, 1923.

Zöllner, J. C. F. Transcendental Physics. London, 1880. Reprint, Boston, Mass.: Colby and Rich, 1881.

APRO See Aerial Phenomena Research Organization

APRO Bulletin

Publication of the Aerial Phenomena Research Organization, a long-established body sponsoring conferences on UFOs. The Bulletin began a decline in the 1970s due to loss of support by APRO and was discontinued in the 1980s.

Aquarian Age

An age of universal brotherhood and enlightenment that many believe humanity is presently entering. It is often identified with the New Age. While astrologers have used it as a technical term for many years, it was popularized by the Broadway musical Hair with the song "This Is the Dawning of the Age of Aquarius." Astrologers believe that the Earth enters a new zodiacal age every 2,160 years, a figure calculated by the changing position of the Sun at the spring equinox each year. Among astrologers and occultists, there is no consensus on the date for the beginning of the Age of Aquarius. According to some calculations, the Aquarian Age began as early as the seventeenth century, while others place it as late as the twenty-first century.

The Aquarian Conspiracy

Title of a 1980 book by Marilyn Ferguson. The title became a catchword to describe a new consciousness revolution involving a leaderless network of many enlightened individuals to bring about radical change in modern culture, based on a greatly enlarged concept of human potential. The book is subtitled Personal and Social Transformation in the 1980s, and in her introduction, Ferguson explains her reasons for the choice of the term "conspiracy," which she uses in a positive sense.

In 1975 she founded a twice-monthly newsletter, Brain/Mind Bulletin, concerned with research and theory in the fields of learning, health, psychiatry, psychology, states of consciousness, meditation, and related subjects. The newsletter became a focus for other individuals exploring the same territories of experience, and Ferguson began to travel the U.S. to meet such individuals, attend conferences, and deliver lectures. She became aware of a transformative movement involving social change stemming from the personal transformation of individuals in all walks of society, which she discussed in Brain/Mind Bulletin (January 1976) (now known as New Sense)in her editorial, "The Movement that Has No Name." Ferguson claimed that the conspiracy had infected "medicine, education, social science, hard science, even government with its implications. It is characterized by fluid organizations reluctant to create hierarchical structures, averse to dogma. It operates on the principle that change can only be facilitated, not decreed. It is short on manifestos. It seems to speak to something very old. And perhaps, by integrating magic and science, art and technology, it will succeed where all the king's horses and all the king's men failed."

When writing her book about this new movement, Ferguson felt that the subtle links and mutual recognition among enlightened individuals implied something of an undeclared collusion. She was initially reluctant to use the term "conspiracy" because of its negative connotations until she saw a book of spiritual exercises in which Greek novelist Nikos Kazantzakis said that he wished to signal his comrades "like conspirators" that they might unite for the sake of the earth. The next day she read a report in the Los Angeles Times about a speech by Pierre Trudeau, in which he quoted a passage from French Jesuit priest Pierre Teilhard de Chardin urging a "conspiracy of love." As Ferguson points out, the literal meaning of the word "conspiracy" is "to breathe together." Even before her book was published, the use of this term produced friendly correspondence from individuals who signed themselves "co-conspirators."

In the Aquarian Age ferment of the 1960s, there was a widespread emphasis on the more sensational aspects of the occult, but as this has subsided, there are signs of a more integrated and mature approach to personal transformation, loosely based on enhanced consciousness on the one hand and holistic approaches to physical health on the other. The term Aquarian Conspiracy has been widely quoted to characterize this widespread transformation.

Sources:

Ferguson, Marilyn. The Aquarian Conspiracy: Personal and Social Transformation in Our Time. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher/Houghton Mifflin, 1987.

Aquarian Educational Group

The Aquarian Educational Group is a small group built around the teaching activity of the Rev. Torkom Saraydarian (1917–1997). Saraydarian was born in Asia Minor of Armenian heritage. He had a diverse religious upbringing and began to search for spiritual wisdom as a youth in the Christian and Islamic mystical groups available in his homeland. He was also an accomplished musician. After moving to the United States and gaining some proficiency in English, in the 1960s he began teaching informally in his home in Van Nuys, California, but soon shifted to Agoura, California, where group meetings were held until the early 1990s when the move was made to Sedona, Arizona. In 1987, Gita Saraydarian, Torkom's daughter, founded T.S.G. Publishing to keep her father's many writings (including some 170 books) in print.

Saraydarian attempted to create and teach a synthesis of the major teachings found in all true religions, the ancient wisdom, and found particular assistance in that endeavor in the theosophical writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, Alice A. Bailey, and Helena Roerich. His pronouncement of the ancient wisdom was summarized in a series of statements that affirmed the existence of One Almighty Power that is the cause of all that is manifest. In each human being, indeed in every living form, there is a spark of the Divine. Each person has the potential to unfold and radiate Beauty, Goodness, Truth, and Joy. Each person also has the responsibility to live a life of honesty, nobility, simplicity, justice, and generosity.

The group is headed by a nine-person board of trustees. Saraydarian was president of the board during his life and has been succeeded by his daughter, who is also the principal teacher at the Torkom Saraydarian Center for Esoteric Learning in Arizona. The keynote of her teaching is that while we have a tremendous capacity for greatness, humans tend to chain themselves to a lesser mediocre life characterized by frozen ethnic, national, social, family, and personal mind sets.

The group's publishing affiliate has a website at http://www.tsg-publishing.com. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 7068, Cave Creek, AZ 85327.

Sources:

Saraydarian, Torkom. A Commentary on Psychic Energy. West Hills, Calif.: T.S.G. Enterprises, 1989.

———. The Flame of Beauty, Culture, Love, Joy. Agoura, Calif.: Aquarian Educational Group, 1980.

———. The Symphony of the Zodiac. Agoura, Calif.: Aquarian Educational Group, 1980.

Aquarian Foundation

The Aquarian Foundation was a Spiritualist church built around the mediumship of its founder Rev. Keith Milton Rhinehart. It was founded in 1955 and existed for several decades as a single congregation in Seattle. Rhinehart articulated an eclectic occult perspective that combined elements of Theosophy and Eastern religion with more traditional Spiritualism. Rhinehart also claimed contact with the ascended masters identified with the Theosophical Society. Through the 1960s Rhinehart gained some fame as a "materialization" medium. In the 1970s his ideas began to spread across the United States and into Canada. Rhinehart claimed to possess the stigmata, the extraordinary appearance of the wounds of Christ, which appeared on his body and were seen by many.

The work of the Aquarian Foundation centered upon contact with the ascended masters, who constituted the Great Brotherhood of Cosmic Light (termed by some the Great White Brotherhood), the spiritual hierarchy that mediates divine energies to humanity. Many of the sessions during which Rhinehart channeled messages from the masters have been recorded, transcribed, printed, and were distributed to the foundations's various centers.

The brotherhood affirmed a belief in karma and reincarnation, the evolution of the soul, the law of cause and effect, and the eventual attainment of personal mastery. Among those contacted by Rhinehart were Saint Germain, Master Morya, Sanat Kumara, and Djual Khul (all prominent figures in Theosophy and the I Am Movement). Also included among the masters were the Angel Moroni (the angel who gave the Book of Mormon to Joseph Smith Jr.), Mahatma Ghandi, and flying saucer entities Clarion and Ashtar. The foundation's last known address was 315 15th Ave. E., Seattle, WA 98112.

Sources:

Rhinehart, Keith Milton. Soul Mates and Twin Rays. Seattle, Wash.: Aquarian Foundation, 1972.

Aquarian Tabernacle Church

Founded in 1979, the Aquarian Tabernacle originated as a small group of Pagans in greater Seattle, Washington. It was incorporated four years later and has since grown into an international body with affiliated groups across the United States and in Canada and Australia. Founder Pete Pathfinder and his wife Wende (nee Graebex) serve as the archpriest and archpriestess for the church. The Aquarian Tabernacle Church teaches what can be thought of as a consensus modern Pagan perspective. Deity is viewed as both transcendent and immanent and is most likely to manifest as female and male, and in a multiplicity of forms (i.e., the goddesses and gods). Members share a deep love of nature, believe that life should be joyous, pleasurable, and loving, and refrain from harming others. The Pagan path is seen as leading to growth, evolution, and balance.

The church maintains a retreat house in the Cascade mountains and a nearby Moonstone Circle constructed by menhirs where some of the annual major festivals (sabbats) are held for those members who reside in the Northwest. Like most Pagans, the church follows a cycle of worship including eight major gatherings evenly spaced through the year and anchored in the solstices and equinoxes, and lesser biweekly gatherings (called esbats) at the new and full moon.

The church has been in the forefront of claiming a place for contemporary Paganism in the larger religious community. The church joined the Interfaith Council of Washington State, and Pathfinder served two terms as its president. Pathfinder also serves as a member of the Religious Advisory Commission of the Department of Corrections in Washington. The church gained some unwanted national attention in the 1990s when one of its congregations in Melbourne, Florida, became the target of some city residents angered by the idea of having a functioning Witchcraft group in their midst.

The church has also been in the forefront of calls for more educated Pagan priesthood and to that end has founded the Patricia Holmes Woolston Theological Seminary, a small school that operates out of the church's headquarters in Index, Washington. The church's periodical Panegyria includes both articles on Paganism and news of the church. Information may also be found at the church's website, http://www.aquatabch.org/, or that of one of its prominent congregations, http://www.ironoak.org/. The church may be contacted at P.O. Box 409, Index, WA 98256.

Sources:

Aquarian Tabernacle Church. http://www.aquatabch.org/. November 1, 1999.

Iron Oak Congregation. http://www.ironoak.org/. November 1, 1999.

Aquarius Rising (Magazine)

Quarterly publication of the Astrology Center of the Northwest. Last known address: 522 Northeast 165th St., Seattle, WA 98155.

Aquino, Michael A. (1946–)

Michael A. Aquino, U.S. Army officer and founder of the Temple of Set, is a graduate of the University of California, Santa Barbara (B.A., 1968; Ph.D., 1980). In 1968 he joined the army as a specialist in psychological warfare. The next year he joined the Church of Satan. His career in the church was put on hold while he served a tour of duty in Vietnam, but shortly after his return to the United States in 1971, he was ordained as a Satanic priest and organized a group (termed a grotto) that met at his home.

Aquino rose to a position of prominence in the Church of Satan, but became dissatisfied with the leadership of church founder Anton LaVey. He opposed LaVey's arbitrary leadership and atheistic approach to religion. LaVey actually denied the existence of Satan. In 1972 Aquino resigned and was joined in his revolt by Lilith Sinclair, another prominent leader on the East Coast. In 1975 he sought a new mandate to operate by invoking the devil. Satan responded by appearing as Set, the ancient Egyptian deity, and gave Aquino a document, The Book of Coming Forth by Night. He authorized Aquino to found the Temple of Set to supersede the Church of Satan. Aquino created a new religious society built around the worship of Set, of whom Satan is one derivation.

During the 1980s Aquino gained some degree of fame when the media became aware that an army officer led a Satanic group. The temple became the subject of criticism, and Aquino was charged with fabricated tales of Satanic child abuse. Aquino, an officer who has an exemplary record, was investigated and found innocent of any wrongdoing. The molestations he was accused of perpetrating were traced to a fellow officer. Meanwhile, he continues his professional career and his leadership in the temple.

Sources:

Aquino, Michael A. The Church of Satan. N.p.: The Author, 1989.

Lyons, Arthur. Satan Wants You. New York: Mysterious Press, 1988.

Arabs

The heyday of occultism, especially astrology and alchemy, occurred among the Arab race at the time when the Moors established their empire in the Spanish peninsula. In the eighth century an Arabian mystic revived the dreams and speculations of the alchemists and discovered some important secrets. Geber, who flourished about 720–750, is reputed to have written upwards of five hundred works on the Philosophers' Stone and the elixir of life. His researches in these occult subjects proved fruitless, but though the secrets of immortal life and boundless wealth eluded him, he discovered silver nitrate, corrosive sublimate, red oxide of mercury, and nitric acid, for he was a brilliant chemist.

His tenets included a belief that a preparation of gold would heal all diseases in animals and plants, as well as in human beings; that the metals were affected with maladies, except the pure, supreme, and precious gold; and that the Philosophers' Stone had often been discovered, but its fortunate discoverers would not reveal the secret to blind, incredulous, and unworthy man.

Geber's Summa Perfectionis, a manual for the alchemical student, has been frequently translated. One English version, of which there is a copy in the library of the British Museum, London, was published by an English enthusiast, Richard Russell, at "the Star, in New Market, in Wapping, near the Dock," in 1686. Geber's true name was Abou Moussah Djafar, to which was added Al Sofi, or "The Wise," and he was a native of Houran in Mesopotamia. He was followed by Avicenna, Averroes, and others equally gifted and fortunate.

According to Geber and his successors, the metals were not only compound creatures, but they were also all composed of the same two substances. By the nineteenth century, European chemists like William Prout and Humphry Davy were propounding similar ideas. "The improvements," stated Davy, "taking place in the methods of examining bodies, are constantly changing the opinions of chemists with respect to their nature, and there is no reason to suppose that any real indestructible principle has yet been discovered. Matter may ultimately be found to be the same in essence, differing only in the arrangement of its particles; or two or three simple substances may produce all the varieties of compound bodies." The ancient ideas, of Demetrius the Greek physicist and of Geber the Arabian polypharmist are still hovering about the horizon of chemistry. In the twentieth century, successful nuclear fission has validated the transmutation of metals.

The Arabians also taught that the metals are composed of mercury and sulphur in different proportions. They toiled away at making many medicines out of the various mixtures and reactions from the few available chemicals. They believed in transmutation, but they did not strive to effect it. It belonged to their creed rather than to their practice. They were hard-working scientific artisans with their pestles and mortars, their crucibles and furnaces, their alembics and aludels, their vessels for infusion, for decoration, for cohobation, sublimation, fixation, lixiviation, filtration, and coagulation. They believed in transmutation, in the first matter, and in the correspondence of the metals with the planets, to say nothing of potable gold. It is not known where the ancient Arabians derived the sublimer articles of their scientific faith. Perhaps they were the conjectures of their ancestors according to the faith. Perhaps they had them from the Fatimites of Northern Africa, among whose local predecessors it has been seen that it is just possible the doctrine of the four elements and their mutual convertibility may have arisen. Perhaps they drew them from Greece, modifying and adapting them to their own specific forms of matter, mercury, sulphur, and arsenic.

Arabian Astrology

Astrology was also employed by the oracles of Spain. Al-Battani was celebrated for his astronomical science, as were many others; and in geometry, arithmetic, algebraical calculations, and the theory of music, the list of Asiatic and Spanish practitioners is long, but only known by their lives and principal writings. The works of Ptolemy also exercised the ingenuity of the Arabians. But judicial astrology, or the art of foretelling future events from the position and influences of the stars, was a favorite pursuit; and many of their philosophers dedicated all their labors to this futile but lucrative inquiry. They often spoke highly of the iatro-mathematical discipline, which could control the disorders to which man was subject and regulate the events of life.

The tenets of Islam, which inculcate an unreserved submission to the overruling destinies of heaven, are evidently adverse to the lessons of astrology; but this by no means hindered the practitioners of old Spain and Arabia from attaining a high standard of perfection in the art, which they perhaps first learned from the peoples of Chaldea, the past masters of the ancient world in astronomical science, in divination, and the secrets of prophecy. But in Arab Spain, where the tenets of Islam were perhaps more lightly esteemed than in their original home, magic unquestionably reached a higher if not more thoughtful standard.

From the Greeks, still in search of science, the Arabs turned their attention to the books of the sages who are esteemed the primitive instructors of mankind, among whom Hermes was deemed the first. They mention the works written by him, or rather by them, as they suppose, like other authors, that there were three of the name. To one the imposing appellation of "Trismegistus" has been given, and the Arabians, presumably from some ancient records, minutely described his character and person. Illustrating their astrological discipline, they also published some writings ascribed to the Persian Zoroaster.

Sources:

Hutin, Serge. A History of Alchemy. New York: Walker, 1963. Reprint, New York: Tower Books, n.d.

Jabir ibn Hayyan. The Works of Geber. London: Printed for William Cooper, 1686.

Muhammad ibn Umail al-Tamini. Three Arabic Treatises on Alchemy. Calcutta: Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1933.

Aradia

The book Aradia: Gospel of the Witches by Charles G. Leland (1899 and often reprinted) presented traditional witchcraft teachings from Italy, which Leland claimed he obtained from a Florentine fortune-teller and hereditary witch in the late nineteenth century. This book is clearly one of the inspirations of the modern witchcraft revival launched by Gerald B. Gardner, and it has furnished some materials for the contemporary witches' Book of Shadows, the ritual book used by modern witch covens.

Sources:

Leland, Charles Godfrey. Aradia: Gospel of the Witches. 1899. Reprint, New York: Hero Press, 1971.

Arael

One of the spirits that the ancient rabbis of the Talmud made princes and governors over the people of the birds.

Arariel

According to the ancient rabbis of the Talmud, Arariel is an angel who takes charge of the waters of the Earth. Fishermen invoked him so that they might catch large fish.

Ararita

According to occultist Éliphas Lévi, Ararita is "the verbum inenarrabile of the sages of the Alexandrian School," which "Hebrew Kabalists wrote Javeh and interpreted by the sound Ararita, thus expressing the triplicity of the secondary kabalistic principle, the dualism of the means and the equal unity of the first and final principle, as well as the alliance between the triad and the triad and the tetrad in a word composed of four letters, which form seven by means of a triple and double repetition." (See also Kabala)

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Rider, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Arbatel

A magical ritual published at Basle in 1575. The text is in Latin and appears to have been influenced by Paracelsus. It is of Christian, not Jewish, origin, and although the authorship is unknown, it is probably the work of an Italian. Only one of its nine volumes still exists: dealing with the institutions of magic, the work is entitled Isagoge, which means "essential or necessary instruction."

The book introduces the ritual of the Olympic spirits who dwell in the air and among the stars and who govern the world. There are, we are told, 196 Olympic provinces in the universe: thus Aratron has 49; Bethor, 42; Phaleg 35; Och, 28; Hagith, 21; Ophiel, 14; and Phul, 7. Each of the Olympic spirits rules alternately for 490 years. They have natural sway over certain departments of the material world, but outside these departments they perform the same operations magically.

Thus Och, the ruler of solar affairs, presides over the preparation of gold naturally in the soil. At the same time, he presides magically over the preparation of that metal by means of alchemy. The Arbatel states that the sources of occult wisdom are to be found in God, spiritual essences, and corporeal creatures, as well as in nature, but also in the apostate spirits and in the ministers of punishment in Hell and the elementary spirits. The secrets of all magic reside in these, but magicians are born, not made, although they are assisted by contemplation and the love of God.

It is sufficient to describe the powers and offices of one of these spirits. Aratron governs those things that are ascribed astrologically to Saturn. He can convert any living thing into stone, can change coals into treasure, gives familiar spirits to men, and teaches alchemy, magic, medicine, and the secret of invisibility and long life. He should be invoked on a Saturday in the first hour of the day. The Arbatel was said to be one of the best authorities on spiritual essences and their powers and degrees.

ARC See Astrological Registration and Communication

Arcana Magazine

A quarterly journal devoted to cosmology, eschatology, hermetic science and the occult. Current address not obtained for this edition.

Arcana Workshops

The Arcana Workshops, one of the full moon meditation groups operating in Southern California, grew out of the program of the Arcane School and the teachings of Alice Bailey, to which it has added insights from the theosophical Agni Yoga Society. The group promotes full moon meditation as a time for transmitting the spiritual energies of the masters to the world. The group also works to unite the efforts of occult groups in Southern California to celebrate the three spring festivals (Easter, Wesak, and Goodwill) originally suggested by Bailey. Arcana Workshops literature refers to them as the festivals of Aries, Taurus, and Gemini.

The Arcana Workshops also offers correspondence courses, publishes a number of pamphlets, and sends out regular mailings to those on their mailing list. The non-profit organization may be contacted at Box 506, Manhattan Beach, California 90267-0506. Website: http://www.meditationtraining.org/.

Sources:

Arcana Workshops. http://www.meditationtraining.org/. March 8, 2000.

The Full Moon Story. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Arcana Workshops, 1974.

The Full Moon Workers. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Arcana Workshops, n.d.

What Is Arcana? Beverly Hills, Calif.: Arcana Workshops, n.d.

Arcane

That which is hidden or secret; usually refers to rites associated with the mystery religions or secret societies. (See also Arcanum, Great)

Sources:

Yarker, John. The Arcane Schools. Belfast, 1909.

Arcane School

The Arcane School, an occult organization founded by Theosophist Alice A. Bailey and her husband, Foster Bailey, was designed to bring in the New Age by the Great White Brotherhood, the spiritual hierarchy of masters who are believed to guide human destiny. As a young woman, Bailey affiliated with the Theosophical Society, moved into the Krotona community in Hollywood, California, and became editor of The Messenger, the society's journal. She also began to channel material from Djwhal Khul, one of the masters of the theosophical spiritual hierarchy, generally called "The Tibetan." Her channeling activity proved unacceptable to the society, and in 1920 she and her husband departed.

They moved to New York where Alice completed the channeling of two books and wrote one herself. They formed the Lucis Trust as a publishing concern and began a magazine, the Beacon. The Arcane School was founded in 1923 as an organization for students who responded to the books. Over the next years Bailey dictated a series of books that laid out a program for bringing in the New Age.

Among the several programs nurtured by the school was the New Group of World Servers, founded in 1932. The group sought to unite people of goodwill as harbingers of a coming civilization. Five years later the school launched the Triangles program to bring together groups of three people to work together in spiritual service. The primary task of a triangle is to channel spiritual energy from the hierarchy to the world. To assist the triangles, she released what is possibly her most famous piece of writing, a prayer called "The Great Invocation."

Bailey also began to announce the coming of the New Age and the accompanying appearance of the Christ. This coming of the New Age Savior was also encouraged by the repeating of "The Great Invocation."

Bailey taught that certain moments of the year are especially fruitful times for spiritual work because an abundance of spiritual energy is available. Such a time is the monthly period of the full moon, when members of the school gather on the evening of the full moon to meditate and transmit energy. On three full moon dates the great festivals Easter, Wesak, and Goodwill take place. The festival of Easter does not follow either of the Christian calendars, but is celebrated on the full moon in April as the time of the most active forces for the restoration of the Christ. In May, Wesak is the time when the Buddha's forces are available. In June, at the full moon, the forces of reconstruction are active.

Foster succeeded his wife as head of the school following her death in 1949. Their daughter Mary Bailey succeeded to the leadership after Foster's death in 1977. The school publishes several periodicals, including the Beacon and the World Goodwill Newsletter. International headquarters are located close to the United Nations building at 113 University Pl., 11th Fl., Box 722, Cooper Sta., New York, New York 10276. There are also European offices in London and Geneva. Several groups such as the Arcana Workshops, Meditation Groups, Inc., and the School for Esoteric Studies carry on programs similar to the Arcane School, though they are organizationally separate from it.

Sources:

Bailey, Alice A. The Unfinished Autobiography. New York: Lucis Publishing Co., 1951.

Sinclair, John R. The Alice Bailey Inheritance. Wellingsborough, England: Turnstone Press, 1984.

Arcanum, Great

The great secret that was supposed to lie behind all alchemical and magical striving. "God and Nature, alike," wrote Éliphas Lévi, "have closed the Sanctuary of Transcendent Science . . . so that the revelation of the great magical secret is happily impossible." Elsewhere he states that it makes the magician "master of gold and light."

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Rider, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Archaeus Project

A private foundation first formed to study techniques for detection and measurement of bioenergetic fields—electric, magnetic, and physical—and their application to diagnosis and treatment of disease. The project once issued the bimonthly newsletter Artifex and the scholarly journal Archaeus, which dealt with parapsychological topics and anomalous phenomena. It is now the aim of the project to create health-care programs in affiliation with other organizations in Northwest Hawaii while maintaining their prior goals. The project publishes the journal, Healing Island. Address: PO Box 7079, Kamuela, HI 96743-7079. Website: http://www.fivemtn.org/fivemtn/archaeus/.

Sources:

Five Mountain Medical Community. http://fivemtn.org/fivemtn/archaeus/. March 8, 2000.

Archivo di Documentazione Storica Della Ricerca Psichica

The Archivo di Documentazione Storica Della Ricerca Psichica (the Archives of Historical Documents on Psychical Research) was founded in 1985 in Bologna, Italy, by Gastone de Boni and Ernesto Bozzano. The library and archive of books and materials on parapsychology, psychical research, and related topics was the largest such collection in Italy. The archives also published Luce e Ombra. Last known address: Via Orfeo 15, 40124 Bologna, Italy.

Ardat-Lile

Ancient Semitic female spirit or demon who wed human beings and worked great harm in the dwellings of men.

ARE See Association for Research and Enlightenment

ARE Journal

Bimonthly publication founded in 1966 by the Association for Research and Enlightenment and concerned with the life and work of Edgar Cayce (1877–1945). Articles covered the wide range of subjects mentioned in Cayce's writings. It was superseded in 1984 by Venture Inward.

ARGENTINA

Although little has been published abroad on the history of Spiritualism and psychical research in Argentina, there has been considerable activity from the late nineteenth century onward. In the early period, Argentine Spiritualism was strongly influenced by the Spiritism of French Spiritualist Allan Kardec. The journal Constancia: Revista semanal, Illustrada de Espiritismo, Psicologia, y Socialogia was founded as early as 1877. Other publications during the 1930s included La Nota Espiritista and Revue Anales. One early organization Spiritualistic Association Lumen aimed to take the study of Spiritualism in the direction of humanistic science rather than religion.

With the growth of interest in experimental psychology stimulated by such pioneers as Dr. Horacio Rinoldi, scientific techniques were applied to the study of the paranormal. The first Institute of Psychology was created in the University of Buenos Aires in November 1931 to investigate general psychology, psychological pathology, psychometry, and psychotechniques. Dr. Enrique Mochet, who headed the institute, observed activities of various clairvoyants and mediums and included a course on paranormal psychology. Other scientists at the institute included Dr. Fernando Gorriti, Prof. Dr. Gonzalez Bosch, and Prof. José Fernández.

In 1933 Fernández founded the ATMAN Spiritualist Circle and also attended meetings of the Psyke Circle, known for their séances with clairvoyants and mediums. Their successes or failures were assessed statistically, and in 1941 Fernández published the results in the pamphlet Clairvoyance and Probability. Although these and other investigations were without rigorous control techniques, they played an important part in the development of parapsychological method in Argentina.

During the wartime period in the early 1940s, parapsychological researches were temporarily suspended, but in 1946 Dr. Orlando Canavesio founded the Argentine Medical Association for Parapsychology and launched its journal Revista Medica de Metapsiquica. At that time the Argentine government, which considered Spiritualism a "social evil" and attempted to control it sponsored the Institute of Applied Psychopathology. Spiritualists responded by turning increasingly to the research of parapsychologists to validate and support their work. The organization was the first known anywhere to encourage doctors to investigate ESP. Despite the fact that the agency was established by the government for the purpose of determining whether spiritualism was dangerous to the health of Argentinians, Canavesio's work proceeded to be recognized throughout the world. In 1953 Canavesio was invited to speaked at the International Conference on Parapsychological Studies at the University of Utrecht, in the Netherlands, and brought renown to the work being done in Argentina, and the first of the Hispanic countries to be so recognized. He died in 1957.

In 1949 the Argentine Association of Parapsychology brought together scientists and active Spiritualists. The research of Dr. J. B. Rhine in the U.S. had become well known to Argentine parapsychologists, and it became possible to develop statistical methods of psi evaluation.

Through the early 1950s Benjamin Odell, Julio C. Di Liscia, and J. Ricardo Musso created the Association of Friends of Parapsychology and its official organ, the Revista Argentina de Parapsicología in 1955. Musso became president of the Instituto Argentino de Parapsicología in Buenos Aires, which publishes the quarterly journal Cuadernos de Parapsicología. The serious study of parapsychology seemed well established.

By 1970 there were over 130 organizations devoted to the study of the paranormal in Argentina and many publications. Then, suddenly, all of the parapsychology courses at both the Roman Catholic and state universities were canceled, except for the one at the Universidad del Salvador. One explanation for this could be the military dictatorship that governed the country from 1976 until 1983, and the events during the previous years that lead up to them. The era was most famous for the unexplained disappearance of reportedly thousands of citizens, particularly those known as los Desaparecidos, of Spanish origin and settled in the country from Italy, France, Germany, the United States and Spain. Academic freedom in universities became severely restricted as well. Because the Roman Catholic Church had been known to sympathize with anti-military forces their university was scrutinized closely. Besides the restriction of academic freedom, the investigations appropriate to parapsychology were under suspicion, in addition to being a government threat. Even after democracy was restored in Argentina, the military leaders thought responsible for these disappearances were never put on trial or officially questioned. While work has continued through two remaining research centers, a return to the previous level of activity has been slow to evolve.

As of early 2000, the two research centers that do remain, are both in Buenos Aires. Enrique Novillo Paulí teaches parapsychology at the Universidad del Salvador, and the Institutio Argentino de Parapsicología continues to issue Cuadernos de Parapsicología. Address: Calle Ramon Lista 868, 1706, P. F., Sarmiento-Haedo, Buenos Aires, Argentina. The country's major parapsychological publication is, Cuadernos de Parapsicologia, (Instituto de Parapsicologia).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

"Los Desaparecidos." http://About.com/cultures/Spanish Culture. June 16, 2000.

Musso, J. Ricardo. "Parapsychology in Argentina." Parapsychology Today: A Geographic View. Edited by Allan Angoff and Betty Shapin. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1973.

Argentum, Potabile

A remedy prescribed by ancient alchemists such as Paracelsus and composed of sulphur, spirits of wine, and other ingredients. These practitioners gave the remedy for all types of ailments. Called a sovereign remedy, the name implies "silver," meaning that the preparation reflects the powers of the Moon (associated with silver), just as the Sun implies gold.

Arica

A psychophysical system developed by Oscar Ichazo and named after the town in Chile where Ichazo first trained members. The system includes meditation and exercises connected with vibrations, sounds, and movements to produce a state of enhanced consciousness called "Permanent 24." Arica is a body-mind system adapted from a variety of Eastern and Western mystical teachings of a Gurdjieff type. Teaching centers have been established in a number of American cities, with headquarters at the Arica Institute, 150 Fifth Ave., New York, NY 10011.

Sources:

Ichazo, Oscar. The Human Process for Enlightenment and Freedom. New York: Arica Institute, 1976.

Interviews with Oscar Ichazo. New York: Arica Institute Press, 1982.

Ariel

One of the two spirits supposed to have attended the seventeenth-century English writer on witchcraft, John Beaumont.

ARIES See Association pour la Recherche etl'Information sur l'Esotericisme

Arignote

An early ghost story told by the ancient Greek writer Lucian (second century C.E.). The story relates that at Corinth, in the Cranaüs quarter, there was a certain house that no one would inhabit, because it was haunted by a specter. A man named Arignote, well versed in the lore of Egyptian magical books, shut himself in the house to pass the night and began to read peacefully in the court. Soon the specter made its appearance, and in order to frighten Arignote, it first took the form of a dog, then that of a bull, and finally that of a lion. But Arignote was not at all disturbed. He admonished the specter by a magic spell that he found in his books, and he commanded it to go to a corner of the court, where it disappeared. On the following day the spot to which the specter had retreated was dug up, and a skeleton was found. When it was properly buried, the ghost was not seen again. This anecdote is an adaptation of the adventure of Athenodorus, which Lucian had read in Pliny.

Arigó, José (1918–1971)

Pseudonym of José Pedro de Freitas, a Brazilian psychic healer who performed surgical operations without proper instruments or anesthetics. Arigó, who claimed to be directed by the spirit of "Dr. Adolpho Fritz," performed complex operations at top speed with an unsterilized pocket knife. In 1957 he was sentenced to imprisonment for illegally practicing medicine but was pardoned by the president of Brazil. He was again sentenced in 1964, with an additional charge of practicing "witchcraft" (presumably to account for his uncanny successes), but the case was reviewed the following year and Arigó was released before serving his complete sentence. He was killed in a road accident six years later. (See also Psychic Surgery)

Sources:

Fuller, John R. Arigó: Surgeon of the Rusty Knife. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1974.

Playfair, Guy Lyon. The Flying Crow. London: Souvenir Press, 1975. Reprinted as The Unknown Power. New York: Pocket Books, 1976.

Valentine, Tom. Psychic Surgery. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1973.

Arioch

Demon of vengeance, according to some demonologists. Arioch differs from Alastor and occupies himself only with vengeance in particular cases where he is employed for that purpose.

Ariolists

Ancient diviners whose special occupation was called ariolatio because they accomplished their divination by means of altars. They consulted demons on their altars, stated Dangis; they observed whether the altar trembled or performed any marvel and predicted what the Devil inspired them with. François de la Tour Blanche maintained that these people ought to have been put to death as idolators. He based his opinion on Deuteronomy 18 and Revelation 21, which assert that idolators and liars shall be cast into the lake of fire and sulphur, which will be their second death. (See also Divination)

Aristaeus (ca. sixth century B.C.E.)

A charlatan who lived in the time of Croesus (sixth century B.C.E.). He claimed that his soul could leave his body whenever he wished and then return to it. Some maintain that it escaped in the sight of his wife and children in the figure of a stag. Johan Weyer stated that it took the shape of a crow.

According to Herodotus, in his fourth book, Aristaeus fell dead upon entering a fuller's shop, and the fuller ran to break the news to his parents. When they came to bury him, no corpse could be found. The whole town was astonished. Then some men returning from a voyage assured them that they had met Aristaeus on the way to Crotona and that he appeared to be a species of vampire. Herodotus added that Aristaeus reappeared at the end of seven years, composed a poem, and died again.

Leloyer, who regarded Aristaeus as a sorcerer or ecstatic, quoted a certain Apollonius, who said that at the same hour as the vampire disappeared for the second time, he was transported to Sicily, where he became a school master.

Aristaeus is again heard of 340 years later in the town of Metapontus, where he caused certain monuments to be raised that were to be seen in the time of Herodotus. So many wonderful happenings inspired the Sicilians with awe, that they raised a temple to him and worshipped him as a demigod.

Sources:

Herodotus. The Histories of Herodotus of Halicarnassus. London: Oxford University Press, 1962.

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Arithmancy

Divination by means of numbers (sometimes wrongly called Arithmomancy). The ancient Greeks examined the number and value of the letters in the names of two combatants and predicted that he whose name contained the most letters, or letters of the greatest value, would be the victor. Using this science, diviners foretold that Hector would be overcome by Achilles. The Chaldeans, who also practiced it, divided their alphabet into three parts, each composed of seven letters, which they attributed to the seven planets, in order to make predictions from them. The Platonists and the Pythagoreans were also strongly addicted to this method of divination, which is similar to certain aspects of the Jewish Kabala.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Armida

The episode of Armida in Jerusalem Delivered by Torquato Tasso (1554–1595), is founded on a popular tradition related by Pierre De Lancre. This skillful enchantress was the daughter of Arbilan, king of Damascus. She was brought up by an uncle, a great magician, who taught his niece to become a powerful sorceress. Nature had so well endowed her that she far surpassed the most beautiful women of the East. Her uncle sent her as a worthy foe against the powerful Christian army that Pope Urban XI had collected under the leadership of Godfrey de Bouillon. And there, De Lancre says, she so charmed the principal leaders of the crusaders with her beautiful eyes that she almost ruined the hopes of the Christians. She kept the valiant knight Renaud for a long time in an enchanted castle, and it was with great difficulty that he was disenchanted.

Sources:

Tasso, Torquato. Jerusalem Delivered. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1970.

Armomancy

A method of divination effected by the inspection of the shoulders. The ancients judged by this means whether a victim was suitable for sacrifice to the gods.

Arnaldus de Villanova (ca. 1235–1311)

Famous early alchemist who was also an astrologer, diplomat, and social reformer. He was regarded as a great authority on alchemy and is cited in many histories of the subject. Born in a Catalan family near Valencia, he was educated by Dominicans and studied medicine at Naples. His medical skill brought him a great reputation, and he treated kings, popes, and other famous people, which gave him reason to travel widely in Spain, France, Italy, and North Africa. He studied languages and was fluent in Arabic, Greek, and Latin. He became a favorite physician of James II, king of Aragon, and in 1285 he attended King Peter III of Aragon and was rewarded with the professorial chair of the University of Montpellier and a castle in Tarragona. However, his frank criticisms of the clergy of his time made many enemies in the church, and in 1299, during a diplomatic mission to Paris on behalf of James II of Aragon, he was arrested by order of the Holy Office and charged with heresy in his book on the Antichrist. After strong protests on his behalf to the King of France and Pope Boniface VIII, he was released in 1301.

He wrote many books on medicine and alchemy, although some works ascribed to him are probably wrongly attributed. During a visit to Naples, he met the famous alchemist Ramon Lully. In addition to his writings on alchemy, Arnaldus conducted some practical experiments. He died on a voyage from Sicily to Avignon, where he had been summoned to attend Pope Clement V, who was ill. Arnaldus was buried in Genoa.

His major work on alchemy, The Treasure of Treasures, Rosary of the Philosophers, was published in Italian and Latin. There is a lengthy account on Arnaldus in Histoire littéraire de la France by J. B. Hauréau, 1881.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. Alchemists through the Ages. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1970.

Arnoux, François (ca. 1622)

Canon of Riez, France, who published a popular work on wonders of the other world (Merveilles de l'autre monde) in 1622 at Rouen. It was written in a bizarre style and was calculated to disturb feeble imaginations with its tales of visions and apparitions.

Arnuphis (ca. 174 C.E.)

An Egyptian general credited with magical powers. He is said to have saved the army of Marcus Aurelius from defeat by the Quadi (a German tribe) when entangled in a pass which had been closed by the enemy. According to the writer Dio Cassius, the troops of Aurelius were dying of thirst when Arnuphis caused a miraculous storm that confounded the enemy and allowed the Romans to quench their thirst and win the battle. Their triumph was known as "The Miracle of the Thundering Legion," although Christians ascribed the victory to their own prayers rather than to the aid of Mercury and other gods invoked by Arnuphis.

Aromatherapy

Term used for treatment of illness and maintenance of general physical health using essential oils distilled from plants. Virtually unknown to the modern world twenty years ago, aromatherapy is now considered the fastest growing natural healing art in the United States.

Aromatherapy treatments were known in ancient Egypt, Greece, Rome, and other civilizations, while early Arabian physicians developed the distillation of aromatic oils through experiments in alchemy. The term aromatherapy derives from the writings of the French chemist Rene-Maurice Gattefosse, whose book Aromatherapie was published in 1928. However, the modern popularity of aromatherapy is generally traced to Marguerite Maury and Jean Valnet. Maury, after developing a new technique for the extraction and use of oils, published her findings in 1962, for which she earned the Prix international d'esthetique et cosmetologie. Jean Valnet also contributed to the field of aromatherapy by publishing the widely read book The Practice of Aromatherapy in 1964. Both of their works were picked up by the New Age movement in the 1980s and have become an integral part of the holistic health movement.

Essential oils are highly condensed vegetal extracts containing hormones, vitamins, antibodies, and antiseptics. They are considered the most concentrated form of herbal energy, widely used in pharmacy, cosmetology, and perfumery. Various experiments and studies have shown essential oils to be effective therapeutic agents, particularly in cases of disease associated with bacterial, viral, and fungal infection. Essential oils also support and strengthen the human immune system.

Contemporary aromatherapy can be loosely grouped into four main categories: esoteric aromatherapy, fragrance aromatherapy (or aromachology), massage or English aromatherapy, and medical aromatherapy. Esoteric aromatherapy is concerned with the energetic effects of essential oils on the subtle bodies. Aromachology studies the psychological effects of fragrances.

English and medical aromatherapy both address the effects of essential oils on the physical body. They insist upon the use of essential oils from single, identifiable plant sources. Essential oils are used both as natural tonics and as therapeutic agents. Medical aromatherapists use essential oils internally as well as by inhalation and by topical application. Aromatherapists trained in the English method dilute essential oils in other oils for massage, and diffuse the oils for inhalation. By way of diffusing, the healing is achieved through the olfactory senses, which lead from the nose to the limbic system, the most primitive area of the brain. Thus, the essential oils are said to affect the body in a primal and often subconscious manner.

The philosophy behind aromatherapy is connected to the Gaia Hypothesis, which conceptualizes the earth as a living organism, seeing plants and animals together as inextricable parts of that organism. In Aromatherapy Workbook, Lavabre writes, "Essential oils are the 'quintessences' of the alchemists. In this sense, they condense the spiritual and vital forces of the plants in material form. Therefore, they act on the biological level to strengthen the natural defenses of the body, and are the media of a direct human-plant communication on the energetic and spiritual plane." Aromatherapy postulates subtle energies of aromatic plants related to life force, which can be correlated with ancient Chinese concepts of Yin and Yang.

A basic tenet of aromatherapy is to match a specific remedy with a particular malady, designed for a unique body chemistry. As such, aromatherapy can employ a wide variety of plant oils to treat similar conditions. Examples of aromatherapy remedies for common conditions include:

Colds—7ml Rosemarin officitualus verbanion, 3ml Eucalyptus globulus, 0.25ml mentha pepierita, for inhalation through a diffuser
Headache—Two drops lavender, rubbed on temples or back of neck
Muscle Strain—Massage oil created with five drops eucalyptus, five drops peppermint, five drops ginger, diluted in one tablespoon vegetable oil
Stress Reduction Soak—two drops lavender lavera, two drops glang glang, in one tablespoon epson salt, place in warm tub.

(See also Perfumes)

Sources:

Aromatic Thymes. http://www.aromaticthymes.com/. April 17, 2000.

Lavabre, Marcel. Aromatherapy Workbook. Rochester, Vt.: Healing Arts Press, 1990.

National Association for Holistic Aromatherapy. http://www.naha.org/about.html. April 17, 2000.

Schnaubelt, Kurt Ph.D. Advanced Aromatherapy: The Science of Essential Oil Therapy. Rochester, Vt.: Healing Arts Press, 1998.

———. Aromatherapy Course, Cited Pierre Frandomine and Daniel Penoel, formula for colds. San Rafael, Calif., 1985.

Severns, Dorothy & Thorpe, Penni, Letter from Into the Scented Garden Aromatics San Mateo, Calif., 2000.

Stead, Christiane. The Power of Holistic Aromatherapy. Poole, England: Javalin Books, 1986.

The Burton Goldberg Group. Alternative Medicine: A Definitive Guide. Tiburon, Calif.: Future Medicine Publishing, Inc., 1997.

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mystery and Lure of Perfume. London, 1927.

Tisserand, Robert. Aromatherapy. 1977. Reprint, London: Mayflower, 1979.

Worwood, Valerie Ann. The Complete Book of Essential Oils and Aromatherapy. San Rafael, Calif.: New World Library, 1991.

Arphaxat

A Persian sorcerer who was killed by a thunderbolt (according to Abdias of Babylon) as St. Simon and St. Jude were martyred. In the account of the possession of the nuns of Loudun, there is also a demon known as Arphaxat, who took possession of the body of Louise de Pinterville.

Arriola, Pepito (1896–1954)

A Spanish musical prodigy who, in 1900, at the age of three years and three months, was introduced by Charles Richet to the International Psychical Congress. Arriola had only begun playing the piano a year earlier. With his tiny hands, which appeared to grow while he played, he somehow managed to sound full octaves.

He also composed military and funeral marches, waltzes, minuets, and habaneras and played some 20 difficult pieces from memory. At the time, there was no suggestion of a Spiritualist explanation for this phenomena, but 11 years later the boy exhibited the gift of automatic writing. (See also Rosemary Brown; Music (Paranormal); Jesse Shepard)

Arroyo, Stephen (1946–)

Stephen Arroyo is an outstanding contemporary astrologer and leader in the move to integrate it with modern psychology. He was born on October 6, 1946, in Kansas City, Missouri. His father, Joseph Arroyo, was a successful businessman and founder of Karr Products, Inc., in Chicago. Arroyo began his college career at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, but received his B.A. at the University of California at Davis in 1968. He received a master's degree in psychology at California State University in Sacramento in 1972 and was licensed as a marriage, family, and child counselor in the state of California. He married in 1971.

As a young man, Arroyo had become interested in astrology and while still in college began to study it seriously. He was able to make contact with Dane Rudhyar during the period he was developing transpersonal astrology, and he both studied and carried on an extensive correspondence with Rudyhar. He also studied with other astrological notables such as Isabel Hickey. In 1970 he opened a counseling practice in which he used both his astrological and psychological training. In addition, Arroyo became a frequent contributor to astrological publications. His writings led to his first book, Astrology, Psychology, and the Four Elements, in 1975. He has subsequently written a half-dozen additional books, most widely used as textbooks. His Chart Interpretation Handbook has proved a popular beginning text as it attempts a more sophisticated approach to interpretation centered on an understanding of the overall relationship of the various elements of the horoscope.

Arroyo has emerged in the 1990s as one of the most internationally honored astrologers. His work has been recognized by the British Astrological Association, the Fraternity of Canadian Astrologers, and the United Astrology Conference.

Sources:

Arroyo, Stephen. Astrology, Karma, and Transformation. Reno, Nev.: CRCS, 1978.

———. Astrology, Psychology, and the Four Elements. Reno, Nev.: CRCS, 1975.

———. The Practice and Profession of Astrology. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS, 1985.

———. Practicing the Cosmic Science: Key Insights in Modern Astrology. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS, 1999.

———. Relationships and Life Cycles. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS, 1980.

———. Stephen Arroyo's Chart Interpretation Handbook. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS, 1989.

Ars Notoria

Title of a work of magical invocations and prayers attributed to Solomon and therefore related to the celebrated Key of Solomon the King, one of the most famous grimoires, or book of ceremonial magic. Ars Notoria is known in the English translation of Robert Turner (Sloane Manuscript 3648, British Library, London), published by him in 1657.

Artemisian Order

The Artemisian Order is a feminist Neo-Pagan group founded in the 1990s by Oriethyia, a feminist poet. It is a clan of sisterhood and society of women who protect one another while serving nature. Formally identified with Dianic Wicca (centered upon the Roman goddess Diana), Oriethyia found herself drawn more to the Greek equivalent, Artemis, and decided to start a new Wiccan group with Artemis at the center. Like all feminist Wicca, Artemisian faith affirms the female image of deity, which stands in sharp contrast to the primarily male image with which Oriethyia had been raised. Unlike most Wiccan traditions, she saw no need to balance male-female energies by naming a male consort God to stand with the Goddess. She believes that the balancing of energies derives from the assertion of the feminine within a masculine-dominated culture.

Artemisians also identify with the ancient Amazons, the legendary fighters whom even the bravest of male warriors feared and respected. They describe themselves as proud and capable women worshipping the goddess Artemis. They submit to no man in the recognition that women have been subjected to patriarchal cultures that persecuted and killed women for their beliefs. They have threatened to hunt down and kill any man discovered spying upon their activities (though there is no hint that such has ever occurred). Only a few men are associated with the group. They are known as the Gargareans and Philos of the Artemisians. The former are the male companions of the Artemisians who assist the female Artemisians with their duties to nature and to other females. The Philos are the trusted friends of the order.

The modern Artemisian Order consists of the sisterhood, plus the Philos and Gargareans. The sisterhood administers the order on a day-to-day basis. The female members may hold position as either Sophias, who lead with their wisdom; High Priestesses, who keep the rituals; Amazons, who defend the way of life; or Maidens, who assist with their strength of mind and spirit. The Gargareans and Philos assist the sisterhood by protecting their sacred ways. Only females may become initiates. Males may become part of the order, but only as Gargareans and Philos.

The Artemisian Order may be contacted through Oriethyia at P.O. Box 7184, Capitol Station, Albany, NY 12224. Website: http://www.artemisian.org/sanct.html.

Sources:

Hopman, Ellen Evert, and Lawrence Bond. People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out. Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 1996.

Artephius (d. ca. 1119)

A well-known exponent of Hermetic philosophy who died in the twelfth century, and is said to have lived more than one thousand years by means of alchemical secrets. François Pic mentions the opinion of certain savants who affirmed that Artephius was identical with Apollonius of Tyana, who was born in the first century under that name and who died in the twelfth century under that of Artephius.

Many extravagant and curious works are attributed to Artephius: De Vita Propaganda (The Art of Prolonging Life), which he claims, in the preface, to have written at the age of 1,025 years; The Key to Supreme Wisdom; and a work on the character of the planets, on the significance of the songs of birds, on things past and future, and on the philosophers' stone. Jerome Cardan spoke of these books and believed that they were composed by some practical joker who wished to play on the credulity of the partisans of alchemy.

Some scholars have identified Artephius with the Arabic poet and alchemist Al Toghrai, who died ca. 1119.

Sources:

Patai, Raphael. The Jewish Alchemists. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.

Arthur, Gavin (1901–1972)

Gavin Arthur, an astrologer and occultist, was born Chester Alan Arthur III, the grandson and namesake of the 21st President of the United States. He grew up in wealth, but did not pursue a career in the professions, choosing instead to join the Merchant Marines. He later panned for gold and sold newspapers. In the 1930s he traveled widely and came to know many of the counterculture elite of his day. Among his acquaintances were pioneer sexologists Havelock Ellis and Alfred Kinsey.

In the 1950s he settled in San Francisco and devoted his time to astrology. He began to move in the alternative spirituality and sexuality community that first became known for its identification with beat Zen, and he became well-known as an astrological counselor. He began to develop a perspective on astrology that, contrary to the mainstream of astrological writing, took account of homosexual and bisexual gender preferences. His ruminations culminated in 1966 with his major writing, The Circle of Sex, for which Alan Watts wrote an introduction.

Arthur moved beyond traditional observations on sexual roles (that continue to dominate astrology books) that treat issues of sexual attraction and compatibility to argue that each person possesses a distinct combination of Yin and Yang. We attract and repel others as they tend to balance our own combination of male/female attributes. He then placed this understanding that allowed for women with much Yang and men with much Yin, into a complex system of correspondences that involve the astrological signs, the planets, and houses of the horoscope.

Drawing on his reading of gay writers, Arthur concluded that sexuality needs to be separated from the single need to procreate. Heterosexuals need to be free of the constraints of marriage, for only then will the transgendered, homosexuals, and bisexuals be liberated.

Sources:

Arthur, Gavin. The Circle of Sex. Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

———. "Document Received from the Hands of Gavin Arthur and Its Authenticity Vouched for by Allen Ginsberg, San Francisco 1967. [previously unpublished]." Gay Sunshine: A Journal of Gay Liberation 35 (winter 1978). 29.

Arthur, King

Legendary king of England, son of Uther Pendragon and Igraine. It seems likely that Arthur was a sixth-century leader whose life and deeds became interwoven with romance mythology. The character of King Arthur is strongly identified with occult legends. Not only do we find his court a veritable center of happenings more or less supernatural, but his mysterious origin and the subsequent events of his career contain matter of considerable interest from an occult standpoint.

He is connected with one of the greatest magical names of early times—Merlin the Enchanter. It is possible that Merlin was originally a British deity who in later times degenerated from his high position in the popular imagination. There are many accounts concerning him, one of which states that he was the direct offspring of Satan himself, but that a zealous priest succeeded in baptizing him before his infernal parent could carry him off.

From Merlin, Arthur received much good advice, both magical and rational. Merlin was present when the king was gifted with his magic sword, Excalibur, which endowed him with practical invulnerability, and all through his career Merlin was deep in the king's counsels. Merlin's tragic imprisonment by the Lady Viviana, who shut him up eternally in a rock through the agency of one of his own spells, removed him from his sphere of activity at the Arthurian Court, and from that time the shadows were seen to gather swiftly around Arthur's head.

Innumerable are the tales concerning the knights of his court who met with magical adventures, and as the stories grew older in the popular mind, additions to these naturally became the rule. Of note is the offshoot of the Arthurian epic, known as the Holy Grail, in which the knights who go in quest of it encounter every description of sorcery for the purpose of retarding their progress.

Arthur's end is as strange as his origin, for he is wafted away by fairy hands, or at least by invisible agency, to the Isle of Avillion, which probably is the same place as the Celtic otherworld across the ocean.

As a legend and a tradition, that of Arthur is undoubtedly the most powerful and persistent in the British imagination. It has employed the pens and enhanced the dreams of many of the giants of English literature from the time of Geoffrey of Monmouth to the present day. Some claim Arthur was buried at Glastonbury, and tourists who visit are shown a tomb site and may purchase the replica of a cross with an inscription concerning Arthur.

Sources:

De Troyes, Chrétien. Arthurian Romances (Erec and Enide; Cligés; Yvain; Lancelot). London, 1914.

Lacy, Norris J., ed. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Reiss, Edmund, Louise Horner Reiss, and Beverly Taylor. Arthurian Legend and Literature: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1984.

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Holy Grail: The Galahad Quest in the Arthurian Literature. 1933. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1961.

White, Terence H. The Once and Future King. London: Collins, 1958.

Wilhelm, James J., and Laila Zamuelis Gross, eds. The Romance of Arthur. New York: Garland Publishing, 1984.

Arthur Findlay College

A residential center in Essex, England, administered by the Spiritualists' National Union, where students may attend courses on Spiritualist philosophy, practice, healing, and related subjects. These courses are wide ranging, including acupuncture, radionics, meditation, relaxation, color therapy, and Taoism as well as subjects directly related to Spiritualism, such as the practice of mediumship. The college is situated on 15 acres of land in pleasant surroundings and includes the Britten Memorial Museum, devoted to exhibits concerned with the history of Spiritualism and psychic phenomena.

The college is named for pioneer Spiritualist J. Arthur Findlay (1883–1964), the author of a number of well-known Spiritualist works. Address: Stansted Hall, Stansted, Mountfichet, Essex CM24 8UD, England.

Artifex (Newsletter)

A former bimonthly newsletter of the Archaeus Project concerned with bioenergetic fields and anomalous phenomena. Address: PO Box 7079, Kamuela, HI 96743-7079.

Arundale, George Sydney (1878–1945)

Prominent member of the Theosophical Society. Born in Surrey, England, December 1, 1878, he was educated in Italy and Germany before entering St. John's College, Cambridge University, England, from which he graduated M.A., LL.B., D.Lit. He joined the Theosophical Society in 1895 and went to India at the invitation of Annie Besant. Arundale served as principal of the Central Hindu College, Benares (1905), examiner to the University of Allahabad and to the government of United Provinces, India, principal of National University of Madras (1917), and minister of education to the government of the Maharaja Holkar (1923). He was also regionary bishop of the Liberal Catholic Church in India, deputy chief scout of the Indian Boy Scout Association, and provincial commissioner of the Hindustan Scout Association in Madras Presidency.

In 1917 he was interned with Annie Besant, then president of the Theosophical Society, for principles expressed in membership of the All India Home Rule League. In 1920 he married Rukmini Devi, an Indian girl from a Brahmin family, who was a leading exponent of Hindu classical dancing. She helped to restore respect for Indian dancing as an expression of deep spiritual awareness. Arundale lectured extensively in India, Europe, and Australia and was at one time general secretary of the Theosophical Society in England, Australia, and India. In 1934 he succeeded Besant as president of the Theosophical Society. He also wrote a number of works on Theosophy and edited The Theosophist, The Theosophical Worker, and Conscience (Madras). His book Kundalini: An Occult Experience (1938) has special importance as an early personal description of the arousal of kundalini in the body. He died at Adyar, India, August 12, 1945.

Sources:

Arundale, George S. Fragment of Autobiography. Adyar, India: Kalaksetra, 1940.

———. Kundalini: An Occult Experience. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

———. Lotus Fire. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1939.

———. Thoughts on "At the Feet of the Master." Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1919.

———. You. Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1973.

Asal

Known as the King of the Golden Pillars in Irish Celtic mythology. He was the owner of seven swine, which might be killed and eaten every night, yet were found alive every morning.

Asana, Jehangir Jamasji (1890–1954)

Biologist and parapsychologist, a professor of biology at Gujarat College in India, and a correspondent with J. B. Rhine and other parapsychologists on the subject of ESP. Born July 21, 1890, at Broach, Bombay State, he was educated at Bombay University (B.A., M.A.) and Cambridge University, England (M.A.). He died December 16, 1954, at Poona, India.

Asanas

The physical positions, or postures, of hatha yoga. Many of these are named after living creatures, e.g., cow, peacock, locust, cobra, lion. Early yoga treatises state that there are 8.4 million asanas, of which 84 are the best and 32 the most useful for the health of mankind. Hatha yoga should properly be combined with spiritual development.

Sources:

Hittleman, Richard L. Richard Hittleman's Yoga for Total Fitness. New York: Bantam Books, 1983.

Kuvalayananda, Swami. Popular Yoga Asanas. Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1971.

Asatru

The term Asatru (literally, being true to the Æsir or Germanic deities) is the most used term for the modern reconstructed forms of the magical polytheistic religions of the German and Scandinavian people that have appeared in Europe and North America since the 1960s. In North America, the first such group, and for many years the most prominent, was the Asatru Free Assembly. The assembly was founded in 1972 as the Viking Brotherhood by Stephen A. McNallen. Shortly after founding the new organization to give public expression to the belief that McNallen had slowly appropriated, he went into the army. The brotherhood became largely moribund, though he continued to publish the quarterly periodical, The Runestone.

Returning to civilian life in 1976, McNallen worked on refining the idea of the brotherhood and soon changed its name to Asatru Free Assembly. The assembly rejected collective ideologies (especially fascism) and emphasized individualism, courage, integrity, and independence. A wide variety of belief and practice was allowed within the general framework of acknowledgment of the deities. The Asatru people also saw themselves as over against the Odinists, who emphasize a single deity rather than the whole of the deities. Celebrations were held to recognize the deities, such as Yule (December 22) and the summer solstice. Other holidays included March 28, Ragnar's Day, when the assembly remembered the sacking of Paris in 845 by the Viking Ragnar Lobrok. Local groups called Skeppslags, or ship's crews, consisted of 3 to 15 members. Also, interest groups were formed as guilds to develop skills in activities from sewing to brewing.

The assembly reached a crisis in 1987, when McNallen felt unable to continue as the primary leader and disbanded the organization. In the meantime, a number of mostly small local Norse groups had arisen, some falling victim to racial ideologies that alienated them from the larger body of Neo-Pagans. Among his last productions was the publication of a book of Norse rituals. The fall of the Asatru Free Assembly also left a vacuum just as Norse Paganism appeared to be in a growth phase. Former members began to form new associations such as the Asatru Alliance and the Ring of Thoth. In 1992 McNallen returned to active leadership as an Asatru, founding the Asatru Folk Assembly and reissuing The Runestone.

Sources:

Hundingbani, Heigi. The Religion of Odin-A Handbook. Red Wing, Minn.: Viking House, 1978.

McNallen, Stephen A. Rituals of Asatru. Breckenridge, Tex.: Asatru Free Assembly, 1985.

Asatru Alliance

The Asatru Alliance is one of several groups operating in North America that continues the revival of Asatru (literally "faithfulness" to the Germanic deities) faith begun by the Asatru Free Assembly in the early 1970s. The assembly disbanded in 1987 and the alliance is one of several organizations that emerged to fill the vacuum. It follows the basic teachings established by the assembly, a reconstruction of the magical polytheistic religion of the ancient Northern European peoples. There is also a liberal spirit that allows for the many variations that were evident across the Northern lands. The alliance exists as a free association of kindreds, the name given to local Asatru groups. As a continental organization, the alliance promotes the faith by sponsoring regional and national meetings and publishing materials. The alliance is headed by the Allthing, its representative legislative body to which all the kindred send a delegate. The Thing was the legislative and executive assembly of free men in Germanic antiquity and the Allthing was the successor to the Thing in the free state of Iceland.

After the Asatru Free Assembly dissolved, seven surviving kindreds worked together to continue the religion of Asatru in Vinland (the name given to North America by the Vikings). In the late summer of 1987 they drafted a set of bylaws and then invited every known Asatruar in the country to an Allthing to approve them. This first modern Allthing was held in the summer of 1988. The bylaws were adopted, a council appointed, and the tradition of annual gatherings of the kindred established.

The Asatru Alliance may be contacted at P. O. Box 961, Payton, AZ 85547. Its extensive website can be found at http://eagle.webpipe.net/. It publishes a periodical, Vor Tru.

Asatru Folk Assembly

The Asatru Folk Assembly was founded in California in 1994 by Stephen A. McNallen, the pioneer American advocate of the magical polytheistic Norse Neo-Paganism that became an international religious community in North America and Europe in the last quarter of the twentieth century. McNallen founded the original North American group of the Asatru (literally, loyalty to the Germanic deities), the Viking Brotherhood, while a college student in Texas in 1971. (Unknown to him at the time, other groups were being created simultaneously elsewhere: a periodical, The Odinist, was first published in Canada; the Committee for the Restoration of the Odinic Rite was organized in England; and the Asatru movement emerged in Iceland.) That organization became the Asatru Free Assembly (AFA) later in the decade. In 1980 the AFA held the first annual Allthing (national gathering). McNallen also assembled a calendar for seasonal observances, wrote a three-volume book of rituals, and produced a series of booklets and tapes. However, in 1987 McNallen, feeling burned out with his leadership of the assembly, disbanded it and allowed it to continue through several other organizations, primarily the Asatru Alliance.

After serving several years as a junior high school teacher, McNallen decided to return to active leadership in the faith community he had largely founded. In 1992 he restarted The Runestone, the old assembly's periodical. Then in 1994, he created the Asatru Folk Assembly, modeled on the previous assembly. The new assembly continues the beliefs and practices appropriate to the acknowledgment of the ancient Norse deities. New local kindred groups have been organized and the annual gatherings revived. As with the former AFA, several guilds (special interest groups) have emerged, and Wolf Age, a periodical for the Warrior Guild, appeared. The new AFA has even gone to court to protect the remains of an ancient man, believed to be caucasoid, discovered in America.

As of the end of the 1990s, the revived assembly is still very much a small emerging organization. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 445, Nevada City, CA 95959. Website: http://www.runestone.org/.

Sources:

McNallen, Stephen A. Rituals of Asatru. 3 vols. Breckenridge, Tex.: Asatru Free Assembly, 1985.

———. What Is the Norse Religion? Turlock, Calif.: The Author, n.d.

Asbestos

Asbestos is so called from being inextinguishable even by showers and storms, if once set on fire. The name derives from an ancient Greek term for a fabulous stone. Pagan peoples made use of it for lights in their temples. Plutarch records that the Vestal Virgins used perpetual lamp wicks, while Pausanias mentions a lamp with a wick that was not consumed, being made from a mineral fiber from Cyprus. Asbestos is of woolly texture and is sometimes called the Salamander's Feather. Leonardus stated: "Its fire is nourished by an inseparable unctuous humid flowing from its substance; therefore, being once kindled, it preserves a constant light without feeding it with any moisture."

ASC See Austin Seth Center

Ascended Masters

Ascended Masters are enlightened beings whom many in the esoteric field believe have evolved beyond the need to reincarnate on earth and now act from a higher plane of existence to assist humans in their movement toward enlightenment and guide the race in its destined evolution. The concept of ascended masters was popularly introduced by Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, and described in some detail in her most important book, The Secret Doctrine. Blavatsky taught that both individuals and the human race were engaged in an upward evolutionary process. At the same time, she pictured a hierarchy of Masters headed by a being known as the Solar Logos. Those masters at the lowest level of the hierarchy regularly interacted with humanity. The Masters El Morya and Koot Hoomi have had a special role in the formation and guidance of the society. One of the early members of the society, A. P. Sinnett, also received regular communications from the masters that became the basis of two important theosophical texts, Esoteric Buddhism and the Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sinnett.

Together, the masters constituted the Great White Brotherhood. A number of the spiritual leaders from past history were pictured as members of the hierarchy. For example, the person known as Jesus, revered as the fountainhead of Christianity, is believed to hold the office of Maitreya in the hierarchy. The work of the masters was championed by Blavatsky's successor Annie Besant and her colleague Charles W. Leadbeater, whose works further elaborated upon the nature and work of the masters.

Blavatsky also introduced the idea of ascension as a goal for humans, a concept made central of "I AM" Religious Activity, an organization founded by Guy W. Ballard, who further developed theosophical concepts. Ballard taught that it was possible through following the disciplines of the movement, including vegetarianism, to so purify the self that the individual need not die but could ascend to the next level of conscious existence. Ballard's own untimely death necessitated some revision of that ideal, and the natural process of death was integrated into the understanding of the process of ascension. Ballard is now believed to have assumed a position as an ascended master, as has Mark Prophet, the founder of the Summit Lighthouse (now the Church Universal and Triumphant), a group similar to the "I AM."

Ballard regularly and publicly served as a messenger for a variety of Ascended Masters, especially Comte de St. Germain. At the same time, Alice A. Bailey claimed contact with a Master she generally called "The Tibetan," named Djwhal Khul. Both became models for a variety of people through the last half of the twentieth century who have claimed contact with and who have channeled messages from the masters. By the 1970s, over one hundred groups with roots in the Theosophical Society that either acknowledged the messages from the masters received by Blavatsky and/or were receiving new messages regularly from the masters were functioning in the English-speaking world. One group of channelers, beginning with George King, founder of the Aetherius Society, have claimed contact with extraterrestrial entities, who nevertheless have the same names as the members of the spiritual hierarchy originally described by Blavatsky. Flying saucer contactees, such as Dorothy Martin of the Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara, described them as members of an outer space hierarchy.

During the 1970s, the practice of channeling messages from the Masters spread to a much larger audience as a result of the New Age Movement, a revitalization movement that spread through the Western theosophical groups and adopted channeling as one of its key activities. While New Age channelers received material from a variety of sources, many claimed to be in touch with the same ascended masters as Blavatsky, Bailey, and Ballard. Most notable among these is Benjamin Crème, who claimed not only to receive messages from the Master Maitreya, but that this particular entity had returned to human society and was walking among us. The emphasis upon ascended masters accompanied an emphasis upon individual ascension as the goal of the spiritual life. Ascension had been placed upon the agenda of the metaphysical community by Guy Ballard and the "I AM" Movement, but had not become a significant teaching until the New Age Movement began to wane in the 1990s.

The ascended masters have been likened to angelic beings in Christian folklore. Given the impersonal and transcendently remote deity of Western esoteric worldviews, the masters serve as a source of revelation and authority. They are seen as authoritative teachers of spiritual wisdom. They are highly revered for the knowledge they present, though as a rule they do not receive worship, a practice that does not have a prominent place in most esoteric groups. The masters have also been compared to the bodhisattvas of Mahayana Buddhist thought. They are compassionate beings dedicated to humanity and its uplift. Contemporary writers on ascended masters have nominated many of the spiritual exemplars of all religious traditions as having become ascended masters while also greatly expanding the number of ascended masters believed to be currently interacting with humanity.

Sources:

Ballard, Guy W. [as Godfre Ray King]. Unveiled Mysteries. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1934.

Besant, Annie. The Masters. Adyar, India: The Theosophist Office, 1912.

———. The White Lodge and Its Messengers. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1931.

Crème, Benjamin. The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom. London: Tara Press, 1980.

Garver, Will I. Brother of the Third Degree. Halcyon, Calif.: Halcyon Temple Press, 1894, 1929.

Leadbeater, Charles W. The Masters and the Path. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1925.

Prophet, Elizabeth Clare. The Great White Brotherhood in the History and Religion of America. Los Angeles: Summit University Press, 1976.

Sinnett, A. P. Esoteric Buddhism. London: Trubner, 1883.

———. The Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sinnett. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1924.

Stone, Joshua David. The Ascended Masters Light the Way: Beacons of Ascension. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology Publishing, 1995.

Ascent

Journal of spiritual development published by Yasodhara Ashram, founded in Canada by Swami Sivananda Radha, a disciple of the late Swami Sivananda Saraswati of Rishikesh, Himalayas, India. Address: Yasodhara Ashram, Box 9, Kootenay Bay, BC, Canada V0B 1X0.

Asclepius (or Aesculapius)

In Greek mythology, the son of Apollo and Coronis who was instructed in the arts of healing by the centaur Chiron. Asclepius married Epione, who begat Hygeia (health). So successful was Asclepius in the art of healing that Zeus was fearful that he would make mankind immortal, so he killed him with a thunderbolt. Apollo retaliated by attacking the Cyclopes who had forged the thunderbolt, and Zeus was eventually prevailed upon to admit Asclepius to the ranks of the gods.

The worship of Asclepius centered in Epidaurus, and the cock was offered to him in sacrifice. The serpent and the dog were sacred to him, and his symbol of the serpent coiled about a staff still remains as the sign of medical practice. Asclepius is also featured in the Hermetic literature connected with Hermes Trismegistus ("Thrice-greatest Hermes").

Sources:

Edelstein, Emma Jeanette Levy. Asclepius: a Collection and Interpretation of the Testimonies. New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Ashcroft-Nowicki, Delores (1929–)

Delores Ashcroft-Nowicki, the head of the Servants of the Light, a contemporary school of ritual magic, is a sensitive psychic who came from a family of psychics. As a youth, she studied at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art and later at Trinity College, the course of her education being interrupted by an early brief marriage. She later studied fencing, through which she met her second husband, whom she married in 1957. Around 1963, the pair came into contact with the Fraternity of the Inner Light, the magical organization founded by Dion Fortune. They took the study course and were formally initiated in 1967. They also came to know William E. Butler and Gareth Knight, both former members of the fraternity, and took the course of magic the pair developed, then known as the Helios Course. Taking the course led to their break with the fraternity. They continued to work with Butler, founder of the Servants of the Light, and Ashcroft-Nowicki soon established direct contact with the same inner plane adept that had guided Butler.

Ashcroft-Nowicki decided to dedicate her life in service to the inner plane adept with whom she had come into contact. She began to work full-time for the Servants of the Light School of the Occult Science and shortly before his death in 1978, Butler named her his successor as the school's new director of studies. Her husband was named the school's guardian.

As the head of the school, she began to travel and speak at various conferences and seminars, and to expand the school internationally. She authored a number of books through the 1980s including First Steps in Ritual (1982), The Shining Paths (1983), and Highways of the Mind (1987). She has continued her productivity through the 1990s with such works as The Tree of Ecstasy (1991), Daughters of Eve (1930), and The Initiates Book of Pathworkings (1999).

Sources:

Ashcroft-Nowicki, Delores. First Steps in Ritual. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1982.

———. Highways of the Mind. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1987.

———. The Shining Paths. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1983.

———. The Tree of Ecstasy. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1991.

Servants of the Light. http://www.servantsofthelight.org/. May 16, 2000.

Ashkir-Jobson Trianion

A guild of psychical researchers formed during the 1930s in Britain to develop apparatus to facilitate communication with spirits of the dead. The name derived from the individuals concerned: George Jobson (an engineer who first introduced the telephone into Britain), A. J. Ashdown, and B. K. Kirkby, and was associated with the mediumship of Mrs. I. E. Singleton (who became warden of the Ashkir-Jobson Trianion Guild).

Jobson, Kirkby, and Ashdown were preoccupied with the question of proving survival after death, and they formed a pact that whoever passed away would attempt to communicate with his comrades through an agreed signal—the initials "B. K. K." In 1930, within three months of the passing of Jobson, the signal was received through a medium not formerly known to the three, and thereafter instructions were communicated for the construction of instruments to facilitate spirit communication. The Ashkir-Jobson Trianion was formed as a nonprofit guild to produce apparatus, which included the Reflectograph and Communigraph. Another instrument, named the Ashkir-Jobson Vibrator, was designated to produce a continuous musical tone to create a harmonious influence at séances. The vibrator was operated by clockwork, which activated an "A" tuning fork, sending out sonorous but subdued sound vibrations, sustained for up to three hours.

The Ashtabula Poltergeist

The supposed cause of the extraordinary poltergeist disturbances that took place about mid-nineteenth century in the presence of a woman of Ashtabula County, Ohio. First of all, she became a medium on the death of her husband and produced spirit-rappings and other manifestations. Then for a time she studied anatomy in Marlborough, and afterward returned to her home in Austinburg, where an alarming outbreak of weird manifestations occurred. Stair-rods moved after her when she went to her room, light articles flew about the house, and uncanny sounds were heard. At Marlborough, when she resumed her anatomical studies, the disturbances increased in violence, and she and her roommate had a ghastly vision of a corpse they had been dissecting that day. The skeptical Dr. Richmond maintained that these phenomena were the result of "magneto-odylic" emanations from the medium.

Sources:

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. 2 vols. Rev. ed. as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Ashtar

Ashtar was one of the original extraterrestrial entities who appeared among the flying saucer contactees of the 1950s. In his booklet, I Rode a Flying Saucer!, George Van Tassell (1910–1978) claimed that he had begun to receive messages from alien beings from a planet named Shanchea. These channeled messages were directed toward the people of Earth, warning that humanity's warlike ways, in the development of super atomic weapons, threatened the peace not just of Earth, but of the solar system and beyond. Van Tassel began receiving these messages in January of 1952, but it was not until July that an entity named Portla sent the following message: "Approaching your solar system is a ventla [flying saucer] with our chief aboard, commandant of the station Schare in charge of four sectors." The commandant soon introduced himself to Van Tassell as "Ashtar, commandant quadra sector, patrol station Schare, all projections, all waves." Ashtar's subsequent messages would expand upon the anti-atomic weapon theme developed by his extraterrestrial colleagues.

Of all the entities with whom Van Tassel claimed contact, for reasons not altogether clear, Ashtar turned out to be the one to whom people responded and within a few months messages from Ashtar began to be received and spread by other channels. The term "channel," a reference to the new phenomenon of television, began to be used among contactees for one who was receiving messages telepathically from outer space beings. It replaced the Spiritualist term "medium," one who received messages from the deceased.

As the scientific effort to study UFOs emerged and ufology separated itself from what was seen as the lunatic fringe of flying saucer believers, the contactees assumed a role analogous to religious prophets and the extraterrestrial entities who spoke through them emphasized a message that continued the teachings previously advocated by Spiritualists and Theosophists. Ashtar assumed a status similar to such previous spiritual entities as White Eagle and El Morya.

After Van Tassell passed from the scene, in the 1980s a new contactee, Thelma B. Turrell, better known by her public name Tuella, emerged as Ashtar's primary spokesperson. In 1985, she collected many of Ashtar's messages in a book called simply Ashtar: A Tribute, and through the 1980s a number of other people around the world continued to receive messages by and about him, including no less a personage than New Age channel Ruth Montgomery. Ashtar came to be seen as the Supreme Director in charge of the spiritual program for the Earth, and those he led as the Ashtar Command. He was in charge of the 20 million space brothers (and sisters) who were lowering their own vibratory rate so to be enabled to work with earthlings and prepare them for their future evolution.

Messages from the Ashtar Command flourished as the New Age Movement peaked and continued through the 1990s. By the end of the decade, however, so many varied descriptions of Ashtar existed that it became impossible to depict his likeness, and so many contradictory bits of information about him had been written, that it has been difficult to write his biography. Some channels picked up on the positive millennialism of the New Age; others joined in the dark apocalyticism warning of imminent catastrophic events that have repeatedly appeared on the fringes of Western society through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Ashtar's spokespersons resonated with the public anxiety over the hydrogen bomb, but as the threat of nuclear holocaust faded from the public consciousness, a notable shift to more traditional warnings of natural disasters, such as pole shifts, occurred. Ashtar literature continues to circulate in New Age circles and has found its place on the Internet.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. "UFO Reporter: Our Friends from the Ashtar Command." Fate 42, no.11 (November 1989): 37–41.

Montgomery, Ruth. Aliens Among Us. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1985.

Tuella [pseudonym of Thelma B. Turrell], ed. Ashtar: A Tribute. Salt Lake City, UT: Guardian Action Publications, 1985.

———. Project World Evacuation: By the Ashtar Command. Salt Lake City, UT: Guardian Action Publications, 1982.

Van Tassell, George. I Rode a Flying Saucer! The Mystery of the Flying Saucers Revealed. Los Angeles: New Age Publishing, 1952.

Ash Tree

There are many old superstitions of the wonderful influence of the ash tree. The old Christmas log was of ash wood, and its use was helpful to the future prosperity of the family. Venomous animals, it was said, would not take shelter under its branches. A carriage with its axles made of ash wood was believed to go faster than a carriage with its axles made of any other wood, and tools with handles made of this wood were supposed to enable a man to do more work than he could do with tools whose handles were not of ash. Hence the reason that ash wood is generally used for tool handles. It was upon ash branches that witches were enabled to ride through the air, and those who ate the red buds of the tree on St. John's Eve were rendered invulnerable to witches' influence.

In speaking of the ash, reference was often to the mountain ash or rowan tree.

Sources:

Porteous, Alexander. Forest Folklore, Mythology, and Romance. London: George Allen & Unwin, 1928.

Asiah

According to the Kabala, Asiah is the first of the three classes or natural ranks around the spirits of men, who must advance from the lower to the higher.

Asipu

Priests of ancient Mesopotamia. (See also Semites)

Asmodeus

Ancient Persian demon of lust and rage who also appeared in ancient Jewish folklore, where he was believed to cause strife between husband and wife. He is mentioned in the book of Tobit ca. 250 B.C.E., where he attempts to cause trouble between Tobias and his wife, Sarah. Jewish legends claim that Asmodeus was the result of a union between the woman Naamah and a fallen angel. Asmodeus was often represented in magical texts as having three heads—a man, a bull, and a ram, riding a dragon, and carrying a spear. Directions for evoking this demon are contained in the well-known magical textbook The Magus; or, Celestial Intelligencer by Francis Barrett (1801).

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus. London, 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Aspidomancy

A little-known form of divination practiced in the Indies. According to the seventeenth-century writer Pierre de Lancre, the diviner traces a circle, takes up his position seated on a buckler (shield), and mutters certain conjurations. He becomes entranced and falls into an ecstasy, from which he emerges to answer his client's queries with revelations from the devil.

Asports

The reverse of apport phenomena—the disappearance of objects from the séance room through the barriers of intervening matter and their appearance at another spot. It is seldom attempted as an independent demonstration and may more often form part of an apport materialization, as in the Millesimo séances with the Marquis Centurione Scotto and Mme. Fabian Rossi.

In a sitting on July 8, 1928, the members of the circle were tapped by a little parchment drum and Rossi and Mme. la Marquise Luisa felt their hands squeezed by two iron mittens. At the conclusion of the sittings, these objects were no longer in the room. The drum was found in the large salon where it previously stood, while the mittens were discovered at the foot of the suit of armor from which they had previously been detached.

Sources:

Hack, Gwendolyn K. Modern Psychic Mysteries: Millesimo Castle, Italy. London, 1929.

ASPR See American Society for Psychical Research

ASPR Newsletter

The news bulletin of the American Society for Psychical Research, which began publication in 1968. It features information on activities of the society and features nontechnical rewrites of articles from the society's Journal. The society is at 5 W. 73rd St. New York, NY 10023. The newsletter is also available online at http://www.aspr.com/.

Ass

Many superstitions concern this familiar animal. The Egyptians traced his image on the cakes they offered to Typhon, god of evil. The Romans regarded the meeting of an ass as an evil omen, but the animal was honored in Arabia and Judea, and it was in Arabia that the ass of Silenus spoke to his master. Other talking asses were Balaam's ass (Numbers 22), which Mahomet placed in his paradise with Alborack; the ass of Aasis, Queen of Sheba; and the ass on which Jesus Christ rode into Jerusalem.

Some people have found something sacred and mysterious in the innocent beast, and a species of divination employed the head of an ass. At one time a special festival was held for the ass, during which he was led into the church while mass was sung. This reverence in which he was held by Christians was doubtless due to the black cross which he wore on his back, and which, it is said, was given him after the ass of Bethphage carried Christ into Jerusalem. But Pliny, who carefully gathered all that related to the animal, made no mention concerning the color of its coat. It seems likely, therefore, that the ass of today is as he always was.

It was not only the devout who respected the ass, for the wise Agrippa offered him an apology in his book, On the Vanity of the Sciences (1530). Among the Indians of Madras, the people of the Cavaravadonques, one of the principal castes, claimed to be descended from an ass. These Indians treated the ass as a brother, took his part, and prosecuted those who overburdened or ill-treated him in any way. In rainy weather they would often give him shelter when they denied it to his driver.

One old fable shows the ass in an unfavorable light. Jupiter had just taken possession of Olympus. On his coming, men asked of him an eternal springtime, which he accordingly granted, charging the ass of Silenus to bear the precious treasure to earth. The ass became thirsty and approached a fountain guarded by a snake, who refused to let the ass drink unless he parted with the treasure. The stupid animal thereupon bartered the gift of heaven for a skin of water, and since that time snakes, when they grow old, can change their skin and become young again, for they have the gift of perpetual springtime.

Another fable endows the creature with greater intelligence. In a village a few miles from Cairo, there lived a mountebank who possessed a highly trained ass, so clever that the country people took it to be a demon in disguise. One day the mountebank mentioned in the ass's hearing that the sultan wished to construct a beautiful building and planned to employ all the asses in Cairo to carry the lime, mortar, and stones. The ass immediately lay down and pretended to be dead, and his master begged for money to buy another. When he had collected some, he returned to his old ass. "He is not dead," he said; "he only pretended to die because he knew I had not the wherewithal to buy him food." Still the ass refused to rise, and the mountebank addressed the company, telling them that the sultan had sent out the criers commanding the people to assemble the next day outside Cairo to see the most wonderful sights in the world. He further desired that the most gracious ladies and the most beautiful girls should be mounted on asses. The ass raised himself and pricked up his ears. "The governor of my quarter," added the mountebank, "has begged me to lend my ass for his wife, who is old and toothless, and very ugly." The ass began to limp as though he were old and lame. "Ah, you like beautiful ladies?" said his master. The animal bowed his head. "Oh, well," said the man, "there are many present; show me the most beautiful." The ass obeyed with judgment and discretion.

These marvelous asses, said the demonologists, were, if not demons, at least men metamorphosed, like Apuleius, who was transformed into an ass. Vincent de Beauvais speaks of two women who kept a little inn near Rome and who sold their guests at the market after having changed them into pigs, fowls, or sheep. One of them, he adds, changed a certain comedian into an ass, and as he retained his talents under his new skin, she led him to the fairs on the outskirts of the city, gaining much money thereby. A neighbor bought this wise ass at a good price, and in handing it over the sorcerers felt obliged to warn the purchaser not to let the ass enter water. Its new master attended to the warning for some time, but one day the poor ass managed to get free and jumped into a lake, where it regained its natural shape, to the great surprise of its driver. The matter was brought to the ears of the pope, who had the two witches punished, while the comedian returned to of his profession.

Many stories are told of the ass that carried Jesus Christ into Jerusalem, which is said to have died at Verona, where its remains are still honored. They say the ass is a privileged animal that God formed at the end of the sixth day. Abraham employed it to carry the wood for the sacrifice of Isaac; it also carried the wife and son of Moses in the desert. The rabbis maintained that Balaam's ass was carefully nourished and hidden in a secret place until the coming of the Jewish Messiah.

Assagioli, Roberto (1888–1974)

Psychiatrist, psychotherapist, and parapsychologist. He was born February 27, 1888, in Venice, Italy, and educated at University of Florence (M.D.). As a young psychiatrist he became disenchanted with first Freudian and then Jungian psychoanalysis. Thus he turned his attention to the development of a new psychology he termed psychosynthesis. Psychosynthesis assumes that in addition to the conscious self, or "I", every person also has a pathway to a "Higher Self," which is a reflection of the divine. The purpose of each human life is to participate as fully as possible in self-evolution along that pathway. The system was left open so that both individuals and any psychologists could participate in developing psychosynthesis and incorporate the various occult tools of transformation.

Assagioli founded the Institute of Psychosynthesis in 1926. He met Alice Bailey during the early 1930s, and they became friends; their organizations have retained a working association. Psychosynthesis was suppressed during World War II, and Assagioli was arrested. He spent his prison days exploring meditation and altered states of consciousness. After the war he revived his work and promoted the founding of institutes in the United States, Greece, and England.

In 1958 Assagioli became chair of the Psychosynthesis Research Foundation at Greenville, Delaware, and editor of Psiche-Rivista di Studi Psicologici. During his mature years, he authored a set of books which became the major statements of psychosynthesis. He died in Capaiona, Italy, on August 23, 1974.

Sources:

Assagioli, Roberto. The Act of Will. New York: Viking/Penguin, 1973.

———. Parapsychological Faculties and Psychological Disturbances. London: Medical Society for Study of Radiesthesia, 1958.

———. Psychosynthesis: A Manual of Principles and Techniques. Rev. ed. New York: Viking/Penguin, 1971.

Assailly, Alain Jean Joseph (1909– ?)

French physician and neuro-endocrinologist who studied psychophysiology of mediumship and hauntings and published articles on these subjects. Born October 17, 1909, at Pontchateau (Loire-Infériere), France, he became consulting psychiatrist to Bichat Hospital and was awarded the Croix de Guerre in World War II. He contributed the chapter "Modern Man Faced with the Problem of the Supernatural" to the book Medicine and the Supernatural (1957).

ASSAP See Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena

ASSAP News

Newsletter of the Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena. It provided news of individuals and groups concerned with a wide range of anomalous phenomena and was also associated with the ASSAP's quarterly journal Common Ground until it ceased publication in 1984. Last known address: Caroline Wise, 56 Telemann Sq., Kidbrook, London SE3, England.

Assassins

The contemporary term "assassin," referring to someone murdering a political or religious leader, derives from the use of the term to describe a mystical Islamic sect that arose in the twelfth century following the destruction of the Fatimid dynasty in Egypt. Following the emergence of Islam, it had split into factions due to differences over the leadership of the community. One group saw the leadership passing to the descendents of Muhammad. Today these Muslims are known as Shi'ites and constitute about 20 percent of Islam. They are concentrated in Iran and Iraq, but there are large Shia minorities in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

For several centuries after Muhammad's death, the Shia community was headed by an Imam. The 12th such leader, Muhammad ibn al-'Askari, took office in 873 C.E., after his father died. He was only four years of age. Within days he disappeared, never to be seen again. As he had no brothers, the lineage ceased to exist. The Shia community was in crisis. Refusing to believe that they had been left leaderless, the community came to believe that the 12th Imam was still alive and that at some point in the future would reappear as the chosen one mentioned in the Quran, as the Madhi. Because of their belief in the 12th, Shia Muslims are often referred to as Twelvers. In the meantime, leadership passed to a council of leaders, the Ayatollahs.

In the century before the crisis of the 12th Imam, Isma'il, the eldest son of the sixth Imam, died before his father. While most Shias supported the younger son as the new Imam, a minority refused to recognize him and declared the lineage extinct with the passing of Isma'il in 762. They became known as Ismailis, or Seveners, as Isma'il would have been the seventh Imam.

The Ismailis developed an esoteric doctrine built around the number seven. Allah (God), for example, was seen as the seventh dimension who held the other six in balance. The world would last for seven millennia. More importantly, they took one of Isma'il's descendents as their new Imam, suggesting that a new line of seven Imams was beginning. Their belief was finally put together in a book, Rasa'il ikhwan al-safa (Epistles of the Brethren of Purity). As a minority, in order to survive, the Ismailis created a secret underground culture, and would pose as Christians and Jews in some countries. The Imam remained in seclusion. Only in the tenth century were they able to rise up and establish a homeland in Egypt. Their rulers were known as the Fatimids, after Fatima the daughter of Muhammad. The Fatimids, who turned Cairo into a major city and created their famous university, ruled until 1173, when they were driven out by Sunni Muslims (the majority party in the world of Islam).

In the wake of the fall of the Fatimid dynasty, two parties arose, each attempting to regain the throne. The first supported the Fatimid prince, al-Tayyib. The other supported al-Tayyib's brother Nizir. Unable to regain the throne, the Niziriyah moved their headquarters to Syria and resumed the underground existence that had been standard in the Ismaili community prior to the dynasty in Egypt. In expectation of the imminent arrival of the Madhi, they also introduced the doctrine of repudiation of the law which the Madhi would restore. The effect of this doctrine was to introduce alcohol, and more significantly, hashish use into the community. The word "assassin" means, literally, hashish user.

The Niziriyah again moved their headquarters, to the Alamut Valley in northern Persia, and here built a mountain fortress. The men who resided in the fortress smoked hashish and learned the fine art of killing. They were masters of the sword and proficient with poisons. They became the terror of Muslim lands for the next two centuries. Alamat was designed as an earthly representation of Paradise and those sent out on killing missions were assured that if they died during their mission they would go straight to the heavenly Paradise. Alamut was finally captured in 1256, but assassin fortresses in Syria survived until the sixteenth century. The assassins gradually dropped their distinctive ways, including murder and hashish, reconciled with the other Ismaili factions, and continue to the present under their present Imam, still a descendent of Nizir, the Aga Khan.

Sources:

What Is Islam?: A Comprehensive Introduction. London: Virgin, 1998.

Association for Astrological Networking (AFAN)

AFAN was founded in Chicago in 1983 by members of the American Federation of Astrology who were dissatisfied with some of its more conservative policies. The new organization took an aggressive stance toward changing public opinion about astrology, seeking to reverse negative rulings concerning astrological practice in the courts and to promote networking among different astrological organizations.

AFAN began by creating an open, democratic organization. In 1984 it moved to Europe and became a catalyst for networking among European astrological organizations. At the 1987 World Astrological Congress in Zurich, delegates created the Astrological Registration and Communication. In 1986 AFAN joined with the Institute for the Study of American Religion (ISAR) and the National Council for Geocosmic Research in sponsoring the first United Astrology Congress (UAC), which has met at regular intervals since.

On the legal front, AFAN prepared a legal information kit for astrologers, began write-in campaigns to overturn antiastrology ordinances in various cities, worked to defeat an antiastrology statute in Los Angeles County, and backed a case in the California courts guaranteeing astrologers their rights in the state. The long-term strategy is to have the federal courts recognize the legitimacy of astrology.

A media-watch program was instituted to respond to negative coverage of astrology in the United States and Canada. Incorrect statements are refuted and a positive image is projected.

As of the mid-1990s, AFAN established an international network of astrologers on every continent. It publishes a newsletter, operates a speakers bureau, and manages an education scholarship fund. AFAN's council includes a number of nationally and internationally known astrologers. Address: 8306 Wilshire Blvd., Ste. 537, Beverly Hills, CA 90211. Website: http://www.afan.org/.

Association for Holotropic Breathwork International

The Association for Holotropic Breathwork International is a nonprofit organization that has emerged in the wake of the successful spread of the Holotropic Breathwork technique developed in the 1970s by Stanislav Grof and his wife, Christina Grof. Holotropic Breathwork uses a form of accelerated breathing to create an altered state of consciousness in the practitioner. Many people find it a useful tool of self-exploration and some have experienced a range of therapeutic benefits. Following its development and initial testing at the Esalen Institute, where the Grofs resided for 14 years beginning in 1973, the Grofs regularly offered breathwork workshops and then began to train and certify people to teach. By 1997 more than 300,000 individuals were believed to have taken the basic workshop.

The association does not itself offer the basic workshop or the teacher training (both of which are obtained through Grof Transpersonal Training). It is designed to promote the understanding of Holotropic Breathwork and educate the general public concerning its benefits, as well as to provide fellowship for the users of the technique and serve as a professional association for the teachers. Membership is open to the general public, but the association has a special membership category for certified teachers, who must go through a two-year training program prior to receiving authorization to teach.

The association publishes a periodical, The Inner Door. It may be contacted at Box 7169, Santa Cruz, CA 95061-7169, and supports an extensive Internet site at http://www.breathwork.com/. Included in the Internet site are Web pages of certified teachers.

Sources:

Association for Holotropic Breathwork International. http://www.breathwork.com/. May 22, 2000.

Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE)

An organization founded by the late Edgar Cayce (1877–1945) in 1931. Cayce, one of the outstanding psychics of the twentieth century, gave readings almost daily during his mature years on subjects ranging from diagnosis of illness to astrology, reflections on future earth changes, and the nature of the afterlife. Known as "the sleeping prophet," he gave many thousands of readings to clients who consulted him. He spoke in a rapidly induced trance condition resembling normal sleep, and his statements were taken down by a stenographer.

Cayce moved to Virginia Beach in the 1920s. With the backing of Morton Blumenthal, a wealthy businessman, Cayce hoped to develop a hospital and university. The former opened in 1928 and the latter in 1930, but both failed along with Blumenthal's business enterprises in 1931. With the readings as the basic means of support, Cayce and his close associates founded two organizations: the Association for Research and Enlightenment, (ARE), a public fellowship of Cayce's clients and followers; and the Edgar Cayce Foundation, a private corporation to hold the Cayce papers (especially the transcripts of the readings) and the property.

After Cayce's death in 1945, his son Hugh Lynn Cayce became head of the ARE. Personnel began the process of sorting, indexing, and studying the approximately 14,000 transcripts of the Cayce readings. Hugh Lynn began an aggressive program of building the association, but not until the late 1960s, when Jess Stern's biography of Cayce, The Sleeping Prophet (1967), became a best-seller, did the ARE begin to grow appreciably. In the wake of The Sleeping Prophet's success, Hugh Lynn contracted with Paperback Library to do a series of books based on the readings. These became highly successful and made the ARE one of the largest and most stable associations in the psychic community.

The ARE sponsors lectures, symposia, psychic research, prayer and meditation workshops, a summer camp, and Search for God study groups. It maintains a therapy department and a 60,000-volume library on metaphysics, psychic phenomena, and related subjects. The Edgar Cayce Foundation has custody of the readings and conducts a continuous program of indexing, extracting, microfilming, and otherwise organizing the material in the data files, which are open to the public in print form and on CD-ROM disc. The ARE has sponsored a host of books and booklets on the Cayce materials, some published by the foundation and some by commercial publishers. Several periodicals are produced, including Venture Inward, The New Millennium, and Chrysalis Rising, a quarterly newsletter for its Search For God group members.

The association, which seeks to give physical, mental, and spiritual help through investigation of the Cayce readings, runs a Health Services Department offering massages, steams, etc., closely tied to its Cayce/Reilly School of Massotherapy and a Health Research and Rejuvenation Center, involved in applying the health readings and information to many different disease conditions. The association also maintains an affiliation with Atlantic University, which offers a master's degree program in Transpersonal Studies.

Currently headed by Edgar Cayce's grandson, Charles Thomas Cayce, the ARE may be contacted at 215 67th St., Virginia Beach, Virginia 23451-2061. Website: http://www.are-cayce.com.

Sources:

Bolton, Brett, ed. Edgar Cayce Speaks. New York: Avon, 1969.

Bro, Harmon Hartzell. A Seer Out of Season: The Life of Edgar Cayce. New York: New American Library, 1989.

Cayce, Hugh Lynn, ed. The Edgar Cayce Reader. 2 vols. New York: Paperback Library, 1969.

Puryear, Herbert B. The Edgar Cayce Primer. New York: Bantam Books, 1982.

Smith, Robert A. Hugh Lynn Cayce: About My Father's Business. Norfolk, Va.: Donning, 1988.

Association for the Alignment of Past Life Experience

The Association for the Alignment of Past Life Experience grew out of the work of Morris Netherton, a pioneer practitioner of past life therapy. He began his career as a psychological counselor with the Los Angeles County Probation Department for 14 years before moving into private practice. Here he was able to work with the idea of reincarnation and previous embodied lives as a tool in psychotherapy. In 1978 he wrote the original book on regression therapy, Past Life Therapy, that included accounts of people who had been regressed to birth and/or to a previous existence as part of their healing treatment. Continued work with regression therapy led him to develop what is now known as the Netherton Method of past life therapy. Netherton's second book on the therapeutic techniques, Past Life Discovery & Integration: A Teaching Manual, appeared in 1996.

The association was founded to teach and practice the Netherton Method. It is the assumption of the Netherton Method that one's current life can be enriched by knowledge of one's past life experiences. Netherton does not use any formal hypnotic induction, but relies upon the existence of hypnotic states that remain in the patient from prior traumatic experiences and are still unresolved in the present. While it is Netherton's opinion that a belief in reincarnation is not necessary to successfully use his method, it is also his opinion that those undergoing therapy should integrate personal religious beliefs with the techniques and procedures. Such integration allows the process to be experienced fully by all aspects of the self. For some people, the experiences of past life therapy may lead to a radical change in spiritual perspectives.

The association offers classes leading to certification as a past life therapist in the Netherton Method. It includes an introductory weekend, a set of classes, and supervised clinical sessions. Any professional who completes the training may be certified. The association may be contacted through its Internet site at http://www.aaple.com/.

Sources:

Association for the Alignment of Past Life Experience. http://www.aaple.com/. May 20, 2000.

Netherton, Morris. Past Life Discovery & Integration: A Teaching Manual. Privately printed, 1996.

———. Past Life Therapy. New York: William Morrow, 1986.

Association for the Anthropological Study of Consciousness See Society for the Anthropology of Consciousness

Association for the Development of Human Potential

Founded in 1970 with the purpose of promoting scientific investigations into the interrelationship of the physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual aspects of the human being. This research consisted of inquiry into those methods of study, practice, and discipline that may be used to broaden and deepen consciousness. The association conducted formal educational programs to disseminate research results, and it published books and audiovisual educational materials. It was affiliated with the Yasodhara Ashram Society. Last known address: Box 60, Porthill, ID 83853.

Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena (ASSAP)

British organization founded June 10, 1981, to obtain, store, process, and disseminate information concerning areas of human experience and observed phenomena for which no generally acceptable explanation is as yet forthcoming; to encourage and aid investigation and research into these phenomena by investigative groups; and to provide a multidisciplinary forum for the exchange of views and information concerning these phenomena. "Anomaly" is defined as "irregularity, deviation from the common or natural order, exception condition or circumstance," and anomalous phenomena cover a wide field of the paranormal as well as Fortean phenomena, including altered states of consciousness, apparitions, electronic voice phenomenon, extrasensory perception, falls, firewalking, healing, hypnosis, levitation, ley lines, metal bending, out-of-the-body experiences, poltergeists, telepathy, UFOs, etc.

ASSAP, an integrating body with no corporate views, discouraged dogmatism while it adopted a scientific approach at all times. It did not wish to replace existing organizations in the field but rather support and encourage them. It published ASSAP Newsletter. Its quarterly journal, Common Ground, ceased publication in 1984. Last known address: 30 South Row, London SE3 ORY, England.

Association for the Understanding of Man (AUM)

A nonprofit corporation founded in 1971 in Austin, Texas, as a vehicle for the psychic activity of Ray Stanford. Stanford is a trance medium who channels messages from the "Source," believed to be his superconsciousness. Besides its more religious activities, the association carried on a research program in several areas. Project Starlight concerned itself with UFOs; through it the short-lived Journal of Instrumented UFO Research was issued. A research division concerned with parapsychology was headed by Ray Stanford's brother, Rex G. Stanford. AUM was disbanded in the early 1980s.

Association for Transpersonal Psychology

Organization concerned with the study of transpersonal psychology, defined as "those experiences which seem to be more than just of the self, those perceptions of life and the universe which are basic to sentient beings, those feelings, which express a profound commonality with all that is, and those thoughts and ideas which transcend ego considerations." The association publishes a quarterly Newsletter, giving news of the association's activities and bibliographies of the subject as well as a semi-annual journal, The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology. Address: PO Box 3049, Stanford, CA 94309. Website: http://www.atpweb.org/.

Association Internationale de Recherche Psychotronique (International Association for Psychotronic Research)

Founded in 1973 to study psychotronics, the relationship of man to the universe, interaction with other physical bodies and matter, and fields of energy, known or unknown. The association publishes biennial multilingual Proceedings. Address: V Chaloupkach 59, Hloubetin, CS–194 01 Prague 9, Czech Republic.

Association of Progressive Spiritualists of Great Britain

The first organization representing Spiritualism in England, formed in 1865. The first convention was held in Darlington, with the objects of "social communion, interchange of sentiment or opinion to record and catalogue our united experience, and the progress which Spiritualism is making in and around us; to devise means for propagating and diffusing among our fellow men and women the principles and soul saving truths of this Divine philosophy by distribution of the best tracts and books." The third convention in London in 1867 attracted representatives from America, France, and Germany. The association declined after 1868, possibly because it was based on individual membership rather than a firm foundation of local groups, and is no longer in existence.

Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara

The Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara was founded in 1965 by Sister Thedra (the religious name of Dorothy Martin), a New Age channel. However, the association was rooted in more than a decade of prior channeling activity. In the 1950s Martin had been the leader of an early UFO contactee group that became the subject of a famous sociological study, When Prophecy Fails (1956). She was identified as Mrs. Keech in the study.

In When Prophecy Fails, the group was described as breaking up, but Martin went on to a lengthy career as a channel and leader within the contactee community. In 1954, after the disruption of the group in Illinois, she moved to Peru. She later explained that she had been healed by Sananda (Jesus) and instructed to go to South America. Much of that time was spent at the Brotherhood of the Seven Rays, the community established by fellow contactee George Hunt Williamson. These years were a time of intense growth, and before returning to the United States she began to send out transcripts of the messages she was receiving from the masters.

In 1961 Sister Thedra returned to the United States and settled in Arizona. She established the Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara in 1965 and a short time later relocated to Mount Shasta, California. In 1988 she and the group returned to Sedona, Arizona. The association existed as a far-flung network of people who received the teachings of those who spoke through Sister Thedra. The advanced beings she channeled were seen as both spiritually advanced and coming from outer space.

Martin has since died and no new channel has arisen to take her place. The association may be reached at 2675 W. Highway 89-A, #454, Sedona, AZ 86336, where the newsletter, Call to Arms may be obtained.

Sources:

Festinger, Leon, Henry W. Riecken, and Stanley Schachter. When Prophecy Fails. New York: Harper & Row, 1956.

Sananda, as recorded by Sister Thedra. I, the Lord God Says Unto Them. Mt. Shasta, Calif.: Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara, [1954].

Thedra. Excerts of Prophecies from Other Planets Concerning Our Earth. Mt. Shasta, Calif.: Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara, [1956].

———. Mine Intercome Messages from the Realms of Light. Sedona, Ariz.: Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara, [1990].

Association pour la Recherche et l'Information sur l'Esotericisme (ARIES)

The Association pour la Recherche et l'Information sur l'Esotericisme (ARIES) is both an international scholarly association and periodical focused upon defining and researching the Western esoteric tradition, especially as it has manifested since the Renaissance. The leading personality in the emergence and development of ARIES has been Antoine Faivre. Through the 1990s, Faivre, a senior professor of the religious studies faculty at the University of Paris (the Sorbonne) has been holding the only academic chair devoted primarily to the study of esotericism in the world, the chair in the "history of Western Esoteric and Mystical Currents in Modern and Contemporary Europe." Through the 1980s and 1990s, Faivre wrote and edited a series of books that have explored the intellectual currents and tradition formed by the esoteric thinkers from the sixteenth century to the present. These books have attempted to distinguish the various currents of esoteric thought and to define criteria for approaching and studying the form of thought proper to these currents. ARIES was founded in 1985 with Faivre, R. E. Deghaye, and Pierre Deghaye serving as its three co-directors.

ARIES, the professional association, sponsors symposia and colloquies irregularly. ARIES, the journal, is issued biannually. Each issue includes several articles on modern Western esotericism by scholars from around the world. It is explicitly multilingual, contributions being accepted in German, French, or English. A significant portion of each issue is devoted to book reviews and surveys of periodicals concerned with various issues (theosophy, alchemy, hermeticism, Rosicrucianism, Christian kabbalah, etc.).

Study of the esoteric tradition as an important subdiscipline in religious studies was given a significant boost at the end of the 1990s when the University of Amsterdam established a new chair in the History of Hermetic Philosophy and Related Currents as part of its Department of Theology/Religious Studies. That chair is now held by Wouter J. Hanegraaff. Beginning in 2000, E. J. Brill of Leiden, The Netherlands, assumed responsibility for publishing ARIES. These two events have led to the development of a second center of primary activity for ARIES. Hanegraaff now serves with Antoine Faivre and Roland Edighoffer as an editor of the journal.

The association ARIES may be contacted at 8 Chemin Scribe, 92190 Meudon, France. The journal ARIES may be contacted at 76, rue Quincampoix, 73003 Paris (for issues 1–22, 1985–99, and the Proceedings), and at E. J. Brill, P.O. Box 9000, 2300 PA Leiden, The Netherlands (for current subscriptions).

Sources:

ARIES. Paris, France, n.d.

Faivre, Antoine. Access to Western Esotericism. Albany: State University Press of New York, 1994.

———. Theosophy, Imagination, Tradition: Studies in Western Esotericism. Albany: State University Press of New York, 2000.

Faivre, Antoine, and Jacob Needleman, eds. Modern Esoteric Spirituality. New York: Crossroad, 1992.

Hanegraaff, Wouter J. New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996.

Associazione Italiana Scientifica de Metapsichica

The Associazione Italiana Scientifica di Metaphichica (the Italian Scientific Association of Metaphysics) was established in Milan in 1946 to disseminate information on parapsychology, psychical research, and related topics to Italian parapsychological groups and the general public and secondarily to support new research on paranormal phenomena by individuals. It publishes a journal, Metapsichica, considered by many as Italy's finest psychical research periodical. The association may be contacted at Via S. Vittore 1920123, Milano, Italy.

Astara

Astara is a hermetic occult fraternity founded in 1951 by Robert and Earlyne Chaney, both former Spiritualists. As a young medium, Robert Chaney had been active in the Spiritualist community in the Midwest in the 1930s and 1940s and was one of the founders of the Spiritualist Episcopal Church in 1941. He became somewhat alienated from Spiritualism after reading theosophical and hermetic literature and accepting some ideas, such as reincarnation, he discovered there. Reincarnation was still a very controversial idea in Spiritualism at the time. Meanwhile, Earlyne Chaney, who had been a clairvoyant since childhood, had held conversations with a spirit being who called himself Kut-Hu-Mi. She later discovered this being described in theosophical literature. Kut-Hu-Mi told Chaney that she had been selected for a special task—teaching the ancient wisdom to the people of the New Age. The Chaneys resigned from their church in Eaton Rapids, Michigan, moved to Los Angeles, and founded Astara.

Astara's teachings are an eclectic body. They draw on Christianity, Spiritualism, Theosophy, yoga, and especially on the ancient Egyptian teachings of Hermes Trismegistus, who is believed to have organized the original mystery school from which all others ultimately derive. The Chaneys also have made themselves open to new insights from the world's religions and philosophies.

From Hermes, Astara teaches that God is the only uncreated reality and that he has emanated his seven attributes and all that exists. Hermes taught the seven laws beginning with the magical law of correspondence ("As above, so below"). The law concisely states that any part of the world reflects the structure of the whole. Other laws deal with basic observations concerning motion, polarity, cycles, cause and effect, gender, and mind. The acceptance of these laws leads to a number of spiritual practices. Central to Astara is Lama Yoga, a method of mind expansion originally taught to Earlyne Chaney by the masters. The law of vibration has led to the practice of reciting "Om," the Sanskrit word believed to encompass the creative energy of the universe. Along with other yogic and meditative techniques, Astara recommends a natural food diet that leans toward vegetarianism.

Astara is headquartered in a complex in Upland, California, where members congregate and regular Sunday services and a cycle of conferences and retreats are held throughout the year. Most members relate to Astara through a set of correspondence lessons, the Book of Life. The Book of Life lessons function as a guru to the student and replace any need for a personal teacher. Apart from the lessons, both Chaneys have written a number of books and shorter works. In 1988 there were approximately 18,000 students. Astara may be contacted at 800 W. Arrow Hwy., Box 5003, Upland, California 91785.

Sources:

Chaney, Earlyne. Beyond Tomorrow. Upland, Calif.: Astara, 1985.

———. Remembering. Los Angeles: Astara's Library of Mystical Classics, 1974.

Chaney, Earlyne, and William L. Messick. Kundalini and the Third Eye. Upland, Calif.: Astara's Library of Mystical Classics, 1980.

Chaney, Robert. The Inner Way. Los Angeles: De Vorss, 1962.

———. Mysticism: The Journey Within. Upland, Calif.: Astara's Library of Mystical Classics, 1979.

Astolpho

A hero of Italian romance, the son of Otho, king of England. He is the subject of Aristo's Orlando Furioso. Astolpho was transformed into a myrtle by Alcina, a sorceress, but later regained his human form through Melissa. He took part in many adventures and cured Orlando of his madness. Astolpho is the allegorical representation of a true man lost through sensuality.

Astragalomancy

A system of divination involving casting small bones (each associated with particular interpretations), rather in the manner of throwing dice. Later developments in fact utilized dice in place of bones, the numbers being associated with letters, to form words which had a bearing on the questions put by the diviner. An associated preliminary ritual was sometimes used, involving writing a question on paper and passing it through the smoke of burning juniper wood.

Astral Body

An exact replica of the physical body but composed of finer matter. The term is chiefly employed in Theosophy, and those numerous occult systems derived from it, to denote the link between the nervous system and the cosmic reservoir of energy. The astral body corresponds to the double of out-of-the-body experiences reported in psychic research. The term double, however, is less comprehensive and refers only to the living; astral body refers specifically to the bodily counterpart of the dead. The etheric double or body, in Theosophy, is distinct from the astral, but in Spiritualistic literature they are often interchanged. These concepts derive from traditional Hindu mysticism, though there are also Western precursors.

The astral body is the instrument of passions, emotions, and desires, and, since it interpenetrates and extends beyond the physical body, it is the medium through which these are conveyed to the latter. When it separates from the denser body—during sleep, or by the influence of drugs, or as the result of accidents—it takes with it the capacity for feeling, and only with its return can pain or any other such phenomena be felt. During these periods of separation, the astral body is an exact replica of the physical, and as it is extremely sensitive to thought, the apparitions of dead and dying resemble even to the smallest details the physical bodies which they have lately left.

The Astral World is said to be attainable to clairvoyants, and many claim that the appropriate body is therefore visible to them. In accordance with theosophical teaching, thought is not the abstraction it is commonly considered to be, but is built up of definite forms, the shape of which depends on the quality of the thought. It also causes definite vibrations, which are seen as colors. Hence, clairvoyants may tell the state of a man's development from the appearance of his astral body.

For example, some suggest that a nebulous appearance indicates imperfect development, while an ovoid appearance betokens a more perfect development. As the colors are indicative of the kind of thought, the variety of these in the astral body indicates the possessor's character. Inferior thoughts produce loud colors, so that rage, for instance, will be recognized by the red appearance of the astral body. Higher thoughts will be recognizable by the presence of delicate colors; religious thought, for instance, will cause a blue color.

This teaching holds true for the bodies higher than the astral, but the coloration of the astral body is much more familiar to those dwellers in the physical world who can see into the astral plane. Less familiar are the coloration and feelings of the higher bodies, for humans are relatively unacquainted with them.

There is a definite theory underlying the emotional and other functions of the astral body. The astral body is not composed of matter alive with an intelligent life, but it nevertheless possesses a kind of life sufficient to convey an understanding of its own existence and wants. The stage of evolution of this astral life is that of descent, the turning point not having yet been reached. He who possesses the physical body has, on the other hand, commenced to ascend, and there is, therefore, a continual opposition of forces between him and his astral body. Hence, the astral body accentuates in him such grosser, retrograde thoughts as he may nourish, since the direction of these thoughts coincides with its own direction. If, however, he resists the opposition of his astral body, the craving of the latter gradually becomes weaker and weaker, till at last it disappears altogether. The constitution of the astral body is thereby altered, for gross thoughts demand for their medium gross astral matter, while pure thoughts demand fine astral matter. During physical life the various kinds of matter in the astral body are intermingled, but at physical death the elementary life in the matter of the astral body seeks instinctively after self-preservation, and it therefore causes the matter to rearrange itself in a series of seven concentric sheaths, the densest being outside and the finest inside.

Physical vision depends on the eyes, but astral vision depends on the various kinds of astral matter capable of receiving different undulations. To be aware of fine matter, fine matter in the astral body is necessary, and so with the other kinds. Hence, when the rearrangement takes place, vision only of the grossest kinds of matter is possible, since only that kind is represented in the thick outer sheath of the astral body. Under these circumstances, the new inhabitant of the astral sphere sees only the worst of it, and also only the worst of his fellow inhabitants, even though they are not in so low a state as himself.

This state is not eternal, and in accordance with the evolutionary process, according to Theosophists, the gross sheath of astral matter wears slowly away, and the individual remains clothed with the six less gross sheaths. These also, with the passage of time, wear away, being resolved into their compound elements, and at last when the final disintegration of the least gross sheath of all takes place, the individual leaves the Astral World and passes into the Mental. However, this rearrangement of the astral body is not inevitable, and those who have learned and know are able at physical death to prevent it. In such cases the change appears a very small one, and the so-called dead continue to live their lives and do their work much as they did in the physical body. (See also Avichi)

Sources:

Mead, George R. S. The Doctrine of the Subtle Body in Western Tradition. London: John M. Watkins, 1919. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1967.

Powell, Arthur E. The Astral Body and Other Astral Phenomena. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1927.

Astral Projection

Popular term for the ability to travel outside the physical body during sleep or trance, also known as etheric projection or out-of-the-body traveling. Astral projection involves the movement of the consciousness, often pictured as an astral body or double, some distance away from the physical body. There are numerous reports of this ability in popular psychic literature as well as that of psychic research. For example, the British scientist Dr. Robert Crookall collected hundreds of cases from individuals in all walks of life.

Sources:

Crookall, Robert. The Study and Practice of Astral Projection. London: Aquarian Press, 1961.

Fox, Oliver [Hugh Callaway]. Astral Projection. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Muldoon, Sylvan, and Hereward Carrington. The Phenomena of Astral Projection. London: Rider, 1951.

———. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Rogo, D. Scott. Leaving the Body. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1983.

Steiger, Brad. Astral Projection. Rockport, Mass.: Para Research, 1982.

Astral World

According to theosophical teaching, the Astral World is the first sphere after bodily death. It is said to be material of a refined texture. There are many speculations concerning this world of existence. Theosophy claims definite knowledge of its conditions and its inhabitants and the numerous teachers influenced by Theosophy offer variations on the basic theme. Many descriptive accounts are to be found in spiritualistic after-death communications. All this, however, is inaccessible to experimental research.

In Theosophy, the Kama World is the second lowest of seven worlds, the world of emotions, desires, and passions. Into it man passes at physical death, and there he functions for periods that vary with the state of his development, the primitive savage spending a relatively short time in the Astral World, the civilized man spending relatively longer. The appropriate body is the astral body, which although composed of matter as is the physical body, is nevertheless of a texture vastly finer than the latter. Although it is in its aspect of the after-death abode that the Astral World is of most importance and most interest, it may be said that even during physical life, some clairvoyants and even ordinary people are said to be aware of it. This happens during sleep, or by reason of the action of anesthetics or drugs, or accidents; and the interpenetrating astral body then leaves its denser physical counterpart, taking with it the sense of pleasure and pain, and lives for a short time in its own world. Here again the state of the primitive differs from that of his more advanced fellows. The less advanced body does not travel far from his immediate surroundings, while the more mature one may perform useful, helpful work for the benefit of humanity. Furthermore, note that disembodied people are not the only inhabitants of the Astral World, for very many of its inhabitants are said to be of an altogether nonhuman nature—lower orders of the devas, or angels; and nature-spirits, or elementals, both good and bad, such as fairies, which are just beyond the powers of human vision; as well as demons, present to alcoholics in delirium tremens. Following physical death, the Astral World is said to contain both heaven and hell as these are popularly conceived.

The Astral World is comprised of seven divisions which correspond to the seven divisions of matter: the solid, liquid, gaseous, etheric, super-etheric, subatomic, and atomic. These divisions are believed to play a most important part in the immediate destiny of humans: If through ignorance, one has permitted the rearrangement of the matter of the astral body into sheaths, one is cognizant only of part of one's surroundings at a time, and it is not till after experience, much of which may be extremely painful, that one is able to enjoy the bliss that the higher divisions of the Astral World contain.

The lowest of these divisions, the seventh, is the environment of gross and unrestrained passions. Since it and most of the matter in the inhabitants' astral bodies is of the same type, it constitutes a veritable hell and is the only hell which exists. This is Avichi, the place of desires that cannot be satisfied because of the absence of the physical body, which was the means of their satisfaction. The tortures of these desires are the analog of the torments of hell-fire in the older Christian orthodoxy.

Unlike that orthodoxy, however, Theosophy teaches that the state of torment is not eternal but passes away in time, when the desires—through long gnawing without fulfillment—have at last died. Avichi is more correctly regarded as a purgatorial state.

The ordinary individual, however, does not experience this seventh division of the Astral World, but according to character finds itself in one or other of the three next higher divisions. The sixth division is very little different from physical existence, and the new inhabitant continues in the old surroundings among old friends, who, of course, are unaware of the astral presence. Indeed, the newly disembodied soul often does not realize that it is dead, so far as the physical world is concerned.

The fifth and fourth divisions are in most respects quite similar to this, but their inhabitants become less and less immersed in the activities and interests that previously engrossed them, and each sheath of their astral bodies decays in turn, as did the gross outer sheath of the sensualist's body.

The three higher divisions are still more removed from the ordinary material world, and their inhabitants enjoy a state of bliss of which we can have no conception: worries and cares of earth are altogether absent, the insistence of lower desires has worn out in the lower divisions, and it is now possible to live continually in an environment of the loftiest thoughts and aspirations.

The third division is said to correspond to the Summerland of Spiritualism, where the inhabitants live in a world of their own creation—the creation of their thoughts. Its cities and all their contents, scenery of life, are all formed by the influence of thought.

The second division is what is properly looked upon as Heaven, and the inhabitants of different races, creeds, and beliefs all find it each according to individual belief. Hence, instead of it being the place taught of by any particular religion, it is the region where every religion finds its own ideal. Christians, Muslims, Hindus, and so on, find it to be just as they conceived it would be. Here, and in the first and highest division, the inhabitants pursue noble aims freed from whatever selfishness was mingled with these aims on earth. The literary man, without thoughts of fame; the artist, the scholar, the preacher, all working without incentive of personal interest, and when their work is pursued long enough, and they are fitted for the change, they leave the Astral World and enter one vastly higher—the Mental.

However, the rearrangement of the matter of the astral body at physical death is said to be the result of ignorance, and those who are sufficiently instructed do not permit this rearrangement to take. They are not, therefore, confined to any one division and do not have to progress from division to division, but they are able to move through any part of the Astral World, laboring always in their various lines of action to assist the great evolutionary scheme. Many such theosophical teachings derive from traditional Hindu mysticism.

Sources:

Besant Annie. The Ancient Wisdom. 1897. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Press, 1928.

Leadbeater, Charles W. The Astral Plane. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1915.

Mead, George R. S. The Doctrine of the Subtle Body in Western Tradition. London: John M. Watkins, 1919. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1967.

Nizida. The Astral Light. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1889. Reprint, Talent, Ore.: Eastern School Press, 1983.

Astro Communications Services

Astro Communications Services, the original company that attempted to computerize astrology, was founded as Astro Computing Services in 1973 in White Plains, New York, by Neil Franklin Michelsen, a systems engineer with IBM. He began work on astrology in 1971 with a computer in his home and inputted the data for the planetary positions for each day of the year through the twentieth century and then for the daily changes in the astrological houses. The primary tool that an astrologer needs for the construction of a horoscope are the ephemeris (which shows the position of the planets day-by-day) and the table of houses (which shows how the astrological houses are divided on the chart). In 1976, Michelsen published the first editions of an American ephemeris and a table of houses. That same year he also left his position at IBM to nurture his new company full time.

Michelsen moved to San Diego in 1979 and three years later reorganized the company as a California corporation, Astro Communications Services, and created its publishing arm, ACS Publications. The company grew off of the continually expanding editions of his reference books, which came to include ephemerises covering a variety of astrological needs, including midpoints and Haley's Comet. He also produced a separate ephemeris for those astrologers who work from a heliocentric (sun-centered) astrological system.

Following Michelson's death in 1990, Maria Kaye Simms, his widow, assumed control of the company. She led the growing enterprise, which now sells a range of astrological accessories, until 1998 when ACS was sold to Great Wisdom Publishing. At that time Simms was succeeded by David Reecher as CEO. Simms remains on the ACS board.

Astro Communications Services is headquartered at 5521 Ruffin Rd., San Diego, CA 92123. It maintains an expansive Internet site at http://www.astrocom.com/.

Sources:

Astro Communications Services. http://www.astrocom.com/. May 23, 2000.

Astroflash

An IBM computer for use in astrology, first set up in Paris in the Pan-Am Building in the Champs Elysées. It was programmed by French astrologer Andre Barbault and was said to cover nearly two billion possible planetary interpretations. Astroflash II, a similar computer, was temporarily installed at Grand Central Station, New York, in June 1969 and offered a 14-page horoscope in two minutes for $5.

Astrologers' Guild of America, Inc.

Organization founded in 1927 for students and other persons interested in astrology. The guild sought to promote astrological research and study and to protect the interests of qualified astrologers. It held lectures and publishes a quarterly journal, Astrological Review. The guild was affiliated with the Congress of Astrological Organizations. Last known address: Morningstar, Long Pond, PA 18334.

Astrologica (Journal)

South American Spanish-language periodical concerned with the serious study of astrology. Last known address: Centro Astrologica de Buenos Aires, Avenida Auintana 142, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Astrological Association

British professional organization for astrologers. The Astrological Association grew out of the desire of John Addey to end the chaos he found in astrological thought and practice in the 1950s. He believed he had found a uniting force in his discovery of harmonic patterns in his astrological research. The organization was founded in 1958, and among those who gave it blessings was C. E. O. Carter, the most prominent British astrologer at the time.

Addey found little enthusiasm for his harmonic theories, yet the other goals of the association have proved sufficient to maintain it as a vital organization. Addey served as president for more than a decade (1951–63) and Charles Harvey presided over the association until his death in February 2000. The association puts out two journals, Journal, published six times a year and Correlation, an academic journal published twice annually. Address: Unit 168, Lee Valley Technopark, Tottenham Hale, London N17 9LN, England. Website: http://www.astrologer.com/aanet/welco.html.

Astrological Houses

Besides the 12 astrological signs and the astrological planets, the birth chart or horoscope also notes the existence of 12 astrological houses. The 12 houses are determined by drawing certain great circles through the intersection of the horizon and meridian, apportioning the whole globe or sphere into 12 equal parts. In practice, these lines are projected by a very simple method onto a plane. The space in the center of the figure thus delineated may be supposed to represent the situation of the earth.

Each of the 12 divisions or houses rules certain events, in the following order, reckoned from the east:

1. The basic self/physical body
2. Income and possessions
3. Relatives, communication, and short-distance travel
4. Property (house and land), the mother
5. Children, creations, self-expression
6. Health, work, pets
7. Marriage and partnerships
8. Sex, death, inheritance
9. Higher education, in-laws, religion, and long-distance travel
10. Career and public image
11. Friends, ideals, group associations
12. Unconscious mind, institutions, how we limit ourselves

These categories are designed to comprehend all that can possibly befall any individual, and the prognostication is drawn from the configuration of the planets in one or more of these "houses."

First House. The first house, the house of life, includes all that affects one's basic self. The sign ascending will considerably modify the character of the native, so forming an astrological judgment will require combining the indications of the ascending sign and the planet. In what are called horary questions, this house relates to all questions of life, health, and appearance, such as stature, complexion, shape, accidents, and sickness. It shows the events that will occur during journeys and ventures with respect to the life and health of those engaged in them. Regarding questions of a political nature, the first house signifies the people in general, and being of the same nature as Aries, all that is said of that sign may be transferred to this house.

Second House. The second house, which is of the same nature as the sign Taurus, is the house of income and possessions. It signifies advancement in the world with respect to the wealth of the querent. Jupiter, Venus, Mercury, and the Sun in this house indicate good fortune. Saturn, Mars, the Moon, and Uranus are generally unfortunate, though much depends on other factors in the chart. In horary questions the second house signifies the money of the querent or the pecuniary success of any expedition of undertaking. It concerns loans, lawsuits, and everything by which riches may be gained or lost. In political questions it signifies the treasury, public loans, taxes, and subsidies as well as the "death" of national enemies.

Third House. The third house is the house of kindred, particularly of the immediate family in which one was raised. In this house Saturn signifies coldness and distrust; Mars, sudden and hasty quarrels, all unaccountable estrangements; Jupiter, steady relationships; Venus, great love between brothers and sisters and good fortune by their means; the Sun, warm attachment; and the Moon, indifference or fluctuations in relationships. In horary questions the third house signifies the health, fortune, and happiness of the querent's parents, the querent's own patrimony and inheritance, and the ultimate consequences of any undertaking the person may be engaged in. In political questions it denotes the landed interests of a nation; the ancient and chartered rights of all classes, handed down to them from their ancestors; and all public advocates and defenders of those interests and rights.

Fourth House. The fourth house, which is associated with the sign Cancer, is that of the home and relates to one's domicile and other real estate one might own. The fourth house also signifies one's subconscious habit patterns and the nurturing parent (usually the mother). Difficult planets placed in the fourth house show problems with the home or with the nurturing parent. A native whose natal sun is in the fourth house tends to be a home body and likes to spend most of his or her time at home. In a horary chart, the fourth house indicates real estate and the home. In a political chart, the fourth house signifies public lands.

Fifth House. The fifth house, which partakes of the same character as Leo, is the house of children. In birth charts, therefore, it denotes the children of the native, their success, and also the parent's success by means of the children. It also has some reference to women. The health and welfare of children, whether present or absent, are determinable by the planets in this house. It also denotes all questions relative to amusement, on account of the fondness of youth for such pursuits. In political questions the fifth house signifies the rising generation, theaters, exhibitions, public festivals, and national amusements; increase in the population; and music and musical taste, sculpture, painting, and the advancement of the fine arts in general.

Sixth House. The sixth house is that of health, but it also denotes work, particularly service work, pets, and servants. It is usually considered a difficult house because only a few of the planetary configurations that can take place in it are fortunate. It is of the nature of Virgo. When the ruler of the ascendant (rising sign) is placed in the sixth house it denotes a low station in life and, depending on other aspects of the horoscope, may indicate that the native will not rise above menial employment. In horary astrology the sixth house points out servants and cattle, dependents, and small shopkeepers; uncles and aunts on the father's side; and tenants, stewards, shepherds, and farmers. In queries of a political nature, however, this house indicates the underservants of the government; the common seamen in the navy; private soldiers in the army; and the general health of the nation, chiefly regarding contagious and epidemic disorders.

Seventh House. The seventh house, which is of the same nature as Libra, is the house of marriage. Saturn here denotes unhappiness from constitutional causes; Mars, from difference of temper; Uranus, as usual, from some strange and unaccountable dislike. The other planets are mostly causers of good, except for the Moon, which may indicate fluctuating relationships. In horary questions the seventh house denotes love, speculations in business, partners in trade, and litigation. In queries of a political nature it signifies war and the consequences of a treaty; the victorious nation, army, or navy; and outlaws and fugitives, along with the places to which they have retreated.

Eighth House. The eighth house is the house of death. It is of the nature of Scorpio. Saturn in this house may indicate a slow death through a lingering disease, and Uranus a sudden, unexpected death. Jupiter and Venus point out a late and quiet departure. In horary questions it denotes wills, legacies, and all property transferred upon the death of others, as well as one's attitude toward sex. It also denotes the portion or dowry of women, as well as seconds in duels. In political questions the eighth house has a very different significance, namely, the privy council of a king or queen, their friends, and secrets of state. Here again, however, it also relates to death, denoting the rate of mortality among the people.

Ninth House. The ninth house is that of religion, science, and learning. It is related to Sagittarius. Jupiter is the most fortunate planet in it, and if Jupiter is joined by Mercury then the native is promised a character at once learned, estimable, and truly religious. The Sun and Venus are likewise good signs here, but the Moon denotes a changeable mind and frequent alterations in religious principles. Mars portends indifference or even active hostility to religion. In horary questions the ninth house is appropriated to the church and the clergy and all ecclesiastical matters, dissent, heresy, schism, dreams, and visions. It also denotes voyages and travels to distant lands. In questions of a political nature it represents the religion of the nation as well as all the higher and more solemn courts of law.

Tenth House. The tenth house is considered one of the most important. It is the house of honor, rank, and dignity and is of the nature of Capricorn. In this house the planets are more powerful than in any other, save the first. They point out the employment, success, preferment, and authority of the native. Saturn is here a difficult planet that make's the native's climb to success a long and arduous one. The Moon here shows unusual sensitivity to one's public image, and Uranus shows sudden changes in one's career. Jupiter and the Sun signify advancement by the favor of distinguished men, and Venus by that of distinguished women. In horary questions the tenth house signifies the mother of the querist. In political questions it denotes the sovereign. This is a house in which Mars is not unfortunate if well placed, in which case it denotes warlike achievements and consequent honors.

Eleventh House. The eleventh house is the house of friends and has the nature of Aquarius. In addition to friends it denotes well-wishers, favorites, and flatterers. The Sun is the best planet in this house, and Mars is the worst. In horary questions it signifies the same things as in a birth chart and also denotes the expectations and wishes of the querist. The eleventh house is said to be much influenced by the sign that is in it and to denote legacies if the sign is one of the earth triplicity (Taurus, Virgo, Capricorn) and honor with princes if it is one of the five triplicity (Aries, Leo, Sagittarius). In political questions the eleventh house signifies the allies of the public, the general council of the nation, and newly acquired rights.

The last house, which partakes of the character of Pisces, is the house of the unconscious. It denotes sorrow, anxiety, and all kinds of suffering. Yet here difficult planets are weaker, according to some writers, and good planets stronger than in certain other houses. Very few configurations in the twelfth house are esteemed good for the native, but even unfortunate effects are greatly modified by the planetary influences. In horary questions this house signifies imprisonment, treason, sedition, assassination, and suicide. In political questions it points out deceitful treaties, unsuccessful negotiations, treachery in the offices of state, captivity to princes, and general ill fortune. This house also denotes the criminal code, punishment of culprits, dungeons, and circumstances connected with prison discipline. Venus is the best planet in this house, and Saturn is the worst.

There are numerous astrological house systems, each of which divides up the sky in a slightly different way. All of the commonly used house systems agree that the first house–seventh house axis should be drawn from the eastern horizon to the western horizon. All but one system—the equal house system—use the degree of the zodiac closest to the zenith as the place to begin the tenth house, with the point 180 degrees away (the nadir) designated as the cusp of the fourth house. Hence with the exception of the equal house system, the differences between the most commonly used systems—Placidian, Koch, Campanus—are relatively minor.

Sources:

Holden, Ralph William. The Elements of House Division. Essex, U.K.: L. N. Fowler, 1977.

Lewis, James R. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

McEvers, Joan. The Houses: Power Places of the Horoscope. St. Paul, Minn.: Llwellyn Publications, 1991.

Rudhyar, Dane. The Astrological Houses: The Spectrum of Individual Experience. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Astrological Journal

Quarterly publication of the Astrological Association of Britain. The journal is published at "Oakfield," Goose Rye Rd., Worplesdon, Surrey, England.

Astrological Lodge of London

The Astrological Lodge of London was established in 1915 as the Astrological Lodge of the Theosophical Society by Alan Leo (pen name of William Frederick Allen). Leo had been both an enthusiastic Theosophist and professional astrologer for many years. The lodge continued the thrust of two earlier organizations, the Astrological Society (founded in 1895) and the Society for Astrological Research (founded in 1903), in both of which Leo had taken a leadership role. Unfortunately, he died in 1917 and the lodge languished for several years. It was revived in the 1920s by C. E. O. Carter, who remained its president until 1952. He turned it into the most influential astrological organization in Great Britain. In 1948 Carter led in the founding of the Faculty of Astrological Studies, a school sponsored by the lodge. Lodge Address: 50 Gloucester Pl., London W1H 4EA, England.

Sources:

Naylor, P. I. H. Astrology: A Fascinating History. North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book Co., 1970.

Astrological Magazine

An English-language magazine published monthly in India since 1895. It includes articles on Indian astrological theory and practice. Address: "Sri Rajeswari", 28, Nehru Circle, Nagappa St., Seshadripuram, Bangalore 560 020, India. Website: http://personal.vsnl.com/astromag/.

Astrological Planets

Traditional astrology traced the movement of the planets, the seven wandering celestial bodies, through the heavens and pictured them abstractly in the horoscope chart. In the horoscope the planets traversed both astrological signs and astrological houses, divisions created as a map of meanings in the heavens. Astrologers saw in them the major variables in the astrological chart. The seven traditional planets were the Sun, the Moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. As other planets were discovered (Uranus, Neptune, and Pluto), they were added to considerations of the horoscope.

Modern astrologers are, of course, fully aware that the Sun and Moon are not planets, but they generally keep the traditional terminology. The Sun is the most important planet in the chart. Individuals are primarily designated by the sign in which the Sun is located in their birth chart. The Moon is second only to the Sun in importance. Whereas the Sun represents the active individual, the Moon, whose light is reflective, designates the more receptive and passive qualities of the person.

Some contemporary astrologers also give consideration to asteroids, particularly to the largest (Ceres, Pallas, Juno, and Vesta, which can be found in the asteroid belt, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter), as well as to Chiron, a large comet orbiting between Saturn and Uranus.

The practice of astrology is based on the premise that the planets can be related to significant personality traits and correlated with major events on Earth. The traits most often associated with specific planets, beginning with the outermost planet in the solar system, are as follows:

Pluto. The slow-moving outermost planet represents a powerful transforming energy whose effect is relative to its position in the chart. Pluto's qualities are power, elimination, latency, eruption, annihilation, renewal, and regeneration. It is seen as related to subtle underground forces that lie dormant for a time and then suddenly burst forth. The discovery of Pluto came at the same time as the rise of Nazism, the discussions on splitting the atom, and the rise of mass media. Pluto's power is the power of the atom, the power of the masses, and the power of the unconscious.

Neptune. Neptune has come to be associated with those forces that tend to do away with such artificial barriers as time, space, ego, and national borders. It might be seen as the higher, more spiritual, form of Venus. Its qualities include universality, idealism, compassion, spirituality, formlessness, elusiveness, secrecy, mystery, fantasy, and delusion. All states of consciousness that destroy the limitations of normal waking consciousness indicate Neptune's influence.

Uranus. Uranus is by nature extremely cold, dry, and melancholy. Natives with a strong Uranian influence are of small stature, dark or pale complexion, rather light hair, highly nervous temperament, and sedate aspect but have some striking physical feature, light gray eyes, and a delicate constitution. If the planet is well dignified (i.e., there is a high degree of harmony between the planet and the sign it is in), the native is a searcher of science, particularly chemistry, and remarkably attached to the wonderful. The person possesses an extraordinary magnanimity and loftiness of mind, with an uncontrollable and intense desire for pursuits and discoveries of an uncommon nature. If the planet is ill dignified, the native is weak, sickly, and destined to have a short life; is treacherous, given to gross imposture, unfortunate in undertakings, capricious in tastes, and eccentric in his conduct. The effects of Uranus are of a totally unexpected, strange, and unaccountable character. The planet rules over places dedicated to unlawful arts and laboratories. Uranus governs Lapland, Finland, and the Poles.

Saturn. Saturn is by nature cold and dry, a melancholy, earthy, masculine, solitary, and diurnal planet. When Saturn rules the ascendant (rising sign), the native is of average stature and dark or pale complexion, has small black eyes, broad shoulders, and black hair, and is ill shaped about the lower extremities. When Saturn is well dignified, the native is grave and wise, studious and severe, of an active and penetrating mind, reserved and patient, constant in attachment but implacable in resentment, upright and inflexible. If the planet is ill dignified, then the native will be sluggish, covetous, and distrustful; stubborn, malicious, and malcontented.

Jupiter. Jupiter is a diurnal, masculine planet, temperately hot and moist, airy, and sanguine, the lord of the air triplicity. If the planet is well dignified, the native will be of erect carriage and tall stature with a handsome ruddy complexion, high forehead, soft, thick brown hair, handsome shape, and commanding aspect; his voice will be strong, clear, and manly, and his speech grave and sober. If the planet is ill dignified, the native will still be a good-looking person, although of smaller stature and less noble aspect. In the former case, the understanding and character will be of the highest possible description; in the latter case, although the native will be careless and improvident, immoral and irreligious, he or she will never entirely lose the good opinion of friends.

Mars. Mars is a masculine, nocturnal, hot, dry planet, of the fire triplicity. It is the author of strife, and the principle of assertiveness. The native is short but strong, having large bones; ruddy complexion; red or sandy hair and eyebrows; quick, sharp eyes; round, bold face; and fearless aspect. If Mars is well dignified, the native will be courageous and invincible, unsusceptible to fear, careless of death, resolute, and unsubmissive. If the planet is ill dignified, the native will be a trumpeter of his own fame, dishonest, fond of quarrels, and prone to fights. The gallows is said to most often terminate the lives of those born in low circumstances under the influence of Mars. Mars signifies soldiers, surgeons, barbers, and butchers.

Sun. The Sun is a masculine, hot, dry planet with usually favorable influences. The native is very much like one born under Jupiter, but with lighter hair, redder complexion, fatter body, and larger eyes. When the Sun is well dignified, the native is affable, courteous, splendid and sumptuous, proud, liberal, humane, and ambitious. When it is ill dignified, the native is arrogant, mean, loquacious, and sycophantic, resembling the native under Jupiter when ill dignified, but even worse. The Sun indicates that which is most seasonable; professions (kings, lords and all dignified persons, braziers, goldsmiths, and persons employed in mints), and places (kings' courts, palaces, theaters, halls, and places of state).

Moon. The Moon is feminine, nocturnal, cold, moist, and phlegmatic. Its influence in itself is neither fortunate nor unfortunate. The Moon is benevolent or otherwise according to how the other planets conflict or are in harmony with it, and in all circumstances it becomes more powerful than any of them. The native is short and stout with fair, pale complexion, round face, gray eyes, short arms, and thick hands and feet; is very hairy but with light hair; and is phlegmatic. If the Moon is affected by the Sun at the time of birth, the native will have a blemish on or near the eye. When the Moon is well dignified, the native is of soft, engaging manners, imaginative, and a lover of the arts but is also wandering, careless, timorous, and unstable; loves peace; and is averse to activity. When it is ill dignified, the native is of an ill shape, indolent, worthless, and disorderly.

Venus Venus is a feminine planet, temperately cold and moist, the author of mirth and sport. The native is handsome and well formed but not tall, with a clear complexion, bright hazel or black eyes, dark brown or chestnut hair that is thick, soft, and shiny; a soft and sweet voice; and a very prepossessing aspect. If Venus is well dignified, the native is cheerful, friendly, musical, fond of elegant accomplishments, and prone to love but frequently jealous. If it is ill dignified, the native is less handsome in person and in mind, given to every licentiousness and to dishonesty.

Mercury. Mercury is masculine, melancholy, cold, and dry. The native is tall, straight, and thin, with a narrow face and high forehead, long straight nose, black or gray eyes, thin lips and chin, scanty beard, and brown hair; the arms, hands, and fingers are long and slender. If Mercury is in the east at the time of birth, the native is likely to be of a stronger constitution and have sandy hair; if in the west, the native is prone to be sallow, lank, slender, and of a dry habit. When mercury is well dignified, the native has an acute and penetrating mind, a powerful imagination, and a retentive memory; is eloquent; is fond of learning; and is successful in scientific investigation. If engaged in mercantile pursuits, the native is enterprising and skillful. If Mercury is ill dignified, the native is a mean, unprincipled character, a pretender to knowledge, a boastful impostor, and a malicious slanderer.

Asteroids represent highly specific principles and influences, in contrast to the planets, which are associated with a broad range of attributes, personality traits, and principles. The "big four" asteroids are Ceres, Juno, Vesta, and Pallas. Ceres represents the attribute of nurturance, either where and how one is nurtured, or where and how one nurtures others. Juno represents the principle of marriage and indicates traits of one's marriage partner, as well as features of one's marriage(s). Vesta represents the principle of dedicated work. Pallas represents the principle of creative wisdom. Chiron, a large comet in orbit between Saturn and Uranus, has a wide variety of associations but seems to have a particular link with healing and counseling.

Aspects and Relationships

As can be seen from the foregoing descriptions, each planet has picked up a host of associations through the centuries. Each one has also been assigned "rulership" of different astrological signs with which it has a particular affinity. The rulerships are as follows:

Mars and Aries; Venus and Taurus; Mercury and Gemini; Moon and Cancer; Sun and Leo; Mercury and Virgo; Pluto and Scorpio; Jupiter and Sagittarius; Saturn and Capricorn; Uranus and Aquarius; Neptune and Pisces.

Planets "project" certain qualities as they assume geometric relationships to other planets in the birth chart. The major geometric aspects of the planets are thus distinguished:

Conjunction. When two planets are in the same degree and minute of a sign, which may be of good or unfortunate import, depending on the nature of the planets and whether their relationship is harmonious or conflicting.

Sextile. When two planets are 60 degrees distant from each other; it is called the aspect of imperfect love or friendship and is generally a favorable omen.

Square. When two planets are 90 degrees distant from each other, making the aspect inharmonious and inclining to conflict and difficulty.

Trine. When the distance is 120 degrees, promising harmonious cooperation and the best blending of energies.

Opposition. When two planets are 180 degrees apart, or exactly opposite each other, which is considered an aspect of tension, implying conflict and difficulties.

Aspects need not be exact, but can be within three to eight degrees of the foregoing geometric relationships, depending on the particular aspect and the planets involved. The closer an aspect is to being exact, the stronger it is.

Sources:

George, Llewellyn. The New A to Z Horoscope Maker and Delineator. Rev. ed. St. Paul, Minn.: Llwellyn Publications, 1987.

Lewis, James R. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

McEvers, Joan. Planets: The Astrological Tools. St. Paul, Minn.: Llwellyn Publications, 1989.

Mayo, Jeff. The Planets and Human Behavior. 1972. Reprint, Reno, Nev.: CRCS Publications, 1985.

Astrological Registration and Communication (ARC)

A networking organization for astrologers and astrological organizations worldwide. ARC was created in 1987 by delegates attending the World Astrological Congress meeting in Zurich. ARC is an international computer network with primary stations on every continent. Twenty-one countries were represented at its initiation, and its support has grown steadily year by year. ARC is strongly backed by the Association for Astrological Networking, based in North America. World Headquarters: 2920 E. Monte Vista, Tucson, AZ 85716.

Astrological Signs

Astrologers divide the heavens into 12 segments tracing the apparent movement of the Sun around the Earth. The measuring of the signs begins with the point where the Sun's apparent path crosses the celestial equator, designated 0° Aries. The 12 signs were named after the stellar constellations that appear in the different segments. The signs are classified according to quality and element. The three qualities are cardinal (outgoing), fixed (stable), and mutable (variable). The four traditional elements are fire, earth, air, and water, which stand for activity, matter, mind, and feeling, respectively. The three qualities and four elements offer twelve possible combinations, one for each sign. The signs may also be seen as positive or "masculine" (active), in the case of the fire and air signs; or negative or "feminine" (reactive), in the case of the earth and water signs. The signs are also divided into "northern" and "commanding" (the first six), and "southern" and "obeying" (last six).

There are four triplicities among the signs: the earth triplicity, including Taurus, Virgo, and Capricorn; the air triplicity, which includes Gemini, Libra, and Aquarius; the fire triplicity, encompassing Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; and the water triplicity, containing Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces. The signs are further divided into diurnal and nocturnal, the diurnal signs being all masculine and the nocturnal feminine. Signs named after quadrupeds are, of course, quadrupedal; those named after human states of endeavor (e.g., water bearer, archer) are called humane. A person born under a fiery, masculine, diurnal sign is hot in temper and bold in character. If it is a quadrupedal sign, the native is somewhat like the animal after which the sign is called. Thus in Taurus, the native is bold and furious; in Leo, fierce and aggressive. Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces are called fruitful or prolific; and Gemini, Leo, and Virgo, barren. Sagittarius, because usually represented as a centaur, is said to produce humane character if located in the first 15 degrees (first half) of the sign, but a savage, brutal, and intractable disposition if found in the last 15 degrees.

Astrologers designate the 12 signs as follows:

Aries, the first sign of the zodiac, is a cardinal fire sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the planet Mars. Its symbol is the ram, and its glyph (symbol) is said to represent a ram's horns. It takes its name from the Greek god of war. Aries is associated with the head, and people with an Aries sun sign (the Sun is in the sign Aries in their natal chart) are prone to headaches and injuries to the head and face. The association of the head with Aries is the source of the expression "headstrong," which characterizes people with a strong Aries nature. Aries is dry, vernal and equinoctial (it begins on the vernal equinox), diurnal, movable, commanding, eastern, choleric, and aggressive. The native, that is, the person born under its influence, is tall of stature, of a strong but spare make, long face and neck, thick shoulders, piercing eyes, sandy or red hair, and brown complexion. The native's disposition is warm, hasty, and passionate. The aspects of the planets however, may materially alter these traits. (Aspects are the angular relationships between various points in a boroscope; in a natal chart the planets represent the various facets of one's psyche, and aspects between them indicate how these facets conflict or work together.) This sign rules the head and face. As the first sign, the key phrase for Aries is "I am," representing the birth of awareness.

Taurus, the second sign of the zodiac, is a fixed earth sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the planet Venus. Its symbol is the bull, and its glyph is said to represent a bull's head and horns. It takes its name from the Greek word for "bull." A sign known for its stubbornness, it is the source of our expressions "bullheaded" and "stubborn as a bull." Taurus is associated with the throat and neck. People with a Taurus sun sign, although they often have beautiful voices, are also prone to sore throats, thyroid irregularities, and other neck problems. Taurus is cold and dry, melancholy, nocturnal, and southern. When influential in a nativity, it usually produces a person with a broad forehead, thick lips, dark curling hair, and melancholy, slow to anger, but when once enraged, violent, furious, and difficult to appease. Places ruled by Taurus are stables, cowhouses, cellars and low rooms, and all places used for or by cattle. The key phrase for Taurus is "I have."

Gemini, the third sign of the zodiac, is a mutable air sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the planet Mercury. Its symbol is the twins, and its glyph is said to represent a set of twins. It takes its name from the Latin word for "twins." Gemini is associated with the shoulders, arms, hands, and lungs. The native is tall and straight with long arms and well-formed hands and feet, rather dark complexion, brown hair, and hazel eyes. The native is strong and active in person, sound and acute in judgment, lively, playful, and generally skillful in business. Places ruled by Gemini are hilly and high grounds, the tops of houses, wainscoted rooms, halls and theaters, barns, storehouses, and stairs. The key phrase for Gemini is "I think."

Cancer, the fourth sign of the zodiac, is a cardinal water sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the Moon. Its symbol is the crab, and its glyph is said to represent the two claws of a crab. It takes its name from the Latin word for "crab." A moody sign, it is the source of the expression "crabby." Cancer is associated with the breasts and the stomach. It is a cold, moist, nocturnal, and exceedingly fruitful sign, more so than any other. The native is fair and pale, short and small, with the upper part of the body larger in proportion to the lower, a round face, light hair, and blue or gray eyes. The native is phlegmatic and heavy in disposition; weak in constitution, and of a small voice. Places associated with Cancer are the sea and all rivers, swamps, ponds, lakes, wells, ditches, and watery places. The key phrase for Cancer is "I feel."

Leo, the fifth sign of the zodiac, is a fixed fire sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the Sun. Its symbol is the lion, and its glyph is said to be a modified version of the initial letter of its Greek name. It takes its name from the Latin word for "lion." Leo is associated with the back and, especially, the heart. The association of Leo with the heart is the astrological basis for the common expression "lion hearted." Leo is hot, dry, commanding, and very barren. When this sign ascends in a nativity, the individual has a tall and powerful frame and is well shaped, with an austere countenance, light, yellowish hair, large piercing eyes, commanding aspect, and ruddy complexion. The character is fierce and aggressive, yet open, generous, and courteous. This sign is more modified by planetary influences than any other. Leo governs woods, forests, deserts and hunting grounds, and fireplaces and furnaces. The key phrase for Leo is "I will."

Virgo, the sixth sign of the zodiac, is a mutable earth sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the planet Mercury. Its symbol is a young woman, and its glyph is said to represent a serpent. Virgo takes its name from the Latin word for "virgin." Virgo is associated with the nervous system and, especially, with the bowels. Virgo is cold, dry, barren, and melancholy. The native is handsome and well shaped, slender, of average stature, with a clear, ruddy or brown complexion, dark hair and eyes, a rather round face, and a voice sweet and clear but not strong. The character is amiable and benevolent, witty and studious, but not persevering; and if not opposed by planetary aspects, apt to oratory. Virgo is associated with cornfields and granaries, studies and libraries. The key phrase for Virgo is "I analyze."

Libra, the seventh sign of the zodiac, is a cardinal air sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the planet Venus. Its symbol is the scales, which its glyph is said to represent. It takes its name from the Latin word for "pound weight," or "scales." Libra is associated with the lower back, buttocks, and kidneys. Libra is sanguine, hot, moist, and diurnal. The native is tall and well made, very handsome, of a fine, ruddy complexion in youth, which changes to a deep red with advancing years. The native has long, flaxen hair, gray eyes, a courteous disposition, and a just and upright character. The places Libra rules are mountains, sawpits, and newly felled woods. The key phrase for Libra is "I balance."

Scorpio, the eighth sign of the zodiac, is a fixed water sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the planet Pluto (in traditional astrology it was ruled by Mars). Its symbology is complex, being the only sign with three symbols—the scorpion, the snake, and the eagle. Its glyph is said to represent a serpent. It takes its name from the Latin word for "scorpion." Scorpio is associated with the sexual organs and the kidneys. Scorpio is a cold, nocturnal sign. The native has a strong, robust, corpulent body, is of average stature, and has a broad visage, dark but not clear complexion, dark gray or light brown eyes, black or very dark brown hair, short, thick legs, and a thick neck. Scorpio governs swampy grounds and stagnant waters, orchards and ruinous houses, especially near water. The key phrase for Scorpio is "I desire."

Sagittarius, the ninth sign of the zodiac, is a mutable fire sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the planet Jupiter. Its symbol is the centaur (sometimes, alternately, the archer) and its glyph is an arrow, which refers to the arrow in the bow that the centaur is holding. It takes its name from the Latin word sagitta, "arrow." Sagittarius is associated with the hips, the thighs, and the liver. Sagittarius is hot, dry, and diurnal. The native is well formed and of slightly above-average stature, with fine chestnut hair, but inclined to baldness, a visage somewhat long but ruddy and handsome. The body is strong, stout, and hardy. The native is inclined to horsemanship and field sports, careless of danger, generous and intrepid, but hasty and careless. Sagittarius rules the hips and is the cause of gout, rheumatism, and disorders that affect the muscles. Accidents and disorders occasioned by intemperance come under the government of this sign. Sagittarius is associated with stables and parks. The key phrase for Sagittarius is "I see."

Capricorn, the tenth sign of the zodiac, is a cardinal earth sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the planet Saturn. Its symbol is a goat with a fishtail, and its glyph is said to reflect this symbol. It takes its name from the Latin capricornus, "goat horn." Capricorn is associated with the bones and, especially, with the knees. It is a cold, dry, nocturnal, domestic sign. The native usually is tall, of slender stature and long, thin countenance, with a small beard, dark hair and eyes, long neck, and narrow chest and chin. The native is cheerful and collected, talented and upright. Ruling the knees and hips, Capricorn governs all diseases that afflict them, and also melancholy diseases such as hypochondriasis and hysteria. The places over which it has power are workshops and fallow grounds. The key phrase for Capricorn is "I use."

Aquarius, the eleventh sign of the zodiac, is a fixed air sign. It is a positive, masculine sign, ruled by the planet Uranus (before the outer planets were discovered, it was said to be ruled by Saturn). Its symbol is the water bearer, and its glyph is a pair of wavy lines representing water. Aquarius is associated with the shins, ankles, and the circulatory system. Aquarius is a hot, moist, rational, sanguine sign. The native is a well-made and robust person, of above-average stature, long face, but with a pleasing and delicate countenance, clear, bright complexion, and flaxen hair. The native is fair, open, and honest. Aquarius rules the legs and ankles and causes all diseases that affect them: lameness, swelling, cramping, and gout. It governs mines and quarries, flying machines, roofs of houses, wells, and conduits. The key phrase for Aquarius is "I know."

Pisces, the twelfth sign of the zodiac, is a mutable water sign. It is a negative, feminine sign, ruled by the planet Neptune (in traditional astrology it was ruled by Jupiter). Its symbol is two fish moving in opposite directions, tied together by a rope. Its glyph is said to be a stylized representation of this symbol. It takes its name from the plural of the Latin word for "fish." Pisces is associated with the feet. It is a cold, moist, nocturnal, and extremely fruitful sign, second only to Cancer. The native is short and ill shaped, fleshy, if not corpulent, with thick, round shoulders, light hair and eyes, pale complexion, and a large head and face. The native has a weak and vacillating disposition and is well-meaning but devoid of energy. Pisces rules the feet and causes lameness and every kind of disorder occasioned by watery humors. Pisces governs the same places as Cancer, except for the sea and rivers. The key phrase for Pisces is "I believe."

Interpreting a horoscope begins largely with the astrological signs. A person is usually initially designated by the sign within which the sun was located at the time of his or her birth. The influence of the signs however, is lessened or enhanced by the aspects of the planets within them and by the astrological houses, so these factors also have to be considered in interpreting the horoscope. (See also Astrological Houses; Astrological Planets)

Sources:

Cirlot, J. E. A Dictionary of Symbols. New York: Dorset Press, 1991.

Evans, Colin. The New Waite's Compendium of Natal Astrology. 1917. Revised by Brain E. F. Gardener. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

Green, Landis Knight. The Astrologer's Manual: Modern Insights into an Ancient Art. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS Publications, 1975.

Hall, Manly P. Astrological Keywords. 1958. Reprint, Savage, MD: Littlefield Adams Quality Paperbacks, 1975.

Lewis, James R. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Astrological Society

An early astrological organization that grew out of the magazine Modern Astrology, published in the late nineteenth century in London. The society was organized in 1895 by Walter Gorn Old. Alan Leo, a fellow Theosophist, became the first president. The society lasted for approximately eight years but ran into criticism because it was almost exclusively confined to London. In 1903 it was disbanded and the new Society for Astrological Research, with a wider national focus, was organized in its stead.

Sources:

Naylor, P. I. H. Astrology: A Fascinating History. North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book Co. 1970.

Astrology

The art of divining the fate or future of persons from the juxtaposition of the Sun, Moon, and planets. Judicial astrology foretells the destinies of individuals and nations, while Natural astrology predicts changes of weather and the influence of the stars upon natural things.

The characters used in astrology to denote the 12 signs represent natural objects, but they have also a hieroglyphic or esoteric meaning that has been lost. The figure of Aries represents the head and horns of a ram; that of Taurus, the head and horns of a bull; that of Leo, the head and mane of a lion; that of Gemini, two persons standing together; and so on. The physical or astronomical reasons for the adoption of these figures is explained by the Abbé Pluche in his Histoire du Ciel (1739–41), and Charles F. Dupuis, in his Abrégé de l'Origine de tous les Cultes (1798), endeavors to establish the principles of an astro-mythology by tracing the progress of the moon through the 12 signs in a series of adventures he compares with the wanderings of Isis.

Nativities

Traditionally, the cases for which astrological predictions have chiefly been sought were nativities, that is, in ascertaining the fate and fortunes of individuals from the positions of the stars at the time of birth, and in questions called horary, which comprehend almost every matter that might be the subject of astrological inquiry. Sickness, the success of business undertakings, the outcome of lawsuits, and so on are all objects of horary questions.

A person is said to be born under that planet that ruled the hour of his birth. Thus two hours every day are under the control of Saturn; the first hour after sunrise on Saturday is one of them. Therefore, a person born on Saturday in the first hour after sunrise has Saturn for the lord of his or her ascendant; those born in the next hour, Jupiter; and so on in order. Venus rules the first hour on Friday, Mercury on Wednesday, Jupiter on Thursday, the Sun and Moon on Sunday and Monday, and Mars on Tuesday.

In drawing a nativity or natal chart (horoscope) a figure is divided into 12 portions representing the astrological houses. The 12 houses are similar to the 12 astrological signs, and the planets, being always in the zodiac, will therefore all fall within these 12 divisions or houses. The line that separates any house from the preceding is called the cusp of the house. The first house is called the ascendant, or the east angle; the fourth, the imum coeli, or the north angle; the seventh, the west angle; and the tenth, the medium coeli, or the south angle. After this figure is drawn, tables and directions are given for placing the signs, and because one house corresponds to a particular sign, the rest can also be determined. When the signs and planets are all placed in the houses, the astrologer can augur, from their relative position, what influence they will have on the life and fortunes of the native.

History of Astrology in the West

The precise origin of astrology is lost to history, but its practice appears to have developed independently in both China and Mesopotamia, and was quite known early in India. One of the most remarkable astrological treatises of all history is the fabulous Bhrigu-Samhita of ancient India, said to contain formulas for ascertaining the names of all individuals, past, present, and future, and their destinies. Unlike popular Western astrology, the key to a Bhrigu consultation is not the birth sign and conjunction of planets, but the moment of consultation of the oracle.

Marco Polo found astrology well established in China, although Chinese astrology developed apart from Western history and only recently has been imported into the West. Western astrology seems to have originated in Mesopotamia, and all of the cultures of ancient Iraq and Iran contributed to its creation. Among the earliest records of astrology are the cuneiform tablets from the library of King Ashurbanipal of Assyria (669–626 B.C.E.). Astrologers were making periodic reports to Ashurbanipal on such matters as the possibility of war and the probable size of the harvest. Astrology had been present in the region for at least a millennium but was given a distinctive boost by the Chaldeans who took over the Tigris and Euphrates valleys in 606 B.C.E. The Chaldeans mapped the sky, improved the methods for recording the passing of time, successfully predicted eclipses, and accurately determined the length of the solar year (within 26 minutes).

Thus astrology was well developed in Chaldea when (in the second millennium B.C.E.) the biblical Abraham migrated from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:31) to Palestine. The conflict between the emerging religions of the Israelites and Babylonian astrology can be seen in Isa. 47:13 and repeatedly in the book of Daniel (e.g. 2:27, 4:7). A primitive astrology had developed among the Greeks, but during the conquests of Alexander in the West beginning in 334 B.C.E. Chaldean astrology flowed into the Mediterranean basin. Alexander's conquests also introduced astrology into India, although the Indians took the Chaldean notions and developed them in a unique direction.

In Egyptian tradition the invention of astrology is attributed to Thoth (called Hermes Trismegistus by the Greek), the god of wisdom, learning, and literature. He is the Mercury of the Romans, the eloquent deliverer of the messages of the gods.

In imperial Rome astrology was held in great repute, especially under the reign of Tiberius (14–37 C.E.). Augustus (27 B.C.E.–14 C.E.) had discouraged the practice of astrology by banishing its practitioners from Rome, but his successors recalled them; and although occasional edicts in subsequent reigns restrained and even punished all who divined by the stars, the practices of the astrologers were secretly encouraged and their predictions extensively believed. Domitian (51–96 C.E.), in spite of his hostility toward them, was in fear of their pronouncements. They prophesied the year, the hour, and the manner of his death, and agreed with his father in foretelling that he should perish not by poison, but by the dagger. The early Christians gave some sanction to astrology in the Gospel of Matthew, which opens with the visit of the three magi (Persian astrologers) who, having seen the star in the east, have come to worship Christ.

After the age of the Antonines and the work of the third-century C.E. Roman scholar Censorinus, we hear little of astrology for some generations. In the eighth century the Venerable Bede and his distinguished scholar, Alcuin, are said to have pursued this mystic study. Immediately following, the Arabians revived and encouraged it. Under the patronage of Almaimon, in the year 827, the Megale Syntaxis of Ptolemy was translated, under the title Almagest, by al-Hazen Ben Yusseph. Albumasar added to this work, and the astral science continued to receive new force from the labors of Alfraganus, Ebennozophim, Alfaragius, and Geber.

The conquest of Spain by the Moors carried this knowledge, with all their other treasures of learning, into Spain, and before their cruel expulsion it was naturalized among the Christian savants. Among these Alonzo (or Alfonso) of Castile has immortalized himself by his scientific research, and the Jewish and Christian doctors who arranged the tables named for him were convened from all the accessible parts of civilized Europe. Five years were employed in their discussion, and it has been said that the enormous sum of 400,000 ducats was disbursed in the towers of the Alcazar of Galiana in the adjustment and correction of Ptolemy's calculations. Nor was it only the physical motions of the stars that occupied this grave assembly. The two Kabbalistic volumes, yet existing in cipher, in the royal library of the kings of Spain, and which tradition assigns to Alonzo himself, indicate a more visionary study. In spite of the denunciations against this orthodoxy, which were thundered in his ears on the authority of Tertullian, Basil, and Bonaventure, the fearless monarch gave his sanction to such masters as practiced the art of divination by the stars, and in one part of his code enrolled astrology among the seven liberal sciences.

In Germany many eminent men pursued astrology. A long catalog could be made of those who have considered other sciences with reference to astrology and written on them as such. Faust has, of course, the credit of being an astrologer as well as a wizard, and we find that singular but splendid genius, Cornelius Agrippa writing with as much zeal against astrology as on behalf of other occult sciences.

Of the early developments in astrology in England little is known. Bede and Alcuin have been mentioned. Roger Bacon included it among his broad studies. But it is the period of the Stuarts that can be considered the acme of astrology in England. Then William Lilly employed the doctrine of the magical circle, engaged in the evocation of spirits from the Ars Notoria and used the form of prayer prescribed therein to the angel Salmonoeus, and entertained among his familiar acquaintance the guardian spirits of England, Salmael and Malchidael. His ill success with the divining rod induced him to surrender the pursuit of rhabdomancy.

The successor of Lilly was Henry Coley, a tailor, who had been his amanuensis and was almost as successful in prophecy as his master.

While astrology flourished in England it was in high repute with its kindred pursuits of magic, necromancy, and alchemy at the court of France. Catherine de Medicis herself was an adept in the art. At the Revolution, which commenced a new era in France, astrology declined.

Modern Astrology

Astrology has now permeated every activity of modern life, from daily household activities to politics and stock market speculation. Leading names that have emerged in the astrology revival include Luke D. Broughton, Evangeline Adams, Manly Palmer Hall, Elbert Benjamine Heindel, and Llewellyn George. More recently, figures have included Sydney Omarr, Jeane Dixon, "Zolar" (Bruce King), "Ophiel," and Sybil Leek. Also still popular in its various editions is the mass circulation almanac of "Old Moore," which first appeared nearly three centuries ago.

The psychologist C. G. Jung related astrology to "synchronicity," an acausal connecting principle in nature (as distinct from normal cause and effect), and believed that horoscopes offered useful psychological information on patients. Astrology was widely used during World War II as a psychological weapon by both Germans and British.

The most noticeable aspect of the occult revival of modern times has been the widespread popularity of astrology, particularly among young people. It is estimated that there are more than ten thousand professional astrologers in the United States, with a clientele of more than twenty million people. Most American newspapers run an astrology column. Even the respected Washington Post includes a horoscope column.

In 1988 the revelations of former White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan (in his book For the Record) caused widespread media comment with the claim that Nancy Reagan consulted astrologers on questions relating to presidential schedules of her husband, Ronald Reagan. Joan Quigley was cited as her astrological consultant. Caroline Casey, daughter of a former congressman, was also revealed as a leading astrologer to politicians, high-ranking officials, and Georgetown socialites.

None of this would be surprising to Indian and other Asian celebrities, since the astrologer is still an indispensable figure in Asian society, consulted on marriage dates and partnerships, business enterprises, and affairs of state. But the extent of American involvement with astrology surprised and infuriated many commentators, who condemned "occult superstitions." In May 1988, testifying before the Senate Banking Committee, Donald Regan was asked whether he had ever heard of American stockholders using astrology for guidance. He replied, "Recently a study was made of Wall Street people and stockholders—and 48 percent admitted that they used astrology of one sort or another in the stock market."

One astrologer responded, "What's new? Queen Elizabeth I set her coronation date by her guy, John Dee, and consulted him every day. Kings have always used us—and popes! Some of those guys were do-it-yourselfers, like Fixtus IV and Julius II. Others just kept their astrologers in the closet, like Nancy did."

There has been little new to add to popular belief in astrology in the present revival except its linking with modern technology in the use of an IBM computer for rapid calculation of horoscopes. For some time the giant Astroflash computer was a familiar sight to commuters at the Lexington Avenue entrance to Grand Central Station, New York.

In spite of its pseudoscientific basis, deriving from outmoded theories of the planetary system, astrology can point to documented successes, particularly by astrologers who combine their calculations with an intuitive faculty of interpretation. There is also scientific evidence for the influence of lunar and solar rhythms on human activity.

One interesting development in modern astrology has been the research of the French statistician Michel Gauquelin and his wife Francosise Gauquelin, beginning in 1950. They claimed to find a significant correlation between the position of planets at birth and the chosen professions of a large sample of people from all walks of life. The research of the Gauquelins, whose collaboration lasted until 1980, is so significant that it is the most frequently cited research validating astrology.

Sources:

Collins, Rodney. The Theory of Celestial Influence. London: Stuart & Watkins, 1955.

Eisler, Robert. The Royal Art of Astrology. London: Herbert Joseph, 1946.

Gauquelin, Michel. The Cosmic Clocks. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1967.

———. Cosmic Influences on Human Behavior: The Planetary Factors in Personality. New York: Stein & Day, 1973. Rev. ed. New York: ASI Publishers, 1978.

———. Dreams and Illusions of Astrology. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1978. Reprint, London: Glover & Blair, 1980.

———. Scientific Basis of Astrology. New York: Stein & Day, 1969. Reprinted as Astrology and Science. London: P. Davies, 1970.

Hone, Margaret. Modern Textbook of Astrology. London: Fowler, 1951.

Howe, Ellic. Astrology & Psychological Warfare during World War II. London: Rider, 1972.

Kenton, Warren. Astrology: The Celestial Mirror. London: Thames & Hudson, 1974.

Lee, Dal. Dictionary of Astrology. New York: Warner, 1968.

Leo, Alan. Casting the Horoscope. London: Fowler, 1969.

Lewis, James R. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

McIntosh, Christopher. The Astrologers and their Creed. London: Praeger, 1969.

Rudhyar, Dane. From Humanistic to Transpersonal Astrology. Seed Center, 1975.

Sachs, Gunter. The Astrology File. London: Orion, 1998.

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mystery and Romance of Astrology. London, 1929. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1969. Reprint, New York: Causeway, 1973.

Astrology: A Comprehensive Bibliography

A somewhat dated but comprehensive publication issued by Yes Bookshop that lists nearly a thousand books on all aspects of astrology as practiced in the mid-1970s. It contains sections on cosmobiology, sidereal astrology, Uranian astrology, calendars, ephemerides, and so on. Yes Bookshop is located at 1035 31st St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20007.

Astrology Guide

Popular bimonthly magazine that included horoscopes of notable personalities, a daily guide for astrological signs, and planetary predictions. Last known address: Sterling's Magazines, 355 Lexington Ave., New York, NY 10017.

Astrology Now

Former bimonthly magazine for serious study of astrology published in the 1970s and 1980s by Llewellyn Publications in St. Paul, Minnesota.

Astrology Quarterly

Journal of the Astrological Lodge of London. It is published from the lodge's headquarters at 50 Gloucester Pl., London W1H 4EA, England. Back issues are available online at http://www.spica.com.au/astro-quart.htm.

Astromancy

Astromancy, fortune telling by the reading of the astrological chart, has constituted the major use of astrology in centuries past. It assumes a deterministic worldview in which the stars indicate patterns into which individuals are locked and events are destined to occur. Criticism of astrology has largely been directed at astromancy, with religious scholars attacking the deterministic worldview and scientists attacking the accuracy of astrological predictions.

Contemporary astrology, especially that based in psychology and growing out of the work of Dane Rudhyar, has rejected astromancy as a perspective beyond the ability of astrology. Modern astrologers believe that the horoscope shows planetary influences operating upon a person but the individual remains free to respond to those influences in a variety of ways. In like manner, some astrologers claim that they can predict heightened pressures operating on society but not specific events. Thus astrology can be of practical assistance in a counseling situation and usefully applied to understanding the stock market, but it cannot predict upcoming events in a person's life or relationships or the movement of specific stocks. Most contemporary textbooks carry at least a passing reference to astromancy, and rejection of it, as part of their introduction to the topic.

Sources:

Freeman, Martin. Forecasting by Astrology: A Comprehensive Manual of Interpretation and Technique. Wellingborough, Northhamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1982.

Lee, Dal. Dictionary of Astrology. New York: Coronet Communications/Constellation International, 1968.

Ronan, Margaret, and Eve Ronan. Astrology and Other Occult Games. New York: Scholastic Books Services, 1972.

Astronomical Communications

From time to time, Spiritualist mediums have delivered messages relating to astronomy. In discussing the question whether such communications have led science forward a single step, Camille Flammarion returned a negative answer. His conclusion was based on his own automatic scripts which were signed by Galileo and contained nothing new and on the analysis of the writings of Major General A. W. Drayson (1827–1901), professor of military surveying, reconnaissance, and practical astronomy at the Royal Military Academy in Woolwich. Under the title The Solution of Scientific Problems by Spirits, Drayson published an article in the journal Light (1884) in which he asserted that the spirit of an astronomer, communicating through a medium at his house in 1858, had made known the true orbital movement of the satellites of Uranus.

This planet was discovered by William Herschel in 1781. He observed that its satellites, contrary to all the other satellites of the solar system, traversed their orbits from east to west. The spirit communication said on this point: "The satellites of Uranus do not move in their orbits from East to West: they circle about their planet from West to East, in the same way that the moon moves round the earth. The error comes from the fact that the South Pole of Uranus was turned towards the Earth at the moment of the discovery of this planet."

Flammarion pointed out in Mysterious Psychic Forces (1907) that the reasoning of the spirit is false. There is abundant evidence that it was really the North Pole which was at that moment turned toward the Sun and the Earth. Regarding another claim of Drayson that a medium in 1859 disclosed the facts about the two satellites of Mars 18 years before their discovery, Flammarion stated that the claim must remain doubtful as it was not published at the time. Furthermore, after Kepler pointed out the probability of their existence, this subject was discussed several times, notably by Dean Swift and Voltaire. Of Drayson's book Thirty Thousand Years of the Earth's Past History, Read by Aid of the Discovery of the Second Rotation of the Earth, which seeks to explain the glacial periods and variations of climate, Flammarion says that it is full of scientific errors unpardonable in a man versed in astronomical studies.

No mention is made by Flammarion of the book Nature's Divine Revelations by Andrew Jackson Davis which, written in March 1846, speaks of nine planets. Seven planets were known at the time. The existence of an eighth was calculated by Leverrier but was not discovered until September 1846. The statement of the Poughkeepsie seer that its density is four-fifths of water agreed with later findings. The ninth planet, Pluto, was not discovered until 1930. On the other hand, Andrew Jackson Davis only spoke of four planetoids, Ceres, Pallas, Juno, and Vesta, whereas they are now numbered in hundreds.

A further indication that psychic experiences may lead to an advance in science is furnished by the dream of Rev. Charles Tweedale of Weston, England, of a comet in the East discoverable before sunrise. He went into the laboratory and found the comet, which was invisible to the naked eye. Shortly afterward he learned that he was preceded in the discovery by Barnard and Hartwig.

Of all the astronomers who devoted time and talent to psychic research, Flammarion's name stands foremost. His interest from 1861 onward was continuous until the time of his death. Many important books testify to his keen judgment and to the importance he attributed to this branch of science.

Another famous astronomer whose name is often mentioned in Spiritualist books was Schiaparelli, director of the Milan observatory, who participated at a number of séances with Eusapia Palladino in 1892 at Milan. In a letter to Camille Flammarion he stated:

"If it had been possible entirely to exclude all suspicions of deceit one would have had to recognize in these facts the beginning of a new science pregnant with consequences of the highest importance. I cannot say that I am convinced of the reality of the things which are comprised under the ill-chosen name of Spiritualism. But neither do I believe in our right to deny everything; for in order to have a good basis for denial, it is not sufficient to suspect fraud, it is necessary to prove it. These experiments, which I have found very unsatisfactory, other experimenters of great confidence and of established reputation have been able to make in more favourable circumstances. I have not enough presumption to oppose a dogmatic and unwarranted denial to proofs in which scientists of great critical ability, such as William Crookes, Alfred Russel Wallace, Charles Richet, and Oliver Lodge, have found a solid basis of fact and one worthy of their examination, to such an extent that they have given it years of study."

Schiaparelli discontinued his investigations because, as he said, "Having passed all my life in the study of nature, which is always sincere in its manifestations and logical in its processes, it is repugnant to me to turn my thoughts to the investigation of a class of truths which it seems as if a malevolent and disloyal power was hiding from us with an obstinacy the motive of which we cannot comprehend."

Flammarion believed the cautious reserves of Schiaparelli were exaggerated. He declared, after reading the records of the Milan sittings, "If fraud has sometimes crept in, still what has been accurately observed remains safe and sound and is an acquisition to science."

A fellow astronomer of Schiaparelli, Prof. Francesco Porro, who attended the same sittings and later a number of others, came to the following conclusion:

"The phenomena are real. They cannot be explained either by fraud or hallucination. From the idea of the unconscious muscular action of the spectators (put forth half a century ago by Faraday) to the projection of protoplasmic activity or to the temporary emanation from the body of the medium imagined by Lodge; from the psychiatric doctrine of Lombroso to the psycho-physiology of Ochorowitz; from the externalisation admitted by Rochas to the eso-psychism of Morselli; from the automatism of Pierre Janet to the duplication of personality of Alfred Binet—there was a perfect flood of explanation, having for their end the elimination of an exterior personality. It is not possible, and never will be, to have a scientific proof of the identity of beings who manifest themselves. It will always be possible to imagine an unknown mechanism by the aid of which elemental substance and power may be drawn from the medium and the sitters and combined in such a way as to produce the indicated effects. It will always be found possible to find in the special aptitudes of the medium, in the thought of the sitters, and even in their attitude of expectant attention, the cause of the human origin of the phenomena. Still I should be inclined to admit it (the spirit hypothesis), if I did not see the possibility that these phenomena might form part of a scheme of things still more vast. In fact, nothing hinders us from believing in the existence of forms of life wholly different from those we know, and of which the life of human beings before birth and after death forms only a special case, just as the organic life of man is a special case of animal life in general."

Other astronomers of renown whose names have gone down in the annals of psychical research are Arago, Marc Thury, Johann Zöllner, and Sir William Huggins. Arago made interesting experiments in 1846 with Angelique Cottin, "the electric girl"; Thury came to positive conclusions in his investigation of table-turning phenomena and admitted that there may exist in this world other wills than those of man and the animals, wills capable of acting on matter; Zöllner's experiments with Slade are still widely quoted in books on the subject. Crookes was assisted for some time, in his memorable experiments with D. D. Home, by Sir William Huggins, ex-president of the Royal Society, well known for his researches in physics and astronomy. (See also Planetary Travels)

Astrotalk (Newsletter)

An online publication for users of astrological software; features new programs, developments, technologies, compatible hardware, and related news. Address: Matrix Software, 407 N. State St., Big Rapids, MI 49307. Website: http://www.astrologysoftware.com/.

Astrotherapy

Astrotherapy, also called clinical astrology, is a practice which integrates astrology and clinical psychotherapy. While astrology is still not an accepted practice within mainline psychological disciplines, it has found a place within psychotherapy and is currently utilized in this field which itself is radically divided into different camps based upon variant and even contradictory approaches to the human psyche. Thus defined, astrotherapy "includes any form of treatment utilizing astrological precepts to treat emotional and behavioral problems, remove or modify existing symptoms, and promote positive personality growth and fulfillment." Attempts have been made to integrate astrology with various schools of psychotherapy.

Psychotherapist Carl Jung's (1875–1961) stated appreciation of astrology provided contemporary astrology with an additional set of credentials and his theory of synchronicity assisted astrologers in their movement beyond the deterministic worldviews that had dominated astrological practice in centuries past. Jung stated that he had found that astrology illuminated aspects of his clients' personality that he had otherwise been unable to understand. He saw the astrological signs and the planets as symbols of the powers operating in the unconscious aspect of the personality, and was often amazed at the manner in which a person's horoscope coincided with observed psychological events and manifest character traits. Horoscopes demonstrate synchronicity, which he defined as "The simultaneous occurrence of a certain psychic state with one or more external events which appear as meaningful parallels to the momentary subjective state."

Dane Rudhyar began integrating Jungian psychology into astrological practice in the mid-1930s and his 1936 volume, The Astrology of Personality, is now seen as a watershed in the post-scientific astrological revival. Rudhyar understood the human personality as a dynamic entity that held a variety of opposing forces in more-or-less equilibrium. The human psyche was developing toward wholeness (understood in Jungian terms as individuation) and self-realization. The horoscope pictures these opposing forces and their distribution and relative strength in the individual.

Rudhyar was a voice crying in the wilderness until the 1960s and the emergence of humanistic astrology. Previously, psychotherapy had almost totally concentrated on individual pathology, but humanistic psychology focused upon creating and improving the basically healthy personality. It also provided a model for understanding the purposeful activity of human beings as they operated within a meaningful world. Again, Rudhyar was the first to see the potential of humanistic psychology for understanding the truth of astrology and for freeing astrology finally from its deterministic past. He initiated the humanistic astrology movement and in 1969 founded the International Committee for Humanistic Astrology. He found an immediate response from a new generation of astrologers including Stephen Arroyo, Zipporah Dobbins, Liz Greene, and Robert Hand. Their combined efforts would remake astrology in the 1970s.

Through the 1980s, astrology was recognized as one of the tools for transformation that facilitated individual transformation and movement into a New Age consciousness. Astrotherapy was integrated into the movement as if they had been made for each other. At the same time, practitioners dealt with the problems inherent in the introduction of such a questionable tool as a horoscope into the therapeutic environment and answered the most frequent challenges to their practice posed by colleagues. Rudhyar, always on the cutting edge of the movement, began to call for an integration of the findings of transpersonal psychology and its exploration of transcendent states of consciousness.

A variety of professional structures were created to assist contact in the small but growing number of astrotherapists, including the Rudhyar Institute for Transpersonal Activity. In the United Kingdom, the Centre for Psychological Astrology, founded in 1982 as the Centre for Transpersonal Astrology by Liz Greene and Howard Sasportas, emerged as an organization offering classes both for individuals who wish to gain personal insights and for colleagues seeking professional training. The centre also publishes Apollon, the Journal of Psychological Practice. Just as psychotherapy is a dynamic field, astrotherapy continues to grow and change as it integrates fresh psychological insights into astrological practice.

Sources:

Arroyo, Stephen. The Practice and Profession of Astrology. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRCS, 1985.

Dobbins, Zipporah. Expanding Astrology's Universe. 2nd ed. San Diego: Astro Computing Services, 1988.

Greene, Liz. The Astrology of Fate. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1984.

Hand, Robert S. Essays in Astrology. Rockport, Mass.: ParaResearch, 1982.

Perry, Glenn. "Astrotherapy." In James R. Lewis. The Encyclopedia of Astrology. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Rudhyar, Dane. Astrological Study of Psychological Complexes and Emotional Problems. 2nd ed. Wassenaar, the Netherlands: Servire, 1969.

———. The Astrology of Personality: A Re-formulation of Astrological Concepts and Ideals, in Terms of Contemporary Psychology and Philosophy. New York: Lucis Publishing, 1936.

———. Beyond Individualism: The Psychology of Transformation. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1979.

———. From Humanistic to Transpersonal Astrology. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1972.

As You Like It Library

An organization that maintained a free lending library of books on psychic subjects. Last known address: 915 E. Pine St., Rm. 401, Seattle, WA 98122.

Athame

The athame, a knife, is one of the primary tools employed by modern Wiccans (or Witches) in their rituals. It has a black handle and double-edged blade. The blade is never used for cutting and no attempt is made to keep it sharp, though often great care is taken to make it artistic. The athame is normally used to cast the circle at the beginning of rituals, thus establishing the magical space within which rituals are performed. It is also used for summoning and banishing the spirit entities who are called to be present as guardians of the ceremony. At the climax of the ritual at which wine is shared, the athame is often plunged into the chalice of wine (symbolic of the sex act).

Although occasional pieces of art show figures identified as Pagans or Witches holding a knife, knives were conspicuous by their absence in European Witchcraft texts. They appear to be one of the several elements introduced by Gerald B. Gardner (1884–1964), who was largely responsible for creating modern Neo-Pagan Witchcraft. Gardner had spent most of his life as a British civil servant in Asia. While in Malaysia, he became familiar with the local ritual weapon known as the kris. This wavy dagger was a well-known object, but almost nothing had been written about its use and significance. He learned of the kris majapahit, the magical instrument that was reputed to work wonders. It was believed to be possessed of a hantu, a spirit. Owning such a weapon was said to bring good fortune, providing protection for those fortunate enough to have one. Gardner's work on the kris is still the standard reference source.

By the time Gardner returned to England in the 1930s, he had hopes of creating a new magical religion built around the worship of a female deity. He drew from a multitude of sources, but added the ritual knife from his knowledge of the kris. The athame is one of the most distinctive contributions of Gardner to modern magical practice.

Sources:

Bracelin, Jack L. Gerald Gardner: Witch. London: Octagon Press, 1960.

Valiente, Doreen. The ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1973.

Athanor

According to Philostratus in his Life of Apollonius, Athanor is an occult hill surrounded by mist except on the southern side, which is clear. It has a well, which is four paces in breadth, from which an azure vapor ascends, which is drawn up by the warm sun. The bottom of the well is covered with red arsenic. Near it is a basin filled with fire from which rises a livid flame, odorless and smokeless, and never higher or lower than the edge of the basin. Also there are two black stone reservoirs, in one of which the wind is kept, and in the other the rain. In extreme drought the rain cistern is opened and clouds escape, which water the whole country.

This description should be interpreted as alchemical symbolism, since the Athanor was also the furnace supplying heat for the alchemical process. The term Athanor is also employed to denote moral and philosophical alchemy.

Atkinson, William Walker (1862–1932)

Lawyer William Walker Atkinson was an important early exponent of New Thought metaphysics and the occult, and, under the name of Swami Ramacharaka, he was a pioneer advocate of Hinduism and yoga. Atkinson was born December 5, 1862, in Baltimore, Maryland, and began his legal career after he was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1894. His promising future, however, began to dissolve as he found himself unable to cope with the pressures of the job. Doctors were unable to heal him, but in his search for health, he discovered the mind cure movement and was soon healed.

He moved to Chicago around the turn of the century and there continued his law practice but developed a second career as a metaphysical teacher and writer. His first pamphlet, "The Secret of the I AM," was freely distributed for many years. In 1900 he became the editor of Suggestion, a New Thought periodical, and about the same time met publisher and entrepreneur Sydney Flowers. Flowers had created the Psychic Research Company and the New Thought Publishing Company. In 1901 Atkinson became editor of Flowers's monthly New Thought magazine. He founded a Psychic Club and the Atkinson School of Mental Science, both of which he headquartered in the same building as Flowers's organizations.

The period of association with Flowers proved fruitful for both men. Through Flowers, Atkinson met publisher Elizabeth Towne, for whom he did a large percentage of his writing over the next decades. The first of his more than 50 books, Thought-Force: In Business and Everyday Life, appeared in 1900. It was followed by such prominent New Thought titles as The Law of New Thought (1902), The Inner Consciousness (1908), How to Know Human Nature: Its Inner States and Outer Forms (1913), and The New Thought: Its History and Principles, or the Message of New Thought (1915).

Soon after moving to Chicago, Atkinson became deeply involved in Hinduism and saw in yogic philosophy a parallel to his New Thought teachings. In 1903, under the pseudonym Swami Ramacharaka, Atkinson issued his first Hindu text, Fourteen Lessons in Yoga Philosophy and Oriental Occultism. It was followed by the Advanced Course in Yogi Philosophy (1904), Hindu Yogi Science of Breath (1904), Hatha Yoga (1905), Reincarnation and the Law of Karma (1908), and eight more. As popular as the New Thought books were, those books Atkinson wrote as Swami Ramacharaka have proved more enduring. They have remained in print to the present and have become important texts introducing Westerners to Hindu thought and practice.

Atkinson remained active as a writer and editor into the 1920s. He wrote regularly for The Nautilus, Elizabeth Towne's monthly, and issued one set of books he cowrote with Edward E. Beals in the early 1920s. In his later years he retired to California; he died in Los Angeles on November 22, 1932.

Sources:

Atkinson, William Walker. The Law of New Thought: A Study of Fundamental Principles and Their Application. Chicago: Psychic Research, 1902.

———. The New Thought: Its History and Principles; or, the Message of New Thought. Holyoke, Mass.: Elizabeth Towne, 1915.

———. Thought Force: In Business and Everyday Life. 1900. 18th ed. New York: Sydney Flower, 1903.

Swami Ramacharaka [William Walker Atkinson]. Fourteen Lessons in Yogi Philosophy and Oriental Occultism. Chicago: Yogi Publication Society, 1903.

———. Reincarnation and the Law of Karma. Yogi Publication Society, 1908.

Atlanta Astrologer

Monthly newsletter of the Metropolitan Atlanta Astrological Society; includes news of local membership, psi phenomena, and book reviews. Address: PO Box 12075, Atlanta, GA 30305.

The Atlanteans See Friends of Runnings Park

Atlantis

A mythical island continent said to have existed in the Atlantic Ocean in ancient times. The earliest mention of Atlantis is found in Plato's two dialogues Timaeus and Critias, from which it emerged as a topic of fascination and speculation over the centuries. It entered occult perspectives through the writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, in the nineteenth century and has been a topic of popular speculation in the twentieth century. For many, Atlantis has replaced the biblical Garden of Eden as a mythical original home for the human race.

For Plato, Atlantis was a useful myth for conveying several lessons he wanted to make about government and the nature of city-states. In the twentieth century it has been integrated into a myth about overreliance on technology as opposed to personal spiritual and psychic awareness. Plato described Atlantis as a large land located beyond the Straits of Gibraltar. It was a powerful land able to conquer much of the Mediterranean basin, but at the height of its power it was destroyed by geologic forces. Plato supposedly learned of Atlantis as a result of the Athenian lawgiver Solon, who had brought the story to Greece from Egypt several centuries earlier.

Over time the Atlantis myth grew in proporition, so that by the Middle Ages, Atlantis had been transformed into a massive mid-Atlantic continent. Eventually it became one of the destinations visited by explorers in the European fantastic voyage literature, the most prominent being Captain Nemo in Jules Verne's Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea (1870).

Interest in Atlantis was revived in 1882 with the publication of Ignatius Donnelly's Atlantis, the Antediluvian World. He argued that Atlantis was the lost origin point of humanity, the place where the race moved out of barbarism to a civilized state. For Donnelly, Atlantis explained many of the prominent similarities between the culture of Egypt and that of Latin America. He believed that the worldwide myth of the flood was really the account of Atlantis's demise.

Blavatsky adopted Donnelly's ideas and integrated Atlantis into the theosophical story of the evolution of the human race. She hypothesized the evolution of humanity through a series of "root races." Lemuria, the Pacific equivalent of Atlantis, was the home of the third root race; Atlantis, of the fourth root race. Earth is currently populated by the fifth root race. Blavatsky's ideas were expanded by such Theosophists as Charles W. Leadbeater, W. Scott Elliott, and Rudolf Steiner.

In the 1920s the subject of Atlantis was taken up by Scottish journalist and anthropologist Lewis Spence, who eventually wrote four books on the subject, beginning with The Problem of Atlantis (1924). He passed along speculations to psychic Edgar Cayce (1877–1945), who frequently spoke of Atlantis, primarily as he described the past lives of his clients. Many were seen as people who had escaped to such places as Egypt or Peru following the destruction of the continent.

Cayce pictured Atlantis as a land of high technological achievement, even by twentieth-century standards. Atlanteans understood universal forces and had learned to fly, had central heating, sonar, and television. Central to Atlantean technologies was a firestone, a large crystal that collected energy from the stars and then gave off energy to power the technology of the land. The misuse of the crystal's power led to the destruction of Atlantis.

The Association for Research and Enlightenment, an organization formed to promote and perpetuate Cayce's work, gathered his comments about Atlantis and published them in two books, Atlantis: Fact or Fiction (1962) and Edgar Cayce on Atlantis (1968), which called attention to a Cayce prediction that a remnant of Atlantis would emerge at the end of the 1960s near the island of Bimini. No such emergence occurred, but a number of Cayce's believers travel to the area in search of underground remnants of the continent.

Amid the numerous speculations about the location of the lost continent, one seems to have emerged as the most likely. In 1969 Greek archaeologist Angelo Galanopoulos released data he had collected on the island of Thera. Galanopoulos had discovered an ancient Minoan city, buried in layers of volcanic ash. It was the center of a once-powerful city-state that was wiped out suddenly by the volcano. With the exception of its location in the Mediterranean rather than outside the Straits of Gibraltar, it fits most precisely the several descriptions of Atlantis reported by Plato.

From Cayce the idea of Atlantis was picked up in the New Age movement. In 1982, Frank Alper, a channel from Arizona, issued an important channeled work, Exploring Atlantis, in which he picked up the account in Cayce's writings about the crystal on Atlantis. The three-volume work, which purports a crystal-based culture on the lost continent, became the basis of the faddish use of crystals by New Agers in the 1980s. In particular, Alper describes in some detail the techniques of crystal healing.

Sources:

Alper, Frank. Exploring Atlantis. 3 vols. Farmingdale, N.Y.: Coleman Publishing, 1982.

Cayce, Edgar. Atlantis: Fact or Fiction. Virginia Beach, Va.: ARE Press, 1962.

———. Edgar Cayce on Atlantis. New York: Paperback Library, 1968.

Donnelly, Ignatius. Atlantis: The Antediluvian World. New York: Harper's, 1882.

Ferro, Robert, and Michael Gromley. Atlantis: The Autobiography of a Search. New York: Bell Publishing, 1970.

Galanopoulos, A. G., and E. Bacon. Atlantis. London: Nelson, 1969.

Scott-Elliott, W. The Story of Atlantis. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1896.

Spence, Lewis. Atlantis in America. London: E. Benn, 1925.

———. The Problem of Atlantis. London: Rider, 1924.

Steiner, Rudolf. Cosmic Memory: Prehistory of Earth and Man. West Nyack, N.Y.: Paperback Library, 1968.

Atlantis (Magazine)

Monthly publication of the Ancient Mediterranean Research Society; contained articles, book reviews, and news of the society's activities. Last known address: 1047 Gayley Ave., Ste. 201, Los Angeles, CA 90024.

Atlantis Book Shop

One of the two most famous British bookshops specializing in occult literature (the other is Watkins Book Shop). It was started 30 years ago by Michael Houghton, poet, writer, publisher, student of the occult, and a friend of Aleister Crowley. Houghton wrote under the pen name Michael Juste.

For many years the bookshop was a meeting place for occultists, long before the present occult revival. After the death of Houghton, the shop was taken over by the Collins family, who had hoped to change the character of the stock by specializing in books on science and microscopy, but the association with occultism was too strong to be broken and they were obliged to continue as an occult bookshop. It was run by Geraldine Collins and specialized in witchcraft, mythology, vampires, Atlantis, occultism, and magic rituals. Collins closed the shop in 1989, pending sale as a going concern.

The bookshop opened again in November 1989. This resulted in a larger and more varied stock of new and secondhand books on the paranormal, spiritualism, occult studies, and New Age topics. Address: Atlantis Bookshop, 49A Museum St., Bloomsbury, London, WC1A 1LY England.

Atlantis Rising

Atlantis Rising is a newsstand magazine that focuses upon alternative scientific perspectives, especially anomalistic events, ancient mysteries, and those scientific findings that appear to contradict current scientific consensus. The issues the magazine highlights are those that would, if accepted into contemporary science, most likely force scientists to alter their views of the world. Among the issues frequently touched upon are Atlantis, catastrophism, cold fusion and free energy, time travel, ancient astronauts, the unexpected wisdom of ancient peoples, parapsychology, and UFOs.

Founded in 1994 as an oversized quarterly, Atlantis Rising has given support to writers such as Graham Hancock and Zecharia Sitchin who have championed an alternative view of history. Hancock emerged in the 1990s as the major voice challenging the common view of historians that Western civilization emerged approximately 5,000 years ago. Rather, Hancock argues, civilization is much older and the ancients possessed a dramatically higher level of technology than we have supposed. Sitchin, whose initial book, The 12th Planet, appeared just as the ancient astronaut hypothesis appeared to have run its course in the 1980s, has subsequently published a series of popular books arguing for extraterrestrial intervention in the human past. While finding a popular audience, as a whole the views championed by Hancock and Sitchin failed to find any support from mainstream academics.

Each issue of Atlantis Rising carries a set of feature articles on alternative science and reproduces news reports that tend to confirm views of the world outside of the current scientific consensus. Each issue also carries an extensive catalog of books and audio visuals that support the magazine's general editorial position. With issue 22 in 1999, the magazine dropped its oversized format in favor of a more conventional one in order to overcome objections of distributors who refused to handle oddsized publications. Its publication headquarters may be contacted at P.O. Box 441, Livingston, MT 59047. Its webpage is at http://www.atlantisrising.com/.

Sources:

Atlantis Rising. http://www.atlantisrising.com/. February 28, 2000.

Atmadhyana

In the raja yoga philosophy of Sankaracharya, Atmadhyana is the fourteenth of the stages necessary to acquire the knowledge of the unity of the soul with Brahman. It is characterized as the condition of highest joy arising from the belief of the identification of the self (Atman) with Brahman.

Sources:

Mishra, Shri Ramamurti. Self Analysis and Self Knowledge. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1977.

Atman

Usually translated "Soul" but better rendered "Self." In the Hindu religion, Atman means the union of the collective human soul with God (Brahma), eventually merged in the absolute totality of Brahman. It is believed that the soul is neither body nor mind, nor even thought, but that these are merely conditions by which the soul is clouded so that it loses its sense of oneness with God. In the Upanishads it is said, "The Self, smaller than small, greater than great, is hidden in the heart of the creature" and "In the beginning there was Self."

Sources:

Davis, Roy Eugene. The Path of Soul Liberation. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1975.

Mishra, Shri Ramamurti. Self Analysis and Self Knowledge. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1977.

Prabhavananda, Swami, with Frederick Manchester. The Spiritual Heritage of India. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963.

Atmaniketan Ashram

Founded to propagate the teachings of the Hindu sage Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950) as presented by one of his disciples,

Sadhu Loncontirth. Atmaniketan maintained a residence center for individuals who desired to dedicate their lives to Aurobindo teachings and arranged classes and seminars for visitors with special emphasis on spiritual expression through painting, music, and dance. The ashram had a research library of Sri Aurobindo's writings and other Hindu spiritual works, and it issued a book catalog. The last known address of the international headquarters is at Merschstrasse 49, D-4715 Ascheberg 2, Germany.

Atreya, Bhikhan Lal (1897–1967)

Professor of philosophy at Banaras Hindu University, India. Dr. Atreya made a special study of the Yogavasishtha, an important Hindu mystical scripture, and wrote several books about it. He also wrote on parapsychology in the Journal of the Banaras Hindu University. He took special interest in poltergeist phenomena and reincarnation and assisted the researches of Prof. Ian Stevenson into certain cases suggestive of reincarnation.

Attunement

Attunement is a spiritual healing technique developed in the early 1930s by Lloyd Meeker (d. 1954). It appears that in the 1920s he had come across some forms of magnetic healing which launched his own speculations concerning the nature of spiritual healing. He began working as a healer in 1929. Then in 1932 he had a profound spiritual experience during which he became aware of his higher self. He returned to this experience with the higher self repeatedly and soon felt that he had merged with it. He also adopted a new name, Uranda, under which he began to teach. He founded the Third Sacred School that was later incorporated as the Emissaries of Divine Light.

In the 1940s, Meeker met George Shears, a chiropractor who had developed a no-fee chiropractic practice based upon the donations of patients. He shared his ideas with his colleagues and many accepted his approach. He also began to include a form of spiritual healing in what became known as the God-Patient Chiropractor (or G.P.C.) system. Through the 1940s, Meeker used a mixed healing system that included both the laying on of hands with the idea of the radiation of healing power from the hands to specific parts of the body. Then, in 1949, a chiropractor who had worked with Meeker had an unusual experience. He was preparing to do an adjustment, but before he made it, the problem corrected itself. He intuited that the change had been made by spirit. This observation led to the separation of this specific form of healing, now taking the name Attunement, from Meeker's larger theological preachments.

The chiropractor, Albert Ackerly, eventually dropped his chiropractic practice and devoted himself full time to the development of Attunement. The practice is focused on the radiation of energy to the body, based upon the understanding that the endocrine glands are the principal portals through which spirit can enter the body. The endocrine glands are closely related to the traditional chakras. Following Ackerly's discovery, other chiropractors joined him in becoming full time Attunement healers.

In 1950, Meeker first addressed a group of G.P.C. chiropractors and soon afterward a convention of chiropractors was held at Sunrise Ranch, the headquarters of the Emissaries movement in Colorado. In 1952, a set of Emissary programs was regularly offered to chiropractic professionals through what was then known as the G.P.C. Servers Training School. The practice of Attunement was spread through the school.

In 1996, a number of Attunement practitioners gathered at Sunrise Ranch to found the Attunement Guild as a professional association to promote the practice. They use the Server's Code introduced by Meeker in 1953. There are currently several hundred Attunement practitioners found across North America, and in Israel, New Zealand, the Netherlands, and South Africa.

The Attunement Guild may be reached at the headquarters of the Emissaries at 5569 N. Country Rd. 29, Loveland, CO 80537. It has a website at http://www.attunement.org/.

Sources:

Jorgensen, Chris. Attunement, Love Made Visible. Kansas City, Mo.: The Author, 1996.

Layne, Laurence. Attunement: The Sacred Landscape. St Augustine, Fla.: The Florida School of Attunement and Natural Healing, 1998.

Atwater, Phyllis M. H. (1937–)

Phyllis M. H. Atwater, a researcher on the near-death experience, was born on September 19, 1937, in Twin Falls, Idaho. After high school she went to work as a secretary. In 1956 she married John Bernard Huffman, with whom she had three children. During her adult years she became interested in the occult and in 1966 she became a professional numerologist. Four years later she founded Inner Forum, Inc., in Boise, through which she offered her services as a counselor. She soon added astrology and hypnotism to her skills.

In 1976 she went through a divorce. The following year her health failed and she died on three occasions, each time undergoing a near-death experience and returning to life. After she recovered she began to seek out others who had had similar experiences to understand what she had gone through. She also wrote a book about her experiences, I Died Three Times in 1977. In 1980 she married Tony Young Atwater.

In the early 1980s, she began to systematically interview people who had had near-death experiences, which became the basis of a series of articles and then a book, Coming Back to Life: The After Effects of the Near-Death Experience (1988). Her interviews turned into a new career—exploring, understanding, and writing about the near-death experience. Her efforts resulted in a series of near-death books, Beyond the Light: What Isn't Being Said about the Near-Death Experience (1994), Future Memory (1996), and the Complete Idiot's Guide to the Near-Death Experience (2000). Her own experience guided her research and offered unique avenues of exploration. She also developed an interest in children who had had near-death experiences about which she wrote in Children of the New Millennium (1999). Atwater is an officer of the International Association for Near-Death Studies, and helped establish its NDE Research Fund.

Along the way she also wrote The Magical Language of Runes (1990) and Goddess Runes (1996). Besides offering lectures and workshops on the near-death experience, she still gives astrological, numerological, and runes readings. She has a large Internet site through which she can be contacted at http://www.cinemind.com/atwater/.

Sources:

Atwater, P. M. H. Beyond the Light: What Isn't Being Said about the Near-Death Experience. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1994.

———. Children of the New Millennium. New York: Three Rivers Press, 1999.

———. Coming Back to Life: The After Effects of the Near-Death Experience. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co., 1988.

———. Complete Idiot's Guide to the Near-Death Experience. New York: Macmillan Co., 2000 ———. Future Memory. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1996.

———. The Magical Language of Runes. Santa Fe, N.Mex.: Bear & Co., 1990.

Atwood, Mary Ann (1817–1910)

Author of a remarkable book, A Suggestive Enquiry into the Hermetic Mystery, first published in 1850 under her maiden name, M. A. South, putting forward an early statement of the theory that the true goal of alchemy was spiritual perfection. Atwood subsequently regretted publication, fearing that she had revealed matters that should remain secret, and she therefore bought up as many copies of the book as possible and destroyed them. However, after her death, a new edition was brought out in 1918, from one of the few surviving copies. The new edition included Atwood memorabilia and an introduction by Walter Leslie Wilmshurst.

Sources:

Atwood, Mary Ann. A Suggestive Enquiry into the Hermetic Mystery. 1850. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Atziluth

One of the three worlds of the Kabala; the supreme circle; the perfect revelation. According to Éliphas Lévi, it is represented in the biblical book of Revelation by the head of the mighty angel with the face of a sun.

Aubert, George (ca. 1920)

Nonprofessional French musical medium who claimed to play the piano under the control of classical composers. His performance was investigated in 1906 by the Institut Général Psychologique in Paris. Various tests were devised to eliminate conscious operation. They asked him to play a Mozart Sonata blindfolded and started two gramophones at the same time, leading the tubes of them into his ears. He did it to perfection. In another experiment Aubert continued playing while he read slowly and attentively a philosophical work that was put before him. The names of the spirit musicians were given as Beethoven, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, and others. Aubert never studied harmony, technique, or improvisation. However, his improvisations were never reproduced and, all except the records taken at the Institut Général Psychologique, are lost. The story of Aubert's mediumship is told by himself in La Mediumnité Spirite (Paris, 1920). Similar musical mediumship has been demonstrated by Rosemary Brown and Jesse F. G. Shepard.

Aubourg, Michel (1921–)

A professor of anthropology and government official in Haiti. Aubourg was born April 1, 1921, at Les Cayes, Haiti, and studied at the University of Haiti (Bachelier ès lettres, diplôme de la Faculté d'Ethnologie) and at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois. He authored several books on Haitian folklore and articles on divination in voudou.

Sources:

Aubourg, Michel. Haiti prehistorique. Port-au-Prince, Haiti: Editiones Panorama, n.d. [1966?].

———. Le Mouvement folklorique en Haiti. Port-au-Prince, Haiti: Imprimerie de l'Etat, 1952.

Aubrey, John (1626–1697)

John Aubrey, an antiquarian whose work stands as the fountain of the modern revival of Druidism, was born into a well-to-do family in Easton Pierse, Wiltshire, England, on March 12, 1626. He entered Trinity College Oxford in 1642 but his stay was cut short the following year due to an outbreak of smallpox and the beginning of the civil war that would eventually lead to the execution of the king. Through the rest of the decade he studied the megaliths of the country, particularly Stonehenge, studied law, and worked for his father. His father died in 1652 and he inherited his father's estates. However, several lawsuits and an extravagant lifestyle reduced him to poverty over the next decade.

During this time Aubrey continued his antiquarian studies and in 1671 received a commission from the government to make surveys of antiquarian sites. While collecting a mass of data, he published none of it, though he shared some of it with a colleague, Anthony A. Wood, for a volume on the antiquities of Oxford. The only book he published, Miscellanies, was a collection of ghost stories and other accounts of the supernatural. At one point during the reign of Charles II (1660–85), he composed an unpublished manuscript on the Wiltshire stone monuments in which he presented his major thesis that they were a product of the Druids. At the time, the common wisdom was that they were of Roman origin, and Aubrey was the first to realize that they were far older. He expanded upon his beliefs in an unpublished manuscript, Monumenta Britannica.

Aubrey gained a certain fame in later life. He was a guest of many of the intellectual elite and at one point was visited by John Toland, later to be elected the first chief of a revived Druid Order. Aubrey died in Oxford in 1697.

While Aubrey published little during his life, his manuscripts were saved and in 1719, his text Perambulation of Surrey became the basis of Rawlinson's Natural History and Antiquities of Surrey. A number of his works, including extracts from Monumenta Britannica, were issued in the nineteenth century.

Within the modern Druid movement, many believe that Aubrey was more than a gentleman scholar. They have concluded that he was a Druid himself, that he participated in a Druid grove that met at Mount Haemus, and that he passed along some authority to John Toland. There is no hard evidence to support such belief.

Sources:

Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1991.

August Order of Light

An Oriental order introduced into England in 1882 by Maurice Vidal Portman. Its object was the development of practical occultism, and it continued at Bradford, Yorkshire, as "The Oriental Order of Light." It had a ritual of three degrees, Novice, Aspirans, Viator. It adopted kabalistic forms and was governed by a Grand Master of the Sacred Crown, or Kether, of the Kabala.

August Spirits, Shelf of the

In Japan, it used to be customary for every house to have a room set apart, called the spirit chamber, in which there was a shelf or shrine with tablets bearing the names of the deceased members of the family, with the sole addition of the word Mitama (spirit). This is a species of ancestor worship and is known as "home" worship.

AUM (or OM)

A sacred sound in Hinduism, composed of three syllables—A-U-M—merging into each other. The sound is used to preface and end the reading of sacred scriptures and prayers and is used in most mantras. AUM is also the subject of intricate mystical symbolism as a subject for meditation and is said to contain the origin of the alphabet and all sounds. In this respect it parallels the Shemhamforasch of Jewish mysticism and the creation of the universe. The Hindu scripture Mandukya Upanishad is devoted entirely to an exposition of the mysticism of AUM.

Sources:

Prabhavananda, Swami, with Frederick Manchester. The Spiritual Heritage of India. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963.

Wood, Thomas E. The Mandukya Upanishad and the Agama Shastra: An Investigation into the Meaning of the Vedanta. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990.

AUM See Association for the Understanding of Man

AUM Magazine See Anahata Nada

Aura

An emanation said to surround human beings, chiefly encircling the head and supposed to proceed from the nervous system. It is described as a cloud of light suffused with various colors. This is seen clairvoyantly, being imperceptible to the physical sight.

Some authorities trace the existence of the aura in such biblical instances as the bright light shining about Moses, which the children of Israel were unable to look upon when he descended from the mountain bearing the stone tablets engraved with the Ten Commandments (Exod. 34:29–30); in the exceedingly brilliant light that shone about St. Paul's vision at the time of his conversion (Acts 9:3); and in the transfiguration of Jesus Christ, when his raiment shone so brightly that no one on Earth could match it (Matt. 17:1–2). Many of the medieval saints were said to be surrounded with a cloud of light.

It is told that when St. John of the Cross knelt at the altar in prayer, a certain brightness darted from his face. St. Philip Neri was constantly seen enveloped in light, and St. Charles Borromeo was similarly illuminated. This is said to be due to the fact that when a person is engaged in lofty thought and spiritual aspiration, the auric colors become more luminous and translucent and therefore more easily discernible.

In Christian art, around the heads of saints and the sacred characters is portrayed the halo, or nimbus, which is supposed to represent the aura. Medieval saints and mystics distinguished four different types of aura; the Nimbus, the Halo, the Aureola, and the Glory. The first two stream from the head, the aureola from the whole body, the glory is a combination of the two. Theosophists speak of five divisions: the health aura, the vital aura, the karmic aura, the aura of character, and the aura of spiritual nature. Clairvoyants often claim the ability to see the human aura. From its colors they draw inferences as to the emotional state of character. Brilliant red means anger and force; dirty red, passion and sensuality; brown, avarice; rose, affection; yellow, intellectual activity; purple, spirituality; blue, religious devotion; green, deceit and jealousy; a deeper shade of green, sympathy. Polish psychic Stephan Ossowiecki occasionally saw a kind of dark aura that always meant the approach of unexpected death. It is also thought that the colors of the body and clothing in medieval paintings and stained glass are intended to represent the auric colors of the person portrayed.

The crowns and distinctive headdresses worn by the kings and priests of antiquity are said to be symbolic of the aura. In many of the sacred books of the East, representations of the great teachers and holy men are given with the light extending around the whole body. Instances of this may be found in the temple caves of India and Ceylon, in the Japanese Buddhistic books, also in Egypt, Greece, Mexico, and Peru.

In occult literature the tradition of the aura is an old one. Paracelsus mentioned it in the sixteenth century in the following terms: "The vital force is not enclosed in man, but radiates round him like a luminous sphere, and it may be made to act at a distance. In these semi-natural rays the imagination of man may produce healthy or morbid effects. It may poison the essence of life and cause diseases, or it may purify it after it has been made impure, and restore the health."

Paracelsus said further that "Our thoughts are simply magnetic emanations, which, in escaping from our brains, penetrate into kindred heads and carry thither, with a reflection of our life, the mirage of our secrets."

A theosophical description is as follows:

"The aura is a highly complicated and entangled manifestation, consisting of many influences operating within the same area. Some of the elements composing the aura are projected from the body, others from the astral principles, and others again from the more spiritual principles connected with the "Higher Self," or permanent Ego; and the various auras are not lying one around the other, but are all blended together and occupy the same place. Guided by occult training the clairvoyant faculty may make a complete analysis of the various elements in the aura and can estimate the delicate tints of which it is composed—though all blended together—as if each were seen separately."

Classified more exactly, the divisions of the aura are stated to be (1) the health aura (2) the vital aura, (3) the karmic aura, that of the animal soul in man (4) the aura of character, and (5) the aura of the spiritual nature.

The health aura "is almost colorless, but becomes perceptible by reason of possessing a curious system of radial striation, that is to say, it is composed of an enormous number of straight lines, radiating evenly in all directions from the body." The second, or vital aura, is said to be to a certain extent under the control of the will, when it circulates within the "linga charira" or astral body, of a "delicate rosy tint, which it loses, becoming bluish as it radiates outward." The third aura is "the field of manifestation, or the mirror in which every feeling, every desire is reflected." Of this aura the colors constantly change, as seen by the clairvoyant vision. "An outburst of anger will charge the whole aura with deep red flashes on a dark ground, while sudden terror will, in a moment, change everything to a ghastly grey." The fourth aura is that of the permanent character, and is said to contain the record of the past earth life of the personality. The fifth aura is not often seen even by clairvoyants, but it is described by those who have seen it, only in the cases where the spiritual nature is the most powerful factor, as "outshining all the rest of the auras with startling brilliancy." The auric colors, it is declared, cannot be adequately described in terms of the ordinary colors discernible to the physical vision, being very much brighter and of more varied hues and shades. The symbolic meaning of these is roughly of the following order: rose, pure affection; brilliant red, anger and force; dirty red, passion and sensuality; yellow of the purest lemon color, the highest type of intellectual activity; orange, intellect used for selfish ends as well as pride and ambition; brown, avarice. Green is a color of varied significance; its root meaning is the placing of one's self in the position of another. In its lower aspects it represents deceit and jealousy; higher up in the emotional gamut, it signifies adaptability, and at its very highest, when it takes on the color of foliage, it represents sympathy, the very essence of thinking for other people. In some shades, green stands for the lower intellectual and critical faculties, merging into yellow. Blue indicates religious feeling and devotion, its various shades being said to correspond to different degrees of devotion, rising from fetishism to the loftiest religious idealism. Purple represents psychic faculty, spirituality, regality, spiritual power arising from knowledge, and occult preeminence.

Apart from occult beliefs in the aura, there is also some scientific basis. The most important experimental investigations into the subject were conducted by Dr. Walter J. Kilner (1847–1920) of St. Thomas Hospital in London. In the first edition of his book, The Human Atmosphere (1911), he describes a dicyanin screen that rendered the aura visible to normal sight. The screen was a solution of coal-tar dye between two hermetically sealed pieces of glass. Looking through it in daylight and then turning the eye to view a naked man in dim light before a dark background, three distinct radiations, all lying in the ultraviolet end of the spectrum, became visible.

The first, dark and colorless, surrounded the body to the depth of a quarter to half an inch. Kilner called this the etheric double. The second, the inner aura, extended three inches beyond. The third, the outer aura, was about a foot in depth.

Kilner tried various experiments. He found that the depth of the aura is influenced by a magnet and that it is sensitive to electric currents, completely vanishing under a negative charge from a Wimshurst machine, then increasing to an additional 50 percent after the charge dissipates. It is also affected by the vapors of various chemicals and loses brilliance in hypnosis. Illness affects both its size and color. Impairment of the mental powers causes a diminution in size and distinctness. Nervous diseases result in highly observable changes.

From all this Kilner concluded that the higher brain centers are intimately concerned in the output of auric force. This suggested an identity with the "nerve-aura" of Dr. Joseph Rhodes Buchanan, the first explorer of the mysteries of psychometry, which was postulated as early as 1852, and with the "nerve atmosphere" of Dr. Benjamin Richardson.

As death approaches, the aura gradually shrinks. No trace of it is discovered around the corpse. Kilner also claimed the discovery that the aura may be affected by an effort of will, that it may be projected to a longer distance from the body, and change its colors. He said that the auras of different people may show attraction; they may blend and become more intense. From the influence of the state of health on the aura, Kilner drew medical conclusions. Dr. Johnson of Brooklyn followed in his footsteps and based his medical diagnoses on the change in the auric color.

Important as the researches of Kilner were, he was not the first in the field. Baron Karl von Reichenbach asserted at an early age that the aura can be plainly seen issuing from the fingertips. Dr. Hereward Carrington cited a forgotten book, Ten Years with Spiritual Mediums published by Francis Gerry Fairfield in 1874 in America, in which the author anticipated Kilner's conclusions. Claiming that all organic structures have a special form of nerve aura, Fairfield "constantly observed that epileptics, pending the incubation of the fit, appear to be enveloped in a sensitive and highly excited nerve-atmosphere, which . . . heralds the attack; or . . . eventuates in clairvoyance and trance. Though subsensible, observation and experiment seem alike to indicate that the nerve-aura is material—an imponderable nervous ether, possibly related to the odyle. It is thus at once a force and a medium, susceptible of control by the will of the operator, and capable of sensory impression: an atmosphere to take shape of his command, and to dissolve the moment volition ceases, or, when the habit of the medium's will has become fixed in that direction, to come and pass in visible apparitions, without conscious objective impulse on his part."

As the excerpt shows, Fairfield attempted to explain in terms of "nerve-aura" the supernormal manifestations of mediums. To be all-inclusive, he endowed it with a self-directive and self-directing power.

This is essentially the same hypothesis at which Enrico Morselli, Theodore Flournoy, Gustav Geley, and Carrington later arrived, relative to the exteriorization of nervous energy in the case of Eusapia Palladino. Dr. Paul Joire's experiments in the exteriorization of sensibility also lend support to the theory of the aura, and medical observations occasionally bear it out too.

In the Annales des sciences psychiques (July 1905), Dr. Charles Féré of the Asylum Bicêtre quoted two cases of his own experience in which he had seen neuropathic halos. The first was the case of a 28-year-old woman of a neuroarthritic family, subject to various hysterical symptoms:

"It was during an unusually painful attack, accompanied by a sensation of frontal bruising, and by cold in the cyanosic extremities, that I was struck, towards four o'clock in the afternoon (23 February 1883) by the sight of a light possessing a radius of about 20 cm., which encircled her head; the light, which was of an orange colour, diminished in intensity near the periphery. The same phenomenon was manifested around her hands. The skin, which was usually white and matt, had an orange tint of a deeper shade than the halos. The colouring of the skin had preceded, by a few seconds, the lights surrounding the head and hands which had appeared about two hours before my observation. The colouring of the skin and the lights ceased about two hours later at the moment of the habitual vomiting."

The second case was similar to the first, except that, save monthly headaches, nothing indicated nervous trouble.

Dr. O'Donnell of the Chicago Mercy Hospital controlled and confirmed Dr. Kilner's experiments; they were, according to a note by psychic researcher Harry Price in Psychic Research (June 1930), also revived by Dr. Drysdale Anderson in West Africa. He detected a distinct band "like a wreath of tobacco smoke." This smoky aura appeared to "envelope the body and stream out of the tips of the fingers like white elastic bands."

Modern scientific interest in the aura was stimulated briefly in 1970 by the development of Kirlian photography, which many believed made the aura visible. Kirlian photography involved taking a picture of an object placed directly onto an unexposed photonegative by sending an electric current across the film. The object would appear with a discharge of energy coming from it. The corona discharge shown surrounding objects seemed to fluctuate in interesting ways. However, when carefully controlled experiments were done, carefully regulating the pressure between the film and the object photographed, the interesting effects disappeared.

Sources:

Bagnall, Oscar. The Origin and Properties of the Human Aura. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Berger, Ruth. The Secret Is in the Rainbow: Aura Interrelationships. Clearwater, Fla.: Beau Geste, 1979.

Cayce, Edgar. Auras. Virginia Beach, Va.: ARE Press, 1970.

Johnson, Kendall L. The Living Aura: Radiation Field Photography and the Kirlian Effect. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1975.

Kilner, Walter J. The Human Aura. 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Krippner, Stanley, and Daniel Rubin. The Kirlian Aura: Photographing the Galaxies of Life. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Books, 1974.

Ouseley, S. G. J. The Science of the Auras. London: L. N. Fowler, 1970.

Roberts, Ursula. The Mystery of the Human Aura. London: Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, 1972.

Aurobindo, Sri (1872–1950)

Famous Hindu mystic, philosopher, and poet. Sri Aurobindo Ghosh ("Sri" is an honorific pronounced "Shree") was born Arvinda Ackroyd Ghose in Calcutta, India, on August 15, 1872, and educated in Britain, where he spent nearly 15 years. He studied in London and Cambridge, where he mastered Greek and Latin literature as well as the French, German, and Italian languages. He returned to India and worked as a teacher in Baroda, becoming a scholar in Sanskrit and other Indian languages.

After the partition of Bengal, Aurobindo became a leader of a newly formed National party with the goal of home rule. When violence broke out in Bengal, he was arrested for sedition but was acquitted. He was again arrested and acquitted, but a third prosecution commenced while he was detained in prison. During his imprisonment he underwent profound spiritual experiences, which turned him from politics to mysticism. He developed his own system of synthesized yoga, which he called "integral yoga." He retired from public life in 1910 and established an ashram at Pondicherry, where he lived until his death in 1950.

After his death the ashram continued under the guidance of Mira Richards (1878–1973), the wife of a French diplomat who had met Aurobindo in 1914 and embraced his philosophy.

Richards became known as "the Mother." The Mother conceived of the idea of Auroville as an ideal international urban center.

Aurobindo taught that the material world should be transformed by making one's own life divine, and claimed that he had realized the "Overmind" in 1926 and was thus able to bring divine consciousness to the task of human evolution. He had retired into seclusion and from that time forward had spoken to his disciples only through the Mother. During his lifetime he wrote 30 volumes relating to the theme of The Life Divine, including a 23,000 line poem, Savitri dealing with the struggle to unite divine consciousness with historical processes.

With the approval of Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, the ashram at Pondicherry inaugurated many "Sri Aurobindo Action" centers throughout India, and Aurobindo centers were also established in most major European cities and throughout the U.S. For information on Sri Aurobindo publications and organizations, contact the Sri Aurobindo Association at PO Box 163237, Sacramento, CA 95816. They also have a website: http://www.collaboration.org/.

Sources:

Aurobindo, Sri. Sri Aurobindo Centenary Library. 50 vols. Pondicherry, India: Sri Aurobindo Library Press, 1970–72.

Donnelly, Morwinna. Founding the Life Divine. Lower Lake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1976.

McDermott, Robert, ed. The Essential Aurobindo. New York: Schrocken Books, 1973.

———. Six Pillars. Chambersburg, Pa.: Wilson Books, 1974.

Sri Aurobindo Association. http://www.collaboration.org/. April 25, 2000.

Auroville

An international township project for a religious city in India within five miles of the Bay of Bengal, with a planned population of 50,000. The project was originally the idea of Mira Richards (1878–1973), the leading disciple of Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950), known as the Mother, who developed the concept in the 1950s as an extension of Aurobindo's idea. Auroville would be a place where people of good will of all nationalities could live freely as citizens of the world and obey only the truth. The plan was developed over a number of years and was finally inaugurated in 1968, when a group gathered on land adjacent to the Aurobindo Ashram north of Pondicherry, India, to lay the foundation stone. India has recognized Auroville as an international city state.

The plan of the city approximates a giant spiral galaxy. In the center is a giant sphere, the Matrimandir, a giant symbol of the community's aspiration for the divine. Spiraling out from the center are four zones, one each for residences, work, education, and culture and social relations.

Some 500 people, mostly from India, the United States, France, Great Britain, and Holland, settled on the land and began the process of reclaiming the inhospitable site for human habitation. Today, the Auroville community numbers nearly 1,500 from some 30 countries. Since Richards' death in 1973, Auroville has experienced its fair share of setbacks and the project is still a work in progress. Auroville may be contacted in care of Auroville Outreach, Bharat Nivas, Auroville 605101, India. Website: http://www.auroville.org.

Sources:

Auroville. Pondicherry, India: Sri Auroville Society, n.d.

Glenn, Jerome Clayton. Linking the Future: Findhorn, Auroville, Arcosanti. Cambridge, Mass.: Center on Technology and Society, 1979.

Aurum Solis (Order of the Sacred Word)

Magical society founded in 1897 by occultists Charles Kongold and George Stanton. The society is an initiatory order of the Ogdoatic tradition of the Western Mysteries. This tradition fused pre-Christian mystery teachings of the Eastern Mediterranean with the mystic teachings of the Oriental monasteries of Sinai, Carmel, and St. Sabas. Aurum Solis has had a special interest in alchemical, Gnostic, medieval, and Celtic traditions within a basic framework of kabalistic philosophy, affirmed through special rituals relating to spiritual consciousness.

After World War I, the society's membership became influenced by newer occult trends from such other organizations as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, but authentic kabalistic traditions were strengthened by the work of Rabbi Morris Greenburg, a noted Talmudic scholar. World War II largely suspended the society activities until 1949.

Some years later conflicting trends arose, largely around the issue of magical rituals designed to enhance consciousness and the actual use of occult powers. A schism occurred in 1957, and one group broke away to form the Hermetic Order of the Sacred Word (OSW). The main body of the Aurum Solis reaffirmed the original intent of its rituals so that "the rites and the philosophy of the Order should reflect the joy and freedom of the Spirit which has been so much a part of true Magick in all ages; and that, as in the early days of the Order, the essential standard of judgment on any practice should not simply be that of philosophic and technical correctness, but that of effectiveness."

The breakaway group, the Order of the Sacred Word, emphasized the significance of a mystical word in Kabala. For some years this group was enriched by the personality of their warden, Ernest Page, a noted graphologist and astrologer. Page was a kindly and well-loved figure in the bohemian culture of London's Soho, and he spent much time and energy attempting to reconcile the OSW and the Aurum Solis. Although he did not live to see this come about, the desired reunion did occur in 1971.

The Aurum Solis is currently flourishing as a private magical group. Its philosophy has been described in detail by Melita Denning and Osborne Phillips (the pen names of Vivian Barcynski and Leonard R. Barcynski) in their five-volume work, The Magical Philosophy (1974–81). Denning and Phillips are Adept Minores of the Aurum Solis. In 1987 Carl Weschcke became the Grand Master of the order.

Sources:

Denning, Melita, and Osborne Phillips. The Magical Philosophy. 5 vols. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1974–81.

———. The Magick of Sex. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1982.

———. The Magick of Tarot. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1983.

Ausar Auset Society

The Ausar Auset Society, a Rosicrucian body especially oriented to meet the needs of African Americans, was founded in the mid-1970s by R. A. Straughn, formerly the head of the Rosicrucian Anthropological League in New York City. Straughn, under his adopted name Ra Un Nefer Amen, has written a number of occult texts on Hermetic and Eastern religions. He has also developed a unique tarot

The Ausar Auset Society, a Rosicrucian body especially oriented to meet the needs of African Americans, was founded in the mid-1970s by R. A. Straughn, formerly the head of the Rosicrucian Anthropological League in New York City. Straughn, under his adopted name Ra Un Nefer Amen, has written a number of occult texts on Hermetic and Eastern religions. He has also developed a unique tarot card deck.

The program of the society is directed to people of African origin, and its literature regularly integrates more familiar occult themes with material specific to African Americans, emphasizing lessons in African American history and the accomplishments of Africans. Centered in the large African community in the greater New York City area, the society also regularly holds classes in African American communities along the East Coast from Virginia to Connecticut. The society may be contacted at Box 281, Bronx, New York 10462. It publishes a magazine, Metu Neter.

Sources:

Ra Un Nefer Amen [R. A. Straughn]. Black Man's Guide to a Spiritual Union. Bronx, N.Y.: Oracle of Thoth, 1981.

———. Meditation Techniques of the Kabalists, Vedantins, and Taoists. Bronx, N.Y.: Maat Publishing, 1976.

———. The Oracle of Thoth: The Kabalistical Tarot. Bronx, N.Y.: Oracle of Thoth, 1977.

———. The Realization of Neter Nu. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Maat Publishing, 1975.

Austatikco-Pauligaur

A class of Persian evil spirits. Eight in number, they keep the eight sides of the world. Their names are as follows: (1) Indiren, the king of these genii; (2) Augne-Baugauven, the god of fire; (3) Eemen, king of death and hell; (4) Nerudee, earth in the figure of a giant; (5) Vaivoo, god of the air and winds; (6) Varoonon, god of clouds and rain; (7) Gooberen, god of riches; and (8) Essaunien or Shivven.

Austin Seth Center (ASC)

Organization concerned with the "Seth" communications channeled through Jane Roberts (1929–1984). It was established in 1979 by Maude Cardwell, Ph.D., to spread the ideas of the Seth Material. In September 1984, the organization became a tax-exempt, nonprofit educational corporation, with the stated purpose "to teach a philosophy that empowers people to change their personal reality with love, fun, and awareness."

The ASC published a quarterly magazine Reality Change "for people who want to change their lives"; holds an annual Seth World Conference each June and an annual Intensive Seminar in the Seth Material each winter; and in general networks individuals and groups throughout the world who study the Seth Material. Address: PO Box 7786, Austin, TX 78713-7786.

Australasian Society for Psychical Research

The Australasian Society for Psychical Research, and the related UFO organization, UFORUM, are the major organizations tracking parapsychological and ufological data in Western Australia. They trace their beginning to the interest aroused at the end of the 1970s at Murdoch University in psychical research by a Professor Frodsham. His talks and media appearances attracted a group that in 1980 formed the West Australia Society for Psychical Research (WASPR). Over the next years some of the initial optimism and interest waned. Then around 1983, the group split. Those more interested in Spiritualism formed another group, the Psychic Development Association. The WASPR evolved into the Australian Society for Psychical Research (ASPR).

The ASPR continued through the 1980s. Then, in 1987, following the publication of Whitley Strieber's book, Communion, they decided that they also had an interest in ufology, especially the abduction phenomenon. They formed a subgroup called UFORUM which has subsequently integrated itself into the international UFO network.

The ASPR, now the Australasian Society for Psychical Research, is headquartered at P.O. Box 626, Applecross 6153, West Australia. Its Journal of Alternative Realities covers the broad interests from UFOs to parapsychology to fortean phenomena. It has a web presence at http://www.ozemail.com.au/~amilani/ufo.html. Through the interest of several members, including vice president Michael Jordan, the ASPR has developed special ties to the Centro Italiano di Parapsychologia, a group promoting the channeling of Corrado Piancastelli.

Sources:

Australasian Society for Psychical Research. http://www.ozemail.com.au/~amilani/ufo.html. March 4, 2000.

AUSTRALIA

Aboriginal Magic

From birth to death, the Australian aborigine, like most members of tribal societies, was surrounded by magical influences. The origins of all life were considered to emerge from the Dream Time, or the sacred time. This time could be reached while in the altered state of dreaming, and native rituals brought together the normal world with the "Dreaming." Death was believed to be a return to this sacred time.

In many tribes the power to perform magic, sympathetic or otherwise, was possessed by only a few people Among the central tribes it was practiced by both men and women—more often, by the former, who conserved the knowledge of certain forms of their own. There was also among them a distinct class of medicine men, whose duty it was to discover whose magic had caused the death of anyone. Among the central tribes, unlike many others, magic was not made a means of profit or emolument. Women were often sternly forbidden to go near the places where the men performed their magical ceremonies. To frighten them away from such spots, the men invented an instrument called a "bull-roarer"—a thin slip of wood swung at the end of a string that makes a screaming, whistling noise, which was believed to be the voice of the Great Spirit. Aborigines also preserved long oval pieces of wood, which they call churingas. Since the spirits of their ancestors were thought to reside within, these were kept concealed in the most secret manner.

Sympathetic magic is integral to aboriginal practice. Certain ceremonies are employed to control nature to ensure a plentiful supply of food and water, or to injure an enemy. One of the commonest forms is the use of the pointed stick or bone, which is used in one form or another by all Australian tribes. The former is a small piece of wood, varying in length from three to eighteen inches, resembling a skewer, and tapering to a point. At the handle end it is topped with a knob of resin, to which is attached a strand of human hair. Magical songs are sung over it, to endow it with occult potency. The man who wishes to use it goes into the bush alone, or with a friend, where he will be free from observation, and planting the stick in the ground, mutters over it what he desires to happen to his enemy. It is then left in the ground for a few days. The evil magic is supposed to proceed from the stick to the man, who often succumbs, unless a medicine man chances to discover the implement.

The Australian aborigine has a special dread of magic connected with places at a distance, and any magical apparatus purchased or obtained from faraway tribes is supposed to possess potency of a much greater kind than if it had been made among themselves. Thus certain little stones traded by Northern tribes are supposed to contain a very powerful form of evil magic called mauia. These are wrapped up in many folds of bark and string. According to their traditions this type of magic was first introduced by a "batman," who dropped it to Earth, where it made a great explosion at a certain spot where it can still be procured. Sticks procured from a distance, with which the natives chastise their wives, are sufficient by their very sight to make the women obey their husbands.

Much mystery surrounds what are known as "debil-debil" shoes, which consist of a pad of emu feathers, rounded at both ends, in order that no one should be able to trace in which direction the wearer is journeying. These are supposed to be worn by a being called kurdaitcha, to whom deaths are attributed. The Australian aborigine believes that death is due to evil magic. A man may become a kurdaitcha by submitting to a certain ceremony, in which the little toe of his foot is dislocated. Dressed up and painted grotesquely, he sets out accompanied by a medicine man and wearing the kurdaitcha shoes when he desires to slay an enemy. When he spears him, the medicine man closes up the wound, and the victim returns to consciousness oblivious to the fact that he is full of evil magic. When he later sickens and dies, it is known that he has been attacked by a kurdaitcha. Many long and elaborate ceremonies are connected with the churinga.

In 1988 the bicentenary celebrations in Australia placed primary emphasis on the achievements of the colonists, against a background of protest from displaced aborigines. Traditional aborigine beliefs and life-styles have suffered severe disruption. Displaced from their own lands, their world of supernatural beliefs shattered by the materialism of white society, many aborigines have succumbed to the alcohol introduced by the settlers, or to suicide. Others endure a miserable poverty-stricken existence, stranded between two contradictory cultures. A few successfully adapted aborigine artists have been acclaimed for their expressive and visionary paintings and poetry.

Spiritualism in Australia

Spiritualism became a public issue in Victoria, Australia in the 1860s when a gentleman, writing under the pen name of "Schamlyn," entered into a heated controversy with the editor of the Collingwood Advertiser in defense of Spiritualism. Another influential supporter of the spiritual cause was a gentleman connected with the editorial department of the Melbourne Argus, one of the leading journals of Victoria. This was an organ well calculated to exert a powerful sway over the minds of its readers.

As the tides of public opinion moved on, doctors, lawyers, merchants, and men of eminence joined the ranks. Tidings of phenomena of the most astounding character poured in from distant towns and districts. Members of the press shared the general enthusiasm. Some would not, and others could not, avow their convictions. Yet their private prepossessions induced them to open their columns for debate and correspondence on the subject.

Adding to the stimulus imparted, many of the leading colonial journals indulged in tirades of abuse and misrepresentation, only serving to increase the influence, and not diminishing its force. At length the clergy manifested their interest by furious abuse. Denunciation provoked retort; discussion compelled investigation. In Sydney, many converts of rank and influence suddenly appeared. The Hon. John Bowie Wilson, land minister and a champion of temperance, converted to Spiritualism, and his public defense of the cause led many to begin their own investigation. Among many who affiliated with the cause in Sydney were several members of the New South Wales Parliament and Cabinet, the attorney general, and several judges. Possibly most influential of all was William Terry, the editor of the Melbourne Harbinger of Light. As American Spiritualist writer Hudson Tuttle notes:

"About 1869 the necessity for a Spiritualistic journal was impressed deeply on the mind of Mr. Terry. He could not cast it off, but pondered over the enterprise. At this time, an exceedingly sensitive patient described a spirit holding a scroll on which was written 'Harbinger of Light' and the motto, 'Dawn approaches, error is passing away; men arising shall hail the day.' This influenced him, and in August 1870, he set to work to prepare the first number, which appeared on the 1st of September of that year.

"There was no organization in Australian Spiritualism, and Mr. Terry saw the advantage and necessity of associative movement. He consulted a few friends, and in November 1870, he organized the first Victorian Association of Spiritualists. A hall was rented, and Sunday services, consisting of essays and reading by members, enlivened by appropriate hymns, were held. In October 1872, impressed with the desirability of forming a Lyceum, he called together a few willing workers, and held the first session on October 20th, 1872. It is, and has been from the first in a flourishing condition, numbering 150 members, with a very handsome and complete outfit, and excellent library. He has remained an officer ever since, and conducted four sessions. He assisted in the establishment of the Spiritualist and Free-thought Association, which succeeded the original one, and was its first president. He has lectured occasionally to appreciative audiences, and his lectures have been widely circulated. His mediumship, which gave such fair promise, both in regard to writing and speaking, became controlled, especially for the relief of the sick. Without the assistance of advertising he had acquired a fine practice. With this he combines a trade in Reform and Spiritualistic publications, as extensive as the colony, and the publication of the Harbinger of Light, a Spiritual journal that is an honor to the cause, and well sustains the grand philosophy of immortality. No man is doing more for the cause, or has done more efficient work."

A short but interesting summary of the rise and progress of Spiritualism in Australia is given in the American Banner of Light in 1880, in which Terry's pioneering efforts were lauded.

"The Harbinger of Light, published at Melbourne, Australia, furnishes a review of the origin of its publication and the work it has accomplished during the ten years just closed. At its advent in 1870, considerable interest had been awakened in the subject of Spiritualism, by the lectures of Mr. Nayler, in Melbourne, and Mr. Leech, at Castlemaine. The leaders of the church became disturbed, and seeing their gods in danger, sought to stay the progress of what would eventually lessen their influence and possibly their income. But Mr. Nayler spoke and wrote with more vigor; the addresses of Mr. Leech were published from week to week in pamphlet form, and widely distributed. At the same time, Mr. Charles Bright, who had published letters on Spiritualism in the Argus, over an assumed name, openly identified himself with the movement, and spoke publicly on the subject. Shortly after, 11 persons met and formed an association, which soon increased to 80 members. A hymn book was compiled, and Sunday services began. As elsewhere, the press ridiculed and the pulpit denounced Spiritualism as a delusion. A number of articles in the Argus brought some of the facts prominently before the public, and the growing interest was advanced by a public discussion between Messrs. Tyerman and Blair. In 1872, a Sunday school, on harmonial principles, was established, Mr. W. H. Terry, the proprietor of the Harbinger, being its first conductor. Almost simultaneously with this was the visit of Dr. J. M. Peebles, whose public lectures and work in the Lyceum served to consolidate the movement. A controversy in the Age, between Rev. Mr. Potter, Mr. Tyerman and Mr. Terry, brought the facts and teachings of Spiritualism into further notice.

"Soon came Dr. Peebles, Thomas Walker, Mrs. Britten and others, who widened the influence of the spiritualistic philosophy, and aided the Harbinger in its efforts to establish Spiritualism on a broad rational basis. Mr. W. H. Terry is deserving of all praise for his unselfish and faithful exertions in carrying the Harbinger through the years of as hard labor as ever befell any similar enterprise, and we bespeak for him, in his continued efforts to make known the evidences of a future existence, and the illuminating truths of Spiritualism, the hearty co-operation and sympathy of all friends of the cause."

Writing to the Banner of Light on the subject of Anglican clergyman J. Tyerman's accession to the Spiritualist ranks, an American correspondent stated,

"The Rev. J. Tyerman, of the Church of England, resident in one of the country districts, boldly declared his full reception of Spiritualism as a great fact, and his change of religious faith consequent upon the teachings of spirits. Of course, he was welcomed with open arms by the whole body of Spiritualists in Melbourne, the only city where there was any considerable number enrolled in one association. He soon became the principal lecturer, though not the only one employed by the association, and well has he wielded the sword of the new faith. He is decidedly of the pioneer stamp, a skillful debater, a fluent speaker, ready at any moment to engage with any one, either by word of mouth or as a writer. So widely, indeed, did he make his influence felt, and so individual was it, that a new society grew up around him, called the Free-Thought and Spiritualist Propaganda Society, which remained in existence till Mr. Tyerman removed to Sydney, when it coalesced with the older association, under the combined name of Melbourne Spiritualist and Free-Thought Association."

Another valuable convert to the cause of Spiritualism, at a time when it most needed good service, was Florence Williams, the daughter of the celebrated English novelist G. P. R. James. She officiated for many years at the first Spiritualist meetings convened for Sabbath Day exercises and was an eloquent lecturer.

The visits of several zealous propagandists have been alluded to in previous quotations. Among the first to break ground as a public exponent of Spiritualism was the Rev. James Martin Peebles, formerly a minister of Battle Creek, Michigan. Peebles was well known in the United States as a capable writer and lecturer. He visited Australia on two occasions several years apart and in his account, which appeared in the Banner of Light some five years after his first visit, he described the changed spirit that marked both the progress of the movement and the alteration in the tone of public opinion.

"Relative to Spiritualism and its divine principles, public sentiment has changed rapidly, and for the better, during the past five years. Upon my late public appearance in Melbourne, the Hon. John McIlwraith, ex-mayor of the city, and commissioner of our Centennial Exhibition, took the chair, introducing me to the audience. On my previous visit some of the Spiritualists seemed a little timid. They preferred being called investigators, remaining a good distance from the front. Then my travelling companion, Dr. Dunn was misrepresented, and meanly vilified in the city journals; while I was hissed in the market, caricatured in Punch, burlesqued in a theatre, and published in the daily press as an 'ignorant Yankee,' an 'American trickster,' a 'long-haired apostate,' and 'a most unblushing blasphemer.' But how changed! Recently the secular press treated me fairly. Even the usually abusive Telegraph published Mr. Stevenson's article assuring the Rev. Mr. Green that I was willing to meet him at once in a public discussion. The Melbourne Argus, one of the best daily papers in the world, the Australasian, the Herald, and the Age, all dealt honorably by me, reporting my lectures, if briefly, with admirable impartiality. The press is a reflector; and those audiences of 2,000 and 2,500 in the great Opera House on each Sunday for several successive months, were not without a most striking moral significance. It seemed to be the general opinion that Spiritualism had never before occupied so prominent yet so favorable a position in the eyes of the public. . ."

Peebles initially introduced Thomas Walker, a young Englishman, to Australia. Alleging himself to be a "trance speaker" under the control of certain spirits, whom he named, Walker lectured in Sydney, Melbourne, and other places. In March 1878 Walker participated in a debate with a Rev. M. Green, a minister of the Churches of Christ, an American free-church denomination that perpetuated that peculiarly nineteenth-century form of public religious discourse. Green had acquired some reputation in Australia both as a preacher and as one bitterly opposed to Spiritualism, which he constantly ridiculed. The debate, held in the Temperance Hall, Melbourne, attracted large audiences, and was extended for several nights beyond the period originally agreed upon.

Spiritualism was also promoted by the visits of Emma Hardinge Britten and medium Henry Slade. The Melbourne Age of August 20th, 1878, recorded their activities:

"Spiritualism is just now very much to the front in Melbourne. The lectures of Emma Hardinge Britten, delivered to crowded audiences at the Opera House every Sunday evening, have naturally attracted a sort of wondering curiosity to the subject, and the interest has probably been intensified by the strenuous efforts that are being made in some of the orthodox pulpits to prove that the whole thing is an emanation from the devil. The announcement that the famous Dr. Slade had arrived to strengthen the ranks of the Spiritualists, has therefore been made at a very critical juncture, and I should not be surprised to find that the consequence will be to infuse a galvanic activity into the forces on both sides. Though I do not profess to be a Spiritualist, I own to having been infected with the fashionable itch for witnessing 'physical manifestations,' as they are called, and accordingly I have attended several circles with more or less gratification. But Slade is not an ordinary medium even among professionals. The literature of the Spiritualists is full of his extraordinary achievements, attested to all appearance by credible witnesses, who have not been ashamed to append their names to their statements. . .I see that on one occasion, writing in six different languages was obtained on a single slate, and one day, accompanied by two learned professors, Slade had a sitting with the Grand Duke Constantine, who obtained writing on a new slate held by himself alone. From St. Petersburg, Slade went to Berlin, where he is said to have obtained some marvelous manifestations in the house of Professor Johann Zöllner, and where he was visited by the court conjurer to the Emperor, Samuel Bellachini. . .My object in visiting Slade can be understood when I was introduced to him with my friend, whom I shall call Omega, and who was bent on the same errand. Slade and Mr. Terry constituted the circle of four who sat around the table in the center of the room almost as immediately as we entered it. There was nothing in the room to attract attention. No signs of confederacy, human or mechanical. The hour was eleven in the morning. The window was unshuttered, and the sun was shining brightly. The table at which we sat was a new one, made especially by Wallach Brothers, of Elizabeth Street, of polished cedar, having four slight legs, one flap, and no ledges of any kind underneath. As soon as we examined it Slade took his seat on one side, facing the window, and the rest of us occupied the other three seats. He was particularly anxious that we should see he had nothing about him. It has been said that he wrote on the slate by means of a crumb of pencil stuck in his finger-nails, but his nails were cut to the quick, while his legs and feet were ostentatiously placed away from the table in a side position, exposed to view the whole time. He first produced a slate of the ordinary school size, with a wet sponge, which I used to it. A chip of pencil about the size of a grain of wheat was placed upon it on the table; we joined hands, and immediately taps were heard about the table, and in answer to a question—'Will you write?'—from Slade, three raps were given, and he forthwith took up the slate with the pencil lying on it, and held half of it under the table by his finger and thumb, which clasped the corner of the half that was outside the table, and was therefore easily seen by all present. His left hand remained near the center of the table, resting on those of the two sitters on either side of him. Several convulsive jerks of his arm were now given, then a pause, and immediately the sound of writing was audible to every one, a scratching sound interrupted by the tap of the pencil, which indicated, as we afterwards found, that the t's were being crossed and the i's dotted. The slate was then exposed, and the words written were in answer to the question which had been put by Omega as to whether he had psychic power or not. I pass over the conversation that ensued on the subject, and go on to the next phenomenon. To satisfy myself that the 'trick' was not done by means of sympathetic writing on the slate, I had ten minutes previously purchased a slate from a shop in Bourke Street, containing three leaves, and shutting up book fashion. This I produced, and Slade readily repeated his performance with it. It was necessary to break the pencil down to a mere crumb, in order to insert it between the leaves of the slate. This done, the phenomenon at once recurred with this rather perplexing difference, that the slate, instead of being put half under the table, forced itself by a series of jerks on to my neck, and reposed quietly under my ear, in the eyes of everyone present. The scratching then commenced; I heard the t's crossed and the i's dotted by the moving pencil, and at the usual signal I opened the slate, and found an intelligible reply to the question put. . .The next manifestation was the levitation of one of the sitters in his chair about a clear foot from the ground, and the levitation of the table about two feet. I ought to have mentioned that during the whole of the séance there was a good deal of by-play going on. Everyone felt the touch of hands more or less, and the sitters' chairs were twice wrenched from under them, or nearly so, but the psychic could not possibly have done it."

Britten includes her own reflections in her Nineteenth Century Miracles (1883):

"As personal details are more graphic than the cold narrations of passing events, we deem it expedient in this place to give our readers an inside view of Spiritualism in Australia, by republishing one of the many articles sent by the author to the American Spiritual journals during her sojourn in the colonies. The following excerpt was written as the result of personal experience, and at a time when Spiritualism, in the usual inflated style of journalistic literature was 'in the zenith of its triumphs.' It is addressed to the Editor of the Banner of Light, and reads as follows:

"Spiritualism in these colonies finds little or no public representation outside of Melbourne or Sydney, nevertheless warm friends of the cause are scattered all over the land, and endeavors are being made to enlarge the numerous circles into public meetings, and the fugitive efforts of whole-hearted individuals into associations as powerful as that which exists in Melbourne. At present, the attempt to effect missionary work in any portions of Australia outside Sydney or Melbourne, becomes too great a burden to the luckless individual, who has not only to do the work, but to bear the entire cost of the undertaking, as I have had to do in my visits to various towns in Victoria. Expenses which are cheerfully divided amongst the many in the United States, become all too heavy for endurance when shouldered upon the isolated workers; hence the paucity of public representation, and the impossibility of those who visit the colonies, as I have done, effecting any important pioneer work beyond the two great centers I have named. Mr. Walker at Sydney, and I at Melbourne, have been favored with the largest gatherings ever assembled at colonial Sunday meetings.

"Having, by desire of my spirit guides, exchanged rostrums, he filling my place at Melbourne, and I his at Sydney, we find simultaneously at the same time, and on the same Sundays, the lessees of the two theaters we occupied raising their rent upon us one hundred and fifty per cent. The freethinkers and Spiritualists had occupied the theatre in Sydney four years at the rate of four pounds per Sunday. For my benefit the landlord raised the rent to ten pounds, whilst the same wonderful spirit of accordance caused the Melbourne manager to increase upon Mr. Walker from eight pounds to a demand of twenty. With our heavy expenses and small admission fees this was tantamount to driving us out altogether. Both of us have succeeded after much difficulty, and fighting Christian warriors with the Christian arms of subtlety and vigilance, in securing other places to lecture in; and despite the fact that the press insult us, the pulpit curse us, and Christians generally devote us to as complete a prophecy of what they would wish us to enjoy everlastingly as their piety can devise, we are each attracting our thousands every Sunday night, and making such unmistakable marks on public opinion as will not easily be effaced again. . .

"Dr. Slade's advent in Melbourne since last September has been productive of an immense amount of good. How far his labors here will prove remunerative I am not prepared to say. Frankly speaking, I do not advise Spirit Mediums or speakers to visit these colonies on financial advancement intent. There is an abundant crop of Medium power existing, interest enough in the cause, and many of the kindest hearts and clearest brains in the world to be found here; but the lack of organization, to which I have before alluded, and the imperative necessity for the workers who come here to make their labors remunerative, paralyses all attempts at advancement, except in the sensation line. Still I feel confident that with united action throughout the scattered force of Spiritualistic thought in these colonies, Spiritualism might and would supersede every other phase of religious thought in an incredibly short space of time. I must not omit to mention that the friends in every place I have visited have been more than kind, hospitable and appreciative. The public have defied both press and pulpit in their unstinted support of my lectures. The press have been equally servile, and the Christian world equally stirred, and equally active in desperate attempts to crush out the obvious proofs of immortality Spiritualism brings.

"In Melbourne, I had to fight my way to comply with an invitation to lecture for the benefit of the City Hospital. I fought and conquered; and the hospital committee revenged itself for a crowded attendance at the Town Hall by taking my money without the grace of thanks, either in public or private, and the simply formal acknowledgement of my services by an official receipt. In Sydney, where I now am, I was equally privileged in lecturing for the benefit of the Temperance Alliance, and equally honored, after an enthusiastic and successful meeting, by the daily press of the city in their utter silence concerning such an important meeting, and their careful record of all sorts of such trash as they disgrace their columns with. So mote it be. The wheel will turn some day!"

During the years 1881 and 1882 the Australians were favored with visits from three more well-known American Spiritualists. The first of these was William Denton, an able and eloquent lecturer on geology, who usually combined his scientific addresses with one or more lectures on Spiritualism. The community also welcomed Ada Foye, a test-writing, rapping, and seeing medium, and Mrs. E. L. Watson, a trance-speaker.

All was not an upward path. At about this same time the government, through its chief secretary, promulgated an interdict against the proprietor of the Melbourne Opera House, forbidding him to allow Spiritualists to take money at the door for admission to their services, and in effect, forbidding them to hold services there at all. Walker, Peebles, and Britten had occupied the Opera House for months together, and admission fees had been charged regularly at each of their Sunday services, without let or hindrance. As reported in the Harbinger of Light of March 1882, Spiritualists organized to fight the new policy.

In the 1870s, Richard Hodgson, an Australian by birth, became involved in the study of paranormal phenomena as an undergraduate at the University of Cambridge, England. In 1884 the Society for Psychical Research sent him to India to investigate Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and the Theosophical movement. He determined she was a fraud, and had no place in the realm of parapsychology. He and the SPR were both criticized by Theosophists and others—a criticism that followed the society into the end of the 1900s. He died suddenly in 1905 before the Theosophists made their way to his native country.

By the 1910s and 1920s, the Theosophists, worked their way into Australia. Charles Leadbeater took hold of the group in Australia along with James Wedgwood, both of whom espoused doctrine that was not in concert with Blavatsky's original direction. Growing dissatisfaction with Leadbeater's leadership along with Annie Besant, especially when Leadbeater was continually under investigation of immorality by Australian police, helped dissipate that part of the Spiritualist movement.

Psychical Research

Psychical research in Australia can be traced to 1864 when it briefly arose in response to the mediumship of William Archer, a table tilter. It soon died out when it was discovered that Archer was not producing any paranormal phenomena. During Slade's 1878 visit to Sydney, E. Cyril Haviland, latter the author of two pamphlets and other writings on Spiritualism, was initially convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. Haviland, Harold Stephen, and several other gentlemen of literary repute in Sydney combined to form a Psychological Society, the members of which included some leading citizens of the city. However, the society was shortlived. Through the early 1900s, there were sporadic informal attempts to conduct some psychical research, but no sustained interest was generated.

A Society for Psychic Research was organized at Melbourne University in 1948 but soon disbanded. Psychical research was thus still in its infancy in the 1950s when a few courses in parapsychology began to be offered in Australian universities. The first degree in parapsychology was issued in 1960 from the University of Tasmania. Slowly through the 1980s, with the leadership of the likes of Ronald K. H. Rose, Raynor Johnson, Michael John Scriven, H. H. J. Keil, and Michael A. Thalbourne, a psychical research community had arisen, in spite of an hostile academic environment.

Currently there is an Australian Institute of Psychic Research (P. O. Box 445, Lane Cove, NSW 2066) and an Australian Society for Psychical Research, headquartered at Murdoch University in Western Australia. The institute publishes a bulletin, and the society issues a newsletter called Psi. Ghost hunting societies also have emerged in Australia at the end of the twentieth century. One of the more well-known groups is the Brisbane Ghost Hunters, based in the Queensland capital.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Brisbane Ghost Hunters. www.members.tripod.com/claricaun/angel2.gif. June 6, 2000.

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Nineteenth Century Miracles. New York, 1870. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Drury, Nevill, and Gregory Tillett. Other Temples/Other Gods: The Occult in Australia. Sydney: Hodder & Stoughton, 1982.

Johnson, Raynor C. The Imprisoned Splendour. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.

———. Nurslings of Immortality. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1957.

———. The Spiritual Path. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1971.

———. Watcher on the Hills. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1959.

Lewis, James R. Encyclopedia of Afterlife Beliefs and Phenomena. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1995.

Rose, Ronald. Living Magic: The Realities Underlying the Psychical Practices and Beliefs of Australian Aborigines. New York: Rand McNally, 1956.

Washington, Peter. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon. New York: Schocken Books, 1993.

Australian Satanic Council

The Australian Satanic Council emerged in the 1990s as a research and educational organization to help change the public image of Satanism and remove the ridicule and misunderstanding with which Satanists have had to endure. As such, the council is not itself a new Satanist church or religious group; rather, it is a haven for all Satanists and Satanic groups and an organ for promoting Satanism in general. Membership in the council does not preclude membership in any other Satanic group.

The council is headed by a small group of council members who set policy and generally guide its work, much of which consists of upkeep of the council's webpage. Others affiliated with the council are designated associate members. There are no fees required for becoming an associate member. Associate members support the council but do not have a vote on policy issues. The council's primary policy is a disavowal of all illegal activities, especially the use of drugs or violence.

The council does not favor a particular Satanic theology, especially on the matter of whether Satan is a symbol or a deity. It does not recognize ecclesiastical titles (reverend, bishop, etc.), as they tend to perpetuate the Christianity from which they were derived. It recognizes only the accomplishments of individuals. The council maintains a reference library of Satanic materials, which it makes available on its website, and assumes a role in reviewing Satanic websites and Satanic organizations with an Internet presence, though it does not make a final decision on the worth of different organizations.

The Australian Satanic Council exists primarily in cyberspace and may be contacted through its webpage at http://www.satanic.org.au/.

Sources:

The Australian Satanic Council. http://www.satanic.org.au/. May 14, 2000.

Australian Society for Psychical Research

The Australian Society for Psychical Research was founded in 1979 by Dr. J. Frodsham, a professor at the School of Communication at Murdoch University, Murdoch, Western Australia. It has functioned as an organization disseminating information on psychical research, parapsychology, and related issues in Western Australia. To that end it sponsors seminars and lectures and publishes a newsletter, The Journal of Alternate Realities. It may be contacted through its current president, Dr. J. Fordsham at PO Box 626, Applecross, Western Australia 6153.

Australian UFO Bulletin

Quarterly publication of Victorian UFO Research Society, Box 1043, Moorabbin, Victoria, 3189 Australia.

AUSTRIA

(For ancient magic among the Teutonic people of Austria, see the entry on the Teutons; see also Hungary).

Mesmerism

As Spiritualism spread across Europe in the 1860s and 1870s, it also spread into Austria. The movement was first promulgated by Constantine Delby of Vienna, an adherent of the French Spiritism of Allan Kardec. Delby founded a Spiritualist society and started a journal. Despite his efforts, the society found little support and was kept alive primarily by Delby's enthusiasm. Spiritualism never obtained much foothold in Vienna. A number of Austrians, particularly the world-famous mediums and brothers, Willi and Rudi Schneider (from Braunau) began their work in Austria, but received most of their fame outside the country. In fact, experts in Great Britain where much of the investigation into Rudi's abilities were conducted have offered the opinion that had he been allowed to remain in the comfortable world of his native country, his gift might have developed better. Still, he was never caught in any sort of fraud, as was often the case during the seances he conducted.

Two other famous Austrians involved in the world of the paranormal and parapsychology worth mentioning were Erik Jan Hanussen, and Hans Holzer. Hanussen was known as the "Prophet of the Third Reich," who had written a book on stage telepathy, based on his experience in performance since the age of 12. He had successfully defended himself against fraudulent clairvoyance in court by demonstrating his long-practiced techniques well-enough to have the charges dismissed. He reportedly believed in Hitler and his plan to lead Germany so strongly, that while some reports indicate he might have been Jewish, Hanussen donated money to Nazi officials in order to get to meet him. That meeting occured in 1931 and Hanussen spoke to the leader on the occult. By 1933 as a favorite of the Third Reich, he opened his "Palace of the Occult" and presented his vision of the burning of a large public building—only the day before the Reichstag (the seat of the German government) was burned. The day after that, Hitler declared himself dictator. That was in February. One month later, he fell into disfavor and was arrested. On April 7, he was found dead. How much he truly influenced Hitler, another famous Austrian, in his belief in the occult cannot be confirmed.

Holzer who was born in 1920, and a naturalized American, became famous in the 1960s for his work as a "ghost-hunter," appearing on television talk shows and serving as a favorite of celebrities. While he continued to pursue his work, his investigations were considered unreliable, in great part due to his faulty historical data.

It was quite otherwise in Budapest (and at this time Hungary was then part of the larger Austrian Empire). Here a considerable amount of interest was awakened, and many persons of note began to take part in the circles that were being formed there. Among these persons were Anton Prohasker and Dr. Adolf Grunhut. At length a society was formed, and Baron Edmund Vay was elected president. A Mr. Lishner, of Budapest, built a séance room, which the society rented. At that time there were some 110 members, all professing Christians. Vay served as the honorary president, and Grunhut as the active president. The principles of the society, indeed the basis of it, were taken from the Geist Kraft Stoff of Baroness Adelma Vay and the works of Kardec. It never encouraged paid mediumship. All the officers were voluntary and honorary. It had no physical medium, but good trance, writing, and seeing mediums.

Psychical Research

Though Austria has not been a center of parapsychology, there is an Austrian Society for Psychic Research (c/o Prof. Dr. H. Hofman, c/o Technische Hochschule, Gusshausstr. 25, Vienna). Possibly the best known figure in Austrian parapsychology is Andreas Resch, who edited Imago Mundi (former publication of the International Society for Catholic Parapsychologists). Resch has conducted courses in parapsychology at Lateran University in Rome. Resch now edits Grenzgebiete der Wissenschaft as the organ of the Institut für Grenzgebiete der Wissenschaft und von Imago Mundi (Resch Verlag, Maximilianstr. 8. Postfach 8 A-6020 Innsbruck).

There is also an International School for Psycho-Physical Training (Bartlemae 17, 9110 Poertschach/ Woerthersee, Karernten, Austria) and the Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Parapsycholige (Himmelspfortgasse 9/Tür 11, A-1010 Vienna) headed by Gustav Pscholka. Franz Seidl, an electronics engineer from Vienna, has experimented with paranormal taped voices (now generally known as electronic voice phenomenon).

Sources

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Noah's Ark Society. "The Mediumship of Rudi Schneider." http://home.freeuk.net/noahsark/schneidr.htm. June 6, 2000.

Institut für Grenzgebiete der Wissenschaft. http://info.uibk.ac.at/c/cb/cb26/. June 6, 2000.

Austromancy

A form of divination through aerial phenomena, such as thunder and lightning, and a branch of aeromancy. Austromancy is concerned with the observance and interpretation of winds, and the significance being attached to their direction and intensity. (See also Chaomancy)

Autography

A term sometimes used to denote the Spiritualist phenomenon of direct writing.

Automatic Drawing and Painting

The phenomenon of artistic expression without control of the conscious self belongs to the same category as automatic writing, but neither necessarily involves the other.

Mrs. William Wilkinson, the wife of one of the pioneer English Spiritualists, could draw, paint, and play music automatically, but she could not produce automatic writing. Her husband developed both gifts. An interpretation of the flowers of joy, love, humility, faith, and the architectural designs emanating from under his wife's hand was forthcoming in his automatic scripts. After many weeks of vain trial, the power of automatic drawing burst forth on William Wilkinson in the following way:

"After waiting less than five minutes it [the pencil] began to move, at first slowly, but presently with increased speed, till in less than a quarter-of-an-hour it moved with such velocity as I had never seen in a hand and arm before, or since. It literally ran away in spiral forms; and I can compare it to nothing else than the fly-wheel of an engine when it was run away. This lasted until a gentleman present touched my arm, when suddenly it fell like an infant's as it goes to sleep, and the pencil dropped out of my hand. I had, however, acquired the power. The consequences of the violent motion of the muscles of the arm were so apparent that I could not for several days lift it without pain."

In most cases visions are being presented to the automatist, and the idea to sketch then comes to him naturally. Georgiana Houghton in Evenings at Home in Spiritual Séance (1881) wrote of a Mrs. Puget who saw upon a blank paper "a lovely little face, just like a photograph, which gradually disappeared; then another became visible on another part of the sheet, and they arrested her attention so much that she thought she would like to catch the fleeting image, which she did with a piece of burnt cork, thinking that a piece of pencil would be too trying for her sight." William Blake sketched his spiritual visitants as if they were posing. He drew them with the utmost alacrity and composure, looking up from time to time as though he had a real sitter before him. If the vision disappeared, he stopped working until it returned. He wrote: "I am really intoxicated with vision every time I hold a pencil or pen in my hand."

Héléne Smith painted in trance a series of tableaus on biblical subjects in colors. Her fingers moved incoherently over the canvas, executing different details in different parts which later merged into a harmonious whole. She was very slow. The execution of a big picture took more than a year. The vision always returned.

Elizabeth d'Esperance saw a luminous cloud concentrate itself in the darkest corner of the room, become substantial, and form itself into the figure of a child. Nobody else saw the figure, but she could sketch it in the dark, being unconscious of the extraordinary circumstances that she could see the paper and pencil perfectly well. Spirit sketching became a regular phase of her mediumship for a considerable time, but the power waned; the luminosity of the apparitions decreased as soon as she began to study sketching and became more self-conscious of her work.

Dr. John Ballou Newbrough, the automatist of Oahspe, could paint with both hands at once in total darkness. Susan- nah Harris, being blindfolded on a platform, executed in two hours an oil painting upside-down.

There are various degrees of such automatic activity from inspiration to obsession. The fantastic designs of Victorien Sardou—scenes on the Planet Jupiter, the House of Mozart, the House of Zoroaster—were inspired, as he felt it, by Bernard Palissy. In the celebrated Thompson-Gifford case, the impulse amounted to obsession (see possession and obsession).

Heinrich Nusslein, a German automatist of the 1920s, developed his powers of painting under the effect of the suggestion of a friend. In approximately two years he painted 2,000 pictures; small pictures took three or four minutes and the largest works took no more than 30 or 40 minutes. Many of them were painted from visions and in complete darkness. Nusslein made portraits of distant sitters by psychometric rapport or by concentrating on a name. His paintings have considerable artistic merit. Augustine Lesage, the French miner painter, produced his first work in 1918 at the age of 35 after attending some séances. In 10 years he produced 57 canvases, the conceptions of which are harmonious and suggest an innate genius for color. He always began at the top of the canvas and worked his way down. Lesage, who believed himself to be the reincarnation of an old Egyptian painter, experienced an inner prompting before he began to paint. In 1926 the Society of French Artists exhibited some of his works.

Marjan Gruzewski, the Polish painting medium, experienced a preponderant subconscious life from early childhood. At school his hand would write something other than what had been dictated; if he tried to write what he was told to do, the pen dropped out of his hand. When he first came into contact with Spiritualism, he was discovered to be a medium for telekinesis, ectoplasmic phenomena, and trance mediumship in general. His gifts of automatic painting were discovered at the age of 18 or 19 after the end of the war. In a state of trance and in full daylight, he could produce pictorial representations of anything suggested—scenes from the spirit world, historical events, striking portraits of dead people whom he did not know in life—the compositions were often interwoven with grinning demons and weird faces. In Paris at the Institut Métapsychique, he drew designs and painted portraits in complete darkness, although these were inferior to those produced in light. The quality improved with red light, even if it never reached the table where he was working. Gruzewski also painted portraits under psychometric influence. Before his automatic activity developed, he knew nothing of designing or painting.

Since talented painters, like Ferdinand Desmoulin and Hugo d'Alesi, produced automatic pictures, subconscious activity might well explain the case. But that the explanation is not always satisfactory is well shown by the case of Marguerite Burnat-Provins, a very able author and painter. At the outbreak of World War I, when the church bells tolled out the mobilization order, she was seized by a great emotion, and sudden voices impelled her to write. Later the voice was accompanied by a vision, which she drew with lightninglike quickness. The visions, which represented symbolical character pictures, were sometimes felt subjectively but were often seen objectively in natural colors in space. They developed on some occasions from a cloud-like formation and assumed a great variety of shapes and contents. Over 1,000 pictures were produced by summer 1930, when Dr. Eugèn Osty published the result of his study in the Revue Métapsychique Burnat-Provins felt anguished if she tried to resist the temptation to draw the visions as soon as they presented themselves, and an exhaustion followed or sometimes preceded the phenomenon. The works produced during these episodes differ entirely in style and character from the painter's ordinary work; most of them resemble caricatures, which she attributed to an extraneous influence.

John Bartlett produced automatic sketches of Glastonbury Abbey, bringing out archaeologically verified details with an amazing precision. Bartlett would begin at the left-hand top corner and work downward.

The tremendous speed with which the automatic execution takes place is one of the most puzzling features of this psychic activity. The Seeress of Prevorst (Frederica Hauffe) drew complicated geometrical designs. "She threw off the whole drawing," wrote Dr. Justinus Kerner, "in an incredibly short time, and employed, in marking the more than a hundred points into which this circle was divided, no compasses or instruments whatever. She made the whole with her hand alone, and failed not in single point. She seemed to work as a spider works its geometric diagrams, without a visible instrument. I recommended her to use a pair of compasses to strike the circles; she tried, and made immediate blunders." William Howitt, who had the gift of automatic drawing for five years, wrote on this point: "Having myself, who never received a single lesson in drawing, and never could draw in a normal condition, had a great number of circles struck through my hand under spirit influence, and these filled up with tracing of ever-new invention, without a thought of my own, I at once recognized the truth of Kerner's statement."

F. W. H. Myers observed that independent drawings often exhibit a fusion of arabesque with ideography; that is to say, they partly resemble the forms of ornamentation into which the artistic hand strays when, as it were, dreaming on the paper without definite plan; and partly they afford a parallel to the early attempts at symbolic self-expression of primitives who have not yet learned an alphabet. Like primitive writing, they pass by insensible transitions from direct pictorial symbolism to an abbreviated ideography, mingled in its turn with writing of a fantastic or of an ordinary kind. He often showed to experts strange hieroglyphics obtained automatically, but he found that at the best they appeared to resemble scrawls seen on Chinese plates.

The watercolor pictures of Catherine Berry, exhibited in Brighton, England, in 1874, disclosed the vagaries of mind to which Myers alludes. Catherine Berry acknowledged, "By any ordinary observer they would be pronounced as chaotic, but a more minute survey of them reveals a wonderful design in construction and purpose whatever it may be." She was told by her guide that they were illustrative of the origin of species. Baroness Guldenstubbe attributed them to the inspiration of a planetary spirit.

Mental patients often exhibit an impulse to decorative and symbolical drawings. Some of their products, like those of Vaslav Nijinsky, are of decided art merit. As a rule, however the automatist is of sound mind. Learning and erudition have nothing to do with the gift. Fabre, a French blacksmith, produced an almost faultless copy of Raphael's Bataille de Constantin, the original of which is now in the Vatican. The symbolic ideas often disclosed a high moral purpose: "Never has anything proceeded from these drawings," wrote William Wilkinson in Spirit Drawings: A Personal Narrative (1858), "nor from their descriptions, but what has been to us an incentive to a better and holier life." The phenomenon is even recorded in the Bible:

"Then David gave to Solomon his son the pattern of the porch, and of the houses thereof, and of the treasuries thereof, and of the upper chambers thereof, and of the inner parlors thereof, and of the place of the mercy seat and the pattern of all that he had by the Spirit, of the courts of the house of the Lord, and of all the chambers round about it, of the treasuries of the house of God, and of the treasuries of the dedicated things. . . . All this, said David, the Lord made me understand in writing by his hand upon me, even all the works of this pattern" (Chron. 28).

Modern psychic artists include the Brazilian Luiz Gasparetto. Painting in the early 1900s at lightning speed and in semi-darkness, the entranced artist produced more than 6,000 paintings, some of them in the unmistakable style of such dead masters as Picasso, Renoir, Toulouse-Lautrec, Gaugin, Modigliani, Van Gogh, Rembrandt, Tissot, Manet, Monet, and Matisse.

Among British psychic artists, radical magician Austin O. Spare (1888–1956) portrayed fantastic and demonic spirit forms. In 1927 he exhibited a collection of his "psychic drawings and others of magical and occult manifestations" at St. George's Gallery, London. He also published several books of his powerful drawings.

Another British psychic artist, Coral Polge, sketched people who had passed away and wanted to communicate with members of her audience. At such public demonstrations, Polge often worked in a unique partnership with such clairvoyants as Doris Collins, who passed on messages while Polge sketched the communicator.

Some of the most remarkable examples of psychic art have come from the contemporary British medium Matthew Manning, who has produced automatic drawings in the style of many great artists.

Sources:

d'Esperance, Elizabeth. Shadow Land; or, Light from the Other Side. London, n.d. [1897].

Flournoy, Theodor. From India to the Planet Mars: A Study of Somnambulism. New York and London, 1900.

Manning, Matthew. The Link: The Extraordinary Gifts of a Teenage Psychic. U.K.: Colin Smythe, 1974. Reprint, New York: Holt, Rinehart, 1975.

Spare, Austin O. A Book of Automatic Drawing. London: Catalpa Press, 1972.

Automatic Speaking

The phenomenon of excitation of the vocal chords without the volition of the conscious self. Today this phenomenon is called channeling. Speech bursts forth impulsively, whether the medium is in trance or a more normal waking state. In the latter case, and in partial trance, the medium may understand the contents of the communication even if it comes in a language unknown to him or her. But the retention of consciousness during automatic speaking is exceptional.

The mediums Horace Leaf and Florence Morse were conscious during automatic speech, and this consciousness was also observed by Eugèn Osty with Mme. Fraya and M. de Fleurière. The curious case William James records in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 12, pp. 277–98), of the experiences of Mr. "Le Baron" (pseudonym) in 1894 in an American Spiritualist camp meeting, is especially instructive on this score. "Le Baron," who was a journalist, at one of these meetings "felt his head drawn back until he was forced flat on the ground." Then "the force produced a motor disturbance of my head and jaws. My mouth made automatic movements, till in a few seconds I was distinctly conscious of another's voice—unearthly, awful, loud, weird—bursting through the woodland from my own lips, with the despairing words 'Oh, my people.' Mutterings of semi-purposive prophecy followed."

James also spoke, as a curious thing, of the generic similarity of trance utterances in different individuals.

"It seems exactly if one author composed more than half of the trance messages, no matter by whom they are uttered. Whether all subconscious selves are peculiarly susceptible to a certain stratum of the Zeitgeist, and get their inspirations from it, I know not."

Spiritualists, of course, reject James's observation and cite as evidence some of the more notable trance utterances and inspirational oratory, such as The Principles of Nature, Her Divine Revelation's and a Voice to Mankind, originally dictated by Andrew Jackson Davis) in trance in 1845 and 1846. Thomas Lake Harris produced two long poems in a similar manner: Epic of the Starry Heavens (1854), a poem containing nearly four thousand lines, and A Lyric of the Morning Land (1856), another impressive poetic composition of over five thousand words. Both were dictated in a remarkably short time. David Duguid's curious historic romance Hafed, Prince of Persia (1876), and its sequel Hermes, A Disciple of Jesus (1887), were also taken down from trance dictations.

Interesting Cases of Automatic Speaking

The revelations of Catherine Emmerich, the seeress of Westphalia, were taken down and published by Clement Brentano in a work of several volumes. The seeress, who lived at the beginning of the nineteenth century, told the story of the life of Jesus day by day as if she had been an eyewitness of it all. Her account deviated from Roman Catholic teachings at several points, and Roman Catholic apologist Herbert Thurston attacked her work by noting the numerous discrepancies in her visions. He put together a formal critical examination and compared her visions with those of other more "orthodox" ecstatics.

Telka, "Patience Worth"'s poem of sixty to seventy thousand words in an Anglo-Saxon language, was dictated through Pearl Curran as rapidly as it could be written down by a secretary, and the medium was so independent of that which came through her that she was free to smoke a cigarette, to interrupt herself by taking part in the conversation of those present, or go into the next room to answer the telephone. The whole poem, a masterpiece, took a total of 35 hours.

Medium Florence Morse was not only conscious of her inspirational delivery but one of her controls, who had a fund of dry humor, frequently kept her amused by his remarks on some feature of the proceedings, especially when it was a case of answering questions.

Trance singing is a kindred manifestation to automatic speaking. Jesse Shepard was the most notable example. In the case of Mrs. A. M. Gage, a New York soprano singer who lost her voice through an attack of hemorrhage of the lungs, it was accompanied by a complete alteration of personality.

One of the most remarkable examples of trance utterance was that of the British medium Mrs. Louis A. Meurig Morris, who delivered impressive sermons under the control of the spirit "Power." During these addresses, the medium's soprano voice changed to a ringing masculine baritone and all her mannerisms became masculine.

Psychologists who do not accept the claim of spirit utterance through a medium classify the phenomenon as the creation of a secondary personality, and there are many interesting cases on record of individuals who manifested several quite markedly different personalities. Also related to automatic speaking is the phenomenon of glossolalia or "speaking in tongues," as well as xenoglossis, the speaking of a language without having studied it.

Sources:

Thurston, Herbert. Surprising Mystics. London: Burns & Oates, 1955.

Automatic Writing

Scripts produced without the control of the conscious self. It is the most common form of mediumship, the source of innumerable cases of self-delusion, and at the same time the source of some of the most interesting and intriguing cases of mediumship. Between these two extremes many problems of a complex nature present themselves to psychical research. Spiritualists consider automatic writing to be performed "under control"—that is, under the controlling agency of the spirits of the dead—and are therefore not judged to be truly "automatic." Most researchers, however, have ascribed such performances to the subconscious activity of the agent.

Both automatic writing and automatic speaking necessarily imply some alternation of the consciousness from the common waking state in the subject, though such alteration need not be pronounced, but may vary from a light state such is common in day-dreaming to a full trance. When the phenomena are produced during a state of trance or somnambulism the agent may be entirely unconscious of his or her actions. On the other hand, the automatic writing may be executed while the agent is in a condition varying little from waking and he or she may be quite capable of observing the writing process in a critical spirit.

Between these states of consciousness and complete unconsciousness there are many intermediate stages. The personality, as displayed in the writings or utterances, may gain only a partial ascendancy over the primary personality, as may happen in dreams or in the hypnotic trance. As a rule automatic speech and writings display nothing more than a revivifying of faded mental imagery, thoughts and conjectures and impressions that never came to light in the upper consciousness. But at times there appears an extraordinary exaltation of memory, or even of the intellectual facilities.

Cases are on record where lost articles have been recovered by means of automatic writing. Foreign languages that have been forgotten, or with which the subject has small acquaintance, are spoken or written fluently. Hélène Smith, the subject of Theodore Flournoy, even went so far as to invent a new language, purporting to be that of the Martians, but in reality showing a marked resemblance to French—the mother tongue of the medium.

Automatic writing and speaking have been produced in considerable quantities, mainly in connection with Spiritualistic circles, though it existed long before the advent of Spiritualism in the speaking in tongues of the early ecstatics. Though the matter and style may on occasion transcend the capabilities of the agent in a normal state, the great body of automatic productions show no erudition or literary excellence beyond the scope of the natural resources of the automatist. The style is generally involved, obscure, inflated, yet possessing a superficial smoothness and a suggestion of flowing periods and musical cadences. The ideas are often shallow and incoherent, and all but lost in a multitude of words.

Among Spiritualists, the best known of automatic writings have been the Spirit Teachings (1883) of Stainton Moses, and the works of Andrew Jackson Davis, which dominated the movement in the nineteenth century. Possibly more important have been the trance utterances of Leonora Piper, these last convincing many of the reality of telepathy. Much poetry has been produced automatically, notably by the nineteenth century medium Thomas Lake Harris. Among famous individuals known to have produced automatic scripts are Goethe, Victor Hugo, and Victorien Sardou, among other eminent men of letters.

How is the power of automatic writing acquired? In describing his first experience at a séance of Frank Herne and Charles Williams in 1872, Stainton Moses wrote in Spirit Identity (1879):

"My right arm was seized about the middle of the forearm, and dashed violently up and down with a noise resembling that of a number of paviors at work. It was the most tremendous exhibition of 'unconscious muscular action' I ever saw. In vain I tried to stop it. I distinctly felt the grasps, soft and firm, round my arm, and though perfectly possessed of senses and volition, I was powerless to interfere, although my hand was disabled for some days by the bruising it then got. The object we soon found was to get up the force."

The first experience of William Howitt is similarly described by his daughter Anna Mary Watts in Pioneers of The Spiritual Reformation (1883):

"My father had not sat many minutes passive, holding a pencil in his hand upon a sheet of paper, ere something resembling an electric shock ran through his arm and hand; whereupon the pencil began to move in circles. The influence becoming stronger and even stronger, moved not alone the hand, but the whole arm in a rotatory motion, until the arm was at length raised, and rapidly—as if it had been the spoke of a wheel propelled by machinery—whirled irresistibly in a wide sweep, and with great speed, for some ten minutes through the air. The effect of this rapid rotation was felt by him in the muscles of the arm for some time afterwards. Then the arm being again at rest the pencil, in the passive fingers, began gently, but clearly and decidedly, to move."

Elizabeth d'Esperance wrote: "I first noticed a tingling, pricking, aching sensation in my arm, as one feels as one strikes one's elbow; then a numb swollen sort of feeling which extended to my finger tips. My hand became quite cold and without sensation, so that I could pinch or nip the flesh without feeling any pain." The insensibility to pain was noticed by William James, and psychologist Alfred Binet verified this partial anaesthesia by mechanical means.

In Piper's case the automatic writing began with spasmodic violence, with sweeping the writing materials off the table. She wrote in trance. This returns us to consideration of the phenomenon that automatic writing may be produced either in the waking state or in trance. There are many degrees of the two states and blending is frequent, the important point apparently being to bar the interference of the writer's conscious mind.

In conscious writing it is the writer who moves the pencil; in automatic writing it is the pencil that moves the writer. In the waking state, of course, the writer is fully conscious of the strange thing going on but must remain passive. He or she may watch the flow of sentences, but if the writer is too interested or anxious, the writing becomes disconnected, words are left out, or the meaning becomes unintelligible. It is best for the writer to be occupied with something else, like Moses, who kept on writing consciously with his right hand while his left was in control of his "communicators." All this, however, varies considerably with different mediums. Nearly every automatic writer has conditions of his own. Accordingly, the script, which at first is hardly more than erratic markings on the paper, discloses many curious features. The medium may have an impression of the sense of the communication or may not. The text may be couched in tongues unknown, and the character of the writing may be his own or a strange one. It may be so minute that a strong magnifying glass will be necessary for reading it; it may be mirror writing, if the power is applied from underneath the hand; it may come upside down if the horizontal direction is changed to face a particular sitter; the words may be written in a reverse order, as "latipsoh" for "hospital"; and it may be executed at tremendous speed. The automatic communications alleged to originate from Philip the Evangelist, Cleophas, and Frederic William Henry Myers, obtained by Geraldine Dorothy Cummins, were sometimes delivered at the extraordinary speed of two thousand words per hour.

Automatic Writing from Living Communicators

A question of paramount importance, especially for Spiritualists, has been the source of the automatic communications. Could they originate from an extraneous mind? This need not necessarily be discarnate. There are cases on record that suggest the contents of the script may emanate from the mind of a living individual. William T. Stead, who developed the power of automatic writing, often received such curious messages from many of his friends for a period of 15 years. He said that, as a rule, these messages were astonishingly correct and the fact of such communication with the living was as well established for him as the existence of wireless telegraphy. He made it a subject of experimental investigation and found that sometimes the messages so transmitted even came against the direct intention of the agent. He called the phenomenon "automatic telepathy" and asserted that he knew at least ten other automatic writers who received similar messages.

Felicia R. Scatcherd was apparently one of them. She is quoted in James Coates's book Has W. T. Stead Returned? (1913) as follows:

"Then came a new phase; I was the recipient of messages from the living—mostly strangers engaged in public affairs, and was startled into a perception of the scientific value of these phenomena. When at a dinner in Paris I met a famous scientist who, in his after-dinner remarks, expressed the identical sentiments I had received as coming from him, many months earlier, in a language with which I was then ill-acquainted. There was no mistake about it. Knowing I should meet him, I had my written record with me, taken down in shorthand and copied in longhand as soon as possible, as was my invariable practice. I disliked receiving information in this way, but could not help it. If I refused these confidences, nothing else came. However, I became more reconciled to it when I found I could often be of service, in one instance preventing suicide, in others forestalling various casualties.''

To Stead's direct question: "How is it that a person will tell me things with my hand that he would never tell me with his tongue?", his dead friend Julia replied through automatic writing that the real self will never communicate any intelligence whatever except what it wishes to communicate, but the real self is very different from the physical self, it sits behind the physical senses and the mind, using either as it pleases. "I find," said Stead in a lecture before the London Spiritualist Alliance in 1913, "that there are some who will communicate with extraordinary accuracy, so much so that out of a hundred statements there would not be more than one which would be erroneous. I find some who, though they will sign their names correctly, apparently in their own character, make statements that are entirely false." To his question "if the real self does not communicate any intelligence except at its volition, how is it that I can get an answer from my friend without his knowing anything about it?" Julia returned the answer that "the real self does not always take the trouble when he has communicated a thing by the mind through the hand to inform the physical brain that he has done so." In one case the message Stead received from a living friend referred to a calamity that happened three days later.

Stead's theory of automatic telepathy appears to have been borne out in experiments with the planchette, as recorded in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 2, p. 235). A long series of communications between Rev. P. H. Newnham, Vicar of Maker, Devonport, and his wife, indicate that Mrs. Newnham's hand wrote replies to questions of her husband's that she neither heard nor saw.

An even more remarkable illustration is to be found in Frederick Bligh Bond's experiences with S., a woman who figures in the history of the Glastonbury scripts. As Bond wrote in Psychic Research, April 1929:

"I noticed a very curious thing. The communications which she sent me began more and more to follow the line of my current archaeological enquiry. And after we had met once in the summer of that year, this tendency became increasingly obvious. There was some sort of mental rapport of attunement apparently present, and this I attributed to the dominance in both our minds of a very specialized line of interest. On one or two occasions in 1922 this correspondence became more pronounced and the communications took the form of answers to questions which were in my mind, though not consciously formulated. . . . Finally a very strange thing happened. I had a letter from S. in which she sent me a writing she had received automatically in the form of a letter addressed to her by myself and signed with my name, although not in my handwriting. . . . I was and am totally unconscious of having mentally addressed it."

Nevertheless, such communications from the living are comparatively very rare. There is no doubt that, whether the contents disclose a rambling mind or powers of lucid reason, most of the automatic scripts represent a subconscious uprush. Therefore, in judging such scripts the standard of evidence should be very strict. So much more so as automatic writing is known to have been produced by post-hypnotic suggestion.

Automatic Writing Through Hypnotic Suggestion

Edmund Gurney was the first to conduct such experiments. When in trance, his subject was given the suggestion to write "It has begun snowing again" after regaining consciousness. When awakened, the subject wrote with a planchette, while his waking self was entirely unaware of what he was doing, "It has begun snowing." Similar experiments were initiated independently by Pierre Janet in France.

The primary personality will repudiate the authorship of such scripts and it will also say that they cannot emanate from it because there are things in the automatic writings it never knew. Another curious feature of these experimental scripts is that manufactured personalities, dwelling in separate streams of consciousness according to the depth of hypnotism, will sometimes obstinately cling to their fictitious names and refuse to admit that they are only portions of the automatist himself. In incidents of multiple personality the case is still stronger.

The unexpectedness of an automatically received message is yet no proof for its extraneous origin. As Myers suggested, two separate strata of intelligences may be concerned. Besides, automatic writing is often obtained by the collaboration of two people who touch the planchette simultaneously or one touches the wrist of the other during the process of writing. The source of the messages in such cases may be found in a combined fountain of subconsciousness.

The Identity of Communicators

Eugene Rochas recorded a case where the communicator of the automatic script was found to be a fictional being, a character from a novel. Extreme Spiritualists would attribute such messages to lying spirits, the occultist to thoughtforms, endowed with temporary intelligence. It is very likely, however, that nothing more than a dream of the subconscious had been witnessed in the case. Speculative possibilities are well illustrated by the mediumship of Hélène Smith. If the claim of reincarnation and exceptional remembrance of a preincarnate state were to be admitted, both the information contained in the script and the question of the communicators as preincarnate personalities would have to be considered in this light.

The difference in the character of the automatic writing alone does not prove the presence of an outside entity. Charles Richet proved in experiments, considered classics, that the new personality he created by hypnotic suggestion completely transformed the handwriting of two hypnotized subjects.

The reproduction of the handwriting of the deceased is a much stronger but, in itself, not yet decisive point. Strict evidentiality requires that this resemblance should not be loosely asserted and that the medium should not have seen the writing of the alleged communicator, as hypnotic experiments reveal uncanny powers of perception and retention on the part of the subconscious mind. In the Blanche Abercromby case of Stainton Moses's mediumship, F. W. H. Myers found every requirement satisfactory as both the woman's son and a handwriting expert found the spirit writing identical to that by the woman when living.

The analysis is not an easy task as sometimes the handwriting shows the characteristics of two controls and yet the essential characteristics of the medium may also be discernible.

Even simultaneously obtained messages are not safe from the suspicion that they arise from telepathy. Stead's communicator, "Julia," often wrote through Stead and his secretary, Edith K. Harper, at the same time, but not until the idea was further developed to cross correspondence: only by obtaining broken off sentences in each script so that they should complete each other, could these scripts be considered exempt from the influence of living minds.

Psychometry may offer an indirect presumption. If the script emanates from an extraneous intelligence, its psychometric reading should result in the presentation of a character different from the medium's. There is no way of telling, however, to what extent the medium's influence may blend with the script and garble psychometric impressions.

The difficulties, therefore, are very great if we set out to prove that a certain message comes from a discarnate mind. It should not only be clear that the contents of the message were unknown to the medium, but also that they were unascertainable by normal means. And as we do not know the powers of the subconscious to acquire information, those instances in which the information may have been acquired from books should only be provisionally accepted.

Stainton Moses' control "Rector" could read books and proved it in many tests. If a discarnate mind can do so, there is no à priori possibility that an incarnate mind, freed in trance, may not achieve the same thing.

Another series of difficulties will be encountered if we consider the influence of telepathy. A rigorous inquiry should be held into how far the message could have been influenced by the knowledge contained in a living mind. If every exaggerated scruple is to be satisfied we will have to narrow down considerably the circle of conclusive messages. The revelation of the contents of posthumous sealed letters, of the whereabouts of intentionally hidden objects, or the sudden announcement of death unknown to the sitters may offer a prima facie case that the communications come from a discarnate mind.

A good case of the latter kind was quoted by Alexander N. Aksakof. A man named Duvanel died by his own hand on January 15, 1887, in a Swiss village where he lived alone. Five hours after his death an automatic message, announcing the decease, was written at Wilna by a Miss Stramm, whom Duvanel wished to marry, but who could have received no news of his tragic end.

Nevertheless the enumeration of the many difficulties in the way of convincing evidence does not mean that the message in question is worthless if it could have been know to the medium. Every case has to be examined as a whole. Sometimes the display of extraordinary erudition or educational training revealed by the scripts is sufficient alone to establish a claim of paranormal origin. The banality of a message is usually taken as a proof of subconscious origin. This attitude is not justified by any means. If you begin to knock on a wall behind which, unseen to you, people are passing, there is no telling who will stop and answer. It may be a fool, a knave, or a man of intelligence and sympathy, bent on helping and teaching. The recipient of the message may have confidence in the good faith of the communicator, but no assurance of good faith alone justifies an unqualified belief in the intrinsic worth of the messages coming through. Good faith and ignorance, and good faith and presumption often go together in this world. There is no reason to rule out their partnership in the beyond.

The question assumes a different aspect after long association between the automatic writer and the communicator. The latter may succeed in convincing the writer of his sincerity, erudition, and high moral purpose. He has his own means of identification. From the sensation produced in the hand the automatist recognizes the presence of the well-known control of the appearance of an intruder.

Occasionally the writing is attributed to preposterous sources. Victor Hugo received automatic messages from the "Shadow of the Tomb" and the "Ass of Balaam." And Jules Bois quoted questions in Le Mirage Moderne to which the "Lion of Androcles" gave the answers.

The communicator often avails himself or herself of the services of an amanuensis who appears to have more skill in performing the psychic feat of communication. In the séances of Stainton Moses, "Rector" acted as amanuensis for "Imperator" and many others, producing a large part of the automatic script.

In Leonora Piper's case, the communicators were often unconscious whether their messages were delivered by the spoken word or in automatic writing. The scripts of this famous medium are in a class by themselves. While she was writing, her voice was being used by another communicator. To quote from Dr. Richard Hodgson's report:

"The sense of hearing for the 'hand'-consciousness appears to be in the hand, and the sitter must talk to the hand to be understood. The thoughts that pass through the consciousness controlling the hand tend to be written, and one of the difficulties apparently is to prevent the writing out of thoughts which are not intended for the sitter. Other 'indirect communicators' frequently purport to be present and the 'consciousness of the hand' listens to them with the hand as though they were close by, as it listens to the sitters, presenting the palm of the hand, held in slightly different positions for the purpose by different 'direct communicators' so as to bring usually the region of the junction between the little finger and the palm toward the mouth of the sitter."

In the old days writing was usually mirror writing, which sometimes was obtained in an unusual manner, i.e., Piper wrote a name on paper held to her forehead so that the pencil was turned towards her face.

With the advent of the "Imperator" group of Stainton Moses, "Rector" took over the role of the scribe for all communicators and mirror writing only cropped up occasionally. Sometimes the letters were spelled in an inverted order. The writing appeared to be less of a strain than speaking and these séances lasted for two hours or more.

An extremely interesting intellectual aspect of automatic writing is given from the other side in Geraldine Cummins' The Road to Immortality (1932). The spirit of F. W. H. Myers, on the second occasion on which he purported to write through Cummins, wrote:

"The inner mind, is very difficult to deal with from this side. We impress it with our message. We never impress the brain of the medium directly. That is out of the question. But the inner mind receives our message and sends it on to the brain. The brain is a mere mechanism. The inner mind is like soft wax, it receives our thoughts, their whole content, but it must produce the words that clothe it. That is what makes cross-correspondence so very difficult. We may succeed in sending the thought through, but the actual words depend largely on the inner mind's content, on what words will frame the thought. If I am to send half a sentence through one medium and half through another I can only send the same thought with the suggestion that a part of it will come through one medium and a part through another."

The explanation may have been very true in the case of Cummins, yet it need not have general application. She was conscious of the use of her brain by someone else. In the introduction to The Road to Immortality, "Myers" observed:

"Soon I am in a condition of half-sleep, a kind of dream-state that yet, in its peculiar way, has more illumination than one's waking state. I have at times distinctly the sensation of a dreamer who has no conscious creative control over the ideas that are being formulated in words. I am a mere listener, and through my stillness and passivity I lend my aid to the stranger who is speaking. It is hard to put such a psychological condition into words. I have the consciousness that my brain is being used by a stranger all the time. It is just as if an endless telegram is being tapped out on it."

Like any other mediumistic faculty, automatic writing may appear at a very early age. Mr. Wason, a well-known Spiritualist from Liverpool, saw the six-month old son of Kate Fox-Jencken, write: "I love this little child. God bless him. Advise his father to go back to London on Monday by all means—Susan." Susan was the name of Mr. Wason's wife. Myers and Hodgson saw a girl of four write the words, "Your Aunt Emma." Celina, a child of three and a half, wrote in the presence of Drs. Dussart and Broquet: "I am glad to manifest through a charming little medium of three and a half who promises well. Promise me not to neglect her."

Glimpses into Automatic Literature

The claims of discarnate authorship present a delicate problem. Angelo Brofferio knew a writing medium "to whom Boccaccio, Bruno and Galileo dictated replies that for the elevation of thought were assuredly more worthy of the greatness of that trio than on the level of the medium: I could cite competent testimony to the fact." According to Cesare Lombroso, "Dante, or one who stood for him, dictated to Scaramuzza three Cantos in terza rima. I read only a few strophes of this but so far as I could judge they were very beautiful."

Many famous writers wrote in a semitrance, having but an imperfect recollection of the work afterwards. Harriet Beecher Stowe, the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin, claimed that she did not write it: it was given to her; "it passed before her." In like measure William Blake stated that his poem Jerusalem was dictated to him. "The grandest poem that this world contains; I may praise it, since I dare not pretend to be other than the Secretary; the authors are in eternity." Again: "I have written this poem from immediate dictation, twelve or sometimes twenty or thirty lines at a time without premeditation and even against my will."

Parts of the Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament) were received through automatic writing, for example 2 Chronicles 21:12 says, "And there came a writing to him from Elijah the prophet saying . . ." In 1833, the book of the German Augustinian nun Catherine Emmerich, The Lowly Life and Bitter Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ and His Blessed Mother, was accepted by Catholics as divinely inspired. The remarkable contents of the book came to her in visions and were noted and edited by the poet Clement Brentano.

In America one of the earliest automatically written books was Rev. C. Hammond's The Pilgrimage of Thomas Payne and Others to the Seventh Circle (New York, 1852). The book contained 250 octavo pages. It was begun at the end of December 1851 and completed February 1 of the next year. The following year Judge John W. Edmonds's and George T. Dexter's Spiritualism was published, which also contains many spirit messages. The same year saw the appearance of John Murray Spear's Messages from the Spirit Life, which was followed in 1857 by a large connected work, the Educator. A year later, Charles Linton, a bookkeeper of limited education, produced a remarkable book of 100,000 words: The Healing of the Nation, which was printed with Wisconsin governor Nathaniel P. Tallmadge's preface. In the following year Twelve Messages from John Quincey Adams through Joseph D. Stiles was published.

But all these books pale into insignificance before Hudson Tuttle's Arcana of Nature (1862), a volume of broad sweep and scope comparable to the trance writings of Andrew Jackson Davis.

Two late nineteenth-century cases of automatic writing still deserve attention. First, when Victorian novelist Charles Dickens died in 1870, he left a novel The Mystery of Edwin Drood unfinished. T. P. James, an American mechanic of very slight education, completed it automatically. According to many critics the script is characteristic of Dickens in style and is worthy of his talent. Secondly, a few years later John Ballou Newbrough received through the process of automatic typewriting the New Age Bible, Oahspe (1882). This volume remains in print, the scripture of several small but persistent religious groups. Less than two decades later, Aleister Crowley received a much shorter work through automatic writing, The Book of the Law, which has become the scripture for thelemic magicians. In the next decade, James Edward Padgett would begin receiving the writings, four volumes in all, which became the scriptures for the Foundation Church of the Divine Truth.

In France, in the early days of French Spiritism, Hermance Dufeaux, a girl of 14, produced two surprising books: a Life of Jeanne d'Arc, claimed to be dictated by the maid, and Confessions of Louis XI. Allan Kardec vouched for the honesty of the girl. On the other hand, the Divine Revelations of Geneva in 1854, obtained by a little group of ministers and professors by means of the table-tipping "from Christ and his angels," is, according to Flournoy, insipid and foolish enough to give one nausea.

In England, J. Garth Wilkinson published in 1857 an octavo volume of impressional poetry. The first continued a series of automatically received messages deserving serious attention that were produced by William Stainton Moses between 1870 and 1880. His scripts contained many evidential messages, but their main purpose was the delivery of religious teaching.

The Scripts of Cleophas, Paul in Athens, and The Chronicle of Ephesus, produced by Cummins under the alleged influence of Philip the Evangelist, and Cleophas, bear signs of close acquaintanceship with the Apostolic Circle, an early American Spiritualist group which claimed close contact with Jesus' apostles and other New Testament characters. Sir Oliver Lodge claims to have received independent evidence concerning the inspiration of The Road to Immortality, Cummins's fourth book, with communications said to be from the spirit of F. W. H. Myers.

The quantity of automatically written books is such that it is difficult to mention more than a few. W. T. Stead's After Death: Letters From Julia (1914), was widely read by Spiritualists as was Hester Travers Smith's Psychic Messages from Oscar Wilde (1924). The Glastonbury Scripts by F. Bligh Bond have an importance of their own because of their role in actually guiding the excavation of the medieval site. Other notable volumes from the early twentieth century would include Elsa Barker's Letters from a Living Dead Man, War Letters from a Living Dead Man, and Last Letters from a Living Dead Man (the probable communicator being David P. Hutch, a magistrate of Los Angeles), the remarkable books of "Patience Worth" produced through Pearl Curran of St. Louis, The Seven Purposes, by Margaret Cameron (New York, 1918), which unlies the Betty Book literature of Betty and Stewart Edward White, the anonymous Private Dowding (1917) (by New Age movement precursor W. Tudor Pole), and the curious and interesting automatic scripts of Juliette Hervey of France, which Eugèn Osty studied.

Automatic writing has continued as a phenomenon through the twentieth century, though only rarely have it attained any notice, most scripts being privately printed and circulated. Many of the UFO contactee writings were so produced. With the emergence of channeling and audio recording equipment, automatic speaking (channeling) has become a far more popular endeavor. Among the few products of automatic writing that have attained some notice would be the several writings of New Age author Ruth Montgomery, which she received while sitting at her typewriter, such as Here and Hereafter (1968), A World Beyond (1971), and Companions Along the Way (1974).

Sources:

Mühl, Anita M. Automatic Writing: An Approach to the Unconscious. New York: Helix Press, 1963.

Thurston, Herbert. Surprising Mystics. London: Burns & Oates, 1955.

Automatism

A term indicating organic functions, or inhibitions, not controlled by the conscious self. The word "automatism" is actually a misnomer, as the acts, or inhibitions, are only automatic from the viewpoint of personal consciousness and they may offer the characteristic features of voluntary acts on the part of another consciousness.

F. W. H. Myers divided the phenomena of automatism into two principal classes: motor-automatism (the movement of the limbs, head, or tongue by an inner motor impulse beyond the conscious will) and sensory automatism (externalization of perceptions in inner vision and audition). The first he called "active," the second "passive" automatism, stressing, however, that the impulse from which it originates may be much the same in that one case as in the other. This place of origin is either the subconscious self or a discarnate intelligence. Myers suggested that the excitation of the motor or sensory centers may take place either through the subconscious (subliminal) mind, or the communicating intelligence may find some direct way, for which he proposed the name "telergic."

The phenomena of automatism are often accompanied by organic disturbances, or changes in vasomotor, circulatory, and respiratory systems. The sensory impressions are sometimes accompanied by a feeling of malaise, which is noticeable even in such simple cases as telepathy. In the phenomena of dowsing, the disturbance is much keener.

Incapacity for action is an almost rudimentary type of motor-automatism. It may result from a simple subconscious perception or it may be induced by an outside agency to save the subject from grave peril, e.g., from entering a house that is about to collapse or boarding a train that will be derailed. An instructive instance is quoted by Theodore Flournoy from his experiments with Héléne Smith:

"One day Miss Smith, when desiring to lift down a large and heavy object which lay on a high shelf, was prevented from doing so because her raised arm remained for some seconds as though petrified in the air and incapable of movement. She took this as a warning and gave up the attempt. At a subsequent séance, "Leopold" stated that it was he who thus fixed Helen's arm to prevent her from grasping this object which was much too heavy for her and would have caused her some accident."

This record of spirit cure was published in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (Vol. 3: 182–87):

"On August 17, 1891, the patient felt for the first time a unique sensation, accompanied by formication and sense of weight in the lower limbs, especially in the feet. This sensation gradually spread over the rest of the body, and when it reached the arms, the hands and forearms began to rotate. These phenomena recurred after dinner every evening, as soon as the patient was quiet in her armchair. . . . The patient placed her two hands on a table. The feeling of "magnetisation" then began in the feet, which began to rotate and the upper parts of the body gradually shared in the same movement. At a certain point, the hands automatically detached themselves from the table by small, gradual shocks, and at the same time the arms assumed a tetanic rigidity somewhat resembling catalepsy.

"One day Mme. X. felt herself lifted from her armchair and compelled to stand upright. Her feet and her whole body then executed a systematic calisthenic exercise, in which all the movements were regulated and made rhythmic with finished art. . . . Mme. X. had never had the smallest notion of chamber gymnastics. . . . These movements would have been very painful and fatiguing had she attempted them of her own will. Yet at the end of each performance she was neither fatigued nor out of breath. . . .. Mme. X is accustomed to arrange her own hair. One morning she said laughingly: 'I wish that a Court hairdresser would do my hair for me: my arms are tired.' At once she felt her hands acting automatically, and with no fatigue for her arms, which seemed to be held up; and the result was a complicated coiffure, which in no way resembled her usual simple mode of arrangement. The oddest of all these automatic phenomena consisted in extremely graceful gestures which Mme. X. was caused to execute with her arms, gestures as though of evocation or adoration of some imaginary divinity, or gestures of benediction. . . . The few persons who witnessed this spectacle are agreed that it was worthy of the powers of the greatest actress. Of such a gift Mme. X. has nothing."

Dr. F. L. H. Willis claimed that he performed a difficult and delicate surgical operation in trance while controlled by "Dr. Mason." At that time Willis had not even started to study medicine.

Myers classified the motor messages in the order of their increasing specialization:

1. Massive motor impulses. Case of the bricklayer (Phantasms of the Living Vol. 377), who had a sudden impulse to run home and arrived just in time to save the life of his little boy, who had set himself on fire. Case of Mr. Garrison, who left a religious service in the evening and walked 18 miles under a strong impulse to see his mother, then found her dead (Journal of the Society for Psychical Research Vol. 3: 125). Included under this heading the phenomenon of ambulatory automatism: moving about in a secondary state, as a result of an irresistible impulse, and forgetting all about it on return to normal consciousness. It is noticeable in subjects affected with nervous diseases. The mysterious transportation of the Italian Pansini children was attributed by some Italian scientists to this cause.

2. Simple subliminal motor impulses that give rise to table tilting and similar phenomena. Georgina Houghton wrote in Evenings at Home in Spiritual Séance (1881) that on one occasion, being anxious to find her way to a house which she had not visited for several years, she entrusted herself to spirit guides and arrived safely.

3. Musical execution, subliminally initiated. Jesse Shepard, the famous musical medium, George Aubert, and many child prodigies furnish cases of absorbing interest. The heading should be widened to include cases of contagious dancing witnessed in religious revivals, or cases like that of Lina, studied by Col. Eugene Auguste-A. D. Rochas, and Madeleine, studied by Emile Magnin, both girls exhibiting remarkable histrionic and dancing talent in trance.

4. Automatic drawing and painting.
5. Automatic writing.
6. Automatic speech.
7. Telekinetic movements.

J. Maxwell suggested in his Metapsychical Phenomena (1905) the following classification:

1. Simple muscular automatism: typtology, alphabetic systems.
2. Graphic muscular automatism: automatic writing, drawing, and painting.
3. Phonetic automatism: trance speaking.
4. Mixed automatism: incarnations.

Sensory automatism embraces the phenomena of clairvoyance, clairaudience, and crystal gazing. Therefore, according to Myers's scheme, the bulk of the phenomena of psychical research would range under the heading: automatism.

Autoscope

Term used by Sir William Barrett in his work On the Threshold of the Unseen (1917) to denote any mechanical means whereby communication from the unknown may reach us. The unknown may be an extraneous mind, living or dead, or the subconscious. The planchette, the ouija board, and the divining rod are typical autoscopes.

Sources:

Barrett, William. On the Threshold of the Unseen. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1917.

Autoscopy

A term dating from the Mesmeric age and denoting the power of somnambules to see their own organs and give a description of their state. The word was coined by neurologist Charles Féré. He applied it to the vision his patients saw of their double in a morbid state. This is external autoscopy, as contrasted by Baron du Potet to internal autoscopy: self-diagnosis in a trance. Dr. Sollier wrote a monograph, Les Phénomènes d'autoscopie (Paris, 1903), on the subject.

Autosuggestion

System of healing developed by Emile Coué (1857–1926), in which some of the remarkable effects of hypnotism can be achieved through conscious suggestion employed by the subject. Coué's methods have since become the basis for many popular systems of healing, self-improvement, and mysticism and an integral part of New Thought metaphysics.

Avalon (or Avillion)

The enchanted island of Arthurian legend. This terrestrial paradise was known in Welsh mythology as Ynys Avallach (Isle of Apples) or possibly related to the Celtic king of the dead named Avalloc or Afallach. In Geofrey of Manmouth's twelfth-century chronicle of King Arthur, Historia Regum Britanniae, it was noted that Arthur's sword was forged in Avalon, and he was returned to Avalon after his last battle so his wounds could heal.

In 1191 the monks at Glastonbury announced that it was identical to Avalon and that they had discovered Arthur's burial site. As evidence they produced a cross bearing Arthur's name and the place's name, Avalonia, which had been found alongside an exhumed body. Today, replicas of the cross are sold at Glastonbury Abbey.

Sources:

Lacy, Norris J. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Avalon, Arthur

Pseudonym of Sir John George Woodroffe (1865–1936), a prominent British administrator in India. He was educated at Oxford University and the Inner Temple, London, where he qualified as a barrister. He was advocate, Calcutta High Court, 1890; fellow and Tagore Law Professor, University of Calcutta; standing counsel to the Government of India, 1902–03; Puisne Judge of the High Court of Calcutta, 1904–22; and officiating chief justice of Bengal, November 1915. Upon returning to England, he was reader in Indian Law at Oxford University, 1923–30.

He published scholarly translations of rare Hindu esoteric religious scriptures and became a leading authority on Hindu tantra and yoga.

Sources:

Avalon, Arthur. The Garland of Letters: Varnamala; Studies in the Mantra-Shastra. Madras, India: Ganesh, 1922.

———. The Serpent Power. Madras, India: Ganesh, 1924.

———. Shakti and Shakta. 3d ed. Madras, India: Ganesh, 1929.

Avatar

A term used in Hindu religion to indicate the incarnation of a deity. Avatara is a Sanskrit word meaning "descent," and the Hindu gods take on animal or human form in different ages for the welfare of the world. In Hindu mythology, the god Brahma (originally known as the creator Prajapati) became successively incarnated as a boar, a tortoise, and a fish, to assist the development of the world in prehistory.

Certain Hindu scriptures ascribe these incarnations to the god Vishnu (the preserver), but since the manifestation of divine power takes many different forms in Hindu mythology, the distinction is academic. Various scriptures ascribe to Vishnu ten major incarnations: (1) Matsya (the fish), associated with legends of a great deluge in which Manu, progenitor of the human race, was saved from destruction; (2) Kurma (the tortoise), whose back supported great mountains while the gods and demons churned the ocean to retrieve divine objects and entities lost in the deluge; (3) Vahura (the boar), who raised up the earth from the seas; (4) Nara-sinha (the man-lion), who delivered the world from the tyranny of a demon; (5) Vamana (the dwarf), who recovered areas of the universe from demons; (6) Parasu-rama (Rama with the axe), who delivered Brahmins from dominion by the warrior caste during the second age of the world; (7) Rama, hero of the religious epic Ramayana, who opposed the demon Ravana; (8) Krishna popular incarnation chronicled in the religious epic Mahabharata (especially in the Bhagavad-Gita section) and Srimad Bhagavatam; (9) Buddha, the great religious teacher; and (10) Kalki, an incarnation yet to come, who is prophesied to appear on a white horse with a sword blazing like a comet, to destroy the wicked, stabilize creation and restore purity to the world.

In other religious works, as many as 22 incarnations are listed, including various great saints and sages. According to Hindu belief, a perfected human soul has no further karma (action and reaction) and is absorbed into divinity at death, but may elect to be incarnated for the good of the world. The deity Shri Krishna, in the Bhagavad-Gita (4:7–8) specifically promises: "Arjuna, whenever there is decline of dharma (righteous duty), and unrighteousness is dominant, then I am reborn. For the protection of the virtuous, the destruction of evil-doers, and to reestablish righteousness, I am reborn from age to age." Belief in repeated divine reincarnations of the deities for the good of the world, as distinct from one unique Messianic event, is one of the major theological differences between Hinduism and Western religions such as Judaism and Christianity.

Avebury

Avebury is possibly the most spectacular of the ancient megalithic monuments in the British Isles, far surpassing in size the more well-known Stonehenge. Like Stonehenge, it is located in Wiltshire. Enough of the monument has survived that a picture of what it looked like when it was completed can be reconstructed.

The large ritual area is surrounded by a circular earth embankment some 1200 feet in diameter. Immediately inside of the embankment is a ditch, and on the inner edge of the ditch there once stood a circle of some 100 stones; a number of which once formed the western half of the circle remain in place. Inside the large circle were two inner circles, both of approximately 340 feet in diameter. In the center of the circle to the north is a cove, but its purpose is unknown. There was a single stone, surrounded by a rectangle of smaller stones, in the center of the southern circle. All of the stones appeared unfinished and were gathered from the surrounding countryside. Similar stones lie scattered on the landscape of the region to this day.

Avebury has been inhabited since late Neolithic times. Then, around 2600 B.C.E., the southernmost inner circle was erected, and it appears to have been used for a variety of ritual purposes. The northernmost inner circle was erected soon afterwards. It was quite different in that it had a double ring of stones. It has been suggested that it was possibly used for funeral rites. Next, a ditch was dug around the entire site and the earth taken from the excavation was used to form the rampart-like outer circle. A double line of stones, generally called West Kennet Avenue, led from Avebury to the south toward an associated monument about a mile away. There were at one time as many as 200 hundred stones along the avenue, but less than 20 remain today. Avebury probably was completed around 2000 B.C.E. and utilized for more than a millennium.

As the megaliths in Britain have been studied, Avebury has been placed in the larger context of sites scattered across the land. It has been studied in light of the alignments its stones might offer to various prominent planetary bodies. Alexander Thom, who pioneered such study, did very accurate measures of the remaining stones, and has suggested they demonstrate a quite sophisticated knowledge of the Moon's movements. Others have noted that so many stones are missing that determining alignments is quite difficult if not impossible. The circles were probably places in which a large number of the people in the surrounding countryside gathered, but their essential functions remain a matter of widespread speculation.

Sources:

Brown, Peter Lancaster. Megaliths and Masterminds. New York: Charles Scribners's Sons, 1979.

Burl, Aubrey. Rings of Stone. New Haven, Conn.: Ticknor & Fields, 1980.
———. The Stone Circles of the British Isles. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1976.
Thom, Alexander. Megalithic Sites in Britain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967.

Avenar

A fifteenth-century astrologer who promised the Jews, on the testimony of the planets, that their Messiah should arrive without fail in 1444, or at the latest, in 1464. He gave, for his guarantors, Saturn, Jupiter, "the crab, and the fish." The Jews were said to have kept their windows open to receive the messenger of God who did not arrive.

Averroes (1126–1198)

Name generally used for Abul-Walid Mohammed ibn-Ahmad ibn-Mohammed ibn-Rushd, one of the greatest Arabian philosophers, and a commentator on the works of Aristotle. He was born at Cordova and studied theology, mathematics, medicine, jurisprudence, and philosophy. He traveled widely and died in Morocco.

His writings greatly influenced Christian theologians, especially Thomas Aquinas, who obtained copies of his writings as a result of the Crusades. Averroes followed the concept of God as the source of emanation of intelligence and suggested that religious and philosophical truth may be in contradiction.

Avicenna (980–1037)

Named Aben Sina by Hebrew writers, but properly Ebor Sina, or—to give his names in full—Al-Sheikh Al-Rayis Abu Ali Al-Hossein ben Abdallah ben Sina. He was born at Kharmatain, near Bokhara, in the year of the Hegira 370, or 980 C.E., and was educated at Bokhara. He displayed such extraordinary precocity that when he had reached his tenth year, he had completely mastered the Quran and acquired a knowledge of algebra, Muslim theology, and the His ab ul-Hind, or the arithmetic of the Hindus. Under Abdallah Al-Natheli he studied logic, Euclid, and the Almagest, and then, as a diversion, devoted himself to the study of medicine.

He was only 21 when he composed his Kitab al-Majmu or, The Book of the Sum Total, whose mysteries he afterward attempted to clarify in a 20-volume commentary.

Avicenna's reputation for wisdom and erudition was so great that on the death of his father he was promoted by Sultan Magdal Douleth to the high office of grand vizier, which he held with advantage to the state until a political revolution accomplished the downfall of the Samanide dynasty. He then abandoned Bokhara and wandered from place to place, increasing his store of knowledge but yielding himself to a life of sensuality.

About 1012 he retired to Jurjân, where he began his great work on medicine, which is still considered one of the earliest systems of that art with any pretensions to philosophical completeness. It is arranged with singular clearness and presents a very admirable résumé of the doctrines of the ancient Greek physicians. Avicenna subsequently lived at Rai, Karzwîn, and Ispahan, where he became physician to the Persian sovereign. He is said to have been dismissed from this post on account of his debauched living. He then retired to Hamadan, where, worn out with years of sensual indulgence, he died, at the age of 58.

Avicenna wrote nearly 100 works on philosophy, mathematics, and medicine and at least seven treatises on the philosophers' stone of alchemy. His Book of the Canon of Medicine acquired European celebrity and has been translated into Latin several times.

Avichi

A theosophical concept of hell, deriving from the Sanskrit word for "isolation." Although it is a place of torment, it differs in great degree from the dominant conception of hell. Its torments are the torments of fleshly cravings, which for want of a physical body cannot be satisfied. People remain after death exactly the same entity as before, and, if in life an individual has been obsessed with strong desires or passions, such obsession still continues, though in the astral plane the satisfaction of these desires or passions is impossible. These torments are of infinite scope, whether it be the confirmed sensualist who suffers them, or more ordinary people who, without being bound to the things of the flesh, have nevertheless allowed the affairs of the world to loom too largely in their lives and are now doomed to regret the small attention they have given to higher matters.

Avichi is a place of regrets for things done and things undone. Its torments are not, however, eternal, and with the passing of time—of which there is no measure in the astral plane—they are gradually discontinued at the cost of terrible suffering.

Avidya

A Hindu religious term also used in Theosophy to denote the ignorance of mind which causes those commencing the spiritual pathway to expend vain effort and pursue vain courses. It is the antithesis of Vidya, or true knowledge.

The Awakener (Magazine)

One of several independent journals presenting the teachings of famous mystic Meher Baba (1894–1969), regarded by disciples as an avatar or descent of divine power. Address: 938 18th St., Hermosa Beach, CA 90254.

Awareness

Awareness is a holistic health and New Age networking periodical based in Orange County, California. It primarily serves the greater Los Angeles area, but includes a special section devoted to the San Diego area. Based primarily around health concerns, it has adopted the format pioneered by Common Ground, the original New Age networking magazine based in San Francisco.

Awareness, subtitled "A Guide to Healthy Living for the New Millennium," unites an interest in preventive medicine, proper diets, alternative healing methods, and natural remedies. Each issue carries a set of short articles and columns that explore the use of foods and herbs to build and keep a healthy body, various energy-based healing techniques such as qigong and acupuncture, and different forms of New Age counseling. While clearly emphasizing holistic health concerns, the articles also reach out to cover paranormal experiences and New Age spirituality.

Awareness, distributed free throughout Southern California, is built around its advertisements. Each issue carries a "Resource Directory" of different groups and health and counseling practitioners, supplemented by numerous display ads. While each issue carries several lengthy feature articles, most articles are slightly veiled advertisements, detailing current services and events, and drawing upon publicity material from the sponsoring group. There is also a column reviewing recently published books, CDs, and videos, the content also largely drawn from publicity material and each item including information for ordering the item.

Awareness appears bimonthly. It is published at 7441 Garden Grove Blvd., Ste. C, Garden Grove, CA 92841. Website: http://www.awarenessmag.com/.

Sources:

Awareness. Garden Grove, Calif., n.d.

Awareness. http://www.awarenessmag.com/. March 23, 2000.

Awyntyrs off Arthure at the Tern Wathelyn

An Arthurian poem of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, believed to be of Scottish origin. Among other adventures, the poem relates one which King Arthur and his queen, Guinevere, experienced while accompanied by their favorite knight Sir Gawane (or Gawain), hunting in the wilds of Cumberland. Overtaken by darkness which separated them from the rest of the party, the ghost of the queen's mother appeared to them. The apparition told of the torments to which it was being subjected and entreated that prayers be offered up for its release. This the queen and Sir Gawane promised, and on their return to Carlisle millions of masses were ordered to be sung on its behalf.

Sources:

Gates, Robert J. The Awntyrs off Arthure at the Terne Wathelyne: A Critical Edition. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1969.

Hanna, Ralph. The Awntyrs off Arthure: An Edition Based on Bodleian Library MS. Douce 324. Manchester, U.K.: Manchester University Press, 1974.

Lacy, Norris J. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Laing, David. Select Remains of the Ancient Popular Poetry of Scotland. Edinburgh: Balfour & Clarke, 1822.

Small, John. Select Remains of the Ancient Popular and Romance Poetry of Scotland. London: W. Blackwood & Sons, 1885.

Axinomancy

Divination by means of a hatchet or a woodcutter's axe. Diviners predicted the ruin of Jerusalem with axinomancy (Psalm 74). Francois de la Tour-Blanche, who remarked upon this, does not tell us how the diviners made use of the hatchet, but it may have been related to one of the two methods employed in ancient times and lately practiced in certain northern countries.

The first is as follows: To find a treasure, find a round agate, heat the head of the axe until red hot in the fire, and place it so that its edge stands perpendicularly in the air. Place the agate on the edge. If it remains there, there is no treasure; if it falls, it will roll quickly away. It must, however, be replaced three times, and if it rolls three times toward the same place, there the treasure will be found. If it rolls a different way each time, one must seek about for the treasure.

The second method of divination by the axe is for the purpose of detecting robbers. The hatchet is cast on the ground, head downward, with the handle rising perpendicularly in the air. Those present must dance around it in a ring until the handle of the axe totters and it falls to the ground. The end of the handle indicates the direction in which the thieves must be sought. It is said by some that if this divination is to succeed, the head of the axe must be stuck in a round pot.

Ayahuasca

Ayahuasca, the hallucinogenic drug favored by many traditional peoples of South America, has in the twentieth century become the center of a major new religious movement in Brazil and began to spread among neo-shamanistic groups in North America and Europe in the 1990s. Ayahuasca (or vine of the dead) is also known as yage (Colombia) and caapi (Brazil). It is prepared from the vine Banisteriopsis Caapi by boiling vine segments with various other plants. The resulting drink contains several hallucinogenics including harmine and/or N,N-dimethyltryptamine.

Archeological evidence, including mythology and pre-Columbian rock drawings, strongly suggest that ayahuasca has been used for centuries. It first became known in the outside world through the account published in 1858 by Manuel Villavicencio, who described his own experiences from its use. The notes of Richard Spruce, a British explorer who traveled in the upper reaches of the Amazon in the 1850s, were published in 1908 and subsequent accounts appeared through the twentieth century. These were buried in professional journals until the 1960s when ayahuasca was rediscovered in the context of the wave of interest in LSD and other hallucinogenics throughout the West. In 1968, Michael Harner wrote a pioneering paper, "The Sound of Rushing Water," describing his experience after taking the drug in 1961 while doing field work in Ecuador. A variety of people during the hippie era sampled ayahuasca but it never gained the popularity of LSD, peyote, or other more easily obtained psychedelic drugs.

Among the indigenous peoples of South America, ayahuasca is a healing substance. It is gathered, prepared, and used with proper ceremony and reverence. In the Upper Amazon, Banisteriopsis Caapi is mixed with another plant, Psychotria viridis, and boiled for a full day and then stored until needed for a ceremony. It is believed that in using the drug, the individual is connected to the force that interconnects all things.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, Raimundo Irineu Serra had an apparition of the Virgin Mary as Our Lady of Conceição. During the vision, she began to teach him new doctrine. He was under the influence of ayahuasca at the time. From this experience he began to construct what became a new religion, Santo Daime, the Religion of the Rainforest. That religion grew slowly, but in the decades since World War II (1939–45) has spread across Brazil and in recent decades has spread to North America and Europe as Brazilian members have migrated. The appearance of ayahuasca as a sacramental substance by an ethnic religious community has presented legal problems. At the beginning of 2000, members were arrested in Spain, and the movement has begun an effort to have the drug legalized in the United States and several countries of western Europe.

As of the beginning of 2000, the legal situation of ayahuasca consumption is ambiguous. In the United States, for example, the plants from which ayahuasca is made are not illegal; however, some of the substances they contain are. Ayahuasca is not listed as a controlled substance, but N,N-dimethyltryptamine is a controlled substance and illegal. European drug control agencies have demonstrated much more interest in controlling the spread of ayahuasca than has the America Drug Enforcement Agency.

Sources:

Ayahuasca Home Page. http://www.ayahuasca.com/. June 12, 2000.

Luna, Eduardo. Ayahuasca Visions. North Atlantic Books, 1999.

———, and Steven F. White, eds. Ayahuasca Reader: Encounters with the Amazon's Sacred Vine. Synergistic Press, 2000.

Ayperor (or Ipès)

A count of the infernal empire.

Ayton, W(illiam) A(lexander) (1816–1909)

Modern alchemist and member of the famous Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn occult society. He was born April 28, 1816, in London, England, and was educated at Charterhouse School (then in London) and Trinity Hall, Cambridge (matriculating 1837; Latin Prize Essay, 1838–39; B.A., 1841). He was ordained as a deacon in the Church of England in 1841 and became a clergyman two years later. After serving in various country parishes, he was appointed vicar of Chacombe, Northamptonshire, in 1873.

Ayton was a Freemason and Theosophist as well as a member of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia before becoming one of the early members of the Golden Dawn in July 1888 at the age of 72, together with his wife. He took the magical motto Virtute Orta Occident Rarius (Those that rise by virtue rarely fall), his wife, Anne, took Soror Quam Potero Adjutabo (I will help as much as I can).

Ayton was a good Latin scholar, a firm believer in the Mahatmas of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, as well as gnomes and elementals. With his wife, he had been a secret practitioner of alchemy for many years and claimed to have rediscovered the elixir of life. The poet W. B. Yeats, also a Golden Dawn member, described Ayton as "the most panic-stricken person" he had known. Presumably as an elderly clergyman, pursuing secret researches in occultism and alchemy, Ayton was fearful of being discovered by his Church superiors. He also had obsessive fears about being under threat of occult attack from Jesuits, whom he designated the "Black Brethren." Yeats apparently regarded Ayton with friendly but amused skepticism. In his book The Trembling of the Veil (1922), Yeats wrote:

"This old man took me aside that he might say—'I hope you never invoke spirits—that is a very dangerous thing to do. I am told that even the planetary spirits turn upon us in the end.' I said, 'Have you ever seen an apparition?' 'O, yes, once,' he said. 'I have my alchemical laboratory in a cellar under my house where the Bishop cannot see it. One day I was walking up and down there when I heard another footstep walking up and down beside me. I turned and saw a (1707) from Latin into English. He also transcribed a number of alchemi girl I had been in love with when I was a young man, but she died long ago. She wanted me to kiss her. O no, I would not do that.' 'Why not?' I said. 'O she might have got power over me.' 'Has your alchemical research had any success?' I said. 'Yes, I once made the elixir of life. A French alchemist said it had the right smell and the right colour' (the alchemist may have been Éliphas Lévi) 'but the first effect of the elixir is that your nails fall out and your hair falls off. I was afraid that I might have made a mistake and that nothing else might happen, so I put it away on a shelf. I meant to drink it when I was an old man, but when I got it down the other day it had all dried up.' "

Between 1886 and 1905 Ayton conducted an extensive correspondence with fellow Golden Dawn member F. L. Gardner. These letters, which contain valuable sidelights on occultism and Golden Dawn personalities, were published by Ellic Howe as The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn; The Letters of the Revd W. A. Ayton to F. L. Gardner and Others, 1886–1905.

In 1890 Ayton officiated at the marriage of Moina Bergson to S. L. MacGregor Mathers, both of whom played a key part in the history of the Golden Dawn. When A. E. Waite reorganized the GD in 1903, Ayton was a senior adept of the Second Order and was coopted as a co-chief. In 1908 Ayton translated Dr. Thomas Smith's Life of John Dee (1707) from Latin into English. He also transcribed a number of alchemical texts and Golden Dawn papers.

In his later years, Ayton retired to East Grinstead, Sussex, on a small pension, then to Saffron Walden, Hertfordshire, where he died January 1, 1909, at the age of 92.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic, ed. The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: The Letters of the Revd W. A. Ayton to F. L. Gardner and Others, 1886–1905. Wellingborough, U.K.: Aquarian Press, 1985.

Azael

One of the angels who revolted against God. The ancient rabbis stated that he is chained on sharp stones in an obscure part of the desert, awaiting the last judgment.

Azazel

A demon of the second order, guardian of the goat. At the feast of expiation, which the ancient Jews celebrated on the tenth day of the seventh month, two goats were led to the high priest, who drew lots for them, the one for the Lord, the other for Azazel. The one on which the lot of the Lord fell was sacrificed, and his blood served for expiation. The high priest then put his two hands on the head of the other, confessed his sins and those of the people, charged the animal with them, and allowed him to be led into the desert and set free. And the people, having left the care of their iniquities to the goat of Azazel—also known as the scapegoat—return home with clean consciences.

According to Milton, Azazel is the principal standard bearer of the infernal armies. It was also the name of the demon used by Mark the heretic for his magic spells.

Azer

An angel of the elemental fire. According to some accounts, Azer is also the name of the father of Zoroaster, legendary author of the Zend-Avesta, the sacred work of the ancient Persians.

Azoth (or Azoch)

Name given by ancient alchemists to Mercury, also known as Astral Quintessence, Flying Salve, Animated Spirit, Ethelia, and Auraric. The term also implied the essential element of the transmutation process.

Sources:

Waite, A. E. Azoth; or, The Star in the East. London, 1893. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

B

Ba

The Egyptian conception of the soul, which, in the form of a man-headed bird, left the body after death and winged its flight to the gods. It returned at intervals to the mummy for the purpose of comforting it and reassuring it concerning immortality. Sometimes carved on the lid of mummy cases, it might be depicted grasping the ankh and the nif; occasionally it was represented as flying down the tomb shaft to the deceased or perched on the breast of the mummy. In the Book of the Dead, a chapter promises abundance of food to the ba.

The ba, or soul, should not be confused with the ka, the human double. In Egypt the human had both. After death, the ba left the body. The ka remained in the tomb and ventured forth in the likeness of the deceased to haunt family and friends.

Sources:

The Book of the Dead. Translated by E. A. Wallis Budge. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960.

Baalberith

According to Johan Weyer, Baalberith is a demon of the second order, master of the Infernal Alliance. He was said to be secretary and keeper of the archives of hell.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Baal Shem Tov (1698–1760)

Founder of the Jewish mystical movement called Hasidism that swept through Europe during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Born as Israel, son of Eliezer, he became known as the Baal Shem Tov, "Master of the Good Name," or the Besht. Many legends circulated around the zaddikim, or holy leaders, of Hasidism, who were credited with miracles and spiritual insight. Hasidism had, and continues to have, a notable impact on Jewish life.

Sources:

Buber, Martin. The Legend of the Baal-Shem. New York: Schocken Books, 1955.

———. Tales of the Hasidim: The Early Masters. New York: Schocken Books, 1947.

Hilsenrad, Zalman Aryeh, comp. The Baal Shem Tov: His Birth and Early Manhood. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Kehot Publication Society, 1967.

Kaplan, Aryeh. Chassidic Masters: History, Biography, and Thought. New York: Maznaim Publishing, 1984.

Baalzephon

Captain of the guard and sentinels of hell (according to Johan Weyer).

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Baaras

A marvelous plant known to the Arabs as the "Golden Plant," which is supposed to grow on Mount Libanus, underneath the road that leads to Damascus. It is said to flower in the month of May, after the melting of the snow. At night it can be seen by torchlight, but through the day it is invisible. It was believed to be of great assistance to alchemists in the transmutation of metals. It is alluded to by the historian Josephus (Lib. 8, Chap. 25.)

Bab

Name given to Mirza Ali Muhammad (1819–1850), who led the movement that was the direct precursor of the Baha'i Faith. Baha'u'llah (1817–1892), the founder of the Baha'i Faith, was a member of the babi religion, which was in turn heavily influenced by the traditions of Shia Islam, the form of Islam dominant in Iran (formerly Persia). The Bab, meaning the "Gate" (of revelation), was martyred for his faith.

Sources:

Balyuzi, H. M. The Bab: The Herald of the Day of Days. Oxford: G. Ronald, 1973.

Selections from the Writings of the Bab. Comp. Habib Taherzadeh. Haifa, Israel: Bahai World Center, 1976.

Babau

A species of ogre with which the nurses in the central parts of France used to frighten their charges. He was supposed to devour naughty children in salad. The ending "au" suggests a Celtic origin, as for example, "Y Mamau" is Welsh for "fairies."

Babiagora

Certain lakes of a gloomy nature between Hungary and Poland that have figured in various stories of witchcraft. Pools such as these were often used for purposes of divination, as by gazing down into clear water the mind is disposed to contemplation, often of a melancholy character. This form of divination is termed hydromancy and is similar to crystal gazing.

BABYLONIA

Ancient Religion and Magic

Magic was integral to the religion of ancient Babylonia. All the deities (the most prominent ones being Ea, Anu, and Enlil, the elder Bel) retained, even in the last centuries of Babylonian development, traces of their early demonic character. Ea, Anu, and Enlil formed a triad at the dawn of history and appear to have developed from an animistic group of world spirits. Although Ea became specialized as a god of the deep, Anu as a god of the sky, and Enlil as an earth god, each also had titles that emphasized that they had attributes overlapping those of the others. Thus Ea was Enki, earth lord, and as Aa was a lunar deity; he also had solar attributes. In the legend of Etana and the Eagle, his heaven is stated to be in the sky. Anu and Enlil as deities of thunder, rain, and fertility are closely linked to Ea, as Dagan, of the flooding and fertilizing Euphrates.

Each of these deities was accompanied by demonic groups. The spirits of disease were the "beloved sons of Bel"; the fates were the seven daughters of Anu; the seven storm demons, including the dragon and serpent, were of Ea's brood. The following description of Ea's older monstrous form occurs in one of the magical incantations translated by R. C. Thompson:

The head is the head of a serpent,
From his nostrils mucus trickles,
The mouth is beslavered with water;
The ears are those of a basilisk,
His horns are twisted into three curls,
He wears a veil in his head-band,
The body is a sun-fish full of stars,
The base of his feet are claws,
The sole of his foot has no heel;
His name is Sassu-wunnu,
A sea monster, a form of Ea.

Ea was "the great magician of the gods;" his sway over the forces of nature was secured by the performance of magical rites, and his services were obtained by humankind, who performed requisite ceremonies and repeated appropriate spells. Although he might be worshipped and propitiated in his temple at Eridu, he could also be conjured in reed huts. The latter indeed appear to have been the oldest holy places. In the Deluge myth, he makes a revelation in a dream to his human favorite, Pirnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah, of the approaching disaster planned by the gods, by addressing the reed hut in which he slept: "O, reed hut, hear; O, wall, understand." The sleeper received the divine message from the reeds. The reeds were to the Babylonians what rowan branches were to northern Europeans—they protected them against demons. Thus, for example, the dead were buried wrapped in reed mats.

The priesthood included two classes of magicians: the "Ashipu," who were exorcists, and the "Mashmashu," the purifers. The Ashipu priests played a prominent part in ceremonies, which had for their object the magical control of nature; in times of storm, disaster, and eclipse they were especially active. They also took the part of "witch doctors." Victims of disease were supposed to be possessed of devouring demons. In Thompson's translation:

Loudly roaring above, gibbering below,
They are the bitter venom of the gods . . .
Knowing no care, they grind the land like corn;
Knowing no mercy, they rage against mankind,
They spill their blood like rain,
Devouring their flesh and sucking their veins.

The Ashipu priests bore the responsibility to drive out the demon. Before doing so, the demon had to be identified. Once the priest did so, he had to bring it under his influence. He accomplished this by reciting its history and detailing its characteristics. The secret of the magician's power was his knowledge. To cure a toothache, for instance, he had to know the "Legend of the Worm." The worm was vampire-like and absorbed the blood of victims, but specialized in gums.

The legend relates that the worm came into existence as follows: Anu created the heavens, the heavens created the earth, the earth created the rivers, and the rivers created the canals, then the canals created marshes, and the marshes created the worm. In due time the worm appeared before Shamash, the sun god, and Ea, god of the deep, weeping and hungry. "What will you give me to eat and drink?" it cried. The gods promised that it would get dried bones and scented wood. The worm realized that this was the food of death, and answered: "What are dry bones to me? Set me upon the gums that I may drink the blood of the teeth and take away the strength of the gums." When the worm heard this legend repeated, it came under the magician's power and was dismissed to the marshes, while Ea was invoked to smite it. Different demons were exorcised by different processes. A fever patient might receive the following treatment:

Sprinkle this man with water,
Bring unto him a censer and a torch,
That the plague demon which resteth in the body of the man,
Like water may trickle away.

Demons might also be attacked by a form of image magic. The magician began by fashioning a figure of dough, wax, clay, or pitch. This figure might be placed on a fire, mutilated, or placed in running water to be washed away. As the figure suffered, so did the demon it represented, by the magic of the word of Ea.

In treating the sick, the magician might release a raven at the bedside of the sick person so that it would conjure the demon of fever to take flight likewise. Sacrifices could also be offered, as substitutes for patients, to provide food for the spirit of the disease. A young goat was slain and the priest repeated:

The kid is the substitute for mankind;
He hath given the kid for his life,
He hath given the head of the kid for the head of the man.
A pig might be offered:
Give the pig in his stead
And give the flesh of it for his flesh,
The blood of it for his blood.

The cures were numerous and varied. After the patient recovered, the mashmashu priests purified the house. The ceremony entailed the sprinkling of sacred water, the burning of incense, and the repetition of magical charms. People protected their homes against attack by placing certain plants over the doorways and windows. The halter of a donkey, or ass, was apparently used, in the same manner that horseshoes have been used in Europe to repel witches and evil spirits.

The purification ceremonies suggest the existence of taboo. For a period, the sick were "unclean" and had to be isolated. The recently recovered could make their way to the temple. A House of Light was attached, where fire ceremonies were performed, along with a House of Washing, where patients bathed in sacred water. The priest would anoint the individual with oil to complete the release from uncleanliness. Certain foods were also taboo at certain seasons. It was unlawful for a man to eat pork on the thirtieth of Ab (July–August), the twenty-seventh of Tisri, and other dates. Fish, ox flesh, and bread were similarly forbidden on specific dates.

A person's luck depended greatly on the observance of these rules. Still, even if all the ceremonies were observed, one might still meet with ill fortune on unlucky days. On the festival day of Marduk (Merodach) a man must not change his clothes, nor put on white garments, nor offer up sacrifices. Certain disaster would overcome a king if he drove out in a chariot, or a physician if he laid hands on the sick, or a priest who sat in judgment, for example. On lucky days good fortune was the heritage of everyone. Good fortune meant good health in many cases, sometimes assured by worshiping the dreaded spirit of disease called Ura.

A legend related that this demon once made up his mind to destroy all humankind. His counsellor, Ishun, however, prevailed upon him to change his mind, and he said, "Whoever will laud my name I will bless with plenty. No one will oppose the person who proclaims the glory of my valor. The worshiper who chants the hymn of praise to me will not be afflicted by disease, and he will find favor in the eyes of the King and his nobles."

Ghosts

Among the spirits who were the enemies of humans the ghosts of the dead were most dangerous, especially the ghosts of those who had not been properly buried. These homeless spirits—the grave was the home of the dead—wandered the streets searching for food and drink, or haunting houses. They often injured humans seriously.

The ghosts had a scary appearance. When they appeared before children, they frightened them to death. They delayed travelers and mocked those who were in sorrow. The screech-owl was a mother who had died giving birth, and wailed her grief nightly in solitary places. Occasionally she appeared in some terrible form and killed travellers.

Adam's first wife Lilith was a demon who had once been beautiful and was in the habit of deceiving lovers, working evil on them. A hag, Labartu, haunted mountains and marshes and children had to be charmed against her attacks. She also had a human history.

Another belief prevalent in Babylonia was that the spirits of the dead could be conjured from their graves to make revelations. In the Gilgamesh epic, the hero visits the tomb of his old friend and fellow warrior Ea-Bani. The ghost rises like a "weird gust" of wind and answers the various questions with great sadness. Babylonian vision of the future life was colored by profound gloom and pessimism. It was even the fate of the ghosts of the most fortunate and ceremonially buried dead to live in darkness, amid dust. The ghost of Ea-Bani said to Gilgamesh: "Were I to inform thee the law of the underworld which I have experienced, Thou wouldst sit down and shed tears all day long.' Gilgamesh lamented: "The sorrow of the underworld hath taken hold upon thee."

Priests who performed magical ceremonies had to be clothed in magical garments. They received inspiration from their clothing. the gods derived power from the skins of animals in a similar way, with which they were associated from the earliest time. Thus Ea was clad in the skin of the fish—probably the fish totem of the Ea tribe.

The dead were not admitted to the heavens of the gods. When a favored human being, like Utnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah, joined the company of the gods, he was assigned an island paradise where Gilgamesh visited him. He lived there with his wife. Gilgamesh was not permitted to land, and conversed with his immortal ancestor while sitting in his boat. The deities secured immortality by eating the "food of life" and drinking the "water of life."

Astrology

The ancient Babylonians were credited with some of the first correct astronomical observations. They were also pioneers of astrology, which they attributed to the god Marduk or Bel, said to have created the sun, moon, stars, and five planets. They knew that the length of the solar year was approximately 365.4 days and had divided the period of 24 hours into 12 beru (double hours) in accordance with the divisions of the equator, each of which was divided into 60 minutes, and each minute into 60 seconds. Such data were recorded on clay tablets in the library of the Babylonian king Assurbani-pal, around 668 B.C.E. Babylonian astrologers attributed human characteristics to planetary influences at birth, and laid the foundation for modern astrologers.

Sources:

Encyclopedia.com. Babylonia. http://www.encyclopedia.com/. June 26, 2000.

Ferry, David. Gilgamesh: a New Rendering into English Verse. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1992.

Jastrow, Morris. Aspects of Religious Belief and Practice in Babylonia & Assyria. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1911.

Kramer, Samuel N. From the Tablets of Sumer. Falcon's Wing, 1956.

———. Gilgamesh and the Huluppu-tree: A Reconstructed Sumerian Text. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1938.

Lenormant, Francois. Chaldean Magic: Its Origin & Development. London: Samuel Bagster, [1877].

Spence, Lewis. Myths and Legends of Babylonia & Assyria. London, 1916. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1975.

Thierens, A. E. Astrology in Mesopotamian Culture. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1935.

Bach, Edward (1886–1936)

British physician who developed an unconventional system of healing. Bach (his name is pronounced "batch") was a graduate of University College Hospital (M.B., B.S., M.R.C.S.). He left his flourishing Harley Street practice in favor of homeopathy, seeking a more natural system of healing than allopathic medicine. He was appointed bacteriologist and pathologist to the London Homeopathic Hospital, but in due course developed his own simple system of healing based on his psychic insight. He concluded that healing should be as simple and natural as the development of plants, which were nourished and given healing properties by earth, air, water, and sun.

Bach believed that he could sense the individual healing properties of flowers by placing his hands over the petals. His remedies were prepared by floating summer flowers in a bowl of clear stream water exposed to sunlight for three hours.

He developed 38 remedies, one for each of the negative states of mind suffered by human beings, which he classified under seven group headings: fear, uncertainty, insufficient interest in present circumstances, loneliness, oversensitivity to influences and ideas, despondency or despair, and overcare for the welfare of others. The Bach remedies can be prescribed for plants, animals, and other living creatures as well as human beings.

In the last years of his life, Bach abandoned his successful medical practice and lived in a cottage on the borders of Buckinghamshire, where he developed and prepared his healing system.

The Bach Centre now carries on the doctors's work at Mount Vernon, Sotwell, Wallingford, Berkshire. Some of Bach's ideas now have greater relevance through modern interest in the interaction between plants and human beings. During the last years of his life, he published several short books detailing his research. These and other publications dealing with Bach's works are kept in print by the Bach Centre. In the United States, there is an Edward Bach Healing Society, 644 Merrick Rd., Lynbrook, NY 11563.

As many have observed, the Bach system is a gentle method of healing, and many physicians have reported favorably on it. Much of the efficacy of the Bach remedies seemed to depend upon the fact that they were never mass produced but rather prepared individually with care and love for human beings, a fact that suggests that their value may have rested largely on a placebo effect.

Sources:

Bach, Edward. Heal Thyself. London: C. W. Daniel, 1931.

———. The Twelve Healers and Other Remedies: A Simple Herbal Treatment. 3d ed. London: C. W. Daniel, 1936.

Bach, Edward, and F. J. Wheeler. The Bach Flower Remedies. New Canaan, Conn.: Keats, 1977.

Chancellor, P. Handbook of the Bach Flower Remedies. London: C. W. Daniel, 1971.

Weeks, N. The Medical Discoveries of Edward Bach. London: C. W. Daniel, 1940.

Wheeler, Francis J. The Bach Remedies Repertory. London: C. W. Daniel, 1952.

Bach, Richard (1936–)

Writer on aviation who became famous with his book Jonathan Livingston Seagull (Macmillan, 1970; Avon, 1973), written as a result of psychic experience over a period of several years. He was a U.S. Air Force pilot from 1956 to 1959 and a technical writer for Douglas Aircraft and associate editor of Flying magazine from 1961 to 1964. Bach was also a director of the Antique Airplane Association and editor of its magazine Antiquer, and did some airplane barnstorming in the Midwest. His early books include Stranger to the Ground (1963), Biplane (1966), and Nothing by Chance: A Gypsy Pilot's Adventures in Modern America (1969).

In 1959, while living at Belmont Shore, California, Bach was walking by the waterfront when he heard a disembodied voice say "Jonathan Livingston Seagull." This was followed by a kind of daydream of a seagull flying alone at sunrise, and a realization of its significance. Bach felt impelled to write this down, using a green ballpoint pen and some old scratch paper (the only writing materials handy), and completed the first part of the story of Jonathan Livingston Seagull up to the point of Jonathan's expulsion from the flock. Not until eight years later in Iowa, 1,500 miles away, did the next section of the book come to Bach in a dream. He immediately typed it out and sent it to a magazine, but it was instantly rejected. Next he sent it to Private Pilot, which published it reluctantly at below regular rate, but the reader response was so great that the publisher demanded more seagull stories. Bach sat down at his typewriter and, with virtually no rewriting, knocked out the second and third parts of the J. L. Seagull saga, duly published as magazine stories.

The stories were published in book form through the judgment of Eleanor Friede, then an editor at Macmillan (now president of Eleanor Friede Books), who had an intuition about the book. Within two years the book sold over one million copies, was on best-seller lists for nearly a year, became a Book of the Month Club choice, was condensed by Reader's Digest books, and was translated into a dozen languages. It was banned only by the People's Republic of China for no very clear reason, but as composers Beethoven and Mozart also shared this prohibition at that time, Bach thought J. L. Seagull was in very good company.

The widespread success of Jonathan Livingston Seagull lies in its simple but inspiring allegory, with spiritual and psychic overtones. It embodies Bach's own philosophy, "Find what it is you want in the world to do, and then do it." Bach does not ascribe his inspired story to any psychic entity, in spite of the strange way it was manifested, but believes that part of his personality on an unconscious level was communicating with his everyday self. However, he has also had several psychic experiences, including out-of-the-body travel and healing.

His later books include A Gift of Wings (1974); Illusions: The Adventures of a Reluctant Messiah (1977); There's No Such Place as Far Away (1979); One (1988); Running From Safety: An Adventure of the Spirit (1995); and Out of My Mind: The Discovery of Saunders-Vixen (1999).

Sources:

Bach, Richard. Illusions: The Adventures of a Reluctant Messiah. New York: Delacorte Press, 1977.

———. Jonathan Livingston Seagull. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

———. One: A Novel. New York: William Morrow, 1988.

Bach Centre

British center for the preparation and dispensation of the remedies developed by Dr. Edward Bach (1886–1936). These were prepared from summer flowers floated on a bowl of clear stream water exposed to sunlight for three hours. Bach developed 38 remedies, one for each of the negative states of mind suffered by human beings, classified under seven group headings: fear, uncertainty, insufficient interest in present circumstances, loneliness, oversensitivity to influences and ideas, despondency or despair, and overcare for the welfare of others.

Bach, who had psychic faculties, believed that his special preparations transferred a subtle force from the flowers to the water. The sunlight released vital astral forces in the flowers, which had a positive effect on human astral forces. Bach spent his last years at a cottage on the borders of Buckinghamshire, England, which has now become the center for his remedies. Address: Bach Centre, Mount Vernon, Bakers Lane, Sotwell, Oxon, OX10 0PZ, England. Books and information relating to the flower remedies of the late Edward Bach are available at this address. The society also issues a newsletter three times a year and has an official home page: http://www.bachcentre.com/.

Sources:

Bach, Edward, and F. J. Wheeler. The Bach Flower Remedies. New Canaan, Conn.: Keats, 1977.

Chancellor, P. Handbook of the Bach Flower Remedies. London: C. W. Daniel, 1971.

Dr. Edward Bach Centre. http://www.bachcentre.com/. March 8, 2000.

Weeks, N. The Medical Discoveries of Edward Bach. London: C. W. Daniel, 1940.

Bachelor

One of the names given to Satan when he appeared in the guise of a great he-goat for the purpose of sexual intercourse with the witches.

Bacis See Bakis

Backster, Cleve (b. 1924)

Former interrogator for the CIA who became one of America's leading polygraph (lie detector) specialists. He became director of the Keeler Polygraph Institute in Chicago and later founded the Cleve Backster School of Lie Detection in Manhattan, New York. During the late 1960s, he became famous for his experiments in plant ESP, using polygraph techniques. His experiments tend to support the idea that plants are sensitive to human thoughts. Some of his experiments were sponsored by the Parapsychology Foundation and involved tests to see if plants reacted to the destruction of live cells.

Backster believed plants that had become attuned to a particular human being appeared to maintain that link wherever the person went and whatever he did. Backster concluded: "There exists an as yet undefined primary perception in plant life, that animal life termination can serve as a remotely located stimulus to demonstrate this perception capability, and that this perception facility in plants can be shown to function independently of human involvement." Procedures and results were reported in the International Journal of Parapsychology in 1968.

The Backster Research Foundation was founded to sponsor Backster's research in plant sensitivity. It was funded by a $10,000 grant from the Mary Reynolds Babcock Foundation of Winston-Salem, North Carolina. William M. Bondurant of the Babcock Foundation stated that Backster's work "indicates there may be a primary form of instantaneous communication among all living things that transcends the physical laws we know now—and that seems to warrant looking into."

While some of Backster's conclusions may seem fantastic, the sensitivity of plant life to environments is indisputable. What is unknown is how much of this sensitivity is related to any paranormal interchange. Much pioneer work in this field was investigated with delicate apparatus by the late Sir Jagadis Chunder Bose, an Indian scientist in Calcutta. The careful scientific experiments of Bose were reported in a series of papers and books, notably Response in the Living and the Non-Living (1902) and Plant Autographs and Their Revelations (1927). Drawing upon the experiments of Bose, later researchers investigated the reactions of plants when stimulated by music and dancing. The work of Cleve Backster, Bose, and others revived the whole question of plant sensitivity. While many were impressed with Backster's data, others were skeptical and suggested alternative explanations for his results while others questioned the methodology.

Sources:

Backster, Cleve. "Evidence of a Primary Perception in Plant Life." International Journal of Parapsychology 10 (1968): 329–48.

Galston, Arthur W., and Clifford L. Slayman. "Plant Sensitivity and Sensation." In Science and the Paranormal: Probing the Evidence of the Supernatural. Edited by George O. Abell and Barry Singer. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1981.

Tompkins, Peter, and Christopher Bird. The Secret Life of Plants. New York: Harper and Row, 1973.

Whitman, John. The Psychic Power of Plants. London: New English Library, 1974.

Back to Godhead (Magazine)

Monthly publication of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. Address: BTG Service Center, PO Box 255, Sandy Ridge, NC 27046. The magazine is also available on the internet at http://www.krsna.com/.

Backward Masking

A technique claimed to be used in some rock music (especially heavy metal) in order to convey secret, destructive messages. Some conservative Evangelical Christians have claimed that various words and sentences in rock music songs indicate Satanic messages when played backwards. Reversed rituals are a traditional aspect of black magic spells.

The belief in backward masking rests largely on an understanding of subliminal perception, the ability of the brain to take in and store information quite apart from any conscious realization that the information is being received. While a certain amount of subliminal learning seems possible, the idea of backward masking carries the idea to an extreme by suggesting that the brain can receive a coded message and unscramble it. While many Evangelicals believe that Satanism is a real force among contemporary youth, only a few have paid attention to the highly dubious claims concerning backward masking.

Sources:

Aranza, Jacob. Backward Masking Unmasked. Shreveport, La.: Huntington House, 1983.

Bacon, Francis (1561–1626)

Francis Bacon, generally considered the father of modern science, is also revered by modern astrologers and occultists for his incorporation of magic and the astrological arts into his worldview. Bacon was born on January 22, 1561, in London, England. He was but 12 years old when he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and three years later moved on to Gray's Inn to pursue legal studies. He was admitted to the bar in 1582. Two years previously he had been elected to Parliament. His political maneuverings would ultimately lead to his downfall. He steadily advanced in office until he offended Queen Elizabeth in 1593. He subsequently made some unfortunate political alliances but recovered during the reign of James I. He was knighted and became successively attorney general (1613), Lord Keeper (1617), and Viscount St. Albans (1621). Then at the height of his power, he was charged with taking bribes, stripped of his offices, and cast into the Tower of London.

Bacon is best remembered not for his political career, nor even the many essays he wrote on political life, but for the two works produced near the end of his life, Maga Instauratio and Novum Organum, both of which were published in 1620. In the former, he laid out a plan for the reorganization of human knowledge based on science. In the latter he produced a new natural history and laid out a program for studying nature through the empirical method. He complained that science was not moving forward because it was based in false theories derived from Aristotle and Plato rather than the observation of nature and a process of induction reasoning developed out of such observation. He thus criticized alchemy, for example, and suggested that its few successes derived from mere change occurrences.

Bacon tried to rehabilitate himself during the last few years of his life, but he died on April 9, 1626, without the full pardon he sought from the king. In the twentieth century, Rosicrucians have invoked Bacon's name in their attempt to trace a lineage of thinkers back to ancient Egypt, but there is no evidence of his association with Rosicrucianism, which had just appeared in Germany toward the end of Bacon's life. On the other hand, some modern astrologers have claimed Bacon in their drive to recast their art in a post-scientific format based upon empirical observation.

Sources:

Anderson, Fulton H. Francis Bacon: His Career and Thought. Los Angeles: University of Southern California Press, 1962.

The Works, Letters and Life of Francis Bacon. Edited by James Speddong, R. L. Ellis, and D. D. Heath. 14 vols. London: Longmans, 1857–74.

Bacon, Roger (ca. 1220–1292)

Versatile British scientist and philosopher around whom accumulated many legends of occult powers. He was born near Ilchester in Somerset, England. He entered the Order of St. Francis and studied mathematics and medicine in Oxford and Paris. Returning to England, he devoted his attention to philosophy and also wrote Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammars.

Bacon was a pioneer of astronomy and, being acquainted with the properties of lenses, may have foreshadowed the telescope. In the mechanical sciences, Bacon envisioned boats propelled without oars, cars that move without horses, and even machines that fly in the air. In the field of pure chemistry, Bacon's name is associated with the making of gunpowder, for even if the discovery cannot be wholly attributed to him, at least his experiments with niter paved its way.

His study of alchemy naturally led him to a belief in the philosophers' stone, by which gold might be purified to a degree impossible by any other means, and also to a belief in the elixir of life, which, along similar principles of purification, might fortify the human body against death. Thus man could become practically immortal, and by knowledge of the appropriate herbs or by acquaintance with planetary influences, he could experience the same consummation.

Ahead of his time, Bacon was looked on with considerable suspicion, which eventually led to persecution. The brethren of his order practically cast him out, and he was compelled to retire to Paris and to submit to a régime of repression. A prolific author, he was forbidden to write, and it was not till 1266 that Guy de Foulques, the papal legate in England—later Pope Clement IV—heard of Bacon's fame and invited him to break his enforced silence. Bacon hailed the opportunity and in spite of hardship and poverty, he finished his Opus Majus, Opus Minus, and Opus Tertium.

Clement seemed to approve of these works, because Bacon was allowed to return to Oxford, where he continued his scientific studies and the composition of scientific works. He attempted a compendium of philosophy which still exists in part, but its subject matter displeased the ruling powers, and Bacon's misfortunes began afresh. His books were burned, and again he was thrown into prison. He remained there for 14 years, during which time he probably continued to write. About 1292 he was given his liberty, however he is believed to have died shortly thereafter.

Of Bacon's works, which were numerous, many still remain in manuscript and about a dozen have been printed at various times. Many are obscure treatises on alchemy, but the works he wrote by invitation of Clement are the most important. The Opus Majus is divided into six parts treating of the causes of error, the relation between philosophy and theology, the utility of grammar, mathematical perspective, and experimental science. The Opus Minus, of which only part has been preserved, was intended to be a summary of the former work. The Opus Tertium, though written after the other two, actually serves as an introduction to them and is in part supplementary to them. These works, large though they be, were intended to be forerunners of an even greater work to examine the principles of all the sciences; however, this latter endeavor was probably little more than begun.

Although much of Bacon's work and many of his beliefs reflect the outlook of his period, in his devotion to the experimental sciences he stood far above his peers. This has led to an accretion of legendary material around Bacon's name, by virtue of which he has been regarded as a great magician. In the sixteenth century, when the study of magic was pursued with increased zeal, Friar Bacon became the subject of a popular book, entitled The History of Friar Bacon, and the subject of an often-performed play by Robert Greene, one of the dramatists of the age. The greater part of his history of Friar Bacon is evidently the invention of the writer, who lived in the time of Queen Elizabeth. He adapted some of the older traditions and fleshed out the narrative with fables taken from books of the time, including stories about two other legendary occult conjurers, Friars Bungay and Vandermast. The recital is further enlivened with the pranks of Bacon's servant, Miles.

Sources:

Bacon, Roger. The Mirror of Alchemy. Los Angeles: Press of the Pegacycle Lady, 1975.

———. The Opus Majus of Roger Bacon. 2 vols. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1928.

———. Roger Bacon's Philosophy of Nature: A Critical Edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983.

Bridges, John Henry. The Life and Work of Roger Bacon. 1914. Reprint, Merrick, N.Y.: Richwood, 1976.

Easton, Stewart C. Roger Bacon and His Search for a Universal Science. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1970.

Little, A. G. Roger Bacon Essays. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1914.

Bacoti

A common name for the augurs and sorcerers of Tonkin in Indochina. They were often consulted by the friends of deceased persons for the purpose of holding communication with the dead.

Bacstrom, Sigismond (ca. 1750–1805)

Physician who was also an alchemist and a Rosicrucian. Believed to be of Scandinavian origin, he spent some time as a ship's surgeon. While visiting the island of Mauritius, he met the mysterious occultist and alchemist Comte Louis de Chazel, who initiated him into a Societas Rosae Crucis. De Chazel owned an extensive library of occult and mystical works and a well-equipped laboratory for astronomical observations and alchemical experiments. He informed Bacstrom that he had succeeded in making the philosophers' stone and demonstrated the transmutation of quicksilver into gold. Subsequently Bacstrom lived in London and had discussions with other individuals interested in hermetic subjects. He translated a number of treatises on alchemy from German, French, and Latin into English, adding his own commentaries. His manuscript Essay on Alchemy was published in a limited edition under the title Bacstrom's Alchemical Anthology, edited by J. W. Hamilton-Jones (1960).

Bad

A jinni (or genie) of Persia (modern-day Iran), supposed to have command over the winds and tempests. He presided over the twenty-second day of the month.

Badger

To bury the foot of a badger underneath one's sleeping place is believed by Voudou worshipers and some Gypsies to excite or awaken love.

Bael

A demon cited in the Grand Grimoire; head of the infernal powers. It is with him that Johan Weyer commenced his inventory of the famous Pseudonomarchia Daemonum. He alluded to Bael as the first monarch of hell and said that his estates are situated on the eastern regions thereof. He had three heads, that of a crab, a cat, and a man. Sixty-six legions obey him.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Baggally, William Wortley (d. 1928)

Former member of the Council of the British Society for Psychical Research. He cooperated with Hereward Carrington and Everard Feilding on investigation of the phenomena of the famous medium Eusapio Palladino in Naples during 1908.

Baggally joined the Society for Psychical Research in 1896 because he was interested in establishing experimental proof of survival after death, and he was not satisfied with the standard of evidence among most Spiritualists. His knowledge and proficiency in conjuring magic made him a shrewd and intelligent investigator of psychic phenomena. He experimented with many well-known mediums, including William Eglinton, Cecil Husk, Mrs. Corner, Mary Showers, Etta Wriedt, and the stage performers Julius and Mrs. Zancig. Baggally died March 14, 1928.

Sources:

Baggally, W. W., Everard Fielding, and Hereward Carrington. "Report on a Series of Sittings with Eusapia Palladino." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, 23 (1909): 309.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bagnall, (Reginald) Oscar (Gartside) (b. 1893)

British pioneer of aura research. Born March 28, 1893, in Berkshire, England, he was educated at Malvern and Magdalene College, Cambridge, where he read natural sciences (biology, chemistry, and physics) and took his degree in science. After the outbreak of World War I, he left Magdalene to take a commission but was released from active service due to an injury. He returned to Magdalene for advanced studies, working as a schoolmaster and coaching young students for medical examinations.

While a professional biologist, he researched color, as a result of which he became interested in the phenomenon of human radiations. He experimented with dye screens in relation to the mechanics of human vision and in particular the effects of dicyanin, which had been studied by pioneer Walter J. Kilner, author of the book The Human Atmosphere; or, The Aura Made Visible by the Aid of Chemical Screens (1911).

Bagnall's own valuable book, The Origin and Properties of the Human Aura (1937), is also a major study of the subject and validates many of Kilner's findings. Both Kilner and Bagnall brought the phenomena, formerly limited to study by psychics and occultists, onto firmer scientific ground. Since then, modern interest in aura research has been stimulated by the discovery of the Kirlian aura.

Sources:

Bagnall, Oscar. The Origin and Properties of the Human Aura. 1937. Rev. ed. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Bagoe

A pythoness (priestess of Delphi in ancient Greece) who is believed to have been the Erithryean sibyl. She is said to have been the first woman to have practiced the diviner's art. She practiced in Tuscany and judged all events by the sound of thunder. Some identify Bagoe with Bigois, another Tuscan sorcerer.

Bagommedes

A knight mentioned by the poet Gautier in the Conte du Graal (a medieval version of the Holy Grail legend). It is said that he was fastened to a tree by Kay and left hanging head downward until released by Perceval. On Bagommedes' return to the court, he challenged Kay but was prevented by King Arthur from slaying him.

The Baha'i Faith

A world religious body dating from mid-nineteenth century Persia (now Iran). Founded out of Shia Islam, which dominates the religious life of Iran, the Baha'i Faith projected a broad view of the oneness of mankind and coming unity of different religions.

Members of the Baha'i Faith generally look upon three major figures as founding influences on the new religion. Mirza Ali Muhammad (1819–1850), known as the Bab, or "Gate," of revelation, founded a movement in Persia in the 1840s based upon the belief that the promised madhi, the successor of Muhammad, was at hand. Most followers believed the Bab to be the madhi. However, he was martyred in 1850.

Two years later, an attempt on the life of the Shah of Persia by a follower of the Bab released further persecutions. Mirza Husayn Ali (1817–1892) was among those imprisoned. During his four months of confinement he came to believe that he was the Holy One predicted by the Bab, though he confided that insight to only a few. He, his family, and many of the Bab's followers were exiled—first to Baghdad, then Adrianople, Constantinople, and eventually in a prison at Acre (now Israel). In 1863, after being moved from Baghdad, he declared his new revelation, and from that time forward people began to recognize him as Bah'u'llah, the Glory of God. Baha'u'llah spent the rest of his life under house arrest in Acre, where he composed the majority of his writings, now considered as scripture by the movement.

Baha'u'llah's son, Abbas Effendi (1844–1921), known as Abdu'l-Baha (or Servant of Baha), is considered the exemplar of the faith. Like his father he was confined at Acre until 1908, when he was released following the Revolution of the Young Turks. He was then able to oversee the worldwide spread of the Baha'i Faith. He was in turn succeeded by his grandson, Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957), considered the guardian of the faith. The writings of the Bab, Baha'u'llah, and Abdu'-Baha are considered scripture by followers of the faith, and those of Shoghi Effendi as infallible commentary.

The teachings of the Faith are universalist, based on the claim that divine revelation is continuous and that the Baha'i Faith is the culmination of the world's major religions. The Baha'i Faith proclaims the unity of God and His Prophets, upholds the principle of an unfettered search after truth, condemns all forms of superstition and prejudice, and teaches that the fundamental purpose of religion is to promote concord and harmony. Religion must go hand-in-hand with science, as it constitutes the sole and ultimate basis of a peaceful, ordered, and progressive society. Baha'i followers believe in the principle of equal opportunity, rights, and privileges for both sexes; compulsory education; and the abolishment of extremes of poverty and wealth. Work performed in the spirit of service is considered of equal rank to worship. The Faith has become part of the international peace movement and in that regard recommends the adoption of an auxiliary international language, and the formation of the necessary agencies for establishing and safeguarding a permanent and universal peace.

The Baha'i Faith has its international headquarters in Haifa, Israel, and membership now extends to 300 countries and territories, where centers have been established. They remain a minority in contemporary Iran and were among the losers in the revolution that resulted in the departure of the shah in 1979. Many Baha'is were persecuted and executed under the conservative rule of Ayatollah Khomeini. In the United States, the Baha'i National Center is located in Wilmette, Illinois; readings are given from the sacred scriptures in a large and beautiful House of Worship, and the facilities are available for individual worship and meditation. The quarterly journal World Order is published by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the U.S. national center at 536 Sheridan Rd., Wilmette, Illinois 60091. In Britain, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the U.K. is at 27 Rutland Gate, London S.W.7, England.

Sources:

Faizi, Gloria. The Baha'i Faith: An Introduction. New Delhi, India: Baha'i Publishing Trust, 1988.

Hatcher, William S., and J. Douglas Martin. The Baha'i Faith. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984.

Perkins, Mary, and Philip Hainsworth. The Baha'i Faith. London: Ward Lock Educational, 1980.

Stockman, Robert H. The Baha'i Faith in America: Origins, 1892–1900. Wilmette, Ill.: Baha'i Publishing Trust, 1985.

Bahaman

A jinni (or genie) who, according to Persian tradition, appeased anger; governed oxen, sheep, and all animals of a peaceful disposition.

Bahir

("Brightness"). A mystical Hebrew treatise of the twelfth or thirteenth century, the work of a French rabbi named Isaac ben Abraham of Posquières, commonly called "Isaac the Blind." (See Kabala)

Baia

Baia, a town in ancient Italy northwest of Naples, was the site of a famous oracle of the dead, accounts of which appear in Virgil's Aenead and in the writings of Strabo (63 B.C.E.–24 C.E.). It was located close to another oracle famous for its prophecies located at Cuma. Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.) resided close by and noted that Aenead had once visited the site where he contacted the spirit or shade of his father.

The oracle site was an elaborate underground structure carved out of the ground rock. The inquirer would pay heavily for the privilege of seeking contact with someone who had died, and would become involved in a complex process. The ordeal would begin with a three-day waiting period in a room decorated with various images of the afterlife. The person would then be led before an altar where a ewe would be sacrificed and its entrails used for divination (a practice termed extispicy), the purpose being the discernment of whether the continuance of the process would bring success. Once success appeared assured, the inquirer would be led deeper into the underground complex that was made to recreate the Underworld as understood in Greek/Roman mythology.

The next stage of inquiry would begin with a bath, a time of meditation, and a second bath. Dressed in a white tunic, he/she would then be led into a recreation of the Underworld, beginning with a descent by ladder into a round chamber and then into the long descending passageway to the heart of the temple structure. The inquirer would eventually arrive at an underground body of water (the River Styx), and be rowed across by someone representing the ferryman Charon. On the other side was Cerberus, the three-headed Hound of Hell. The passageway then took the inquirer to the Inner Sanctuary where a branch of mistletoe was offered to Persephone, the goddess married to the God of the Underworld. Once inside the inner sanctum, contact with the dead would be made, though the exact process is not known. The inquirer would then be led back to the surface.

During the reign of Augustus in the first century B.C.E., the Roman admiral Marcus Agrippa, for reasons not altogether clear, destroyed the oracle. He cut the sacred grove of trees that surrounded the entrance to the oracle and blocked the tunnels and entrances in a successful attempt to prevent any future activity at the underground site. Lost to memory, it was rediscovered in the twentieth century by two amateur archeologists, Robert F. Paget and Keith W. Jones.

There has been some conjecture that various accounts of the visit to the underworld described in ancient literature, such as Ulysses' visit recounted in Homer's Odyssey, may be accounts of visits to Baia. If that were the case, Baia would be the actual source of the description of the Underworld in the ancient literature rather than a recreation of the Underworld drawn from popular belief.

Sources:

Paget, Robert F. In the Footsteps of Orpheus: The Discovery of the Ancient Greek Underworld. London: Robet Hale, 1967.

Temple, Robert K. G. Conversations with Eternity: Ancient Man's Attempt to Know the Future. London: Rider, 1984.

Virgil. Virgil: The Pastoral Poems. Translated by E. V. Reiu. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1967.

Baian (or Baianus)

Son of Simeon, king of the Bulgarians of 970 C.E., and a mighty magician, who was said to transform himself into a wolf whenever he desired. He could also adopt other shapes and render himself invisible. A primary example of what is termed a werewolf, he is alluded to by Jean de Nynauld in his book De la lycanthropie (Paris, 1615).

Bailey, Alice A(nne) (LaTrobe-Bateman) (1880–1949)

A noted Theosophist who later founded her own Arcane School of esoteric teaching. Bailey was born June 16, 1880, in Manchester, England. An unhappy childhood led her to attempt suicide; however, at the age of 15, a mysterious stranger wearing a turban walked into her room, sat beside her, and stated that she should prepare herself for an important mission. For many years she believed her visitor was Jesus Christ, but later she saw a picture on the wall at the Theosophical Society, which she knew to be the stranger. It was Koot Hoomi, one of the mysterious mahatmas claimed to have inspired and communicated with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

Bailey was raised in the Church of England, and after attending finishing school in London, she worked for the Young Women's Christian Association. She spent some time in India with the YWCA and at a soldier's home there she met Walter Evans. They married in 1907 and moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, where Walter studied for the Episcopal priesthood at Lane Theological Seminary. After graduation, they moved to California, but the marriage was an unhappy one; eventually they divorced. Like Annie Besant, who also had an unhappy marriage with an Anglican clergymen, the emotional ordeal of marital breakdown culminated in an interest in Theosophy.

In the case of Alice Bailey, she was introduced to Theosophy by friends in Pacific Grove, California. She was attracted by the Theosophical concepts of a spiritual hierarchy, karma, and reincarnation. She joined the society and moved to the headquarters at Krotona in 1917, where she edited the society's periodical, the Messenger, and became friendly with Foster Bailey, national secretary of the society.

In November 1919 while walking in the hills, Bailey was contacted by another spiritual master, Djual Khul, who came to be known as "The Tibetan." He requested her to be his amanuensis for a series of books, to be dictated telepathically. The first book, titled Initiation, Human and Solar commenced in 1920, and over the next 30 years some 18 other books were produced. She married Foster Bailey in 1920.

The production of the "Tibetan" books and the charge by Alice Bailey that the society was dominated by the Esoteric Section led to disagreements, and both Bailey and her husband left the society. They founded the Lucis Trust to publish the books and the magazine Beacon. In 1923 they founded the Arcane School to disseminate spiritual teachings. The school became an international organization, branching into special groups. The New Group of World Servers was dedicated to uniting people of goodwill in the goal of creating a new world civilization. Triangles evolved as a spiritual service through groups of three individuals uniting with others.

The books of the Tibetan promoted the ideal of a forthcoming world religion uniting East and West, and the Arcane School developed special prayers and meditations, such as the "Full Moon Meditation" and the "Great Invocation," toward this goal. Another theme arising from the Tibetan writings was the reappearance of the Christ. After the death of Alice Bailey in 1949, the Arcane School split into several groups. Foster Bailey headed the Arcane School and the Lucis Trust until his death in 1977. The work is currently headed by the Baileys' daughter, Mary Bailey.

Sources:

Bailey, Alice A. The Unfinished Autobiography of Alice A. Bailey. New York: Lucis Publishing, 1951.

———. Works. New York: Lucis Publishing, New York, various dates.

Sinclair, John R. The Alice Bailey Inheritance. Wellingborough, England: Turnstone Press, 1984.

Thirty Years' Work. New York: Lucis Publishing, n.d.

Bailey, Charles (1870–1947)

Famous apport medium of Melbourne, Australia, discussed for years both in Australia and in Europe. Though repeatedly caught in fraud, he was able to continue work with a small group of believers until shortly before his death. Bailey was a bootmaker by trade when he began his mediumship in 1889. For many years he was the private medium of Thomas Welton Stanford, a Melbourne millionaire, who made a collection of Bailey's apports, the first museum of its kind. It is preserved at Stanford University, Palo Alto, California, to which he gave an endowment of $50,000 for psychical research in 1911.

Public attention for Bailey's phenomena was aroused in 1902 by accounts published in the Harbinger of Light. In 1904 the records of a long series of experiments appeared in Rigid Tests of the Occult by Dr. C. W. McCarthy, one of the leading medical men of Sydney. The conditions of these experiments were severe. The medium was searched, stripped, sometimes dressed in a new suit, tied up in a sealed sack, with openings for the hands to hold the apported object; on special occasions the sitters were also searched and the medium was enclosed in a cage with close mosquito netting. The doors were locked or sealed, no furniture was kept in the room except chairs and a table, the fireplace was blocked, and the only second floor window was papered.

Immediately after Bailey went into trance, the controls took charge of the phenomena. The chief control was a "Dr. Whitcombe," sometime physician in Melbourne. Another, "Dr. Robinson," claimed to have been professor of Syro-Chaldaic literature in New York. The apport of old coins and Babylonian clay tablets with cuneiform inscriptions were apparently due to him. A third control was a Hindu named "Abdul." It was he who actually brought the apports. A few minutes were sufficient, and when light was produced, the medium was found to hold a live bird and a nest in each hand. Many of these birds were kept for days in cages. Sometimes they disappeared as mysteriously as they came, and sometimes they died in captivity.

Once a live, shovel-nosed shark, 18 inches long, was brought in. A crab, with dripping seaweed, was similarly apported. Another time a long snake was found coiling around the medium's neck. On being covered with a cloth it disappeared in full light. Undercover apports sometimes appeared in good visibility, or were seen to drop from a height away from the medium. In McCarthy's cap, after being covered by a handkerchief, a turtle was discovered. Another time he found a jewel in his hand under a palm leaf.

The clay tablets and the Egyptian and Indian coins that Bailey apported in abundance were submitted by McCarthy to the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities of the British Museum. The tablets were pronounced imitations and the coins genuine but of no rarity or value.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle related his personal experiences with Bailey in the History of Spiritualism (1926), adding that on further inquiry it was found that these forgeries were made by certain Jews in a suburb of Baghdad. He voiced the opinion that a forgery, steeped in recent human magnetism, may be more capable of being handled by the invisible operators than the originals, which have to be searched for in mounds. Bailey produced at least 100 such tablets and told Doyle that they were passed as genuine by the British Museum.

At the sitting in question, besides an Assyrian tablet, Bailey apported a jungle sparrow's nest with an egg in it. The nest was two inches high and showed no sign of any flattening, which ought to have been the case had it been concealed on the medium's person.

On Marco Falcomer's intervention, the Milan Society for Psychical Studies made arrangements with Bailey for a European visit. From February to April 1904, 17 sittings were held in Milan. Bailey was put in a sleeved-sack of thin black satin. The sack was fastened at the neck and wrist with tapes. The tapes were tied and the knots were sealed. His coat and boots were taken off, and the investigators felt over his body, especially in hollow parts where objects could be hidden. Bailey, however, refused to allow himself to be entirely undressed, saying he was afraid of catching cold.

The apports consisted mostly of small articles: two or three live birds; a fish with an acrid, penetrating, saline odor; and a Babylonian tablet enveloped in a hard coating of sand. Some of the birds, nests, and eggs disappeared before the end of the séance. In the dark Bailey demonstrated the rapid growth of a seed in a flower pot and the presence of phosphorescent lights and luminous shapes. The committee's desire to have a specially designated object transported from one room to another was not realized.

The report, signed by Mr. Baccigaluppi, A. Brioschi, Dr. Clericetti, O. Cipriana, Dr. F. Ferrari, A. Marzorati, Odorico, Redealli, and Dr. E. Griffini, stated:

"The Committee . . . whilst it deplores (a) the medium's strange obstinacy in refusing to consent to allow himself to be thoroughly undressed; (b) having been obliged to submit to conditions of total darkness at the critical moment of the apport; (c) having been unable, because of the short time accorded the research and in consequence of the very nature even of the phenomena, to apply any method which might enable the Committee to state, precisely and scientifically, the process and origin of the phenomena in question, is on the other hand obliged to state (i) that during the course of seventeen seances, notwithstanding the search of the medium's person by different individuals and by various methods, nothing has ever been found which might justify the hypothesis of fraud; that even admitting that for some of the phenomena an approximate explanation might be found, as far as others are concerned—e.g., the apport of living birds, the instantaneous disappearance of a small bird, etc.—it does not seem possible to formulate a likely explanation; (ii) that, moreover, the hypothesis of suggestion becomes inadmissible if we take into consideration the number of experimenters, who were constantly being changed and who were differently seated each time, as well as the material traces which were left of the phenomena. Given this, the Committee, whilst making reserves on the archaeological value of certain apports, believes it is able, in principle, to come to a conclusion in favor of the objectivity of the facts, and calls the attention of science to these phenomena which find no sufficient explanation in recognised laws."

From Milan Bailey went on to Rome. After giving two seances to Lady Butt he returned to Australia. Because the Milan findings were criticized in many quarters, plans were set afoot to induce Bailey to make a second European visit. It took some years until the plan materialized.

On the invitation of Col. Eugene A. D. Rochas and W. Reichel, Bailey came to Grenoble, where disaster overtook him. In a séance held on February 20, 1910, two small live birds were produced. A local dealer recognized in Bailey the man who bought three similar birds from him two days previously. The investigators claimed that he concealed the birds in his intestinal opening as Bailey did not allow them to make examination there. Matters were made worse by the statement of the Hindu control that the birds came directly from India.

In 1911, under the auspices of Mrs. Foster-Turner, Bailey came to London. In a test séance on July 6 before a committee selected by Dr. Abraham Wallace in which the Society for Psy- chical Research was represented by two well-known members, Bailey was undressed, examined, and shut into a cage. Several controls came, a Hindu took possession, but when addressed in Hindustani by a professor of Oriental languages, he immediately subsided into broken English. Later a bird nest appeared in the medium's hand. The control, however, tore it asunder. Two small eggs were also produced but they were broken by the control when passing them to a member of the committee. After the séance, the committee desired to examine the medium's boots more thoroughly, but he left the house, and as a result an unfavorable verdict was returned. On July 28, at another test sitting, during a period of complete darkness, two small birds appeared between the mosquito netting that enveloped the medium and the cabinet. However, toward the end of the sitting the medium toppled over, and in falling he tore the network, so the verdict was again "not proven" (Light September 1911; Journal of the Society for Psychical Research Vols. 12 & 15).

Back in Sydney there was another exposure scandal on March 5, 1914. One of the sitters made a grab at a materialized form and caught hold of the drapery. It was wrenched from his hand, and the medium, sick and dazed, was carried to Dr. MacCarthy for medical aid. In the same year Bailey sat for six weeks in Rothesay, Scotland, for a circle selected by James Coates. Coates reported in Light (August 1, 1914) that Bailey was not only a genuine but a unique medium. They obtained apports: ruby sand and an Indian sparrow's nest containing two eggs. The eggs were in Coates's possession for two weeks, and after being blown, the contents were found fresh. Bailey was also induced to try a trumpet. "The personal indication of the voices was most convincing." Impressions of hands and feet were also obtained on plasticine.

In Psychic Research (June 1931), Harry Price published extracts from a letter written to him by H. L. Williams, a retired magistrate from the Punjab. According to this, Bailey was still active and produced such objects as "a Saracen helmet of scale armour, each scale (3,000 of them) a silver coin with inscription; 30 to 40 Chinese carved figures in ivory of exquisite workmanship and draped in silk arranged to represent a royal court, a complete mandarin's robe which a friend of Williams saw fall from the ceiling, live birds . . . Babylonian cuneiform tablets . . . punic tablets, faience figures from Egypt, cut and polished stone and coins, coins in gold, silver, and copper with inscriptions in Sanskrit, Persian, and Arabic; plaster casts of hands and feet of adults and children obtained from materialisations, etc. Williams says that half the homes of Sydney are stocked with these apports." Bailey held daily seances and charged a small fee only. It could not possibly cover the cost of fraudulently producing such a wide variety of apports.

Bailey's phenomena confounded many psychic researchers in his own day. Given the more skeptical perspective produced by continuous observation of physical mediums, of which only a few remain, and the revelations of mediums like M. Lamar Keene, it is difficult to see in Bailey anything other than a clever stage magician and in the favorable reports of some observers as the observations of those less competent in detecting fraud. The simple fact remains that no one has been able to produce apports under anything resembling controlled conditions, and their existence is highly doubtful.

However, it seems that Bailey continued to give seances in the late 1930s. According to Two Worlds (July 9, 1937), the author and playwright H. Dennis Bradley communicated in a circle in Manly, Australia, March 25, 1937, at which Charles Bailey was the medium, and a "fraud-proof" instrument, the "Shastaphone," was used.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Cassele, 1926.

Irwin, H. J. "Charles Bailey: A Biographical Study of the Australian Apport Medium." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 54 (1987): 97.

Keene, M. Lamar. The Psychic Mafia. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1976.

McCarthy, C. W. Rigid Tests of the Occult. Melbourne, Australia: Stephens, 1904.

"Mediumship of Mr. C. Bailey." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 12 (1905): 77, 109.

Bailey, E. H. (1876–1959)

E. H. Bailey was a pioneer British astrologer first attracted to the practice after reading one of the popular astrological almanacs published by Zadkiel (pseudonym of Richard James Morrison). He was born on November 29, 1876, and as a young man went to work with Alan Leo, who had opened the Astrology Publishing Company, the first successful modern business enterprise built around astrology. In 1904, Bailey started his own magazine, Destiny, but it was short-lived. He later became the editor of the British Journal of Astrology.

As his appreciation of astrology matured, Bailey became interested in the problem of what astrologers call the prenatal epoch, i.e., determining the time of an individual's conception. There were methods, some quite ancient, for determining the date of conception from the date of birth, and from those dates making an estimate of the time of birth if otherwise unknown. The time of birth is a necessary bit of information in constructing anything but the most superficial of birth charts and offering a detailed astrological reading.

Bailey collected a significant amount of data from public records and worked with several friendly obstetricians over a period of years to produce his most famous book, The Prenatal Epoch, in 1916. Astrologers paid attention to the topic during the era between the two World Wars, but during the postwar era have turned to other methods for rectifying charts in those minimal number of cases where birth records are nonexistent. Bailey was named a fellow of the Astrological Society of America. He died on June 4, 1959.

Sources:

Bailey, E. H. The Prenatal Epoch. N.p.: The Author, 1916.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Baker, Douglas M. (1922–)

Poet, scientist, and author of popular books on esoteric and occult subjects. He studied medicine and qualified at Sheffield University, England. Preferring to work in complete freedom, he never registered, despite being fully qualified as a medical practitioner. He prefers to use natural energies and remedies without recourse to drugs.

He is concerned with more than 50 different groups in the United States and Britain and has lectured widely on such subjects as reincarnation, life after death, astral projection, the third eye, powers latent in man, esoteric astrology, etc. He is chancellor and director of studies at Claregate College, England, teaching the subjects on which he lectures.

Bakis (or Bacis)

Derived from a Greek term for "speaker," used as a general term for prophets and oracles in ancient Greece from the eighth to sixth century B.C.E. There were three well-known oracles bearing that name who are mentioned by Suidas, the first a Boeotian, the second an Arcadian, and the third an Athenian. The most famous one was from Boeotia and was supposed to have been inspired by the nymphs of the Corycian caves. His oracular verses were said to have been impressively fulfilled. He is cited by Herodotus and Pausanias.

Balan

According to Johan Weyer, a great and terrible demon monarch among the infernal powers. He has three heads, those of a bull, a man, and a ram. Joined to these by the tail is a serpent, the eyes of which burn with fire. Balan rides an enormous bear. He commands 40 of the infernal legions and rules over finesse, ruses, and middle courses.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1991.

Balasius

A precious stone with occult virtues. According to Camillus Leonardus (sixteenth century), it is "of a purple or rosy color, and by some is called the placidus or pleasant. Some think it is the carbuncle diminished in its color and virtue; just as the virtue of the female differs from that of the male. It is often found that the external part of one and the same stone appears a balasius, and the internal a carbuncle, from whence comes the saying that the balasius is the carbuncle's house. The virtue of the balasius is to overcome and repress vain thoughts and luxury; to reconcile quarrels among friends; and it befriends the human body with a good habit of health. Being bruised and drunk with water, it relieves infirmities in the eyes, and gives help in disorders of the liver; and what is still more surprising, if you touch the four corners of a house, garden or vineyard, with the balasius, it will preserve them from lightning, tempest, and worms."

Balcoin, Marie

A sorceress of the Basque-speaking Pays de Labourd who attended an infernal sabbat in the reign of Henry IV of France. The indictment against her alleged that she had eaten the ear of a little child at the sabbatic meeting. For her numerous sorceries she was condemned to be burned.

Balfour, Arthur James (1st Earl of Balfour) (1848–1930)

British prime minister, classical scholar, and one of the most brilliant and eminent students of psychical research. In 1882, through his sister, the wife of Henry Sidgwick (first president of the Society for Psychical Research), he became interested in psychic phenomena and the question of survival. In 1893 he became president of the Society for Psychical Research, serving his term between two periods as vice-president, from 1882 to 1892 and from 1895 to 1930. (His brother, the Rt. Hon. Gerald W. Balfour, another keen student of psychical research, was president of the Society for Psychical Research from 1906 to 1907.)

Born July 25, 1848, at Whittinghame, East Lothian, Scotland, Balfour was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge University (M.A.). He was awarded honorary degrees in law and philosophy by British, American, and Polish universities. From 1874 to 1885, he was a member of the British Parliament, and after holding various official posts, he became prime minister (1902–05), first lord of the admiralty (1915–16), and foreign secretary (1916–19).

In the field of psychical research, he held many sittings with Mrs. Willett (W. M. S. Coombe-Tennant). He died March 19, 1930, in Surrey, England. It is reported that as he lay dying, he remarked, "I am longing to get to the other side to see what it's like."

Sources:

Balfour, Arthur James. Chapters of Autobiography. London: Cassell, 1930.

———. The Foundations of Belief. 8th ed. London: Longmans, Green, 1906.

———. Science, Religions, and Reality. London: Sheldon Press, 1925.

———. Theism and Humanism. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1915.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Prince, Walter Franklin. Noted Witnesses for Psychical Research. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Balfour, Gerald William (2nd Earl of Balfour) (1853–1945)

Brother of Arthur J. Balfour, first earl of Balfour. He was a statesman, classical scholar, and student of psychical research. He joined the Society for Psychical Research soon after its formation and served as president from 1906 to 1907.

Born April 9, 1853, at Whittinghame, Scotland, Balfour was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge University (M.A.). In 1887 he married Lady Betty, daughter of the first earl of Lytton. He was elected member of Parliament for Central Leeds from 1885 to 1906 and held various government posts; he was also private secretary to his brother.

Like his brother, he was very active in psychical research and also took an important part in organizing and studying the group of automatic writings concerned with "cross-correspondence" evidence. He published a number of valuable papers in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, including "The Earl of Dionysius," a study of a cross-correspondence case presenting evidence for survival. He died January 14, 1945, at Whittinghame.

Sources:

Balfour, Gerald W. "The Ear of Dionysius: Further Scripts Affording Evidence of Personal Survival." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 29, no. 74 (1916–18).

———. "Some Recent Scripts Affording Evidence of Personal Survival." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 27, no. 69 (1915).

———. "A Study of the Psychological Aspects of Mrs. Willet's Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 43, no. 140 (1935).

Ballard, Edna Ann Wheeler (1886–1971)

Leader of the I AM Movement and cofounder of the Saint Germain Foundation. Ballard was born on June 25, 1886, in Burlington, Iowa. She studied harp, and by 1912 she had become a concert harpist, on one occasion playing for the duke of Wales. She married Guy W. Ballard in 1916; they had one son, Donald, born in 1918.

During the 1920s she shared an interest with her husband in the occult and worked for a time in the Philosopher's Nook, a Chicago occult bookstore, and edited the American Occultists.

In 1930 Guy Ballard was at Mt. Shasta, California, where he had an encounter with a mysterious being, described as an "ascended master" named Saint Germain. He wrote about his experiences and sent letters to Edna Ballard in Chicago describing them.

After his return to Chicago in 1931 she joined with him in founding the Saint Germain Foundation and the Saint Germain Press, the two main organizational expressions of the I AM Religious Activity, and assumed the role beside him as an "accredited messenger of the ascended masters." Through most of the 1930s she took a secondary role in the organization. Guy Ballard allowed Saint Germain and other masters to speak through him almost daily.

Guy Ballard died in 1939, and Edna and her son, Donald, took control of the movement, but neither operated as a messenger. Shortly after taking control, she, Donald, and a number of the national staff were charged with mail fraud. Acting on accusations of several former adherents, the government contended that the leaders were defrauding people by selling them a religion they knew to be false.

Edna Ballard was convicted, had the ruling overturned, and was then convicted a second time. In 1944 the Supreme Court ruled in one of its most famous decisions (United States v. Ballard) that people cannot be made to prove their religious beliefs in a court of law. It took several subsequent court actions over the next decade to completely undo the damage that had been inflicted upon the movement by the original conviction.

During the 1950s, Edna Ballard began to function as a messenger. For the rest of her life she periodically brought new messages from the masters (more than two thousand of whom were recorded). She had a radio show for a while during the 1960s.

After Ballard's death on February 10, 1971, in Chicago, leadership of the Saint Germain Foundation and the Saint Germain Press passed to the board of directors and to several "appointed messengers" who had served as teachers within the movement (though never as direct instruments of the masters, as had the Ballards).

Sources:

Braden, Charles S. These Also Believe. New York: Macmillan, 1949.

Ballard, Guy Warren (1878–1939)

Cofounder with his wife Edna W. Ballard of the I AM Religious Activity and the Saint Germain Foundation. He was born in Newton, Kansas, on July 28, 1878, attended business college, and held several mining jobs prior to his marriage in 1916. He settled in Chicago, but his work carried him across the United States. In 1930 he found himself in northern California, near the small community of Mt. Shasta. While walking on the side of a volcanic mountain, he met, according to his later published account, Ascended Master Saint Germain.

Saint Germain identified himself as a member of the Great White Brotherhood, the group of evolved adepts believed to guide the destiny of humankind. He was looking for an appropriate person to whom he could give the message that would usher in a new age on earth. Ballard, his wife, and their son Donald were appointed Messengers of the Masters. The Masters began to speak to and through (in a process very similar to what is today termed channeling) Ballard. The story of his initial encounters and early messages, which provided the basic I AM teachings, were later presented as the first six volumes of I AM books. The first volume, Unveiled Mysteries, issued under the pen name Godfre Ray King, appeared in 1934.

Ballard informed his wife of what had happened to him in a set of letters from Mt. Shasta, and upon his return to Chicago, they founded the Saint Germain Foundation and Saint Germain Press. The teachings centered upon the announcement of the existence of and the evocation of the I AM Presence, the spirit of God in each individual. A series of mantric-like prayers called decrees were advocated as the means of such evocation.

The I AM movement was one of the most successful, flamboyant, and controversial of the late 1930s. At its height, however, Ballard unexpectedly died on December 29, 1939. His death created an immediate problem as some expectation had spread through the movement that he would not die but physically ascend. Several years after his death his wife and son and many of the leaders of the movement were the subject of a landmark judicial process initiated by several ex-members who questioned the sincerity of the movement. The process resulted in a 1944 Supreme Court ruling which suggested that it was not legitimate for government to place a religion, no matter how nonconventional, on trial.

Sources:

King, Godfre Ray [Guy W. Ballard]. The "I AM" Discourses. Chicago: St. Germain Press, 1935.

———. The Magic Presence. Chicago: St. Germain Press, 1935.

———. Unveiled Mysteries. Chicago: St. Germain Press, 1934.

Ballinspittle (Moving Statue)

Ballinspittle is a village in county Cork, Ireland, and the site of a reported paranormal moving statue of the Virgin Mary. In the same year, 1985, many statues of the Virgin Mary throughout Ireland were reported to be moving. The first reports began in Asdee, county Kerry, on February 14, when several children claimed to have seen a statue of the Madonna and Child at the parish church of St. Mary open its eyes and move its hands. Other people confirmed that they had seen movements.

In July two teenage girls reported seeing movement in a statue of the Virgin Mary at Ballinspittle, in a grotto some 20 feet up the side of a hill. This was a Marian year shrine, and the statue was illuminated by a halo of 11 electric lights.

Within days of the first reports, thousands of pilgrims visited Ballinspittle every night, some traveling hundreds of miles. At regular intervals prayers were spoken on a public address system and the people joined in. Each night many people claimed that they saw the statue move in some way. The most commonly reported movements included changes of countenance, superimposition of other sacred faces, opening and closing of eyes, movements of the hands, and rocking to and fro.

Ballinspittle and its moving statue rapidly became a media event, reported and discussed in newspapers and on radio and television. Among the many thousands of visitors to the shrine were journalists, camera operators, priests, nuns, doctors, lawyers, engineers, housewives, and ordinary people from all walks of life. Surprisingly, even hardened skeptics reported seeing movement. On one occasion a gang of Hell's Angels motorcyclists stood quietly at the shrine, and although they did not believe that the statue moved, they blessed themselves before putting back their crash helmets and driving off.

Naturally enough the church hierarchy became somewhat concerned. While appreciating the devout atmosphere created by many pilgrims at an open-air shrine, ecclesiastics believed that regular church attendance would be a more practical demonstration of faith. The bishop of Killala stated, "We don't mind people gathering together to pray, but we want them to go into the church to do it." Moreover many people visited the shrine out of mere curiosity or even skepticism; others criticized what they regarded as mass hysteria. Bishop Michael Murphy of Cork warned that "common sense would demand that we approach the claims made concerning the grotto in Ballinspittle with prudence and caution," but he also relished the fact that "crowds are gathering there in a great spirit of prayer."

Nobody denied that the statue itself was a purely material construction. It was a standard five-foot eight-inch Lourdes model cast in concrete. The statue maker, Maurice O'Donnell, recalled, "Her hands are reinforced with wire, and I remember the day she left the works for Ballinspittle. I was making so many at that time there was no time to dry them out before painting, so lots of statues in the shrines around the country are still unpainted. But that was in the Marian Year, 1954. The bottom has dropped out of the statues market since the Vatican Council."

But in 1985, these statues were reported to be moving in shrines all over the country. Not everyone took the moving statues seriously. With characteristic irreverent wit, Irish comedian Brendan Grace recorded a humorous song titled "Is That You Moving?" A new play was written by Brigid McLoughlin titled "Moving Statues." McLoughlin stated that the play "sends up the rituals and double-standards of Catholicism in Ireland."

Although many people claimed that the statue actually moved physically, it seems clear that the majority of reported movements were imaginary. Some may have been related to what psychologists call "eidetic imagery," in which prolonged staring may combine with imaginary mental imagery to produce an illusion. A team of psychologists from Cork University College established that the phenomena did not register on film or motion sensors. Other observers talked of optical illusions, autosuggestion, or mass hallucination. But to many people, the question of physical or visionary movement seemed irrelevant in the highly spiritually charged atmosphere of the grotto. For them, the real movement was one of the soul. On July 31, a 37-year-old Cork housewife named Frances O'Riordan, who had been completely deaf since age 20, claimed that she had her hearing restored during a visit to the Ballinspittle grotto.

With the sudden influx of thousands of visitors and journalists, telephone kiosks were installed at the grotto, as were two concrete toilets. Special bus services were organized, but there was no commercial exploitation of the grotto. The crowds continued to throng at the shrine for over three months, until on Halloween, October 31, there was a sudden and brutal affront to the respect and devotion of the pilgrims.

Three men drove up in a car. Two of them strode swiftly to the shrine, jumped over the fence, and hacked away at the statue with an axe and a hammer, completely destroying the face and severely damaging the hands. The third man calmly took photographs. The spectators were too stunned and horrified to intervene. Someone said, "You must be from Satan to do such a thing!" The men laughed and said, "Well, you're worse to be adoring false gods." They then drove off in their car. Local people linked the attack to a religious sect that had scattered leaflets at the grotto, stating that people should adore the head of Christ in their local churches. Three men were later arrested and charged with malicious damage to the statue. Meanwhile prayers were said at the grotto, and people claimed to have seen the defaced statue continue to move.

The grotto committee arranged for the statue to be repaired, and since its reinstatement at the grotto, pilgrims have still assembled there.

Meanwhile the three men who had been arrested after the Ballinspittle incident were identified as Robert Draper, Roy Murphy, and Anthony Fowler, members of the Faith Center Movement, a Pentecostal Christian church of American evangelist Dr. Gene Scott of Los Angeles, California. The three men were tried at Portlaoise Circuit Court on Tuesday, March 4, 1986, before a Judge O'Higgins and charged with "causing malicious damage in a place of divine worship." The judge stated that he had to be "particularly zealous in guarding the rights of the three defendants" and dismissed the case on the grounds that the Ballinspittle grotto is not, in fact, a place of divine worship. To the defendants, of course, it was a place of sinful idolatry.

Robert Draper, who wielded the axe and hammer at Ballinspittle, emerged from the courtroom triumphantly proclaiming that he was going to demolish other images in wayside shrines. He is since reported to have smashed two more statues, one in Ballyfermot and another in Clondalkin. He appeared with his fellow iconoclasts on the popular "Late Late Show," hosted by Gay Byrne on RTE Television on March 7. Draper arrogantly cited the fourth and fifth commandments of the Old Testament and Exod. 23:24 as giving him divine sanction to smash all religious statues in Ireland, regardless of the rights and views of other people.

As reporter Eoghan Corry stated in an article in the Sunday Press (March 9, 1986), "there isn't a safe statue in the country."

Meanwhile from Los Angeles evangelist Scott indignantly disassociated himself from the activities of the Irish statue smashers and described the Robert Draper group as "the most ridiculous association I have ever heard in a lifetime of confronting ridiculous things." In a press statement he specifically said, "I abhor violence in any form. I am in the process of preserving and restoring a 23 million dollar religious shrine in Los Angeles at the present. I am also president of Sunset Mausoleum in Berkeley, California, which has a 16-foot statue of Christ commanding the cathedral chapel, which was made of the marble from the same quarry from which Michelangelo made Moses. I abhor the thought of anyone anywhere in this world defacing any religious object and totally disassociate myself from anyone who claims to perpetrate such activity in my name."

For a fascinating account of the Ballinspittle story and the other moving statues of Ireland, see the book Seeing is Believing (1985).

Sources:

Tóibín, Colm, ed. Seeing is Believing. Ireland: Pilgrim Press, 1985.

Ball-of-Light International Data Exchange (BOLIDE)

A now-defunct project that shared and disseminated information relating to balls of light, with a wide scope of inquiry including ball-lightning, marsh lights, will o' the wisp, and séance room phenomena. The project coordinator was Hilary Evans, a British authority on such subjects as apparitions, visions, UFOs, and alien visitors. BOLIDE circulated data supplied by contributors—articles found in scholarly journals, press clippings, private research reports from groups or individuals, or personal speculations and hypothesis. Such data was sent to subscribers who paid only the cost of copying and mailing. BOLIDE may still be contacted c/o Hilary Evans, 59 Tranquil Vale, London SE3 OBU, England.

Ballou, Adin (Augustus) (1803–1890)

A Universalist minister, born in Cumberland, Rhode Island, April 23, 1803. In 1842 he formed the Hopedale Community. He was one of those whose doctrines prepared the way for Spiritualism in the United States; after the movement had been inaugurated, he became one of its most enthusiastic protagonists. He published a magazine, The Independent Messenger (1831–39), and wrote a number of books. Ballou died at Milford, Massachusetts, August 5, 1890.

Sources:

Ballou, Adin. Autobiography of Adin Ballou, 1803–1890. Lowell, Mass.: Vox Populi Press, 1896. Reprint, Philadelphia: Porcupine Press, 1975.

———. Practical Christian Socialism. New York: Fowler and Wells, 1854. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1974.

———. Primitive Christianity and its Corruptions. 3 vols. 1870–1900.

Balor

In old Irish mythology, the mighty king of the Formorians, usually called "Balor of the Evil Eye." It was believed that he was able to destroy by means of an angry glance. When his eyelid became heavy with years, it is said that he had it raised by means of ropes and pulleys so that he might continue to make use of his magic gift. He was eventually killed by his grandson, Lugh, the sun god and son of his daughter Birog, who crept near him one day when his eyelid had drooped momentarily and slew him with a great stone, sinking it through his eye and brain.

Baltazo

One of the demons supposed to have possessed a young woman of Laon, France, in the year 1566. He went to dine with her husband under the pretext of freeing her from demonic possession, which he did not accomplish. It was observed that at supper he did not drink, which reinforced the belief that demons are averse to water.

Baltus, Jean François (1667–1743)

A learned Jesuit who affirmed that the oracles of the ancients were the work of demons and that they were reduced to silence during the mission of Christ upon the earth. He propounded this view in his reply to Le Bovier de Fontonelle's L'Histoire des Oracles under the title Réponse á L'Historic des Oracles de Mr. de Fontonelle (1707), translated into English as An Answer to Mr. de Fontonelle's History of Oracles (1709).

Bander, Peter (1930–)

British psychologist, lecturer in religious and moral education, director in the publishing house Colin Smythe, Ltd., of Gerrards Cross, Britain, and writer on psychic topics. Bander introduced the English-speaking world to the experiments of Dr. Konstantin Raudive, a Latvian psychologist who pioneered a particular kind of electronic communication with the dead, discovered by Friedrich Jürgenson in 1959.

This communication involved paranormal voice recordings obtained on a tape recorder enhanced by a simple diode circuit. Bander translated Raudive's book Breakthrough in 1971, after which he appeared on 27 television and radio programs in connection with what came to be called Raudive voices, now more popularly known as "electronic voice phenomenon." Besides a number of books not dealing with parapsychology, Bander wrote The Prophecies of Malachy & Columbkille (1969), Eternal Youth & Music (1970), Voices from the Tapes (1973), and Open to Suggestion (1974).

Sources:

Bander, Peter. Voices from the Tapes: Recordings from the Other World. New York: Drake Publishers, 1973.

Raudive, Konstantin. Breakthrough. New York: Taplinger, 1971.

Bangs Sisters, Lizzie and May (early 1900s)

Chicago mediums who specialized in direct writing and direct drawing and painting. In sealed envelopes that were brought by the sitters and enclosed between two slates, messages in ink were produced in bright daylight. The sitter placed the envelopes between a pair of slates and held them under his or her hand while the medium sat on the opposite side of the table. After waiting from a few minutes to an hour, raps signaled that the message was ready.

On behalf of Dr. I. K. Funk, who investigated the mediums several times himself and had a high opinion of their powers, Hereward Carrington went to Chicago in 1909 and, as narrated in the Annals of Psychic Science (July– September 1910), found fraud. He addressed a letter in a sealed envelope to "Dearest mother, Jane Thompson" (who never existed) and received a reply addressed to "Dearly loved son Harold," signed by his "devoted mother, Jane Thompson." Admiral W. Usborne Moore, who had many sittings with the Bangs sisters in 1909 and later in 1911, defended the sisters.

In the course of the controversy that ensued Carrington told in a letter to Light (May 13, 1911) that David P. Abbott had succeeded in duplicating the Bangs sisters' phenomena exactly by trickery. Moore replied that he made a number of tests, that he read carefully an exposé by a Dr. Krebs, that he knew the method employed by Abbott and that it surpassed in skill almost every conjuring trick he had witnessed but that the conditions were as different from those at the séances of the Bangs sisters as a locomotive is different from a teapot. In fact, it was the conjuring performance that finally convinced him that the Bangs sisters must be genuine, he said.

In telling the story of his investigations in Glimpses of the Next State (1911) Moore narrates how he took his own slates and inkpot to the sitting. On the advice of Sir William Crookes he added lithium citrate to the ink. He obtained a message of eight pages, signed by his spirit guide, "Iola." By later spectrum analysis the presence of lithium was in fact discovered in the ink. This proved to his satisfaction that in some mysterious way his own ink was instrumental in preparing the message in the sealed envelope between his own slates.

Furthermore, he laid his visiting card on top of the slates and tore off one corner for identification. He also wrote a postscript to his questions on a separate piece of paper and placed it alongside the visiting card. The former found its way into the envelope, while the card, in accordance with a message on the outside of the envelope, was discovered in another room in Moore's hat.

The "direct spirit portraits" that the Bangs sisters produced as early as 1894 in color, before the sitters' eyes, and in daylight was an even more mysterious phenomenon. At first a locked box or curtained-off space was used and several sittings were required. Later they were openly precipitated, as if by an airbrush, as quickly as within eight minutes. The arrangement was as follows:

Two identical, paper-mounted canvases in wooden frames were held up, face to face, against the window, the lower edges resting on a table and the sides gripped by each medium with one hand. A short curtain was hung on either side and an opaque blind was drawn over the canvases. With the light streaming from behind, the canvases were translucent.

After a quarter of an hour, the outlines of shadows began to appear and disappear as if the invisible artist were making a preliminary sketch, then the picture began to grow at a feverish rate. When the frames were separated the portrait was found on the paper surface of the canvas next to the sitter. Although the paint was greasy and stuck to the finger on being touched, it left no stain on the paper surface of the other canvas, which closely covered it. The sitters were requested to bring a photograph of their departed friends, but they were not asked to produce it. The portraits were not copies of the concealed photographs, but the facial resemblance was apparently an imitation. Reportedly the tone often grew richer and deeper afterward.

Moore noticed in his experiments that details were added if he did not look, and when once he mentally desired that a gold locket should be enlarged and decorated with a monogram, the thing was done as requested. He often brought his own frames, sealed the window, searched the premises, and closely watched every movement in the room, yet the picture was obtained as before.

The Bangs sisters also produced these phenomena in public halls before great audiences. Apports of flowers were a frequent occurrence; objects disappeared incomprehensibly; and chemical effects, like ink changing into dirty water, were witnessed.

An early slate-writing séance with Lizzie Bangs is described by A. B. Richmond in What I Saw at Cassadaga Lake (1888):

"Soon I heard a faint noise between the slates. It did not sound like writing, but more like the crawling of an insect imprisoned between them, in a few moments there came three distinct raps. I opened the slates and found two messages written in the Morse alphabet, one of them signed by the one to whom the interrogatory was directed, and who could not in this life read or write telegraphy, the other by a prominent jurist who died a number of years ago."

After a trial of many days Richmond obtained three communications between two screwed-together slates. One was signed by Henry Seybert, and the handwriting was the same as that he had obtained a year before in a séance with Pierre Keeler.

The most spectacular direct-writing demonstration by Lizzie Bangs was the direct operation of a typewriter. As described by Quaestor Vitae in Light (January 25, 1896), the machine kept on working when held up in the air by four of the men present. The hand alleged to have done the work also materialized.

In his investigation of the sisters' phenomena, Hereward Carrington refers to an exposé regarding the letter writing inside a sealed enveolope (Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 10). The writer claims to have seen the tricks by means of a small hand mirror that he held beneath the table. He found that, under cover of the writing pad placed against the edges of the slate resting on the table, May Bangs, one of the sisters, wedged open the slate by means of a small rubber wedge; the letter, when abstracted, was dropped on to a sort of "gridiron" arrangement that lay on the carpet. It was promptly drawn backward under a slit in the door into the next room, where Lizzie Bangs, the other sister, steamed the envelope. In the meantime the ink in the cup had time to evaporate so that it appeared to have been used.

A number of testimonies vouching for the Bangs sisters are printed in James Coates's Photographing the Invisible. But there is no doubt that some of the charges of fraud brought against them in their early career were well borne out. In 1880 and in 1891 they were seized as masquerading materialized spirits under very damaging circumstances, and in 1890 a Colonel Bundy charged them in the Religio-Philosophical Journal with fraud in slate writing. Dr. Richard Hodgson made a thorough investigation of the respective documents. His findings were against the mediums (Light, 1899).

A collection of portraits produced by the Bangs sisters has been preserved in the gallery at the Spiritualist Camp at Chesterfield, Indiana.

Sources:

Abbott, David P. Behind the Scenes With the Mediums. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1909.

———. Spirit Portrait Mystery; Its Final Solution. Chicago, 1913.

[Bangs Sisters]. The Bangs Sisters' Manifesto to the World. Chicago, 1909.

Moore, W. Usborne. Glimpses of the Next State (The Education of an Agnostic). London: Watts, 1911.

Banner of Light (Periodical)

Spiritualist weekly, "an exponent of the spiritual philosophy of the twentieth century," founded in 1857 and published in Boston and New York. It ceased publication after 1910.

Banneux

Banneux is a town in the French-speaking section of Belgium that in 1935 became the site of a set of apparitions of the Virgin Mary. These apparitions are often tied to those that occurred at the end of 1934 at Beauraing, another Belgian community not far away. It appears that the claims of five children to be seeing the Virgin at Beauraing was the occasion for the Banneux apparition.

The apparitions occurred to Mariette Beco, the eleven-year-old daughter of a non-practicing Catholic family. The first appearance occurred on January 15, 1935, less than two weeks after the last sighting at Beauraing. Mariette was looking at the window when she saw a woman walking in the garden. She recognized her as the Virgin Mary, but Mariette's mother, who could not see the figure, would not let her daughter out of the house. Without mentioning why, on January 18, Mariette went into the garden and began praying before the figure, who was enveloped in light. Her father came out but could see nothing. Then, with a friend who was still a practicing Catholic, he followed his daughter to a nearby stream where the Virgin told her that She was setting the stream aside for Her use. In a later conversation with the local priest, she described the Virgin as being dressed in white with a blue girdle around her waist. Her left foot was bare and rested on a golden rose. She had a rosary in her hand.

At the third apparition the following night, the Virgin described herself as the "Virgin of the Poor." Again she beckoned for Mariette to follow her to the stream and reiterated its new use and that she wanted a small chapel built. The stream would be for the sick of all nations. The five subsequent apparitions, the last of which occurred on March 2, repeated her message. One of these apparitions was on February 11, the 75th anniversary of the first apparition at Lourdes.

The apparitions at Banneux occurred just as controversy over Beauraing was growing and the country experienced a number of questionable claims of apparitions related to the earlier Beauraing sightings. However, the bishop finally appointed an investigating committee. By that time the stream had become a place of pilgrimage, especially by the sick and crippled. Among the early healing was that of Spanish anarchist Benito Pelegri Garcia, whose arm had been rendered useless due to a boiler explosion.

In 1942, during the Nazi occupation, the church finished its study and issued a word of acceptance of the apparition. The chapel requested by the Virgin had already been built and in 1984 a basilica was started. While hundreds of apparitions of the Virgin have been reported since, this is the last of the twentieth-century apparitions that has passed the tests put to it by the Catholic Church's authorities.

Sources:

Connor, Edward. Recent Apparitions of Our Lady. Fresno, Calif.: Academy Library Guild, n.d.

Delaney, John J., ed. A Woman Clothed with the Sun: Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady in Modern Times. Garden City, N.Y.: Hanover House, 1960.

Banshee

An Irish supernatural being of the wraith type. The name derives from the Gaelic bean si and implies "female fairy." She is usually the possession of a specific family, to a member or members of which she appears before the death of one of them.

T. F. Thistleton Dyer, writing on the banshee in his book The Ghost World (1898), states:

"Unlike, also, many of the legendary beliefs of this kind, the popular accounts illustrative of it are related on the evidence of all sections of the community, many an enlightened and well-informed advocate being enthusiastic in his vindication of its reality. It would seem, however, that no family which is not of an ancient and noble stock is honored with this visit of the Banshee and hence its nonappearance has been regarded as an indication of disqualification in this respect on the part of the person about to die. 'If I am rightly informed,' writes Sir Walter Scott, 'the distinction of a Banshee is only allowed to families of the pure Milesian stock, and is never ascribed to any descendant of the proudest Norman or the boldest Saxon who followed the banner of Strongbow, much less to adventurers of later dates who have obtained settlements in the Green Isle.' Thus, an amusing story is contained in an Irish elegy to the effect that on the death of one of the Knights of Kerry, when the Banshee was heard to lament his decease at Dingle—a seaport town, the property of those knights—all the merchants of this place were thrown into a state of alarm lest the mournful and ominous wailing should be a forewarning of the death of one of them, but, as the poet humorously points out, there was no necessity for them to be anxious on this point. Although, through misfortune, a family may be brought down from high estate to the rank of peasant tenants, the Banshee never leaves nor forgets it till the last member has been gathered to his fathers in the churchyard. The MacCarthys, O'Flahertys, Magraths, O'Rileys, O'Sullivans, O'Reardons, have their Banshees, though many representatives of these names are in abject poverty.

" 'The Banshee,' says D. R. McAnally [in his book Irish Wonders (1888)], 'is really a disembodied soul, that of one who in life was strongly attached to the family, or who had good reason to hate all its members. Thus, in different instances, the Banshee's song may be inspired by different motives. When the Banshee loves those she calls, the song is a low, soft chant giving notice, indeed, of the close proximity of the angel of death, but with a tenderness of tone that reassures the one destined to die and comforts the survivors; rather a welcome than a warning, and having in its tones a thrill of exultation, as though the messenger spirit were bringing glad tidings to him summoned to join the waiting throng of his ancest[o]rs.' To a doomed member of the family of the O'Reardons the Banshee generally appears in the form of a beautiful woman, 'and sings a song so sweetly solemn as to reconcile him to his approaching fate.' But if, during his lifetime, the Banshee was an enemy of the family, the cry is the scream of a fiend, howling with demoniac delight over the coming death agony of another of his foes.

"Hence, in Ireland, the hateful 'Banshee' is a source of dread to many a family against which she has an enmity. 'It appears,' adds McAnally, 'that a noble family, whose name is still familiar in Mayo, is attended by a Banshee of this description—the spirit of a young girl deceived, and afterwards murdered by a former head of the family. With her dying breath she cursed her murderer, and promised she would attend him and his forever. After many years the chieftain reformed his ways, and his youthful crime was almost forgotten even by himself, when one night, as he and his family were seated by the fire, the most terrible shrieks were suddenly heard outside the castle walls. All ran out, but saw nothing. During the night the screams continued as though the castle were besieged by demons, and the unhappy man recognised in the cry of the Banshee the voice of the young girl he had murdered. The next night he was assassinated by one of his followers, when again the wild unearthly screams were heard exulting over his fate. Since that night "hateful Banshee" has, it is said, never failed to notify the family, with shrill cries of revengeful gladness, when the time of one of their number has arrived.'

"Among some of the recorded instances of the Banshee's appearance may be mentioned one related by Miss Lefrau, the niece of [Richard] Sheridan, in the memoirs of her grandmother, Mrs. Frances Sheridan. From this account we gather that Miss Elizabeth Sheridan was a firm believer in the Banshee, and firmly maintained that the one attached to the Sheridan family was distinctly heard lamenting beneath the windows of the family residence before the news arrived from France of Mrs. Frances Sheridan's death at Blois. She added that a niece of Miss Sheridan made her very angry by observing that as Mrs. Frances Sheridan was by birth a Chamberlaine, a family of English extraction, she had no right to the guardianship of an Irish fairy, and that therefore the Banshee must have made a mistake. Then there is the well-known case related by Lady Fanshawe who tells us how, when on a visit in Ireland, she was awakened at midnight by a loud scream outside her window. On looking out she saw a young and rather handsome woman, with dishevelled hair, who vanished before her eyes with another shriek. On communicating the circumstance in the morning, her host replied, 'A near relation of mine died last night in the castle, and before such an event happens, the female spectre whom you have seen is always visible.'

"This weird apparition is generally supposed to assume the form of a woman, sometimes young, but more often old. She is usually attired in a loose white drapery, and her long ragged locks hang over her thin shoulders. As night time approaches she occasionally becomes visible, and pours forth her mournful wail—a sound said to resemble the melancholy moaning of the wind. . . . Oftentimes she is not seen but only heard, yet she is supposed to be always clearly discernible to the person upon whom she specially waits. Respecting the history of the Banshee, popular tradition in many instances accounts for its presence as the spirit of some mortal woman whose destinies have become linked by some accident with those of the family she follows. It is related how the Banshee of the family of the O'Briens of Thomond was originally a woman who had been seduced by one of the chiefs of that race—an act of indiscretion which ultimately brought about her death."

The banshee is not confined to Ireland, since she is also the subject of folktales in the highlands of Scotland, where she is known as bean-nighe, or "little-washer-by-the-ford." She is said to be seen by the side of a river, washing the blood from the clothes of those who will die. (See also Fairies)

Sources:

Lysaght, Patricia. The Banshee. Dublin, 1986.

McAnally, D. R. Irish Wonders. 1888. Reprint, Detroit: Grand River Books, 1971.

O'Donnell, Elliot. The Banshee. London, 1919.

Yeats, W. B. Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry. London: Walter Scott, [1888].

Banyacya, Thomas (1909–1999)

Thomas Banyacya, an elder of the Hopi Nation, was selected as one of four spokespersons of his people in 1948 to deliver an urgent prophetic message to all people. He was born on June 2, 1909, in Moencopi, a Hopi town in Arizona. He attended school under the name Thomas Jenkins, an Anglo name demanded of students at the time by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. He later adopted the name Thomas Banyacya, a combination of the name he had been called as a youth and his birth name. In 1930 he entered Bacone College in Oklahoma, an institution set up for Native Americans. The college did not include studies of Native American culture, and Banyacya and a fellow student set up a medicine lodge for the use of the other students. He dropped his early plans to become a Christian minister and returned to his home as a school teacher.

Banyacya emerged out of obscurity among his people in 1941 when he refused to register for the draft. He served seven years in prison. It was soon after his release from prison that the Hopi leadership selected him as one of their four representatives who were sent out with the Nation's message of peace. This message was one selected from a host of Hopi prophecies and warned that ecological disaster was imminent. If humanity continues to destroy nature, nature will rise up and destroy humankind. The message was integral to the Hopi vision of their role as the people of balance, who are acting on behalf of all humankind.

Banyacya's first actions had some immediacy to them. In 1952 he organized a caravan to travel among the Native American people, encouraging the revival of interest in culture and ways. The next year he set up a meeting with President Eisenhower to gain conscientious objector status for the Hopi males. He also traveled to the UN building in New York to present the Hopi message. Soon afterwards he produced a passport as a citizen of the Hopi Nation and began to travel the world using it. During his many years of travel, he went across central Europe to Moscow and on another occasion to Japan. Most of his years were spent in the western United States.

Of the four messengers, Banyacya lived the longest. He passed away on February 6, 1999, in Hopi land.

Sources:

Fitten, Ronald K. "Messenger Preaches Hopi Love of Earth." Seattle Times (February 21, 1994).

Thomas Banyacya. http://www.alphacdc.com/banyacya/bio.html. May 20, 2000.

Banyen Books & Sound

Banyen Books & Sound is the largest New Age metaphysical bookstore in Western Canada and the center of the metaphysical and alternative spirituality community in the Vancouver area. It was founded as Banyen Books in 1970 by Kolin Lymworth, who as a young man in 1969 had visited and been inspired by Shambhala Books, still a mainstay of the spiritual community in Berkeley, California. He had also visited India and read the landmark book Be Here Now (1971) written by Ram Dass (Richard Alpert), one of the foundational volumes of what would become known as the New Age Movement. The name of the store came from the banyan tree under which the Hindu deity Krishna is said to have spoken the Bhagavad Gita, and from the Banyan Ashram that had been established by Gary Snyder and Nanao Sakaki as an eco-spiritual community in Japan. Lymworth chose the alternate spelling of "banyen" after taking the advice of a numerologist friend.

As the New Age Movement emerged in the 1970s, Lymworth became aligned with its vision for the need for a transformation of the people and societies of Earth. The original bookstore was enlarged in 1987 with an audio wing, Banyen Sound, that specializes in audio cassettes and CDs of meditative, healing, and transformative music and nonmusic tapes of lectures and books on New Age subjects. As the twenty-first century begins it has been transformed. It had emerged in the 1990s as a full-service store carrying a broad range of books and audio visuals that encourage the values of "non-violence, truthfulness, love for all, meditation and spiritual awakening, earthcare and earth wisdom, and healing, holistic and visionary perspectives in arts, sciences, humanities, literature, medicine, philosophy, ecology, and dishwashing." Its stock includes books ranging from the most popular to the scholarly on the broad range of issues, topics, and perspectives alive in the post-New Age world. It also carries a number of related items used by people on their quest for psychic development or spiritual enlightenment, including meditation cushions, musical instruments, altar items (such as incense and candles), stationary, games, card sets, and medicine objects.

In the mid-1990s the Banyen also began publishing the semiannual Branches of Light. It appears each spring and autumn and is built around reviews of selected books and CDs featured in the store along with interviews of featured authors and artists and listings of upcoming events sponsored by the store. As the store has grown and expanded, it has developed an associated program of concerts, lectures, and workshops. Most recently it has developed an extensive Internet site at http://www.banyen.com/.

Banyen Books & Sound is located at 2671 W. Broadway, Vancouver, BC Canada V6K 2G2.

Sources:

Banyen Books & Sound. http://www.banyen.com/. February 28, 2000.

Branches of Light. Vancouver, British Columbia, n.d.

Bapak

An Indonesian name for "father," given affectionately to patrons, gurus, and charismatic leaders, especially to Muhammad Subuh, founder of the Subud movement, a modern mystical school combining Sufi insights with elements of the thought of Georgei I. Gurdjieff and P. D. Ouspensky.

Baphomet

The goat idol of the Templars and the deity of the sorcerers' Sabbat. Some authorities hold that the Baphomet was a monstrous head, others that it was a demon in the form of a goat. One account of a veritable Baphometic idol describes it thusly:

"A pantheistic and magical figure of the Absolute. The torch placed between the two horns, represents the equilibrating intelligence of the triad. The goat's head, which is synthetic, and unites some characteristics of the dog, bull, and ass, represents the exclusive responsibility of matter and the expiation of bodily sins in the body. The hands are human, to exhibit the sanctity of labor; they make the sign of esotericism above and below, to impress mystery on initiates, and they point at two lunar crescents, the upper being white and the lower black, to explain the correspondences of good and evil, mercy and justice. The lower part of the body is veiled, portraying the mysteries of universal generation, which is expressed solely by the symbol of the caduceus. The belly of the goat is scaled, and should be colored green, the semicircle above should be blue; the plumage, reaching to the breast, should be of various hues. The goat has female breasts, and thus its only characteristics are those of maternity and toil, otherwise the signs of redemption. On its forehead, between the horns and beneath the torch, is the sign of the microcosm, or the pentagram with one beam in the ascendant, symbol of human intelligence, which, placed thus below the torch, makes the flame of the latter an image of divine revelation. This Pantheos should be seated on a cube, and its footstool should be a single ball, or a ball and a triangular stool."

In Narratives of Sorcery and Magic (1851), Thomas Wright states:

"Another charge in the accusation of the Templars seems to have been to a great degree proved by the depositions of witnesses[:] the idol or head which they are said to have worshipped, but the real character or meaning of which we are totally unable to explain. Many Templars confessed to having seen this idol, but as they described it differently, we must suppose that it was not in all cases represented under the same form. Some said it was a frightful head, with long beard and sparkling eyes; others said it was a man's skull; some described it as having three faces; some said it was of wood, and others of metal; one witness described it as a painting (tabula picta) representing the image of a man (imago hominis) and said that when it was shown to him, he was ordered to 'adore Christ, his creator.' According to some it was a gilt figure, either of wood or metal; while others described it as painted black and white. According to another deposition, the idol had four feet, two before and two behind; the one belonging to the order at Paris, was said to be a silver head, with two faces and a beard. The novices of the order were told always to regard this idol as their saviour. Deodatus Jaffet, a knight from the south of France, who had been received at Pedenat, deposed that the person who in his case performed the ceremonies of reception, showed him a head or idol, which appeared to have three faces, and said, 'You must adore this as your saviour, and the saviour of the order of the Temple' and that he was made to worship the idol, saying, 'Blessed be he who shall save my soul.' Cettus Ragonis, a knight received at Rome in a chamber of the palace of the Lateran, gave a somewhat similar account. Many other witnesses spoke of having seen these heads, which, however, were, perhaps, not shown to everybody, for the greatest number of those who spoke on this subject, said that they had heard speak of the head, but that they had never seen it themselves; and many of them declared their disbelief in its existence. A friar minor deposed in England that an English Templar had assured him that in that country the order had four principal idols, one at London, in the Sacristy of the Temple, another at Bristelham, a third at Brueria (Bruern in Lincolnshire), and a fourth beyond the Humber."

Some occultists have suggested that the Baphomet of the Templars was really the god of the witches deriving from the nature god Pan. During the nineteenth century, the Austrian Orientalist Baron Joseph von Hammer-Pürgstall discovered an inscription on a coffer in Burgundy that he claimed showed that the name Baphomet derived from two Greek words meaning "Baptism of Metis [Wisdom]"; the inscription exalted Metis or Baphomet as the true divinity.

When Karl Kellner and other early twentieth century German occultists founded the secret order OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis, or Order of Templars in the East), they adopted an emblem of Baphomet taken from Richard Payne Knight's A Discourse on the Worship of Priapus as the seal of the order's grand master. At a later date, when British occultist Aleister Crowley became head of the British section, he took the name Baphomet as his motto. He had previously wrestled with the numerological significance of the name.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symons and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill and Wang, 1969.

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Rider, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Partner, Peter. The Murdered Magicians: The Templars and their Myth. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981. Reprint, N.p.: Crucible, 1987.

Wright, Thomas. Narratives of Sorcery and Magic. London: R. Bentley, 1851. Reprint, Detroit: Grand River Books, 1971.

Baptism of the Devil

It was said that at the witches' Sabbat children and toads were baptized with certain horrible rites. This was called "the baptism of the devil."

Baptism of the Line

A curious rite performed on persons crossing the equator for the first time. The sailors dressed themselves in quaint costumes. The "father of the line" arrived in a cask, accompanied by a courier, a devil, a hairdresser, and a miller. The unfortunate passenger had his hair curled, was liberally sprinkled with flour, and then had water showered upon him, if he was not dunked. The origin of this custom is not known, nor is it quite clear what part the devil played in it. The custom is reminiscent of the traditional initiatory rites of apprentices in trade guilds such as printing, and it may also be a precursor of initiations in college fraternities.

Baquet

A large circular tub that figured prominently in the magnetic treatment that Charles d'Eslon, a friend and follower of Franz A. Mesmer's, prescribed for his patients. The marquis of Puységur tells us in his book Du Magnétisme Animal (1807) that some bottles, arranged in a particular manner, were placed in the baquet and partly covered with water. The tub was fitted with a lid having several holes through which passed iron rods connecting the patients, who sat around the contrivance. The operator was armed with a shorter iron rod. While the patients waited for a response to the treatment, someone played a pianoforte, a device frequently used at Spiritualist séances. Reactions included violent convulsions, cries, laughter, and vomiting. This state, called the crisis, was supposed to hasten the healing process.

A commission appointed in 1784 by the French government to report on mesmerism suggested that such practices were exceedingly dangerous and in no way proved the existence of an alleged magnetic fluid.

Sources:

Darnton, Robert. Mesmerism and the End of the Enlightenment in France. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Harte, Richard. Hypnotism and the Doctors. I. Mesmer/De Puységur. London: L. N. Fowler, 1902.

Baraduc, Hyppolite (1850–1902)

Noted nineteenth-century French psychical researcher who made interesting experiments in "thought photography" and in 1895 addressed a communication on the subject to the French Academy of Medicine. By photographic means he also claimed to have proved that something misty and vaporous leaves the human body at the moment of death. His contribution to the study of vital emanation is significant. He constructed an instrument, called Baraduc's biometer, that indicated the action of a nervous force and unknown vibrations outside the human body. His experiments are described in his books The Human Soul (1913), Iconographie de la Force Vitale Cosmique Od (1896), Méthode de Radiographie Humaine (1897), Note Sommaire sur la Décondensation Cérébrale (1901), Photographie des Etats Hypervibratoires de la Vitalité Humaine (1897), Les Vibrations de la Vitalité Humaine (1904), and La Force Vitale, Notre Corps Vital, Fulidique, une Formule Barometrique (1905). (See also Sthenometer)

Sources:

Baraduc, Hyppolite. The Human Soul. Paris, 1913.

———. Les Vibrations de la Vitalité Humaine. Paris, 1904.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Barbanell, Maurice (1902–1981)

Veteran British lecturer, journalist, and author in the field of Spiritualism. He served as editor of the Psychic News and The Two Worlds for over three decades. Many in North America first heard of him through his book This is Spiritualism (1959), a survey of the phenomena and personalities associated with Spiritualism. Barbanell was noted for his vigorous journalism in support of Spiritualism, and he frequently lectured across both Europe and North America. Born in London, May 3, 1902, he was the son of a barber who also practiced dentistry. Young Barbanell's first job involved sweeping up hair and acting as lather boy.

As a young man Barbanell was an atheist like his father. He became unpaid secretary of a social and literary club in London's East End. One evening, there was a talk by a young man on the subject of Spiritualism. Although antagonistic to the subject, Barbanell said that this was a subject on which only those with personal experience could venture any worthwhile opinions. When challenged as to whether he was prepared to back this position by undertaking a six-month period of personal investigation of Spiritualism, he said yes. He joined a home circle with the medium Mrs. Blaustein, who was controlled by various entities who spoke through her while she was in a state of trance.

Barbanell was not very impressed by this phenomenon and at one sitting he "fell asleep." When he awoke he learned to his surprise that he had been in a mediumistic trance himself and that an Indian spirit guide had spoken through him.

Barbanell subsequently formed his own home circle at which the Indian guide, "Silver Birch," gave regular teachings through Barbanell's mediumship. Later, the famous journalist and Spiritualist Hannen Swaffer became a member of this home circle and an enthusiastic proponent of the teachings of "Silver Birch."

In 1932 Barbanell married Sylvia Abrahams, who had attended the home circle sittings with Mrs. Blaustein. The newspaper Psychic News was also founded in 1932, as a result of a message from "Red Cloud," the spirit guide of the medium Estelle Roberts. Barbanell edited the newspaper for 14 years, resigning in 1946 when unable to agree with J. Arthur Findlay on terms for purchase of Psychic News. However, 16 years later, in June 1962, Barbanell was able to resume editorship of the newspaper, which by then was in some difficulty. His tireless and enthusiastic work restored the position of Psychic News as the preeminent British Spiritualist publication.

Meanwhile, Barbanell's own role in the "Silver Birch" messages continued to be anonymous. Hannen Swaffer thought the teachings should reach a larger audience, but Barbanell believed that he would be open to criticism if he publicized his own mediumship in Psychic News. Eventually it was agreed that the "Silver Birch" teachings should be published, provided that Barbanell's identity continued to be withheld. However, these communications attracted so much attention that after some time Barbanell was obliged to make it known that he was the medium.

During his active life as editor, lecturer, and author in the cause of Spiritualism, Barbanell was a friend of every major British medium. Less than a week after his death at age 79, on July 17, 1981, spirit messages from him were claimed through the mediumship of Gordon Higginson, a close friend.

In addition to Barbanell's vast output for his two periodicals, he wrote books on psychical research and Spiritualism.

Sources:

Barbanell, Maurice. Across the Gulf. N.p., 1940.

———. Where There is a Will. N.p., 1962.

Barbanell, Sylvia, ed. Silver Birch Speak. . . . London: Psychic Book Club, 1949.

McCulloch, Joseph. The Trumpet Shall Sound. London, M. Joseph, Ltd., 1944.

Naylor, William, ed. Silver Birch Anthology. London: Psychic Book Club, 1955.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

The Wisdom of Silver Birch. London: Psychic Book Club, 1944.

The Barbanell Report

In the 1970s, Paul Beard and Maurice Barbanell (1902–1981) made a pact agreeing that the one who died first would attempt to communicate with the other concerning what he had found in his new existence. Barbanell was the long-term editor of the Psychic News and Other Worlds, two of British Spiritualism's leading periodicals. He was also a medium famous for his contact with "Silver Birch," an American Indian, from whom he channeled messages. Paul Beard was for many years the president of the College of Psychic Studies, a major Spiritualist center in London. While the two were acquaintances, they were not friends, and at times publicly disagreed on various matters.

Barbanell passed away in 1981. Though several mediums claimed to have received messages from him, early in 1982 Beard began a series of sittings with Marie Cherrie, a medium at the college who had never met Barbanell. During these sittings, which continued for four years, Beard came to believe that he was communicating with Barbanell, and several years after the last session, the complete records were transcribed and published.

While two famous British mediums, Estelle Roberts and Ena Twigg, made brief appearances in the sessions, as a whole the conversations adhered to the previously agreed-upon topic. The expectations were that Barbanell, having been a medium, would make an easy transition to spirit existence and that he would be welcomed by Silver Birch. Neither proved the case. The spirit Barbanell professed some confusion distinguishing reality and illusion in his new existence and was still not fully accommodated to his new environment at the end of four years. Also, while he finally encountered Silver Birch, it was only after several years had passed. The indication was that with Barbanell's death their previous relationship ended, and though he was close, he did not make contact.

Barbanell did not try to bring through specifically evidential material. Given the nature of the material, it would leave room for doubt even from those who knew him. Beard believed that the process of communication was limited and incomplete and that unexpected content of the communications would make an important contribution to the continuing development of the Spiritualists' view of the next life.

Sources:

The Barbanell Report. Communicated Through Marie Cherrie. Edited by Paul Beard. Tasurgh, Norwich, UK: Pilgrim Books, 1989.

Barbara Brennan School of Healing

The Barbara Brennan School of Healing was founded in 1982 by Barbara Brennan, a former associate of trance channel Eva Pierrakos (1915–1979) and her husband, psychiatrist John C. Pierrakos (1921–). Eva Pierrakos had founded a system for self-transformation called the Pathwork. Her husband, who had begun his long career working with Wilhelm Reich, had been one of the founders of bioenergetics, a system of bodywork, and later founded the Institute of Core Energetics. During the 1970s, Brennan worked with the couple and became an accomplished practitioner of both the Pathwork and core energetics. She developed her own private healing practice and then began to teach others.

Brennan had begun her adult life as a physicist. She earned a master's degree in atmospheric physics and worked for a time at the Goddard Space Flight Center near Washington, D.C. She became a leader in the Pathwork and one of the first graduates of the Institute of Core Energetics. Through the 1980s she developed her own synthesis of spiritual healing which was embodied in her 1989 volume, Hands of Light, New Age bestselling title. It was followed by two additional books, Light Emerging: The Journey of Personal Healing (1993) and more recently, Seeds of the Spirit (1999), poetry channeled from Heyoan, Brennan's spiritual guide.

The school is designed to train professional healers. The curriculum is built around four areas: healing science, awakening (self-exploration and awareness), creativity, and professionalism. Students not only learn a broad perspective on healing, drawing deeply from the Pierrakoses' work, but are introduced to a broad range of psychic practices from meditation to channeling. In the 1999–2000 school year, the school introduced a graduate program open to the previous graduates of the school. It teaches the most advanced concepts and techniques developed by Brennan and involves the students in a program of research. It is designed to enhance the student's status as a professional.

The Barbara Brennan School of Healing is headquartered at P.O. Box 2005, East Hampton, NY 11937-0903. It has an Internet page at http://www.barbarabrennan.com/.

Sources:

Barbara Brennan School of Healing. http://www.barbarabrennan.com/. June 10, 2000.

Brennan, Barbara. Hands of Light: A Guide to Healing through the Human Energy Field. 1989. Reprint. New York: Bantam Doubleday, 1993.

———. Light Emerging: The Journey of Personal Healing. New York: Bantam Doubleday, 1993.

Barbault, André (1921–)

Contemporary French astrologer, born at Champignelled/Yonne, France, on October 1, 1921. Barbault began his study of astrology in the mid-1930s and a short time later discovered Sigmund Freud. He saw Freudian psychology as an excellent tool for assisting in astrological interpretation. Barbault emerged from the disruptions of World War II as a professional astrologer and a charter member of the Centre International d'Astrologie, founded in 1946. He was vice president of the center for 14 years, during which time he published his first books, De la Psychanalyses de l'Astrologie (1961) and Traité pratique d'Astrologie (1961), an exposition of his Freudian theories and a basic astrological textbook.

In 1967 Barbault attained a level of international fame by opening Ordinastral-Astroflash, a computerized astrology service capable of turning out hundreds of charts daily for Parisians. It was the first such service in the world and in spite of the criticisms of more traditional colleagues quickly spread internationally. Countering critics of the popularizing effects of the computer, Barbault also founded l'Astrologie, an academic journal of astrological studies.

Barbault's psychological approach to astrology has come to characterize French astrology. However, he has spent much of his mature years in the equally fascinating realm of mundane astrology, attempting to correlate astrological facts with historical events. His first such study was published in 1967 as Les Astres et l'historie. This led to a system of predicting political events from astrological studies. Barbault has written more than thirty books, but they have yet to be translated into English.

Sources:

Barbault, André. Les Astres et l'historie. Paris, J. J. Pauvert, 1967.

———. De la Psychanalyses de l'Astrologie. Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1961.

———. Traité pratique d'Astrologie. Paris, 1961.

Brau, Jean-Louis, Helen Weaver, and Allan Edmands, eds. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1982.

Bardon, Franz (1909–1958)

Franz Bardon was one of the most important figures in the occult revival of the twentieth century and the author of three influential books: Initiation into Hermetics, The Practice of Magical Evocation, and The Key to the True Qabalah. He was, however, a reclusive individual and much of his life remains obscure. He was born and grew up in Czechoslovakia, the eldest of 13 children. His father, Viktor Bardon, was a mystic. As a youth, Franz sought some illumination and finally felt an advanced soul entering his body and providing him with his first initiatory experiences.

In the 1920s and 1930s he worked as a stage magician under the name Frabato. He also became an accomplished practitioner of real magic. It has been alleged that Bardon was a member of the Fraternity of Saturn in Germany prior to its being disbanded by the Nazis in the mid-1930s. However, no proof of that association has been produced. In 1941 he was arrested by the Nazis and after refusing to assist Hitler magically, was imprisoned in a concentration camp and tortured. He escaped his execution when the Allies bombed the camp where he was confined. He escaped and spent the rest of World War II (1939–45) in hiding. He returned to his hometown after the war, continuing his occult work and writing the books for which he became well known. While studying, he made his living as a healer using alchemical preparations. Bardon was arrested in 1958 by the Czech government for publishing occult materials, and died in prison on July 10, 1958.

During the 1950s, Bardon set about the task of writing his three books as serious texts from the aspiring magician who did not have a teacher or working group. He wrote in Czech and his finished manuscripts were translated into German and published. English translations became available at the beginning of the 1970s. His work shows a broad familiarity with the magical writings of Francis Barrett, Éliphas Lévi, Alexandria David-Neel, and even Aleister Crowley. However, he synthesized the tradition and focused on his own work and the magical activity that he verified in his own experience.

Like Levi, he saw the universe undergirded with cosmic power, but divided those powers into magnetic (a cool negative force) and electrical, (a warm positive force). The magician learns how to control and manipulate these forces. The magician is composed of the four traditional elements (earth, air, fire, and water) understood psychologically, and the accomplished magician must be a balanced person with a developed psyche in which each element, such as intuition or passion, is present but not so dominating as to push the other elements aside.

In his first book, Initiation into Hermetics, Bardon leads the student through a basic course in magical training. The second volume, The Practice of Magical Evocation, treats all the magical instruments from the wand to the magical mirror, and explains in detail the process of contacting various kinds of spirit entities. The final volume is a more detailed treatment of the Qabalah (or kabbalah).

Bardon was assisted by his long-time student Dieter Rüggeburg, who published both the German and English editions of his several books and continued to keep them in print. In the 1990s, a Franz Bardon Foundation was established and for several years issued a newsletter, but appears to have disappeared as the decade came to a close. Students of the Bardon literature have developed a web presence, possibly the most important site being http://www.franzbardon.com/.

Sources:

Bardon, Franz. Initiation into Hermetics. Wupperthal, Germany: Dieter Rüggeburg, 1970.

———. The Key to the True Qabalah. Wupperthal, Germany: Dieter Rüggeburg, 1971.

———. The Practice of Magical Evocation. Wupperthal, Germany: Dieter Rüggeburg, 1970.

Scott, Tim. "Who Was Franz Bardon?" New Moon Rising (Beltane 1999): 66–72.

Barguest (or Barghest)

A goblin or phantom of mischievous character traditionally reported in the north of England and also in Wales. The meaning of the term is disputed, some believing it to be "town ghost" (burhghest), others suggesting it derives from the German berggeist ("mountain demon"). The goblin often appears in the form of a monstrous dog with huge teeth and claws. Another tradition suggests that the phantom is named from his habit of sitting on bars or gates. A writer in the mid-nineteenth-century Encyclopaedia Metropolitana relates a story of a woman he knew who had been brought up in the country. As a child, she had been passing through the fields one morning and saw someone sitting on a stile; as she drew near, however, the figure vanished.

Barkel, Kathleen (ca. 1930)

British trance medium, controlled by "White Hawk," who claimed to be a chief of the Sioux who had lived 800 years earlier. Barkel had psychic gifts as a child, and her mediumship began to develop in 1922. For years she did excellent work at the British College of Psychic Science, giving psychic healing sessions in conjunction with her husband and offering voice séances with her daughter. Sitters often received apports in the form of beautifully cut stones. "White Hawk" would place Bar-kel's hand over that of the sitter and the stone would appear to grow in between them.

Sources:

Bradley, H. Dennis. . . . And After. London, 1931.

Barker, Elsa (ca. 1869–1954)

American novelist and poet, born in Leicester, Vermont. She allegedly produced through automatic writing the scripts for Letters from a Living Dead Man (1914), War Letters from the Living Dead Man (1915), and Last Letters from a Living Dead Man (1919). These remarkable communications attracted much attention in England, where they were first published. At the time the scripts were produced, Elsa Barker was new to automatic writing, and was also unaware that the communicator (subsequently identified as David P. Hatch, a Los Angeles lawyer), who signed the communications "X," had passed away. These letters record the impressions of an intelligent traveler in a strange country, his mistakes, prejudices, ideals, and new insights.

Elsa Barker's other publications include The Son of Mary Bethel (1909), The Frozen Grail & Other Poems (1910), Stories from the New Testament for Children (1911), The Body of Love (1912), Fielding Sargent (1922), The Cobra Candlestick (1928), The C.I.D. of Dexter Drake (1929), and The Redman Cave Murder (1930).

Barker died August 31, 1954.

Sources:

Barker, Elsa. War Letters from the Living Dead Man. London: W. Rider & Son, 1915.

Barker, Gray (1925–1984)

Writer on UFOs who launched the story of Albert K. Bender and the men in black, who are supposed to have silenced Bender's revelations about flying saucers. Barker's book They Knew Too Much About Flying Saucers (1956) started other similar conspiracy accusations against mysterious officials or unidentified aliens. A number of UFO researchers have since reported sinister telephone warnings, slow knockings at the door, confiscation of documents, and other harassment.

Born May 2, 1925, in Riffle, West Virginia, Barker studied at Glenville State College (B.A., 1947). He was a public school teacher (1948–49), then a sales agent and theater owner. In 1952 he became interested in flying saucers and began writing for Space Review, the magazine of Bender's International Flying Saucer Bureau. In the fall of 1953 Bender closed the bureau and Barker began his own magazine, The Saucerian, later called The Saucerian Bulletin (1953–62). Barker then became obsessed with Bender's claim of having been threatened by three mysterious men in black and eventually wrote his first book about the Bender case, They Knew Too Much About Flying Saucers (1956). He also founded Saucerian Press (later the New Age Press), which published its first title, From Outer Space to You, by contactee Howard Menger in 1959.

Barker emerged in the 1960s as a collector of tales that floated through the flying saucer community, especially stories dealing with claims of actual contact with outer space beings and accounts exhibiting a paranoid element. Barker wrote and edited several books, including the Bender Mystery Confirmed (1962), Gray Barker's Book of Saucers (1965), Gray Barker's Book of Adamski (1967), The Silver Bridge (1970), and Gray Barker at Giant Rock (1974). Among his last publications were two bibliographical books, his own A UFO Guide to "Fate" Magazine (1981) and Bruce Walton's A Guide to he Inner Earth (1983). In the 1970s Barker began to issue an irregular publication, Gray Barker's Newsletter. He was president of the Saucers and Unexplained Celestial Events Research Society (SAUCERS) and a member of the National UFO Congress, the National Audio-Visual Association, and the Mountaineer Educational Media Association. He died December 6, 1984.

Sources:

Barker, Gray. The Silver Bridge. Clarksburg, W. Va.: Saucerian Books, 1970.

———. They Knew Too Much About Flying Saucers. New York: University Books, 1956.

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2, The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Bar-Lgura

Ancient Semitic demon said to sit on the roofs of houses and leap on the inhabitants. People so afflicted were called d'baregara.

Barlow, Fred (d. 1964)

Fred Barlow, photography expert for the Society for Psychical Research, became interested in the claims various people made of having taken photographs of spirit entities. He entered his study hopeful that photography might provide evidence of survival after death and for a while he emerged as a staunch defender of spirit photography. However, by mid-century, especially after his investigations of the work of spirit photographers George Moss and William Hope, he reversed his opinion. This change resulted from his own inability to produce any spirit photographs under test conditions (where the possibility of fraud was ruled out) and the discovery that every spirit photograph could consistently be traced to some existing photograph of which it was an exact copy. While he never discounted the possibility of genuine spirit photographs, his testimonies became an important force in killing the phenomenon.

Barlow died in 1964, and Eric J. Dingwall inherited his collection of photographs. Dingwall deposited them at the British Museum.

Sources:

Barlow, Fred. "Report on an Investigation into Spirit-Photography." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 41.

Dingwall, E. J. "The Need for Responsibility in Psychology." In A Skeptic's Handbook of Parapsychology. Edited by Paul Kurtz. N.p., 1985.

Barnaud, Nicholas (sixteenth century)

A sixteenth-century physician who claimed to have discovered the philosophers' stone. He published many short treatises on the subject of alchemy, which are contained in the third volume of the Theatrum Chimicum of Zetzner, published at Strasbourg in 1659.

Barnum Effect

The Barnum Effect is the name given a psychological process which some psychologists feel explains why people except what they term "pseudoscientific" explanations of events. The process is also called subjective validation effect or the personal validation effect. In the 1940s, one of the more famous demonstrations of the Barnum Effect was made by psychologist B. R. Forer. He gave his class a sophisticated personality but instead of calculating the results he developed a statement from an astrological sun-sign column of a local newspaper. In their confidential psychological report, each student received the following evaluation:

"You have a need for other people to like and admire you, and yet you tend to be critical of yourself. While you have some personality weaknesses you are generally able to compensate for them. You have considerable unused capacity that you have not turned to your advantage. Disciplined and self-controlled on the outside, you tend to be worrisome and insecure on the inside. At times you have serious doubts as to whether you have made the right decision or done the right thing. You prefer a certain amount of change and variety and become dissatisfied when hemmed in by restrictions and limitations. You also pride yourself as an independent thinker; and do not accept others' statements without satisfactory proof. But you have found it unwise to be too frank in revealing yourself to others. At times you are extroverted, affable, and sociable, while at other times you are introverted, wary, and reserved. Some of your aspirations tend to be rather unrealistic."

He then asked each student to evaluate their assessment on a scale of one to five (with one being bad and five being excellent. He found that the students accepted their evaluation, the class average being 4.2. Forer assumed human gullibility as the explanation of the student's acceptance of the reading. He argued that a variation of what he demonstrated in his class accounted for the public's acceptance of psychic readers and counselors. His colleagues have argued that his explanation was limited. Other reasons, ranging from human vanity to an attempt to make sense of a very chaotic world, were additional factors.

Forer's test has been repeated numerous times with amazing similar reports on the results. It has not been applied to more general audiences. It is a simple and fairly easy test to administer and calculate results. Other psychologists have offered profiles of more elaborate tests that would the several hypotheses that have arisen for Forer's original test. These generally require a great deal of additional effort by those running the tests and no one has as yet followed up on the suggestions.

In like measure, no longitudinal studies have been done on subjects taking the test to determine what if anything they might do with the test if the nature of the experiment were kept from them. Does it in fact simulate what it purports to do, the mechanism by which a person might visit and accept the words of a fortune teller? Given the rules governing experiments on human subjects, such tests are not likely to be done by Western psychologists in the foreseeable future.

Sources:

Beyerstein, Barry, and Dayle F. Beyerstein, eds. The Write Stuff - Evaluations of Graphology, the Study of Handwriting Analysis. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1991.

Dickson, D.H., and I.W. Kelly."The 'Barnum Effect' in Personality Assessment: A Review of the Literature." Psychological Reports 57 (1985): 367-382.

Forer, B.R. "The Fallacy of Personal Validation: A Classroom Demonstration of Gullibility." Journal of Abnormal Psychology 44 (1949): 118-121.

Barqu

According to legend, the demon that holds the secret of the philosophers' stone.

Barrett, Francis (fl. nineteenth century)

British magician Francis Barrett, the author of The Magus; or Celestial Intelligencer (1801), stands at the fountainhead of the modern practice of ceremonial magic. Little is known of the early life of Barrett, who is pictured as a young man in the portrait included in his book. However, in a footnote in The Magus, he offered himself as a magical teacher and invited readers to contact him if they wished to become his student (limited to 12). He was at the time living in Marlebourne. Students would be initiated into the occult arts and the practice of magic and be taught the philosophy, rites, and mysteries of the ancients.

Barrett seems to have acquired his knowledge from the library of Ebenezer Sibley (1751–1799), the author a decade earlier of a four-volume work surveying occultism. His library was sold through two London dealers and included English editions of the works of Henry Cornelis Agrippa von Nettesheim, Peter of Albano, Jean Baptiste von Helmont, and Giambattista Porta. These were the major items used in the preparation of The Magus; very little new material was contributed by Barrett himself. The major new material was a set of portraits of various demonic personalities, possibly seen by Barrett while scrying. At a time at which occult material was relatively scarce, Barrett's book offered readers a comprehensive introductory survey of magic and the occult arts as then known. It included sections on astrology, arithmancy, Kabbalistic magic, and the technique for scrying.

Barrett claimed to be a Rosicrucian. Since no Rosicrucian organization existed in England at the time, it is possible that he received initiation from Sigismund Bacstrom, a teacher of alchemy also residing in Marlebourne who had received a Rosicrucian initiation in Mauritius in 1794.

Little is known of Barrett's subsequent career. The Magus did not go through subsequent editions (though it has been reprinted in recent years). Only one of Barrett's students rose out of obscurity, John Parkins of Grantham in Lincolnshire. In 1802, Barrett prepared an essay on the invocation of spirits for Parkins, the manuscript of which has survived. Parkins later became a teacher in his own right.

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus; or Celestial Intelligencer. London, 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Barrett, Sir William Fletcher (1844–1925)

One of the distinguished early psychical researchers, a principal founder in 1882 of the Society for Psychical Research in England. Born February 10, 1844, in Jamaica, West Indies, Barrett was educated at Old Trafford Grammar School, Manchester, England. He became a science master, physics lecturer, and, from 1873 to 1910, professor of physics at the Royal College of Science, Dublin, Ireland. In 1916 he married Florence Willey. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, the Philosophical Society, and the Royal Society of Literature and a member of the Institute of Electrical Engineers and the Royal Irish Academy. He was a highly respected scientist, responsible for important developments in the fields of metal alloys and vision.

Studies in mesmerism aroused Barrett's curiosity for the physical phenomena of Spiritualism. He began his first investigations in 1874. Two years later he submitted a paper, "Some Phenomena Associated with Abnormal Conditions of Mind," to the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The Biological Committee refused it, and the Anthropological subsection only accepted it on the casting vote of the chairman, Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace. The paper contained an exposition of the professor's experiments in telepathy, the existence of which he considered proved, holding that this method of communication is probably explainable by some form of nervous induction.

Barrett was inclined to attribute the more marvelous physical phenomena of Spiritualism (levitation, the fire ordeal) to hallucination. He declared that he himself had heard psychic raps in broad daylight, out-of-doors under conditions that made trickery impossible.

In January 1882 Barrett called a conference in the offices of the British National Association of Spiritualists. At this conference the Society for Psychical Research was born. During a visit to the United States in 1885 he gave the impetus to the foundation of the American Society for Psychical Research.

His theory of hallucination as the cause of the greater part of physical phenomena was soon abandoned. He found mediums among personal friends who were above suspicion, and he could carry out experiments in daylight.

Every branch of psychical research claimed his attention, but his most important studies were on the divining rod. He collaborated with Theodore Besterman on a brilliant and comprehensive study of the subject. He did one of the earliest studies of near-death experiences and explored the philosophical implications of psychic matters. In his paper "Some Reminiscences of Fifty Years of Psychical Research" (1924), he concludes that there is convincing evidence for (1) the existence of a spiritual world, (2) for survival after death, and (3) for occasional communications from those who have died.

Barrett was convinced of the possibility of life of some kind in the "luminiferous ether." "It is in harmony with all we know," he writes in On the Threshold of the Unseen, "to entertain a belief in an unseen world, in which myriads of living creatures exist, some with faculties like our own, and others with faculties beneath or transcending our own; and it is possible that the evolutionary development of such a world has run on parallel lines to our own. The rivalry of life, the existence of instinct, intellect, conscience, will, right and wrong are as probable there as here, and, in course of time, consciousness of our human existence may have come to our unseen neighbours, and some means of mental, or even material communications with us may have been found."

Although Barrett is remembered for his work in psychical research, he also did outstanding work as a physicist and in 1899 was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He died May 26, 1925, in London.

Sources:

Barrett, Sir William F. Death-Bed Visions. London: Methuen, 1926. Reprint, Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

———. The Divining Rod. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

———. On the Threshold of a New World of Thought: An Examination of the Phenomena of Spiritualism and of the Evidence for Survival after Death. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1918.

———. On the Threshold of the Unseen. 1917. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1918.

———. Psychical Research. New York: H. Holt, [1911].

———. "Some Reminiscences of Fifty Years of Psychical Research," Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 34 (1924).

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Inglis, Brian. "Sir William Barrett (1844–1925)." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 55 (1988): 16.

"Bartholomew"

"Bartholomew," the entity channeled through Mary-Margaret Moore, has emerged through the several books of his teachings as one of the more popular entities in the New Age world. Described as an "energy vortex" or alternatively as "the higher and wiser level of energy," "Bartholomew" made his initial appearance in the mid-1970s. Moore was visiting with her friends John and Louise Aiken. John Aiken hypnotized Moore in an attempt to relieve her back pains, and "Bartholomew" began to speak.

Hesitantly Moore accepted "Bartholomew's" presence and allowed him to speak through her, but she also initially tested him. Noting the possibility that she was simply involved in a massive self-delusion, she monitored the information from "Bartholomew" and gauged it according to its helpful effects. Her acceptance of "Bartholomew" was also helped by consulting the I Ching, a Chinese divination method that involves the throwing of sticks that can create one of 64 hexagram patterns. She got the fiftieth, which refers to the "hollow" ruler who is receptive to the wisdom of a sage; and the first, which refers to the creative power of the Deity. She decided that she was the ruler and "Bartholomew" the sage and thus that the channeling was a valid experience.

Equally important, she observed that she and others who began to act out of Bartholomew's wisdom were benefiting from it. For herself, Moore discovered a balance between the use of her rational thinking abilities when appropriate and her intuitive self at other suitable moments. The channeling activity itself seemed to bring a sense of peace, gratitude, and love.

The first volume of selected materials from the channeling sessions with "Bartholomew" was published in 1984 as I Come as a Brother: A Remembrance of Illusions. As many people became aware of "Bartholomew," Moore attained some celebrity status within the New Age community. Moore soon produced a second volume, From the Heart of a Gentle Brother (1987). "Bartholomew" argues for the importance of relating to a higher reality. He calls upon people to turn within and discover the place of knowingness inside the self, assures people that they are not alone in the universe and that they need to open themselves to the energies that permeate it, allowing those energies to transform the self. Self-love and self-acceptance are additional important components of the transforming personality.

"Bartholomew" also emphasizes a life of harmlessness. The shift of people and of society as a whole to a higher level of consciousness is dependent upon the acceptance of a life of harmlessness and a move away from thoughts, words, and actions that lead to harm of others.

Sources:

Moore, Mary-Margaret. From the Heart of a Gentle Brother. Taos, N. Mex.: High Mesa Press, 1987.

———. I Come as a Brother: A Remembrance of Illusions. Taos, N. Mex.: High Mesa Publishing, 1984.

Bartlett, John Allen (1861–1933)

Retired English marine officer and songwriter who was the psychic medium of part of the Glastonbury Scripts, in which indications were given regarding the site and characteristics of the long-lost Edgar and Loretto Chapels of the Abbey at Glastonbury. Bartlett was a friend of Frederick Bligh Bond's, with whom the experiments were conducted and who excavated the abbey site. In his book The Gate of Remembrance (1918), Bond, using the pseudonym "John Alleyne" for his friend Bartlett, describes these experiments and their outcome.

Bond believed that the scripts and also the automatic sketches made by Bartlett gave archaeologically correct information, confirmed by the later excavations. Critics of Bond's book believed that such claims were not justified.

Sources:

Bond, Frederick Bligh. The Gate of Remembrance. Oxford: Blackwell, 1918.

Baru

Caste of priests in ancient Mesopotamia. (See Semites)

Bashir, Mir (1907–)

Kashmiri palmist noted for his serious study of the subject. During his research on palmistry he collaborated with physicians and criminologists, maintaining a library of over fifty thousand handprints. Mir Bashir moved to England in 1948. He wrote How to Read Hands (1955).

Basil (Astrologer)

A Florentine astrologer of the fifteenth century.

Basil (Herb)

Aromatic herb of the mint family (genus Ocimum) with a pungent clovelike flavor, much used in soups and other recipes. Many traditions and superstitions are connected with basil.

There are two suggested derivations of its popular name. It was once thought to be an antidote for the poison of the fabulous basilisk or cockatrice. Another tradition cites an early Greek name, basilikon, implying that the herb was used in a royal ceremony.

Some traditions believed it sacred, others that it was dedicated to the Devil. Greeks believed it was an emblem of hatred, Italians that it was appropriate to lovers. In both Greece and Rome there were ancient rituals involving cursing when the herb was planted, which were believed to assist growth. In Moldavia it was a folk superstition that a sprig of basil flowers handed by a girl to a wayward lover would ensure the boy's fidelity and love.

Basil is much prized in India, where it is known as tulsi (or tulasi) and regarded as sacred to the god Vishnu and the goddess Lakshmi. It is grown in pots near Hindu homes and temples. It is used in cooking and is also believed to help secure children.

Basilidians

A Gnostic sect founded by Basilides of Alexandria, who claimed to have received his esoteric doctrines from Glaucias, a disciple of the apostle Peter. Basilides recognized one supreme being named Abraxas. The sect posited three grades of existence—material, intellectual, and spiritual—and possessed two allegorical statues, male and female. The doctrine had many points of resemblance to that of the Ophites and the Jewish Kabala.

Sources:

Legge, Francis. Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity from 333 B.C. to 330 A.D. 2 vols. 1915. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Basilisk (or Cockatrice)

A fabulous reptilian monster of ancient and medieval legend believed to be generated from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent or a toad in a dunghill. Accounts of this monster vary, but it was generally said to have either the face of a cock or a distorted human face, with the wings and feet of a fowl and the tail of a serpent. It was represented this way in heraldry.

It was reputed to be a deadly creature with a destructive power similar to that of the fabulous Gorgons of Greek legend. A human being could survive its deadly glare only by viewing it in a mirror; however, if anyone saw the basilisk before it saw that person, the creature would die. It was even believed to kill itself if it saw its own image in a mirror. Even its breath was poisonous to plants and animals, as well as to humans, and was believed to have the power to split rocks. It is possible that this fearsome creature really evolved from exaggerated travelers' tales of the horned adder or the hooded cobra, confused with such awesome reptiles as the Gila monster.

Basilisk has also been applied to a group of iguanalike lizards (Basiliscus), found on the banks of rivers and streams in Central America and Mexico.

Sources:

Borges, Jorge Luis, with Margarita Guerrero. The Book of Imaginary Beings. Translated by Norman Thomas de Giovanni. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1970.

Bassantin (or Bassantoun), James (ca. 1504–1568)

Scottish astrologer and mathematician, the son of the laird of Bassandean in the Merse, Berwickshire, Scotland, born in the reign of James IV. After studying mathematics at the University of Glasgow, he traveled for further studies on the Continent. He subsequently went to Paris, where for some years he taught mathematics at the university. He returned to Scotland in 1562.

There was a prevailing belief in judicial astrology at that time, particularly in France. On his way home through England, according to Sir James Melville's memoirs, Bassantin met with Sir Robert Melville (brother of Sir James), who was at that time engaged on the part of the unfortunate Mary, Queen of Scots in endeavoring to effect a meeting between her and Elizabeth. Bassantin predicted that all his efforts would be in vain, which proved to be true.

Bassantin was a zealous Protestant. His principal work is a treatise on astronomy, written in French and translated into Latin by John Tornaesius, which was published at Geneva in 1599. He wrote four other treatises on mathematics and horoscopes, but they do not appear to have been published.

Bastian, Harry (nineteenth century)

Nineteenth-century American materialization medium whose exposure in Vienna on February 11, 1884, led Archduke John to publish a pamphlet under the title A Glimpse into Spiritualism.

Bastian traveled to Vienna at Baron Hellenbach's request expressly for the purpose of sitting for Archduke John and Crown Prince Rudolph. According to the baron, Bastian's powers had waned in 1882 and he had retired from giving séances. Nevertheless, he felt sufficiently confident of himself to honor the baron's request.

In the first séance nothing particular occurred. In the second, a bell that was pushed out of the circle by one of the sitters with his foot flew back ringing within the circle on request. Before the séance, a naval officer had bound Bastian to his chair. A few minutes later he was free, but his hands were tied in such a manner that the cords had to be cut.

At the third séance, after the company retired to an adjacent lighted apartment, phantoms appeared. When the fifth spirit walked in, the door between the dark room and the figure was, by a cord arrangement, suddenly shut by Archduke John. The "spirit" was caught and found to be Bastian without his shoes. The spirit costume, however, disappeared, and no trace of it was found either on Bastian's person or in the cabinet. Hellenbach, responding to the archduke's accusation of fraud in his The Logic of Facts, asserts, "There can scarcely be any doubt that Bastian would have been acquitted through a closer acquaintance with these phenomena."

However, this was not the first occasion on which Bastian was accused of fraud. In August 1874, during a séance with Bastian, a lady caught the medium's hand where a spirit hand should have been (see report in Medium, August 14, 1874). At another séance in Arnhem, an electric lamp was suddenly introduced, providing a moment's glimpse of Bastian holding a guitar in his hand over the heads of the sitters (Medium, January 15, 1875). On this occasion, the editor of the Medium and some other sitters insisted that this could have been a spirit hand in the act of dematerializing and sinking back into the medium's body.

Bat

There is an Oriental belief that the bat is specially adapted to occult uses. In the Tyrol, there is a folklore belief that the man who wears the left eye of a bat may become invisible, and in Hesse, he who wears the heart of a bat tied to his arm with red thread will always be lucky at cards.

"Bataille, Dr."

The alleged author of Le Diable au XIX. Siècle, published in Paris in 1892, a book that created a sensation with its revelations of the secret rites and orgies of many diabolic societies. The author claimed personal experience with devil worship. This exciting and colorful work of some 800,000 words attracted enormous attention and its stories of worldwide diabolic conspiracies associated with Freemasonry were widely discussed. It was first thought to be the work of Dr. Charles Hacks, who contributed a preface entitled "Revelations of an Occultist." Hacks was a real, although shadowy, figure. The book was later revealed to be the work of journalist and editor Gabriel Jogand-Pagés, also known as "Leo Taxil," who confessed to fabricating the book as an anti-Freemasonry, anticlerical hoax. (See also Diana Vaughan)

Sources:

Bataille, Dr. [Gabriel Jogand-Pagés]. Le Diable au XIX. Siècle. Paris, 1892.

Batcheldor, Kenneth J. (1921–1988)

British psychical researcher who specialized in the study of psychokinesis, or PK (the ability to move objects by means of mental concentration). He made a great contribution to identifying the conditions under which such phenomena are most likely to occur.

Before his detailed investigations, he had been a principal clinical psychologist for a group of hospitals in Devon, United Kingdom. At a social occasion in 1964, after a guest had told ghost stories, Batcheldor suggested the group "[have] a go at tabletipping just for fun." Although there were no perceptible unusual phenomena, a sitting at a later date was marked by a loud noise. During a subsequent séance in darkness, the table rose from the floor, apparently of its own volition. Batcheldor was sufficiently intrigued to continue experimental sittings in an attempt to explain the phenomenon. In 1976 he took early retirement and spent more time in the systematic study of what has become known as "macro-PK." He was assisted by fellow researcher Coin Brooked-Smith and other friends. He published some valuable papers on the subject, supported by the papers of Coin Brooked-Smith.

Batcheldor was fully aware of the difference between unconscious muscular activity and paranormal movement of a table, and of the part played by belief and a nonskeptical state of mind in facilitating the production of genuine phenomena. He stated:

"There's something about table-tipping that enables a group of ordinary people to succeed in generating PK without even trying, provided they are reasonably open-minded. It is this—in most cases the table will start to move due to unconscious muscular activity. This can give an amazing illusion that the table is moving of its own accord as if animated by some mysterious force. You get the impression you are already succeeding in generating paranormal movements. This has precisely the same impact on you as real success would have—it sweeps your doubts aside and produces total faith."

Such faith, he believed, was an essential factor in producing general PK effects. Other researchers have from time to time also discovered that rigid objectivity and skepticism are barriers to producing PK phenomena. The problems of possible fraud and repeatability under controlled conditions remain difficult for researchers.

According to Batcheldor, in a letter to Guy Lyon Playfair in 1966, "It is as if the universe allows psi to occur, now and then, quite easily and quickly provided the circumstances are such that it is accidental and not under conscious control. Perhaps if things were otherwise, reality would be too unstable." Playfair took part in a number of Batcheldor's investigations, and in an obituary for his friend (Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 55, July 1988) states, "It could even be argued that PK takes place only under conditions that make its verification impossible. . . . However, some of Ken's evidence is very compelling, especially the videotaped episodes in which the table can be seen moving in ways that do not appear normal. . . ."

Batcheldor died March 6, 1988. His paper "Notes on the Elusiveness Problem in Relation to a Radical View of Paranormality" (compiled, edited, and with a preface by Patrick V. Giesler) was published posthumously in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research. Batcheldor did much to encourage the production and investigation of PK phenomena among various groups and identified the conditions under which such phenomena could more readily occur.

Sources:

Batcheldor, Kenneth. "Contributions to the Theory of PK Induction from Sitter-Group Work." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 78 (1984).

———. "Notes on the Elusiveness Problem in Relation to a Radical View of Paranormality." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 88 (April 1994).

———. "Report on a Case of Table-Levitation and Associated Phenomena." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43 (1966).

Batcheldor, Kenneth, and D. W. Hunt. "Some Experiments in Psychokinesis." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43 (1966).

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Brooked-Smith, Coin. "Data-tape Recorded Experimental PK Phenomena." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 47 (1973).

Bathym

According to Johan Weyer, Bathym is a duke of the infernal regions, also known as Marthin. He has the appearance of a robust man, but his body ends in a serpent's tail. He rides a steed of livid color and is able to transport men from one place to another with wondrous speed. He is well versed in the virtues of herbs and precious stones. Thirty legions obey his behests.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1991.

Baton, The Devil's

There is preserved in the Market of the Arcane, Tolentino, Mexico, a baton that it is said the Devil used.

Bauer, Eberhard (1944–)

Eberhard Bauer, leading German parapsychologist, is a professor of psychology at the University of Freiburg, Germany. Bauer emerged in the period of recovery of German psychical research after World War II and became the leading German historian of parapsychology. In 1981 he led in the founding of the Wissenschaftliche Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Parapsychologie, the first successful academic parapsychology organization in the post-Nazi era. He also became the managing editor of Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie und Grenzgebiete der Parapsychologie, the leading parapsychological journal published in Germany. For Bauer's accomplishments as a historian and as a researcher in psychokinesis (PK), the Society for Psychical Research in England has made him a corresponding member.

Sources:

Bauer, Eberhard. "Criticism and Controversies in Parapsychology." European Journal of Parapsychology 5 (1984): 141.

Bauer, Georg (1490–1555)

German scholar and "father of mineralogy." He Latinized his surname (which means "boor" or "husbandman") to "Agricola" ("farmer"). Bauer was born March 24, 1490, at Glauchau, Saxony. An able and industrious man, he acquired considerable knowledge of the principles of medicine, which led him, as it led many of his contemporaries, to search for the elixir of life and the philosophers' stone. A treatise on these interesting subjects, which he published at Cologne in 1531, secured him the favor of Duke Maurice of Saxony, who appointed him superintendent of his silver mines at Chemnitz. In this post he obtained a practical acquaintance with the properties of metals, which dissipated his wild notions of their possible transmutation into gold; but if he abandoned one superstition he adopted another, and from the legends of the miners he imbibed a belief in the existence of good and evil spirits in the bowels of the earth, and in the creation of explosive gases and firedamp by the malicious agency of the latter.

Bauer's major work, De Re Metallica, completed in 1550 and published in 1556, has an illustration showing dowsers at work searching for minerals with a divining rod.

He died in Chemnitz on November 21, 1555.

Bave

Daughter of the wizard Calatin in ancient Irish mythology. She figures in the famous Irish legend The Cattle Raid of Quelgny. By taking the form of one of Niam's handmaids, she succeeded in enticing Niam away from Cuchulain and led her forth to wander in the woods.

The Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Fellowship

Founded by Guru Bawa, a Sufi teacher from Sri Lanka (Ceylon), is said to be over a hundred years old. Around 1940 he established an ashram on a farm in Sri Lanka, teaching a traditional Sufi doctrine. He traveled to the United States about 1971 to help found a Serendib Sufi study circle in Philadelphia. Other small fellowship groups sprang up around his teachings. He spoke Tamil and seems to have spent some time in South India. A Singalese doctor translated his Tamil discourses into English. His followers established the Guru Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Fellowship, now headquartered at 5820 Overbrook Ave., Philadelphia, PA 19131-1212. Website: http://www.bmf.org/.

Sources:

Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Fellowship. http://www.bmf.org/. March 27, 2000.

Muhaiyadden, Guru Bawa, Shaikh. God, His Prophets, and His Children. Philadelphia: Fellowship Press, 1978.

———. Guidebook. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Fellowship Press, 1976.

———. Mata Veeram, or the Forces of Illusion. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1982.

———. Truth and Light. Philadelphia: Guru Bawa Fellowship of Philadelphia, 1974.

Bayemon

Named in the grimoire of Honorius as a powerful demon and monarch of the western parts of the infernal regions. To him the following invocation is addressed:

"O King Bayemon, most mighty, who reigneth towards the western parts, I call upon thee and invoke thy name in the name of the Divinity. I command thee in the name of the Most High to present thyself before this circle, thee and the other spirits who are thy subjects, in the name of Passiel and Rosus, for the purpose of replying to all that which I demand of thee. If thou dost not come I will torment thee with a sword of heavenly fire. I will augment thy pains and burn thee. Obey, O King Bayemon."

Although ascribed to Pope Honorius III and supported by what is claimed as a papal bull authorizing ordained priests to invoke spirits and control demons, this grimoire is denounced by Roman Catholic writers as a forgery. The grimoire became popular among seventeenth-century occult magicians.

Bayside

Bayside, a section of the borough of Queens, New York, had been the scene of apparitions of the Virgin Mary to Veronica Lueken (1923–1995), a housewife, from 1970 until her death. Over the years she received numerous messages from the Virgin through a process now generally termed channeling.

Lueken's experience with the Virgin began in June of 1968, on the day that presidential candidate Robert F. Kennedy was assassinated. Watching television in her home, she responded to the call for prayers that had gone out and then smelled the scent of roses. Soon afterwards, St. Theresa (the French saint generally called the Little Flower) appeared. Her 10-year-old son also reported seeing the saint. No words were exchanged. Over the next two years she had a series of random visions; then in 1970, the Virgin appeared for the first time. Mary asked that on the eves of the great feast days of the Roman Catholic Church, vigil services for the recitation of the rosary be held outside of the St. Robert Bellermine Catholic Church in Bayside Hills, Queens. She would appear to Lueken at each of these vigils, the first of which was held on June 18, 1970. At these times, the Virgin spoke through Lueken and delivered numerous messages. She was invoked under the name Our Lady of the Roses, Mary Help of Mothers.

Large crowds began to gather for the vigils. The messages took an increasingly negative tone focusing upon the evil of the world and within the church, and warning of widespread chastisements. Included was a prophecy that a comet would strike the earth and that World War III was imminent. Relations with the church deteriorated after an investigation by the office of the Archbishop of Brooklyn concluded that there were not any miraculous or sacred qualities to the apparitions. Additionally, the neighbors complained about the noise and congestion caused by the gatherings. Forced from the church property, in 1975 Lueken and the group that had gathered around her moved to the Vatican Pavilion at Flushing Park that had been erected for the 1965 World's Fair. Lueken predicted that they would be allowed to return to the church, but that never occurred.

Shortly after the move, Lueken endorsed the idea that an imposter had been substituted for the real Pope Paul VI. She also supported the circulation of a number of unusual photographs said to be miraculous photographs. One such picture taken in 1971 of a statue of Mary turned out, when developed, to have the words "Jacinta 1972" written across it. Jacinta was one of the three children who saw the Virgin at Fatima, Portugal, in 1917. As she lay dying just a short time after the apparitions, she is noted to have told the nun caring for her that her order should prepare for 1972.

Lueken died in 1995. The messages channeled by her supported a conservative Roman Catholicism, prophesied many disasters, and decried the moral degeneration of modern life. Since her death the vigils have been carried on by the group that gathered around her and believed in her visions and the revelation spoken by the Virgin Mary through her. The continued vigils are carried on by Our Lady of the Roses Shrine, Box 52, Bayside, NY 11361. An Internet presence can be found at http://www.roses.org/. Believers in the apparitions in Massachusetts organized These Last Days Ministries (P.O. Box 40, Lowell, MA 49331-0240) and launched a weekly radio show, "These Last Days," to promote the messages from Bayside. Other groups in the conservative wing of the Roman Catholic Church have offered their support to the shrine.

Sources:

Grant, Robert. "War of the Roses." Rolling Stone 113 (February 21, 1980): 42–46.

Our Lady of the Roses, Mary Help of Mothers. Lowell, Mass.: These Last Days, n.d. [1987].

Beacon

Journal presenting the teachings of Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949), former Theosophist who founded her own Arcane School. Address: Lucis Publishing Co., 113 University Pl., 11th Fl., Box 722, Cooper Sta., New York, NY 10017.

Beads of Truth (Magazine) See Prosperity Paths (Newsletter)

"Beale, Dr."

The spirit doctor of Hulham House, near Exmouth, England, working through the medium Miss Rose. "Dr. Beale" is credited with the healing of many hopeless cases, as narrated in One Thing I Know (1919), Dr. Beale (1921), and The House of Wonder (1928), by E. M. S. (E. M. Storr), a lady patient, whom he cured.

According to his own claims, "Dr. Beale" had been a physician on Earth. He performed no operations, and his treatment mostly consisted of diet, bath, and massages. Hulham House was acquired in 1921 and was run on humanitarian principles. Patients who were unable to come to the home were often treated at a distance if they sent some articles of apparel to establish the link.

Miss Rose, as a rule, went into trance when "Dr. Beale" possessed her body and made the diagnosis. This was often preceded by another possession when "Madeleine," a spirit nurse, came through and prepared everything for the doctor as Miss Rose herself did not understand nursing. Another worker in "Dr. Beale's" band was "Dr. Nova," who worked through Sister Mercia, a fully trained nurse in a small town in Devon. Miss Rose often visited patients, and this way the healing was superintended by "Dr. Beale."

Bealings Bells

Title of a book by Major Edward Moore, F.R.S., that was published in 1841 on the mysterious bell ringing in his house at Great Bealings, Suffolk, England, which began February 2, 1834, and lasted for 53 days. Every attempt to discover the cause of the mysterious ringing was fruitless, and by no effort could the same clamorous, rapid ringing be normally produced. After three days of the strange experience, Major Moore concluded, "I am thoroughly convinced that the ringing is by no human agency." The psychic researcher Frank Podmore, in Modern Spiritualism (1902), believed the conviction too hastily formed and pointed out that the Major, the sole witness, did not describe a single occasion on which every member of the household was accounted for when the bell ringing occurred. However, no comment was passed by him on the sequel to Major Moore's story as told in the Ipswich Journal. Readers of the paper sent 14 communications of similar happenings in different parts of England, some of them recurring and having an ancestry of 100 years.

In My Life (1901), Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace quoted the testimony of Professor Anstead: "A neighbour and friend of mine at Great Bealings has had the most wonderful things happen in his house, which no one has ever been able to find a cause for. He has often told me about the bells ringing when no one was in the house. He was a very clever man, and I am sure what he says is true, and many people in the neighbourhood were witnesses of it."

Sources:

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Beans

The consumption of beans was prohibited by Pythagoras and Plato to those who desired veracious dreams, as they tended to inflate; and for the purpose of truthful dreaming, the animal nature must be made to lie quiet. Cicero, however, laughed at this prohibition, asking if it is the stomach and not the mind with which one dreams.

Sources:

Cunningham, Scott. Cunningham's Encyclopedia of Magical Herbs. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1985.

Bearded Demon

The demon who teaches the secret of the philosophers' stone. He is not well known. The démon barbu is not to be confused with Barbatos, a great and powerful demon said to be a duke in Hades, although not a philosopher; nor with Barbas, who is interested in mechanics. It is said that the bearded demon is so called on account of his remarkable beard.

Beare, Charles Albert (ca. 1931)

Famous British fake medium, who demonstrated claimed clairvoyance and trumpet and psychometry phenomena. In 1920 he joined the Spiritualist organization the Temple of Light and promoted himself as a medium. His "phenomena" were tested by the Temple of Light, which presented Beare with a diploma certifying his mediumistic "gifts" and accrediting him as an authorized medium. Beare claimed to have a spirit guide named "Shauna," supposed to be a Greek who had lived 130 years earlier.

In 1931, however, Beare published a confession in the newspaper Daily Express (September 18). He stated: "I have deceived hundreds of people. . . . I have been guilty of fraud and deception in spiritualistic practices by pretending that I was controlled by a spirit guide. . . . I am frankly and whole-heartedly sorry that I have allowed myself to deceive people."

On November 4, 1931, Beare gave a talk to members of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research, founded by psychical researcher Harry Price. Beare demonstrated his mediumistic frauds and stated that he was now absolutely disgusted with himself.

Beattie, John (ca. 1873)

A retired British photographer of Clifton, Bristol, England, with 20 years' experience, who decided to test the claims of Frederick A. Hudson in regard to spirit photography. In the early stage of the experiments, in which he was assisted by Dr.

G. S. Thompson, he registered failure after failure. Sometimes 20 plates were exposed without result, but in 1873 he obtained important results. The medium, a tradesman, described minutely and correctly in advance the appearances that were to be impressed on the plates. He claimed to see them clairvoyantly. The developed pictures tallied with his descriptions. The experiments were reported by Rev. Stainton Moses and others in Human Nature (vol. 8, 1874).

Beaumont, John (d. 1731)

British geologist, surgeon, and author of An Historical Physiological and Theological Treatise of Spirits, Apparitions, Witchcrafts, and Other Magical Practises published in 1705. He is described as "a man of hypochondriacal disposition, with a considerable degree of reading, but with a strong bias to credulity." Laboring under this affliction, he saw hundreds of imaginary men and women about him, though, as he added, he never saw anything in the night, unless by fire or candlelight, or in the moonshine. He said:

"I had two spirits, who constantly attended me, night and day, for above three months together, who called each other by their names; and several spirits would call at my chamber door, and ask whether such spirits lived there, and they would answer they did. As for the other spirits that attended me, I heard none of their names mentioned only I asked one spirit, which came for some nights together, and rung a little bell in my ear, what his name was, who answered Ariel. The two spirits that constantly attended myself appeared both in women's habit, they being of brown complexion, about three feet in stature; they had both black loose net-work gowns, tied with a black sash about the middle, and within the net-work appeared a gown of a golden colour, with somewhat of a light striking through it. Their heads were not dressed in top-knots, but they had white linen caps on, with lace on them about three fingers' breadth, and over it they had a black loose net-work hood."

He added: "I would not, for the whole world, undergo what I have undergone, upon spirits coming twice to me; their first coming was most dreadful to me, the thing being then altogether new, and consequently most surprising, though at the first coming they did not appear to me but only called to me at my chamber-windows, rung bells, sung to me, and played on music, etc.; but the last coming also carried terror enough; for when they came, being only five in number, the two women before mentioned, and three men (though afterwards there came hundreds), they told me they would kill me if I told any person in the house of their being there, which put me in some consternation; and I made a servant sit up with me four nights in my chamber, before a fire, it being in the Christmas holidays, telling no person of their being there. One of these spirits, in women's dress, lay down upon the bed by me every night; and told me, if I slept, the spirits would kill me, which kept me waking for three nights. In the meantime, a near relation of mine went (though unknown to me) to a physician of my acquaintance, desiring him to prescribe me somewhat for sleeping, which he did, and a sleeping potion was brought me; but I set it by, being very desirous and inclined to sleep without it. The fourth night I could hardly forbear sleeping; but the spirit, lying on the bed by me, told me again, I should be killed if I slept; whereupon I rose and sat by the fireside, and in a while returned to my bed; and so I did a third time, but was still threatened as before; whereupon I grew impatient, and asked the spirits what they would have? Told them I had done the part of a Christian, in humbling myself to God and feared them not; and rose from my bed, took a cane, and knocked at the ceiling of my chamber, a near relation of mine then lying over me, who presently rose and came down to me about two o'clock in the morning, to whom I said, 'You have seen me disturbed these four days past, and that I have not slept: the occasion of it was, that five spirits, which are not in the room with me, have threatened to kill me if I told any person of their being here, or if I slept; but I am not able to forbear sleeping longer, and acquaint you with it, and now stand in defiance of them'; and thus I exerted myself about them and notwithstanding their continued threats I slept very well the next night, and continued to do so, though they continued with me above three months, day and night."

Beauraing

Beauraing is a small town in the French-speaking part of Belgium that in 1932 became the site of one of the important modern apparitions of the Virgin Mary. The sighting of the Virgin was made by five children, all students in a Catholic parochial school. On November 29, 1932, at the end of the school day, the childen—Fernande (age 15), Gilberte (13), and Albert Voisin (11), and Andrée (14), and Gilberte (11)Degeimbre —gathered in front of the convent where the girls attended classes and prepared to walk home. Albert was the first to see someone on the railway bridge across from the convent. He called the attention of the others to the figure in white. Initially frightened, they hurried home. Their parents dismissed the story.

The next day at the same time, they again saw the figure. On the third night, it was in the convent garden near a statue of Mary as she had appeared at Lourdes. They saw that the figure was a young beautiful Lady dressed entirely in white with a nimbus of golden rays. She stood on a cloud that obscured her feet. Gilberte Degeimbre was overcome with emotion and the children took her home. Three of the children immediately returned to the garden. The Lady had changed locations, to the lower branch of a hawthorn tree. This would be the site of all of the future apparitions.

The apparitions continued daily through December, the five children gathering at the spot before the hawthorn tree in a trance-like state generally referred to as ecstasy. Others began to observe the children as they watched the Virgin, but as is common in such events, only the children actually saw her. As word spread through the community as to what was occurring, several physicians appeared among the observers, and in the course of the apparition tested the children. They stuck them with pins, placed a flame under their hands, directed a bright light into their eyes. The children reacted to none of these occurrences, and no sign of the testing appeared on their body after the apparition was finished.

The messages at Beauraing were brief, and in fact in more than 30 appearances the Virgin spoke only a couple of times. She did request that a chapel be built, and on one of her last appearances she exposed her Immaculate Heart (devotion to it being a major element in the apparitions at Fatima, Portugal). The last appearance occurred on January 3, 1933, in part noteworthy by the failure of one of the children to see her. The Virgin spoke an individual message to each of the four children and also gave them a secret. Secret messages had first become a part of the Virgin's apparitions at La Salette in France, but the secrets of Fatima had become an item for widespread speculation. After the apparition was seemingly over, the Lady appeared separately to the fifth child.

The apparitions caused a wide debate within Catholic circles in Belgium, and many denounced the children as hoaxers. Their plight was not helped by the appearance of several people claiming to have seen the Virgin also at the same spot but embellishing their story with obviously fanciful material. However, the children stuck to their story and returned each evening to the spot of the apparitions to pray. In 1935 the local bishop finally convened a committee to investigate the apparitions. They worked for nine years, but in the end concluded favorably and the church approved the apparitions. The approval came in the midst of World War II (1939–45) and the Nazi occupation of the country. After the war, a chapel was erected and pilgrimages commenced.

The children went on to lead rather ordinary lives. The four girls married and Albert served in World War II and afterwards moved to the Congo as a teacher. Today hundreds of thousands travel to Beauraing to visit the spot in the convent garden where the children saw the Virgin Mary. The apparitions at Beauraing are frequently tied to those at Banneux, Belgium, a nearby town that experienced a set of apparitons just a few weeks after those at Beauraing stopped.

Sources:

Amatora, Sister Mary. The Queen's Heart of God: The Complete Story of Our Lady of Beauraing. New York: Pageant Press, 1957.

Beevers, John. The Golden Heart: The Story of Beauraing, Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1956.

Connor, Edward. Recent Apparitions of Our Lady. Fresno, Calif.: Academy Library Guild, n.d.

Sharkey, Don, and Joseph Debergh. Our Lady of Beauraing. Garden City, N.Y.: Hanover House, 1958.

Beausoleil, Jean du Chatelot, Baron de (ca. 1576–1643)

German mineralogist and alchemist who lived during the first half of the seventeenth century. He traveled over most European countries looking for metals with the aid of a divining ring. In 1626 his instruments were seized under the pretext that they were bewitched, and he was imprisoned in the Bastille, where he died in 1643. In 1617 he published a work entitled Diorisinus, id est defintis verae philisophice de materia prima lapidis philosophalis. Beausoleil was the greatest of French metallurgists of his time. (See also Radiesthesia)

Bechard

A demon alluded to in the ancient grimoire, The Key of Solomon, as having power over the winds and the tempests. He makes hail, thunder, and rain.

Sources:

Mathers, S. L. MacGregor. The Greater Key of Solomon. Chicago: de Laurence, 1914.

Becker, Robert O(tto) (1923–)

Orthopedic surgeon and authority on the biological effects of electromagnetism, with special interest in the relationship between bioelectromagnetics and parapsychology. He was formerly chief of orthopedic surgery at the Veterans Administration Hospital, Syracuse, New York, and later clinical professor of orthopedic surgery at the State University of New York Upstate Medical Center and the Louisiana Medical Center in Shreveport.

Becker has published over 150 scientific papers relating to growth and healing electrical control mechanisms, and the effects of applied electrical currents and/or magnetic fields on living organisms.

His pioneering research in biological electricity and regeneration contributed to the emerging field of energy medicine, which explores alternative medical treatments such as acupuncture, electrotherapy, visualization, and hypnosis, all of which appear to use an invisible common source—the body's innate electrical systems. Becker initiated the first official hearings on power transmission line safety (1973–80, New York State Public Service Commission). He also served as an expert witness in congressional hearings before the House Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources.

His publications include Cross Currents (1990) and The Body Electric (1985). He has contributed chapters to numerous medical and scientific books and is associate editor for vols. 1–3 of Advances in Parapsychology (1977, 1978, 1982). Becker delivered the 1990 Gardner Murphy Memorial Lecture for the American Society for Psychical Research, titled "The Relationship between Bioelectromagnetics and Psychic Phenomena."

Sources:

Becker, Robert O. The Body Electric. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1990. Distributed by St. Martin's Press.

———. Cross Currents. New York: Quill, 1985.

Bed (Graham's Magnetic)

A magnetic contrivance, similar to the baquet, made use of by James Graham, eighteenth-century physician and magnetist of Edinburgh, Scotland. His entire house, which he dubbed the Temple of Hygeia and opened in 1779, was of great magnificence, especially the room with the magnetic bed. The bed itself rested on six transparent pillars; the mattresses were soaked with oriental perfumes; the bedclothes were of satin in tints of purple and sky blue. A healing stream of magnetism, as well as fragrant and strengthening medicines, were introduced into the sleeping apartment through glass tubes and cylinders. To these attractions were added the soft strains of hidden flutes, harmonicons, and a large organ. Use of this celestial couch was said to sooth shattered nerves and was allowed only to those who sent a written application to its owner and enclosed £50 sterling.

Bees

It was maintained by certain demonologists that if a sorceress ate a queen bee before being captured, she would be able to sustain her trial and tortures without making a confession. In some parts of Brittany it was claimed that these insects were very sensitive to the fortunes and misfortunes of their master, and would not thrive unless he was careful to tie a piece of black cloth to the hive when a death occurred in the family, and a piece of red cloth when there was any occasion of rejoicing.

The Latin grammarian Gaius Julius Solinus (third century C.E.) wrote that there are no bees in Ireland, and even if a little Irish earth be taken to another country and spread about the hives, the bees would abandon the place, so fatal to them is the earth of Ireland. The same story is found in the Origines of Isodore. "Must we seek," says Pierre Lebrun, author of Critical History of Superstitious Practices (1702), "the source of this calumny of Irish earth? No; for it is sufficient to say that it is a fable, and that many bees are to be found in Ireland."

There are many ancient superstitions about bees. In biblical times they were thought to originate in the bodies of dead cattle, hence the riddle by Samson in Judges 14:8, "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." In fact, the skeletonized rib cage skeleton of dead cattle provided a natural beehive. In Egyptian mythology, bees arose from the tears of the sun god Ra, while a Breton superstition said they came from the tears of Christ on the cross. In Hindu mythology, bees formed the bowstring of Kama, the Indian Cupid.

Popular folklore claimed that bee stings aided arthritis and rheumatism sufferers and recently bee venom has been revived as a possible treatment for multiple sclerosis.

In rural districts all over the world, the old custom of "telling the bees" persisted when there was a death in the family or someone left home. In Ireland, the bees also told secrets or advised on new projects. In ancient European folklore, bees were regarded as messengers to the gods, and the custom of "telling the bees" might have been a remnant of the idea of keeping the gods advised of human affairs.

Believe It

Former publication (newsletter) of the now-defunct Maryland Center for Investigation of Unconventional Phenomena, concerned with UFOs, Bigfoot, monsters, and related phenomena.

Belin, Dom Jean Albert (1610–1677)

A Benedictine born at Besancon, France, in 1610. His principal works, a treaty on talismans and a dissertation upon astral figures, were published at Paris in 1671 and again in 1709. He also published several texts on alchemy, Sympathetic Powder Justified in 1671 and Les aventures du Philosophe inconnu, en la recherche et en l'invention de la Pierre philosophale (Adventures of an unknown philosopher in the search for and the manufacture of the Philosophers' Stone) (Paris, 1664, 1674). This latter work is divided into four books and speaks very clearly of the manner in which the philosophers' stone is made. However, Belin ascribed the authorship to another hand, and some of the adventures appear symbolical rather than factual.

Belk Psychic Research Foundation

Now-defunct organization founded by Henry Belk, the eldest son of William Henry Belk Sr. of North Carolina (of department store fame), to investigate genuine ESP research. He had the early encouragement of Norman Vincent Peale and Dr. Charles Francis Potter. In cooperation with Harold Sherman, Belk was an early investigator of the phenomenon of psychic surgery as performed by Tony Agpaoa and other Philippine healers. The foundation was headquartered in New York City.

Sources:

Sherman, Harold. "Wonder" Healers of the Philippines. London: Psychic Press, 1967.

Bell, Fred (1940–)

Fred Bell, a flying saucer contactee, was born in Ann Arbor, Michigan. After high school he joined the Air Force. He was trained to work on radar and was stationed at a facility where numerous UFO contacts were tracked. Following his time in the Air Force, he worked with Rockwell International and then as a consultant to various companies in the aerospace industry. It was during this time that he became interested in Eastern spirituality and studied with several spiritual masters. He also obtained a degree in alternative medicine and became a lecturer on behalf of the National Health Federation (an organization advocating freedom of medical choice for the public).

In the 1970s Bell became well known as a contactee, claiming contact with Semjase, the extraterrestrial from the Pleiades first introduced to the public through the writings of William "Billy" Meier, the Swiss contactee. Popular UFO author Brad Steiger wrote about Bell in his 1988 book The Fellowship, and then collaborated with Bell in the production of a fictionalized autobiography, The Promise (1991). The latter book suggested that the Pleiadians had come to the Earth in ancient times, during the Atlantis era. At one point, an evil cabal arose and stole the advanced teachings of the Pleiadians in order to gain dominion over the Earth. They took their struggle to Egypt but were blunted by their inability to gain a Pleiadian artifact, a small jeweled medallion which gave anyone who wore it access to advanced scientific information and also transferred power to the brain.

According to Bell's story, his father discovered the medallion while in Egypt in the 1930s. However, he was killed in the effort to keep it from the Nazis, the modern representatives of the evil Atlanteans. The medallion eventually came into Bell's possession. He then went to Egypt, where he met Semjase and found a book containing information on Pleiadian science and technology. Semjase communicated to him that she had a mission of sharing the technology from the Pleiades with the Earth. The transfer of that technology has been authorized by the intergalactic Andromedan Council. The Pleiadians were also attempting to activate human wisdom.

Through the 1990s, Bell has been a popular lecturer at UFO and New Age gatherings. More recently, he authored a second book, Rays of Truth-Crystals of Light (1998), introducing some of the Pleiadian technology, much of which makes contact with the older teachings of the Western Esoteric tradition.

Sources:

Bell, Fred. Rays of Truth-Crystals of Light: Information and Guidance for the Golden Age. Blue Hill, Maine: Medicine Bear Publishing, 1998.

———, as told to Brad Steiger. The Promise. New Brunswick, N.J.: Inner Light Publications, 1991.

Steiger, Brad. The Fellowship. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Co, 1988.

Belli Paaro

A former secret society of Liberia, Africa, the cult of which consisted in a description of brotherhood with departed spirits. The seventeenth-century author Olfert Dapper, writing of this society, stated: "They have also another custom which they call Belli Paaro of which they say it is a death, a new birth and an incorporation in the community of spirits or soul with whom the common folk associate in the bush, and help to eat the offerings prepared for the spirits." This description is far from clear, but apparently those who joined the society wished to be regarded as spiritualized, or as having died and having been brought to life again; and that their society was a confraternity of all those who had passed through this training in common.

Belloc, Jeanne (ca. 1609)

An alleged witch of the Labourd district in the Basque region of France, who in the reign of Henry IV was indicted for sorcery at the age of 84 years. In answer to Pierre De Lancre who interrogated her, she stated that she first attended the sabbatic meetings of Satan in winter 1609, where she was presented to the Devil, who kissed her—a mark of approbation that he bestowed upon the greatest sorcerers only. She described the Sabbat as a masked ball to which some came in their ordinary forms, while others joined the dance in the guise of dogs, cats, donkeys, pigs, and other animals.

However, no reliance can be placed on the confessions of any victims of De Lancre, as he used torture and believed that most of the 30,000 inhabitants of Labourd, including the priests, were infected with witchcraft.

Bélmez Faces

Strange pictures that appeared on the stone hearth in the kitchen of Juan Pereira Sanchez in the village of Bélmez de la Moraleda, Spain, during 1971. The Sanchez family was puzzled and frightened when the first face gradually manifested on the hearth, and eventually the son of the family hacked out the face with a pickaxe and filled in the hole with cement and sand. Soon afterward, however, a second face appeared near the site of the first one.

As the news spread, neighbors and later sightseers visited to see this phenomenon. The second face was hacked out and placed on a kitchen wall under glass. On the advice of the village mayor, the hearth was excavated and a shaft over six feet dug out. Bones were discovered, and it was later learned that the house was built on the site of an old cemetery. The second face had an agonized expression and resembled a Byzantine sketch. Other faces continued to appear.

The case was investigated in 1972 by German de Argumosa, who reported on some 18 "Bélmez faces" that had "grown" beyond the cemented hearth on the tiled kitchen floor. Even when the professor covered and sealed the floor with plastic, new faces appeared under the plastic, although the seals were not tampered with. Tape recordings were also made of voices associated with the face phenomena.

Belocolus

A fabulous white stone with a black pupil, said to render its bearer invisible in a field of battle.

Beloff, John (1920–)

Psychologist and parapsychologist; served as president of the Parapsychological Association in 1972 and again in 1982; president of the Society for Psychical Research, 1974–76; and editor of the society's Journal.

He studied philosophy and psychology at the University of London, England; became research assistant at the University of Illinois (1952); lecturer in psychology at Queen's University, Belfast, Ireland (1953); then was appointed senior lecturer in psychology at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1956. He has had a long career of research and writing in parapsychology. Among his numerous books, Psychological Sciences (1974) and New Directions in Parapsychology (1975) have been translated into several foreign languages. His later books include The Importance of Psychical Research (1988); The Relentless Question: Reflections on the Paranormal (1990) and Parapsychology: A Concise History (1993). He was also program committee chair for the joint Society for Psychical Research/Parapsychology Association Centenary Conference at Cambridge, England, in 1982.

Sources:

Beloff, John. Existence of Mind. New York: Citadel, 1964.

———. The Importance of Psychical Research. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1988.

———. New Direction in Parapsychology. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

———. Parapsychology: The Way Ahead. Turnbridge Wells, U.K.: Institute for Cultural Research, 1974.

———. Psychological Sciences: A Review of Modern Psychology. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1974.

Belomancy

A method of divination by arrows that dates as far back as ancient Chaldea. It existed among the Greeks, and still later among the Arabians, although its use was forbidden by the Quran. One popular method was to throw a certain number of arrows into the air, and the direction in which the arrow inclined as it fell pointed out the course to be taken by the enquirer. Divination by arrows is related to rhabdomancy.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Belphegor

The demon of discoveries and ingenious inventions. He was said to appear in the shape of a young woman. The ancient Moabites, who called him Baalphegor, adored him on Mount Phegor. He was believed to bestow riches.

Bender, Albert K.

Organizer of an American flying saucer bureau who claimed to have discovered important data on the origin of UFOs but is supposed to have been silenced in September 1953 by the visit of three mysterious men dressed in black. Three years later this story was released by publisher/writer Gray Barker in They Knew Too Much about Flying Saucers. The book firmly established the MIB (Men in Black) in UFO mythology. In 1962 Bender published his own book, Flying Saucers and the Three Men, notwithstanding the alleged sinister silencers, in which the somewhat anticlimactic secret was supposed to be an Agharta-type underground UFO base in Antarctica, discovered during an astral projection. Barker, always aware of the public appetite for paranoia, used the Bender story as the basis for writing two further books, Bender Mystery Confirmed (1962) and MIB: The Secret Terror among Us (1983).

Sources:

Barker, Gray, ed. Bender Mystery Confirmed. Clarksburg, W.V.: Saucerian Books, 1962.

———. MIB: The Secret Terror Among Us. Jane Lew, W.V.: New Age Press, 1983.

———. They Knew Too Much about Flying Saucers. Clarksburg, W.V.: Saucerian Press, 1962. Reprint, New York: Tower, 1967.

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959; The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 2. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Bender, Hans (1907–1991)

Professor of psychology, author, noted parapsychologist. He was born February 5, 1907, at Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany. He studied with Pierre Janet in Paris during the 1930s and received his Ph.D. from the Psychological Institute at Bonn University in 1936. He was the only parapsychologist to avoid the general suppression of psychical research during the Nazi era. In 1954 he obtained the Chair for Psychology and Border Areas of Psychology at the University of Freiburg, which became the center from which parapsychology was slowly revived after World War II. He retired from the university in 1975; then he directed the independent institute known as the Institute Für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene (Institute for Border Areas of Psychology and Mental Hygiene). From 1957 to the time of his death in 1991, Bender acted as editor of the Zeitshrift für Parapsychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie (Journal of Parapsychology and Border Areas of Psychology). He was a member of the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Psychologie and the Parapsychological Association, an honorary member of Società Italiana di Parapsicologia, and a corresponding member of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

A distinguished parapsychologist who wrote a number of books and articles on a wide range of subjects including ESP, psychokinesis, mediumship, spontaneous phenomena, and spiritual healing, Bender was best known in the English-speaking world for his work on poltergeists, about which he has authored a number of papers. The Institute für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene houses a large library relating to border areas of psychology. The library is administered by the University Library of Freiburg, and the address of the Institute is: Eichhalde 12, D-7800 Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany.

Sources:

Bender, Hans. "New Developments in Poltergeist Research." Proceedings of the Parapsychological Association 6 (1969): 81.

———. Unser sechter Sinn. Stuttgart: Wilhelm Goldman Verlag, 1982.

Bendit, L(aurence) J(ohn) (1898–1974)

Psychiatrist, author, parapsychologist. Born in France May 14, 1898, he was educated at Cambridge University, England, and in 1923 established his psychiatric practice in London. In 1939 he married Phoebe Daphne Payne, with whom he would later write several books. He became interested in psychical research during his college years and joined the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1937. His doctorate in medicine was the first to be granted for work in parapsychology by a British university. His thesis, Paranormal Cognition, was published in 1944, followed by Living Together Again (1946) and This World and That (1948).

Bendit was also a devoted member of the Theosophical Society and served as the general secretary of the society in London for three years (1958–61). When his term in office ended, the American section invited him to take up residence at the headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois. In 1962 Bendit headed the research department and produced the small volume, Key Words in the Wisdom Tradition. Later that year, he and his wife moved to Ojai, California, and led in the revival of the Krotona Institute of Theosophy's educational program.

Bendit was a prolific author, and he and his wife collaborated on a number of important texts. He specialized in the question of psychic ability in relation to psychological problems.

Sources:

Bendit, Laurence J. The Mirror of Life and Death. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1965.

———. The Mysteries Today, and Other Essays. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1973.

———. Self Knowledge: A Yoga for the West. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1967.

Bendit, Laurence J., and Phoebe D. Bendit. Man Incarnate. 1957. Reprinted as The Etheric Body of Man. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1977.

———. This Transforming Mind. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1970.

Mills, Joy. One Hundred Years of Theosophy: A History of the Theosophical Society in America. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1987.

Bendit, Phoebe Daphne (Payne) (1891– ?)

Psychotherapist, author, and collaborator with her husband, Dr. L. J. Bendit, in parapsychological studies. Phoebe Bendit was also clairvoyant and associated with the British College of Psychic Science in London. She was sole author of several books and co-author of other books with her husband. In 1961 she moved with her husband to Wheaton, Illinois, and the following year to Ojai, California, where they revived the work of the Krotona Institute of Theosophy.

Sources:

Bendit, L. J., and Phoebe Bendit. Living Together Again. London, Gramol Publications, 1946.

———. Man Incarnate. N.p., 1957. Reprinted as The Etheric Body of Man. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1977.

———. This Transforming Mind. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1970.

Bendit, Phoebe. Man's Latent Powers. London, Faber and Faber, 1938.

———. The Psychic Child or Over-sensitive Child. N.p., 1955.

Bendit, Phoebe, and Laurence J. Bendit. The Psychic Sense. London: Faber and Faber, 1943.

———. This World and That. London: Faber and Faber, 1950.

Benedict, Mrs. (ca. 1850)

Of Auburn, New York, official medium of the Apostolic Circle, the first American psychic after the Fox sisters. Her psychic faculties were developed in Katie Fox's circle in Auburn. Her channeling from the biblical apostles and prophets was edited and published by Thomas Lake Harris.

Benedict XIV, Pope (1675–1758)

Pope Benedict XIV, born Prospero Lambertini of a noble Italian family, is credited with making the first modern objective "scientific" studies of the paranormal in Italy. Lambertini became one of the best educated people of his day, attaining doctorates in both law and theology. Ordained to the priesthood, he became bishop, cardinal (1728), then archbishop of Bologna (1731). From 1702 to 1722 he served as the "devil's advocate" in a series of cases of people proposed for canonization by the Roman Catholic Church. Among the issues the Church investigated in that process were alleged miraculous occurrences credited to the candidate proposed for sainthood.

Lambertini quickly gained a reputation as one who admitted the possibility of miracles but took a very skeptical view of reports of paranormal phenomena. He refused to regard as a "miracle" any event that could result from natural phenomena. He made independent studies of luminous phenomena, nonconventional healings, and extrasensory perception (ESP). He came to see ESP as a natural phenomenon neither spiritually nor diabolically based. He capped his career with the publication of a four-volume work, De Canonization Santorum (1734–38), which had a marked effect upon the thinking of the Church on miracles in a still very superstitious age.

Lambertini was elected to the papal chair in 1740. He gained a reputation as an educated and witty leader and earned the approbation of Voltaire, who dedicated one of his plays to him.

Sources:

Haynes, R. Philosopher King: The Humanist Pope Benedict XIV. London: Weidenfield & Nicolson, 1970.

Benedict IX (ca. 1021–ca. 1054)

During the tenth and eleventh centuries, when the papacy was much abused, the papal crown was more than once offered for sale. Thus the office fell into the hands of a high and ambitious family who held it for a boy of 12—Benedict IX—who became pope from 1033 to 1048. As he grew older the boy lost no opportunity to disgrace his position by his depraved mode of life.

But, according to legends, he excelled in sorcery and various forms of magic. One story tells how he made the Roman matrons follow him over hill and dale, through forests and across rivers, by the charm of his magic, as though he were a sort of Pied Piper.

Benedict was finally driven from Rome by the Marquis of Tuscany in July 1048. He died a few years later.

Beneficent Spiritual Center Uniao do Vegetel

The Beneficent Spiritual Center Uniao do Vegetel is one of several religious groups that have arisen in the twentieth century in Brazil whose practice is built around the consumption of ayahuasca. Ayahuasca is an hallucinogenic substance created from the vine known as Banisteriopsis Caapi, which is boiled in water along with various other plants that also contain psychedelic properties. It was founded by José Gabriel da Costa, known by his followers as Maestre Gabriel.

Maestre Gabriel was born on February 10, 1922, in Coracao de Maria, a small town in the Brazilian state of Bahia. In 1942 he became part of a government program to accelerate the production of rubber for the war effort and while working in the area near the Brazilian/Bolivian border encountered ayahuasca (or hoasca). The formation of the Unioa is dated from that experience though the reconstruction of the religion would take the next 20 years. Maestre Gabriel died on September 24, 1971.

According to the Uniao de Vegetel, its religion dates to the time of King Solomon in Israel. Over the years it has disappeared on several occasions, but as God sees fit, spiritual personages are called forth to reestablish it. In the past, such an effort was reinitiated by the Incas. Maestre Gabriel traced his own introduction to the substance to a people who continued its use from Incan times though the Incan ritual and doctrine had been lost.

Rituals of the Uniao de Vegetel have some resemblance to the Santo Daime, the older ayahuasca group in Brazil. It includes the consumption of the drug and the singing of the songs that were received by Maestre Gabriel. The group has more than 75 centers in Brazil, and may be contacted through its webpage at http://www.udv.org.br/udvpag01-ing.htm.

In 1991 and 1995, the Uniao organized international conferences to promote the study of ayahuasca and assist in the process of its legalization and legitimization internationally.

Sources:

Beneficent Spiritual Center Uniao do Vegetel. http://www.udv.org.br/udvpag01-ing.htm. June 12, 2000.

Benemmerinen

According to ancient Hebrew belief, Benemmerinen are witches who haunt women in childbirth for the purpose of stealing newborn infants.

Benjamine, Elbert (1882–1951)

Elbert Benjamine, one of America's leading astrologers in the early twentieth century and the founder of the Church of Light, was born December 12, 1882, in Iowa. He began to study the occult as a teenager and in 1900 made contact with the Heremetic Brotherhood of Luxor, a small occult order headquartered in Denver, Colorado. The Hermetic Brotherhood was the outward expression of the Brotherhood of Light, a mystical order of enlightened beings believed by occultists to guide the destiny of humankind. The Brotherhood of Light was believed to have been founded in ancient Egypt and to have continued to the present under the leadership of a group of teachers not presently incarnated on the physical plane. The group is popularly known by many as the Great White Brotherhood. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor circulated a series of lessons written by the Hermetic Brotherhood's founder, Thomas H. Burgoyne.

In 1907 Benjamine directly contacted what he believed to be the Brotherhood of Light in response to his prayer for direction in his life. The members of the brotherhood assured him that he had an important task ahead of him. Two years later he was called to Denver to become the Hermetic Brotherhood's astrologer, taking over the position formerly held by Minnie Higgins, who had recently died. He declined, but the next year he accepted an assignment to prepare a series of lessons on the 21 branches of occult science. After five years of intense study, he felt ready to write. His work would take some 20 years to complete.

Meanwhile, the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor was closed and Benjamine was left as an independent representative of the Brotherhood of Light. In 1915 he moved to Los Angeles and began holding classes. Only a small group gathered during the war years, but in 1918 he opened the brotherhood to the public and began his first public class on Armistice Day. As the lessons were completed, they were mimeographed and used as class texts. Eventually Benjamine would publish them under the pseudonym C. C. Zain, the name he used for all official brotherhood writings.

In the 1920s Benjamine also emerged as a specialist in astrology, the area of occult science he enjoyed the most, and he became an important force in rebuilding astrology in the modern world. In the 1940s, having completed his writing task for the brotherhood, he issued a number of important astrological texts, including How to Use the Modern Ephemerides (1940), Stellar Dietetics (1942), The Beginner's Horoscope Maker (1940), and Astrological Lore of All Ages (1945).

In 1932 Benjamine incorporated with Church of Light as a new esoteric expression of the Brotherhood of Light. He led the church until his death on November 18, 1951, by which time membership had spread across the United States and into Canada, England, Mexico, Nigeria, and Liberia.

Sources:

Benjamine, Elbert. Astrological Lore of All Ages. Chicago: Aries Press, 1945.

———. Beginner's Horoscope Maker. Chicago: Aries Press, 1940.

———. Stellar Dietetics. Chicago: Aries Press, 1942.

"The Founders of the Church of Light." Church of Light Quarterly 45, no. 1 (February 1970): 1–2.

Zain, C. C. [Elbert Benjamine]. Brotherhood of Light Lessons. 22 vols. Los Angeles: Church of Light, 1922–32.

The Benjees

Said to be a former Indian cult that engaged in devil worship. It seems likely that this belief was based on a misunderstanding of the symbolism of images of Indian temples.

Bennett, (Charles Henry) Allan (1872–1923)

British occultist, at one time the teacher of Aleister Crowley, whom he met when they were both members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. However, Bennett's inclination was primarily toward mysticism rather than the occult. He lived in London in great poverty, racked by illness, but made a profound impression on a small circle of perceptive friends for his dedication to Buddhist principles and ideals. Aleister Crowley claimed that he had once witnessed Bennett levitate while in a state of meditation.

Bennett was born in London on December 8, 1872. Orphaned at an early age, he was adopted by S. L. M. Mathers, one of the founders of the Golden Dawn. Bennett was educated at Hollesley College and at Bath, England, and took a special interest in scientific research. As a young man he earned a living in a chemical laboratory. Although originally brought up by his mother as a Roman Catholic, he was introduced to occultism through his foster father, who eventually initiated him into the Golden Dawn, in which he was known as Frater Iehi Aour ("Let there be light"). He displayed a great talent for occultism and also conducted a number of dangerous experiments upon himself with poisonous drugs, investigating the borderline between subconscious and supernormal aspects of the mind. Most of the time he lived simply in a small London apartment, where he first studied Sir Edwin Arnold's The Light of Asia, one of the first translations of a Buddhist text readily available to the public. He became increasingly fascinated by Buddhism, and at the age of 28 decided to travel abroad to study Buddhism and to seek relief for his asthma.

He traveled to Ceylon in 1898 and studied Pali at Kamburugamuwa. In Colombo he became a pupil of the yogi Shri Paranánda, who taught him Hatha Yoga asanas and pranayama as well as meditation techniques. Bennett went on to Burma, where he became a Buddhist monk in the monastery of Akyab, taking the name Bhikku Ananda Metteya ("bliss of loving kindness"). The name was appropriate since he was a particularly compassionate individual. He founded the Buddhasasana Samagama, or International Buddhist Society, in 1903. He initially served as its secretary general.

He still suffered considerably with poor health and his doctors recommended he travel to California where the air might be better for his lungs. He came back to England on the first stage of his journey, but the intervention of World War I prevented further financial assistance from the East, and he was obliged to stay in London. Here he was befriended by the playwright Clifford Bax and published the Buddhist Review, propagating the cause of Buddhism in England. He never got to California, spent his time in London in great poverty and ill health, and died March 9, 1923.

Sources:

Bennett, Allan. The Wisdom of the Aryas. London, 1923.

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill and Wang, 1969.

Oliver, Ian P. Buddhism in Britain. London: Rider, 1979.

Bennett, Ernest (Nathaniel) (1868–1947)

British politician and writer on psychic phenomena. Born December 8, 1868, at Rede, Suffolk, England, he was educated at Durham School and Hertford College, Oxford, and in 1915 he married Marguerite Kleinwort. Elected to Parliament in 1906, he later served as the parliamentary private secretary (1909) and assistant postmaster-general (1932–35). He was knighted in 1930.

As a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, Bennett was particularly interested in investigating haunted houses, about which he wrote one book. He died February 2, 1947.

Sources:

Bennett, Ernest. Apollonius; or, The Future of Psychical Research. N.p., 1927.

———. Apparitions and Haunted Houses. London: Faber and Faber, 1939.

———. Christianity and Paganism in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries. London: Rivingtons, 1900.

———. The Downfall of the Dervishes. New York: Negro University Press, 1969.

Bennett, J(ohn) G(odolphin) (1897–1974)

Mathematician, industrial research director, and author of books on parapsychology and the paranormal. He was born in London, England, on June 8, 1887, and was educated at Kings College School, London; the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich; the School of Military Engineering at Chatham; and the School of Oriental Studies, London. He had an outstanding career as a scientist, and in his mature years served as chair and director of the Institute for the Comparative Study of History, Philosophy, and the Sciences, (1946–59).

Bennett took a special interest in the work and teachings of Georgei I. Gurdjieff and after Gurdjieff's death he helped launch the British section of the Subud movement at the headquarters at Coombe Springs, Kingston-on-Thames, England. He wrote a number of books including an autobiography, Witness (1962). Although Bennett's major interest was in the philosophy and techniques of Gurdjieff, he also drew upon other techniques of human transformation and self-awareness, the Shivapuri Baba (a Nepalese saint), dervish dancing, and Sufism. Bennett was particularly concerned with group dynamics in the fields of communication and education.

In 1962–63, Bennett visited Shivapuri Baba (then 136 years old) in the Himalayas, a trip described in his 1965 book, Long Pilgrimage. Both Bennett and his wife, Elisabeth, then entered the Catholic faith (see Bennett's Spiritual Psychology [1964]), following contact with the author Sayed Idries Shah, to whose movement the institute donated its estate at Coombe Springs. This was subsequently sold. In 1971 another estate was acquired in Sherborne, Gloucestershire, and the International Academy for Continuous Education was set up "to achieve, in a short space of time, the effective transmission of a whole corpus of practical techniques for self-development and self-liberation, so that people could learn effectively to direct their own inner work and to adapt to the rapid changes in the inner and outer life of man." This program included a synthesis of such disciplines as mantra yoga, Gurdjieff movements, Sufi teachings, prayers, and dervish dances. Eventually the Sufi community Beshara took over the academy.

Foreseeing chaos, Bennett advocated the establishment of self-sufficient communities of people initiated in the technique of creative transformation whereby the individual transcends almost totally the preoccupation with self to avoid complete elimination. The first such community was established at Claymont, West Virginia, near Washington, D.C.

Bennett died on December 13, 1974. His work is carried on in the United States by the Claymont Society for Continuous Education, Box 122, Charlestown, WV 25414. In Great Britain his disciples may be contacted at Daglingworth Manor, Daglingworth, Gloucester GL7 7AH, England.

Sources:

Bennett, John. Creative Thinking. Sherbourne, U.K.: Coombe Springs Press, 1964.

———. John G. Bennett's Talks on Beezlebub's Tales. Compiled by A. G. E. Blake. York Beach, Maine: S. Weiser, 1988.

———. Enneagram Studies. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1983.

———. Gurdjieff: Making a New World. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

———. Is There "Life" on Earth? Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bennett Books, 1989.

———. Long Pilgrimage: Shivapuri Baba. Clearlake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1983.

———. Spiritual Psychology. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1974.

———. Witness. New York: Dharma Book Co., 1962.

Bennett, Sidney Kimball (1892–1958?)

Prominent figure in twentieth-century astrology. Bennett was born in Chicago on February 10, 1892. Although biographical facts are scarce, he seems to have started his study of astrology around 1915 and to have become a professional in the early 1920s. His first book, Your Birthday and the Year Ahead, appeared in 1928.

During the late 1920s, a series of events came to radically alter his view of astrology. He had received complaints from clients that his predictions for them had not worked as expected. He turned away the criticisms as the result of faulty birth data, which led to mistakes in the placement of planets in the horoscope chart. However, privately he had noted that the failed predictions had derived from his use of what astrologers termed progressions, an old tool for manipulating the chart. (Progressions are based on the notion that there is a relationship between the first day of a person's life and the first year of that person's life. In like measure there is a relationship between the second day and the second year. Thus by examining on the chart the same number of days after the person's birth as the person's age in years, the astrologer supposedly can make some judgments about the present and the immediate future.)

Then two events, one the death of a client in an accident and the other a failed business trip for which Bennett had had high hopes, led to his discarding progressions altogether. He moved on to develop a system based on the solar return (the sun's return to its position in a birth chart, which occurs every seven years), which he called the "Key Cycle."

Bennett functioned publicly under the pen name Wynn. He began Wynn's Astrology Magazine in 1931, and for the next two decades it was one of the most influential in the emerging field. He also contributed a column to the New York Daily News and wrote a number of popular books. He retired in the 1950s, and his last days are undocumented. Dal Lee, in Dictionary of Astrology, reports a rumor that Bennett ended his own life in Australia in 1958, but that event is unverified.

Sources:

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Lee, Dal. Dictionary of Astrology. New York: Coronet Communications, 1968.

Wynn [Sidney K. Bennett]. Astrology, Science of Prediction. Los Angeles: Wynn Publishing, 1945.

———. Astrology, Your Path to Success. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1938.

———. The Key Cycle. 1931. Reprint, Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1970.

Benson, E(dward) F(rederic) (1867–1940)

British novelist, essayist, and biographer, who published 80 works, including some of the most eerie and horrific short stories on occult themes ever written. "The Room in the Tower" and "Mrs. Amworth" have become classic vampire stories.

Born July 24, 1867, at Wellington College (where his father E. W. Benson was headmaster, before becoming archbishop of Canterbury), he was educated at Marlborough, and at King's College, Cambridge University. He worked at Athens for the British Archaeological School, 1892–95, and in Egypt for the Hellenic Society, 1896; he also traveled in Algiers, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. He was elected mayor of Rye, Sussex, 1934–37, living at the famous Lamb House that had been the residence of American novelist Henry James for 18 years. He was an honorary fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge, and was also made a member of the Order of the British Empire for his services to literature.

His best-known fiction works were the series about social climber "Lucia Pillson," later dramatized on British radio and television. His short stories on horror and fantasy themes showed him to be a master of the macabre. He died February 29, 1940.

An E. F. Benson Society has been organized in Britain, arranging social and literary events relating to Benson and his writings, and publishing the journal Dodo (named for one of his early novels) for members. Address: Allan Downend, 88 Tollington Park, London N.4., England.

Sources:

Benson, E. F. The Collected Ghost Stories of E. F. Benson. Edited by Richard Dalby. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1996.

———. The Horror Horn, and Other Stories. Edited by Alexis Lykiard. London: Panther, 1974.

———. More Spook Stories. London: Hutchinson, 1934.

———. The Room in the Tower, and Other Stories. London: Mills & Boon, 1912.

———. Spook Stories. London: Hutchinson, 1928.

———. Visible and Invisible. London: Hutchinson, 1923.

Masters, Brian. The Life of E. F. Benson. London, Pimlico, 1991.

Bensozia

According to Dom Jacques Martin (1684–1751) in his Religion de Gaulois (1727), Bensozia was "chief deviless" of a certain witchcraft Sabbat held in France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. She was, he says, the Diana of the Ancient Gauls and was also called Nocticula, Herodias, and "The Moon." One finds in the fourteenth-century manuscripts of the church at Couserans that women were said to go on horseback to the nocturnal revelries of Bensozia. All of them were forced to inscribe their names in a sabbatic catalog along with those of the sorcerers proper, and after this ceremony they believed themselves to be fairies. In eighteenth-century Montmorillin in Poitou, in a portion of an ancient temple was discovered a bas-relief with the figure of a naked woman carved upon it, and it is not unlikely, according to J. Collin de Plancy (author of Dictionnaire Infernal, 6th ed., 1803), that this figure was the original deity of the Bensozia cult.

Bentley, W(illiam) Perry (1880– ?)

Engineer and parapsychologist born February 22, 1880, at Westerly, Rhode Island. He was educated at Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and became chairman of Uvalde Construction, Dallas, Texas. Bentley was a member of the American Association for Advancement of Science, the American Society for Psychical Research, and the Society for Psychical Research, London, England. He contributed to a fund for a fellowship in parapsychology at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina.

Beowulf

An Anglo-Saxon poem of mythological wonders. The folk tales on which the poem is based may date from the fifth century. The epic itself was composed ca. 700 C.E. Beowulf was most likely regarded as one of the Sons of Light or Men of the Sun whose business it was to fight the powers of darkness until they themselves fell.

The legend recounts the tale of Beowulf fighting the monster Grendel; after losing the fight, the giant escapes only by leaving his arm in Beowulf's grip. But Grendel's mother, a merwoman (see mermaids), revenges him and slays many people. When Beowulf hears of this, he takes up the quarrel. Diving to the bottom of the sea, where her palace lay, he kills her after a fierce fight.

Later on Beowulf is made regent and then king of Gothland, where he reigns about 40 years. He is eventually poisoned by the fangs of a dragon during a mighty struggle and dies from the effects. He is buried on a hill named Hronesnas and is deeply mourned by his people.

There are numerous translations of Beowulf (see C. B. Tinker, The Translations of Beowulf, 1903), as well as many critical works and study guides. A manuscript Beowulf (Cotton Vitellius A. xv) ca. 1000 C.E. is preserved in the British Museum Library in London.

Sources:

Beowulf. Edited by F. Klaeber. Boston, 1950.

Beowulf. Translated by John R. Clarke. Rev. ed. New York: C. L. Wrenn, 1954.

Berande

An alleged sorceress burnt at Maubec, in France, in 1577, at the height of the witchcraft hysteria. She was confronted and accused of sorcery, and when she denied it, her accuser exclaimed, "Dost thou not remember how at the last dance at the Croix du Paté, thou didst carry a pot of poison?" Then Berande confessed and was burnt along with her accuser.

Beraud, Marthe

Also known as Eva C. She was the medium of Charles Richet's experiments in materialization phenomena at the Villa Carmen in Algiers, 1905.

Berendt, H(einz) C(haim) (1911–)

Parapsychologist born in Berlin, Germany, who moved to Jerusalem in the 1930s. A dentist, he practiced as a dental surgeon from 1937 on and became an instructor in radiodontics at Hebrew University in Jerusalem from 1957 to 1960. He published several papers on developmental disturbances and orthodontics.

Berendt became interested in parapsychology and, beginning in 1959, was an acting committee member of the Parapsychological Study Group of Israel. He later served as president of the Israel Parapsychology Society in Jerusalem. He conducted research on paranormal metal bending and eventually came to believe that it is possible.

Sources:

Berendt, Heinz C. "A New Israeli Metal-Bender (with Film)." In Research in Parapsychology, 1982. Edited by William Roll, John Beloff, and Rhea W. White. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983.

———. Parapsychology: The World beyond Our Five Senses. N.p., 1966.

Bereschit

Universal Genesis, one of the two parts into which the Kabala was divided by the rabbis; also the name of the first book of the Hebrew Bible, meaning "in the beginning."

Berger, Arthur Seymour (1920–)

American attorney who in 1970 became active in the field of death education and the investigation and teaching of psychic phenomena. In 1978 he taught courses in death and dying and parapsychology for the Psychical Research Foundation, and a sponsored program of Duke University at Durham, North Carolina. In 1979 he became coordinator of education and a research associate for the Psychical Research Foundation, then taught parapsychology at the Institute for Retired Professionals at Nova University in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, in 1981. He established a PRF Research Center in Florida and became president of Survival Research Foundation, a scientific and educational center investigating the question of survival after death, serving as associate editor of the journal Theta.

Berger published many papers and research briefs dealing with the survival question, one of which earned him the Robert H. Ashby Award from the Academy for Religion and Psychical Research in 1985. Besides his work on survival, he has written several historical and encyclopedic works on parapsychology.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S. Aristocracy of the Dead. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1987.

———. Dying and Death in Law and Medicine. New York: Praeger, 1993.

———. Evidence of Life after Death: A Casebook for the Tough-Minded. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1988.

———. Lives and Letters in American Parapsychology: A Biographical History, 1850–1987. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1988.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bergier, Jacques (1912–1978)

Co-author with Louis Pauwels of the sensational best-selling work Le Matin des magiciens (France, 1960), translated as The Dawn of Magic (London, 1963) and The Morning of the Magicians (1971). This book significantly influenced the magical revival in Europe with its observations about the part that black magic played in the career of Hitler and the establishment of Nazi philosophy.

Bergier, born in 1912 in Doessa in a Jewish family, emigrated to France in 1920. In 1931, he and fellow student Alfred Eskenazi established a laboratory in Paris to study chemical and nuclear reactions, propagating the release of nuclear energy from lighter elements. Bergier was arrested and tortured by the Gestapo in 1943. After the war, Bergier founded and edited the magazine Planeté, which appeared in various foreign editions as Planeta (Spain), Pianeta (Italy), Planeta (Brazil), and Planet (Germany). He also wrote a number of additional books on occult and ancient astronaut themes. Originally published in French, they had a wide appeal in their English editions, with their constant themes of paranoia, conspiracy, and alternative history.

Sources:

Bergier, Jacques. Extraterrestrial Visitations from Prehistoric Times to the Present. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1973. Reprinted as Mysteries of the Earth: The Hidden World of the Extra-Terrestrials. London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1974.

———. Secret Doors of the Earth. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1975.

Bergier, Jacques, and INFO editors. Extraterrestrial Intervention: The Evidence. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974.

Pauwels, Louis, and Jacques Bergier. The Eternal Man. London: Souvenir, 1972.

———. Impossible Possibilities. New York: Stein and Day, 1971.

———. Le Matin des magiciens. Paris: Editions Gallimard, 1960. Translated as The Dawn of Magic. London: Anthony Gibbs and Phillips, 1963. Reprinted as The Morning of the Magicians. New York: Stein and Day, 1964.

Bergman, Samuel Hugo (1883–1975)

Born December 25, 1883, at Prague, Czechoslovakia, he received his Ph.D. from German University, Prague, 1905. He was librarian of the Jewish National and University Library, Jerusalem, 1920–35, and professor of philosophy, rector, and dean of the humanities faculty at Hebrew University, Israel, beginning 1935. Bergman has written on philosophical subjects, with a special interest in parapsychology in relation to philosophy. He served on the committee of the Parapsychological Study Group, Israel. His writings include Experimente über Telepathie (Experiments in Telepathy) (1911). Hebrew University bestowed an honorary Ph.D. on Bergman in 1959.

Bergson, Henri (1859–1941)

Famous French philosopher whose concepts of free will, intuition, and mental life have relevance to psychic research and are frequently cited in that context. Born October 18, 1859, in Paris of Anglo-Jewish parents, he became a naturalized French citizen and studied at the École Normale Supérieure. He taught philosophy at academies in Angers, Clermont, and Paris, then succeeded Émile Ollivier at the Academie Française in 1918 but soon abandoned teaching for international affairs. Heading a mission to the United States after World War I, he served as president of the Committee of Intellectual Cooperation.

His books, which brought him the Nobel Prize in literature in 1928, included Matiére et mémoire (1896), L'évolution créatrice (1907), Durée et simultanéité (1922), L'énergie spirituelle (1919), Les Deux Sources de la morale et de la religion (1932), and La Pensée et le mouvant (1935).

His main concept was of an eternal flux in which everything is moving, changing, and becoming, including all matter in the cosmos. Conscious life itself is not a succession of states but an unceasing becoming. Bergson believed that intuition could apprehend reality independently of the limitations of intellect, and he distinguished between the soul and mental life, the soul being independent of, although influenced by, mental life. He claimed that free will is the very nature of our lives and the expression of individuality, although much of our life is largely automatic, deriving from habits and conventions. Bergson's ideas were quite compatible with occult philosophies; his sister, Mina Bergson, married ritual magician MacGregor Mathers, who had moved to Paris in 1891. Bergson died January 4, 1941, in Paris.

Sources:

Bergson, Henri. Creative Evolution. New York: Modern Library, 1944.

———. The World of Dreams. New York: Philosophical Library, 1958.

Kolakowski, Leszek. Bergson. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Bérigard of Pisa (1578?–1664)

French alchemist born Claude Guillermet de Bérigard (surname is sometimes spelled Beauregard). He was popularly known as Bérigard of Pisa because of his residence in Pisa, Italy. The date of his birth is uncertain—some authorities claim it to be 1578; others believe it is considerably later—but all agree on Moulins being his native town, and that, while a young man, he evinced a keen love for science in its various branches and began to dabble in alchemy.

He appears to have studied for a while at the Sorbonne, University of Paris, then was appointed professor of natural philosophy at the University of Pisa until 1640. He held an analogous position at Padua, where he died in 1664. His most important contribution to scientific literature is Dubitationes in Dialogum Ealilaei pro Terrae immobilitate, a quarto published at Florence in 1632, but he was also author of Circulus Pisanus, issued at Udine in 1643, in which he comments on Aristotle's ideas on physics. Bérigard's writings are now virtually forgotten, but they are valuable as documents illustrating the state of scientific knowledge in the seventeenth century.

Berkowitz, David (1953–)

David Berkowitz, a serial killer known as the Son of Sam, complained that his killing activity was forced upon him by demon voices in his head. Berkowitz was born out of wedlock on June 1, 1953, to Betty Falco and her boyfriend Joseph Kleinman, but was adopted by Nat and Pearl Berkowitz soon after his birth. They gave him a somewhat normal upbringing in the Bronx, New York. It was noted that he was a loner and had a tendency to bully his peers. He became even more introverted after Pearl Berkowitz's death in 1967. Four years later his father remarried and moved to Florida. Berkowitz remained in New York, but within a few months joined the Army. He served for three years.

During the 1970s, it would later be discovered that Berkowitz had become an arsonist. He kept a record of more than 1,400 fires he had started. In 1975 he also began to hear voices. He believed them to be coming from demons, and he identified several of his neighbors and their German shepherd dogs as the locus of the demons. He first gave into the demonic voices on Christmas Day 1975. He claimed to have stabbed two women, though the police were later able to verify only one of the incidents. His victim, Michelle Forman, survived in spite of multiple stab wounds.

On January 29, 1976, he shot Donna Lauria, who was parked in a car with her boyfriend. The shooting of victims sitting in parked cars with his .44 pistol would become his trademark. Sometimes the boyfriend escaped with a bullet wound; sometimes he was killed. However, it was obvious Berkowitz was primarily targeting women. On several occasions he attacked women on the street. On April 17, 1977, he killed Valentina Suriani and Alexander Esau, and left a letter in their car signed Son of Sam. In the letter, he described his father Sam as a bloodthirsty blood drinker. He also said of himself, "I am the 'Monster'—'Beelzebub'—the chubby behemouth." When the letter was released to the press several weeks later, the Son of Sam became an instant celebrity.

Meanwhile Berkowitz started a correspondence with the people he thought of as demons. He complained to Jack Carr, a former neighbor, that his dog, a black Labrador, was barking too much. On April 19, 1977, he sent a second letter. On April 29 he shot the dog. In June he sent a letter to Jack Cassara but signed it with the names of Jack Carr and his wife. Carr and Cassara soon had a meeting, shared stories, and first tied the letters to David Berkowitz, who had lived in the Cassara house. They shared their speculations with the police, who initially ignored them; they were already overloaded on leads.

Berkowitz would strike twice more before police put the murdered women together with the attack on Carr's dog. Shortly thereafter, however, they arrested Berkowitz, who freely admitted his identity as the Son of Sam. Berkowitz was tried and sentenced to 365 years in prison.

There are three theories as to Berkowitz's motivation in the murders. One accepts his basic story of demon possession. One, put forth by writer Maury Terry, has built a picture of Berkowitz operating within the context of a Satanic group that had members in New York and at several locations across the country. Many of the police came to believe that he was a typical serial killer who had set up the demon possession idea as a defense should he ever be caught. This latter hypothesis now dominates serious thinking about Berkowitz.

In 1987, Berkowitz converted to Christianity. From his prison cell, he now has a webpage, http://www.inetworld.net/hutrcc/davidb.htm, hosted by a Christian church in San Jose, California. In his testimony published on that site, he mentioned that before he began his killing spree he had read The Satanic Bible written by Anton LaVey, the founder of the Church of Satan. As a result, he began to dabble in the occult and do Satanic rituals. He does not mention demon voices.

Sources:

Abrrahamsen, David. Confessions of the Son of Sam. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

David Berkowitz. http://www.inetworld.net/hutrcc/davidb.htm. May 16, 2000.

Klausner, Lawrence. Son of Sam. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1981.

Terry, Maury. The Ultimate Evil. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1999.

Berlitz, Charles (1914–)

Popular writer on the Bermuda Triangle and similar mysteries. Born November 23, 1914, in New York City, Berlitz is the grandson of the founder of the famous Berlitz language schools and is familiar with some 30 languages. He studied at Yale University (B.A. magna cum laude, 1936) and during World War II served in the army, becoming a captain in counterintelligence in Europe and Latin America.

He has written or edited dozens of textbooks, language dictionaries, and tourist phrase books in his capacity as vice-president of the Berlitz Schools of Language. His leisure time allowed him to pursue interests in such areas as the Bermuda triangle, Atlantis, UFOs, and ancient astronauts, which stemmed from his prior interest in archaeology and scuba diving. His first book in this vein, The Mystery of Atlantis (1969), reached a popular audience and was followed by a host of others, including Mysteries from Forgotten Worlds (1972), The Bermu- da Triangle (1974), Doomsday 1999 A.D. (1981), and The Dragon's Triangle (1989).

In 1979 Berlitz and UFO researcher William L. Moore became unwitting accomplices in spreading the hoax usually referred to as the Philadelphia Experiment. The story recounts a reported incident in which the U.S. Navy developed a device that transported a destroyer from Philadelphia to Norfolk, Virginia. In the early 1960s Carlos Alende (real name Carl Allen) claimed to have witnessed the experiment and states that the navy classified it and denied that it ever happened.

Sources:

Berlitz, Charles. The Bermuda Triangle. New York: Doubleday, 1974.

———. The Dragon's Triangle. New York: Wynwood Press, 1989.

———. Mysteries from Forgotten Worlds. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

———. Without a Trace: New Information from the Triangle. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.

———. World of Strange Phenomena. New York: Wynwood Press, 1988.

Berlitz, Charles, and J. Manson Valentine. Doomsday 1999 A.D. Garden City, N.Y. Doubleday, 1981.

Berlitz, Charles, and William L. Moore. The Roswell Incident. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1980.

Moore, William L., and Charles Berlitz. The Philadelphia Experiment. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1979.

"Bermechobus"

The supposed writings of St. Methodius of Olympus (martyred 311 C.E.); or the saint of the same name who was patriarch of Constantinople and who died in 846. The real name of the work is Bea-Methodius, a contraction for Beatus Methodivo, which was misprinted "Bermechobus." The work is of the nature of a prophetic Apocalypse and tells the history and destiny of the world. It was handed down by the Gnostics and printed in the Mirabilis Liber. There are no grounds, however, to suppose that the writings were the work of either of the saints mentioned.

The book recounts how Seth sought a new country in the east and came to the country of the initiates, and how the children of Cain instituted a system of black magic in India. The author identifies the Ishmaelites with those tribes who overthrew the Roman power and tells of a powerful northern people whose reign will be overturned by the Antichrist. A universal kingdom will thereafter be founded, governed by a prince of French blood, after which a prolonged period of justice will supervene.

Bermuda Triangle

An area of the Western Atlantic between Bermuda and Florida where ships and planes are said to have vanished without a trace. During the late 1960s, inspired largely by the volume by Vincent Gaddis, Invisible Horizons: True Mysteries of the Sea (1965), a popular controversy erupted around claims that since 1945 over 100 ships and planes and more than 1,000 people have disappeared in the Bermuda triangle. The area was also termed "the Hoodoo Sea," "the Devil's Triangle," "Limbo of the Lost," "the Twilight Zone," and "Port of Missing Ships." Charles Berlitz, who wrote several books on the triangle, speculated on the possibility of time warps, electromagnetic impulses from vanished civilizations, and extraterrestrial activities in UFOs.

The controversy was largely put to rest by Lawrence David Kusche in his book The Bermuda Triangle Mystery—Solved. Kusche destroyed the mystery in a case-by-case discussion of the alleged disappearances. Many had been solved, but popular writers were unaware of the relevant literature. Others happened outside of the triangle. Many had perfectly normal explanations. Since Kusche's book appeared, discussion of the Bermuda triangle has been confined to the fringe, though a few writers like Berlitz have tried to perpetuate interest.

Among the more interesting theories put forward to solve the alleged mystery was proposed by Russian oceanographer Vladimir Azhazha. In articles published in reputable scientific journals in the U.S.S.R. and the United States, Azhazha suggested that storms in the triangle area generate "infrasound"—low-frequency waves that are inaudible to human beings but that can be magnified by special conditions to become a force powerful enough to destroy ships and planes. Infrasound is a frequency lower than 16 cycles per second. In an interview in Moscow published in the National Enquirer (November 15, 1977), Azhazha stated that he believed infrasonic waves in the Devil's Triangle are amplified by such factors as changes in water temperature and a powerful undersea river running in an opposite direction to ocean currents.

Scientists at the Wave Propagation Laboratory of the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) confirm that the power of infrasonic vibrations does increase in a storm and that sound can be carried thousands of miles. A NOAA research oceanographer stated that there are very sharp changes in the temperature of the water in the Devil's Triangle because of the Gulf Stream, and that different temperatures in water could cause differences in the intensity of infrasound, either increasing it or decreasing it.

In the National Enquirer, Azhazha stated: "An infrasonic sound wave can travel thousands of miles to find its victim in a calm sea. If the wave is gigantic enough, a crew can perish almost instantly. Death will come from stopping of the heart or destruction of the cardiovascular system." In the resulting panic, a ship's crew might even abandon ship. Azhazha claimed that the hull and masts of the ship would begin to vibrate in tune with the infrasound, cracking the ship and breaking it up.

Azhazha's theory was published in the Soviet magazine Science and Life, and a similar theory was also put forward by Soviet science writer I. Boyetin. Tests conducted in France have supported the theory that infrasound can damage ships, and Dr. Freeman Hall, chief of the atmospheric acoustic program at NOAA Wave Propagation Laboratory, Boulder, Colorado, confirmed that severe storms can generate such a phenomenon, and that it can also be dangerous to human beings. The theory has not been tested, however, because the mystery was largely accounted for by other means. (See also Devil's Jaw, another area of claimed mysterious disappearances.)

Sources:

Berlitz, Charles F. The Dragon's Triangle. New York: Wynwood Press, 1989.

Berlitz, Charles, and J. Manson Valentine. The Bermuda Triangle. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.

The Bermuda Triangle: An Annotated Bibliography. Buffalo, N.Y.: Buffalo and Erie County Public Library Librarians Association and Buffalo and Erie County Library, 1975.

Kusche, Lawrence D. The Bermuda Triangle—Solved. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Kusche, Lawrence David, and Deborah K. Blouin. Bermuda Triangle Bibliography. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona State University Library, 1974.

Winer, Richard. The Devil's Triangle. New York: Bantam Books, 1974.

Bernard, Pierre (Arnold) (1875–1955)

A pioneer teacher of hatha and tantric yoga in the United States. He was born in Leon, Iowa, in 1875 as Peter Coons. As a young man, he moved to California and worked at various seasonal jobs like fruit picking and salmon packing. In 1905 he teamed up with Mortimer K. Hargis to found the Bacchante Academy to teach hypnotism and "soul charming" (concerned with sex mysteries), but the organization disappeared a year later in the wake of the San Francisco earthquake.

Coons changed his name to Pierre Arnold Bernard after founding his Sanskrit College in New York in 1909. The venture was not altogether successful, and Bernard moved to New Jersey where he married a Miss de Vries, a professional dancer. Together they launched a highly successful "health system of Tantrism," embodying hatha yoga, dancing, and psychophysical education.

In 1919 Bernard's organization, the Brae Burn Club, was situated in a mansion and estate at Nyack on the Hudson river. The club was well conducted and supported by wealthy followers and socialites, although the practice of hatha yoga was sufficiently novel at that date to attract criticism and scandal-mongering from outside. However, it was Bernard's policy never to give interviews or contradict false stories. He was something of a showman as well as an occultist, and he delighted in staging bizarre publicity stunts, such as his own specialty dance with a baby elephant.

The tantric side of his activities seemed confined to a sensible scheme of sex education allied with psychophysical health, and he said he wanted "to teach men and women to love, and make women feel like queens." His enlightened work in body-building and character-training attracted the interest of Dr. Charles Francis Potter, a liberal New York City minister and one of the founders of Humanism. Potter said that Bernard had "all the ear-marks of genius" and "combined knowledge of age-old Indian methods of curing disease of mind and body with the best of Western methods, plus a refreshing amount of common sense." By all reports, the club members, mostly professional and business men and women from New York, were healthy and happy.

There was an inner circle of the club called "The Secret Order of Tantriks," to which a number of wealthy people belonged. Bernard was their guru, known as "Oom the Omnipotent," and his initiates would chant their version of the Tibetan prayer-wheel mantra—"Oom ma na padma oom." Bernard had a special talent for explaining abstruse Hindu Vedanta and yoga teachings in crisp, simple language. Affectionately known as "P.A." to club members, he was no ascetic and was known to enjoy a cigar or a game of billiards.

Many well-known and talented people visited the club or became members, including Francis Yeats-Brown and Sir Paul Dukes, both pioneer writers on yoga; composer Cyril Scott; and conductor Leopold Stokowski. There were some later criticisms that Bernard was influenced unfavorably by his own material and business success, but in general he seems to have been a pioneer of hatha yoga and sane occultism in the United States.

During his period at Nyack, Bernard became director and later treasurer of the local chamber of commerce. He owned controlling stock in the bank at Pearl River, served as its president in 1931, and owned $12 million worth of property in Rockland County. He closed his yoga center during World War II and turned over his estate to the Wertheim family, who used it to house refugees from Nazi Gemany.

Bernard died in Nyack on September 28, 1955, in his eightieth year. His nephew Theos Bernard, who had been a member of the Nyack Community, wrote an authoritative thesis on hatha yoga while at Columbia University. It was first published in 1944 under the title Hatha Yoga: The Report of a Personal Experience and has been frequently reprinted.

Sources:

Bernard, Pierre. In Re Fifth Veda. International Journal of the Tantrik Order. New York: Tantrik Order in America, [1909].

Boswell, Charles. "The Great Fume and Fuss over the Omnipotent Oom." True (January 1965): 31–33, 86–91.

Bernard, Theos (1908–1947)

Early writer and teacher on hatha yoga, who drew from his own experience in undertaking a traditional training course. Little has been recorded about the life of Theos Bernard, a nephew of Pierre Bernard, one of the pioneer yoga teachers in the United States, who undoubtably introduced him to the subject.

Bernard was born in Tombstone, Arizona. As a child he had hoped to become an athlete, but he suffered from ill health for many years. While at university, he read books on yoga, and one day was visited by a guru from India (possibly Shri Yogendra) who taught Bernard a graduated system of hatha yoga asanas and hygiene practices, combined with traditional yoga philosophy of duty and self-purification. Bernard was already practicing yoga while still at law school and arranged to travel to India to perfect his studies. In India Bernard undertook traditional training under a guru, after first traveling throughout India to familiarize himself with the people and beliefs of the country. He spent several months visiting colleges, libraries, museums, temples, shrines, and ashrams from Calcutta to Bombay, from Kashmir to Ceylon. In Bombay he met Dr. Kovoor T. Behanan, author of the important study Yoga: A Scientific Evaluation (1937), and he visited Swami Kuvalayananda, a noted yoga teacher, at his ashram in Lonavala. Bernard studied hatha yoga under various teachers, especially in Bombay, which had become the center from which hatha yoga had been revived in India in the late 1800s.

After he obtained his degree in law (M.A., LL.B.), he studied at Columbia University and earned a doctorate in philosophy. His treatise on hatha yoga was first published in 1944 by Columbia University Press and has since been frequently reprinted. Hatha yoga covers all the traditional aspects of hatha yoga and correlates his personal training with the major Indian texts: the Hatha Yoga Pradipika, the Gheranda Samhita, and the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali. Bernard achieved the classic requirement of being able to maintain steadiness in performance of the main asanas for a period of three hours each. He went on to practice the traditional forms of mental concentration and meditation.

In order to further his studies, Bernard traveled through Tibet, and at the holy city of Lhasa he was accepted as an incarnation of the Tibetan saint Padma Sambhava. This enabled him to take part in many special religious ceremonies and to discuss Tibetan teachings with some of the leading lamas at famous Tibetan monasteries. He described his experiences in his book Land of a Thousand Buddhas (1939).

Bernard died in 1947 while on a mission to a monastery in western Tibet in search of special manuscripts. While en route in a remote area, rioting broke out among Hindus and Moslems, and after the dissident Hindus killed Moslem men, women, and children, they pursued the Moslems who accompanied Bernard as guides and muleteers. These Moslems fled, leaving Bernard and a Tibetan boy alone on the trail. It is believed that both were shot and their bodies thrown into the river.

Sources:

Bernard, Theos. Hatha Yoga. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944.

———. Heaven Lies Within Us. New York: Scribner's Sons, Ltd., 1939.

———. Hindu Philosophy. New York: Philosophical Library, 1947.

———. Land of a Thousand Buddhas. London: Rider, 1952.

———. Philosophical Foundations of India. London: Rider, 1945.

———. A Simplified Grammar of the Literary Tibetan Language. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Tibetan Text Society, 1946.

Bernstein, Morey (1919–1999)

Businessman and hypnotist from Pueblo, Colorado, who wrote the best-seller The Search for Bridey Murphy, published in 1956. His book opened public discussion of reincarnation and uncovered a large popular interest and belief in it that had been growing in the West through the twentieth century. The book claimed that under hypnosis by the author, Colorado housewife "Ruth Simmons" (pseudonym of Virginia Tighe) recalled memories of a previous existence in nineteenth-century Belfast, Ireland.

In a series of hypnotic sessions, Bernstein probed Tighe's early memories back to childhood, then as it seemed, to an earlier life as Bridey Murphy, an Irish girl, for which Tighe was able to provide many details. Bernstein instituted a search in Ireland to validate these details. The Denver Post sent a reporter to Ireland, and although the findings were somewhat ambiguous, they were added as a supplement to the paperback edition of Bernstein's book.

The tremendous success of Bernstein's book revived interest in hypnotism and stimulated pop songs on the theme of reincarnation. An album of some of Tighe's trance sessions was even released. In the wake of the attention given the book, the Chicago American published a series of articles questioning wether Tighe was really Bridey Murphy in a former existence. An astute reporter investigated Tighe's early childhood in Chicago and identified names and places that had been woven into an unconscious fantasy of previous life. Across the street from Tighe's girlhood home lived an Irish family with a Mrs. Corkell, whose maiden name had been Bridie Murphy. The Chicago American articles went into syndication by the Hearst press, and they ran in the New York Journal American (June 10–18, 1956) and in Time (June 18, 1956) and Life (June 25, 1956). An amusing and witty exposé of the Bridey Murphy story appeared in Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science by Martin Gardner.

The Bridey Murphy case highlights the remarkable ability of the subconscious mind to create fantasies of other lives and personalities that can be elicited under hypnosis. The same faculty is present in the creative imagination of novelists, although consciously controlled. Since the Bridey Murphy case was published, there have been numerous cases of claimed memories of former existence under hypnosis, but few have found them evidential, given the inherent problem of hypnotists guiding the sessions and making leading suggestions to the subject.

Hypnotism continues to be used in counseling situations, and reports of past life recall have gained a large audience among people who have already accepted reincarnation as a fact.

Sources:

Bernstein, Morey. The Search for Bridey Murphy. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1956.

"Bridey Murphy—Fact, Fraud, or Fancy?" Special issue of Tomorrow 4, no. 4 (summer 1956).

Fiore, Edith. You Have Been Here Before: A Psychologist Looks at Past Lives. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1978.

Gardner, Martin. Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science. New York: Dover Publications, 1957.

Berosus (fl. 290 B.C.E.)

Berosus is the Babylonian priest most responsible for spreading Chaldean astrological ideas to Greece. Berosus was born and raised in Babylon (present-day Iraq). He was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who died at Babylon when Berosus was still a child. As an adult he traveled to Greece and settled on the Island of Cos, where he founded a school of astrology. Around 280 B.C.E. he wrote a history of his homeland; only fragments of this document remain. His greater influence came from the number of students he trained who went on to teach astrology throughout Greece. The Babylonian astrologers were the first to carefully map the night sky and to calculate the length of the solar years (to within 26 minutes). They greatly improved methods of forecasting eclipses and recording time.

Sources:

Brau, Jean-Louis, Helen Weaver, and Allan Edmands. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1977.

Burstein, Stanley Mayer. The Babyloniaca of Berosus. Malibu, Calif.: Undena Publications, 1978.

Berridge, Edward (ca. 1843–1923)

British homeopathic physician who played an important role in the Isis-Urania Temple of the occult society known as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Berridge is believed to have qualified as a medical doctor in London and as a homoeopathist in the United States. He was influenced by the writings of Thomas Lake Harris and Andrew Jackson Davis, whom he probably encountered during a period in the United States. He returned to England in the 1850s and founded an Adventist organization called the Brotherhood of the New Life, devoted to the "reorganization of the industrial world." He was also interested in psychosexual theories and practices in relation to the occult.

Berridge joined the Golden Dawn in May 1889, taking the magical name "Respiro" and the motto "Resurgam" (I shall rise again). He associated with the London members who supported MacGregor Mathers, including Aleister Crowley, who later ridiculed Berridge with typical malice in his Confessions and under the name "Dr. Balloch" in the novel Moonchild.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. New York: Hill and Wang, 1969.

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972.

Berry, Catherine (1813–1891)

Nineteenth-century English medium active in the 1870s. She discovered her gift in 1864 after a sitting with Mary Marshall. It was alleged that she could throw sitters to the ground by a wave of her hand. Many well-known mediums of the period came to sit with her to be charged with more power. The early issues of the Medium contain many accounts of her seances. In her sole presence, however, psychical phenomena were very few. At the Spiritual Institution in London in 1870, she sat publicly with the medium Frank Herne. Her book, Experiences in Spiritualism (London, 1876), records frequent sittings with Charles Williams, Frank Herne, Agnes Guppy, and Mrs. Everitt.

She developed automatic drawing, painting, and healing power. In 1874 she exhibited 500 curious watercolors at Brighton. In 1870 she published some prophecies regarding the Franco-Prussian war by pointing out Bible texts illustrative of passing events.

Sources:

Berry, Catherine. Experiences in Spiritualism. London, 1876.

Berry, George (d. 1947)

First president of the British-based organization International Spiritualists' Federation (ISF). He was a member of the Spiritualist's National Union prior to World War I. In 1916 he joined the council on which he served for many years. He became vice-president in 1919 and afterward served as president (1920–22) and general secretary (1922–32). He also edited the publication National Spiritualist Monthly from July 1924 to December 1932.

Berry participated in the inaugural meeting of the International Spiritualists' Federation in 1922 in London and the next year traveled to Liége, Belgium, when a constitution was drawn up. Berry was elected first president and served a six-year term. He was succeeded by Ernest W. Oaten, whom he had previously followed in the presidency of the Spiritualist's National Union. In 1936 Berry suffered a stroke, which obliged him to relinquish his ISF duties. He died July 13, 1947.

Beryl

Group of precious stones that includes emerald and aquamarine. Colorless beryl is known as goshenite; rose beryl is called verobyerite or morganite; golden beryl is called heliodor; and there are also pale blue stones (aquamarine) and blue-green stones. Beryl was traditionally recommended for curing throat or liver disorders. It was also said to preserve wedded love and to be a good medium for magical vision. (See also Crystal Gazing)

Besant, Annie (1847–1933)

Prominent Theosophist and successor to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky as the international leader of the Theosophical movement. Besant was born Annie Wood in London, England, October 1, 1847. She was raised by a widowed mother in a very religious environment and in 1867 married Frank Besant, a Church of England minister. However, when she became increasingly skeptical of Christian teachings and refused to silence her doubts, the marriage ended in separation (1873) and divorce (1878). In 1874 she met atheist and freethinker Charles Bradlaugh, leader of the National Secular Society, became friends with him, joined the society, began to write for the National Reformer, and was elected vice-president of the society in 1875. Her first public lecture concerned the political rights of women. In 1876 she and Bradlaugh formed a partnership, the Freethought Publishing Company, and Besant became coeditor of the National Reformer.

Pursuing her feminist agenda, Besant led in the publication of Charles Knowlton's The Fruits of Philosophy, an early text advocating birth control. In 1877 she and Bradlaugh were arrested on charges of publishing obscene literature, and in a sensational trial, which became a forum for both to present their opinions to the public, they were convicted of intending to corrupt morals (the conviction was later overturned on a technicality). The trial established Besant's reputation as one of England's finest orators, an atheist, and advocate for women's rights.

In the 1880s she was drawn into the circle of George Bernard Shaw's associates. Besant became a socialist, which led to her break with Bradlaugh, and in 1887 she resigned as coeditor of the National Reformer. She joined Shaw's Fabian Society. Meanwhile, she championed the strike of the underpaid matchgirls in 1888 and became the first woman to be accepted at the University of London.

In 1888 she was given a copy of The Secret Doctrine for review. The event proved life-changing. She found the answers that had eluded her in Christianity and in freethought. She soon became a close associate of Blavatsky, joined the editorial staff of the Theosophical Society's magazine, Lucifer, and turned her oratorical skills to defend her new mentor and promote Theosophy. In 1890 she made her first trip to the United States to revive the society badly shaken by the scandal that followed when Richard Hodgson of the American Society for Psychical Research accused Blavatsky of fraud.

After Blavatsky's death in 1891, Besant headed the Esoteric Section, the group of Blavatsky's personal occult students. In 1892 Besant published her first theosophical books, Karma and The Seven Principles of Man. In 1893 she visited India for the first time and made a triumphal American tour climaxing with an appearance at the World's Parliament of Religions. She settled in India at the society's headquarters at Adyar, Madras, where she resided for the rest of her life. She had to head off the challenge to her power from William Q. Judge, the third co-founder of the society, who remained in America when Blavatsky and Henry S. Olcott moved to India. Besant kept him marginalized internationally, but her efforts cost the society most of its American members. Succeeding to the presidency of the society following Olcott's death in 1907, she had to devote considerable energies to rebuilding the American work.

In 1908 she became sponsor (with C. W. Leadbeater) of Jiddu Krishnamurti as the vehicle of the world savior, and to that end in 1909 organized the Order of the Star of the East. The order flourished for 20 years, but was dissolved when Krishnamurti abandoned it in 1929.

Besant became deeply involved in Indian life. In 1917 she was elected to the Indian Nationalist Congress, one of the organizations promoting Indian home rule. She also led in the founding of many schools, including some of the first for Indian women.

Besant, who came to the society because of her acceptance of its ideas and worldview, did not manifest or claim any outstanding occult abilities. After Blavatsky's death, Besant had no close associates until she met Leadbeater, who claimed to possess clairvoyant vision capable of seeing the occult worlds, and they developed a close friendship and professional working relationship. She co-authored several books based on his occult experiences and generally promoted him in the society. Besant paid dearly for this friendship, as Leadbeater was homosexual and his attraction to young boys became a second major scandal for the society.

Besant led the society until her death on September 21, 1933. She wrote several hundred books (many are transcripts of her lectures) that cover the scope of theosophical philosophy. She also explored Hinduism and gave the society its current focus on Hindu thought, as opposed to the Buddhism that had attracted many of the first generation leaders.

Sources:

Besant, Annie. Annie Besant: An Autobiography. London, 1893.

———. Autobiographical Sketches. London: Freethought Publishing, 1885.

———. My Path to Atheism. London, 1877.

———. Why I became a Theosophist. London: Theosphical Publishing Society, 1891.

Besterman, Theodore. A Bibliography of Annie Besant. London: Theosophical Society in England, 1924.

Nethercot, A. H. The First Five Lives of Annie Besant. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

———. The Last Four Lives of Annie Besant. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1963.

Taylor, Anne. Annie Besant: A Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Beshara (Community)

A Sufi organization devoted to the study of the writings of Muhyiddin Ibn'Arabi, a twelfth-century mystic born in Andalucia, Spain. The community was founded in 1971 at Swyre Farm, Gloucestershire, England, and has since moved to the center that once housed John G. Bennett's International Academy for Continuous Education at Sherborne, also in Gloucestershire. United around the basic questions of identity and purpose in life and accepting the absolute unity of existence, Beshara offers courses on the fundamental principles necessary to complete self-knowledge and awareness of reality. The center at Sherborne also holds an Open Day, as well as a regular

"Zikr," or meeting, devoted to discovering divine purpose in life.

Affiliated groups emerged throughout the United Kingdom and were opened in Canada, the Netherlands, and Australia. Beshara came to the United States in 1976 when a center was opened in Berkeley, California. The group's strength remains in the San Francisco Bay Area. The center publishes a Beshara News Bulletin and may be contacted at Chisholme House, Roberton, Nr Hawick, Roxburghshire, Scotland TD9 7PH. Website: http://www.beshara.org/.

Sources:

al-Arabi, Ibn. Sufis of Andalucia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.

Landau, Ron. The Philosophy of Ibn 'Arabi. London: Allen and Unwin, 1959.

Besinnet, Ada M. (d. 1936)

American physical medium who produced psychic lights, direct voices known for singing and whistling, and materializations. She was married to William Wallace Roche and lived for many years in Toledo, Ohio.

After a formal investigation during 1909–10 in 70 test sittings, James H. Hyslop wrote in Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 5, 1911) that the medium produced phenomena herself, but while in a hysterical state of secondary personality and without the slightest degree of moral responsibility in her own person for the fraud. After six months of study, the British College for Psychic Science in London reached the opposite conclusion in 1921. According to J. Hewat McKenzie's report in Psychic Science (April 1922), those actions of the medium which Hyslop attributed to hysteria could be fully accounted for as due to the action of controlling spirits.

Dr. Hereward Carrington concluded in The Story of Psychic Science (1930), "My own sittings with this medium left me entirely unconvinced of their genuineness." Nevertheless, he admitted that he observed very curious lights at a séance in 1922. On request, the lights hovered for a few moments over exposed photographic plates, and the plates, when developed, showed unusual markings that he failed to obtain by artificial means.

Besinnet had two principal controls, both Indians: "Pansy," a little girl, and "Black Cloud." As a rule Besinnet sat in the dark, unbound; then during the séance, as a feat of her stock performance, her hands and feet were often tied to her chair by invisible hands. The sitters usually did not join hands, but placed them on the table. Her materializations were incomplete. The faces seen had a corpse-like appearance and often resembled her own face. It is said that she disappeared several times from the séance room altogether and was found transported in a deep coma in another room. In Glimpses of the Next State (1911), Osborne Moore described several séances with the medium. He found the phenomena supernormal and entirely convincing. Besinnet died in 1936.

Bessemans, Joseph François Antoine Albert (1888– ?)

Belgian physician and public official who became active in many branches of parapsychology beginning in 1913. Bessemans held many academic appointments during his distinguished career. He investigated such phenomena as clairvoyance, psychometry, and ESP, although his conclusions were skeptical.

Besterman, Theodore (Deodatus Nathaniel) (1904–1976)

Librarian, world authority on bibliography, psychical researcher, and member of the Theosophical Society. He was born September 18, 1904, in Geneva, Switzerland, and was educated at Lycée de Londres and Oxford University. In addition to his activities in the field of psychic research, he also established a worldwide reputation as a bibliographer. He was a special lecturer at the London School of Librarianship (1931–38), then worked for the Association of Special Libraries and the Department for the Exchange of Information for UNESCO. He devoted two decades of his life to work on Voltaire and was editor of the Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century and the Complete Works of Voltaire.

Besterman, who became a Theosophist as a young man, soon combined his interests and professional credentials in such texts as Bibliography of Annie Besant (1924), A Dictionary of Theosophy (1927), The Mind of Annie Besant (1928), and a 1930 plea for a better relationship between the Society for Psychcical Research (SPR) and the Theosophical Society. Theosophy led Besterman to psychic research. He became librarian of the SPR in 1927 and editor of the society's Proceedings and Journal in 1929; he also served as investigation officer. Demanding high standards, he was critical of any sloppy work in the field. He openly denounced Albert von Schrenck-Notzing and Charles Richet, questioned the legitimacy of Mina Crandon ("Margery"), and regularly called attention to the problems inherent in human observation. His criticisms of Italian researcher Ernesto Bozzano caused Sir Arthur Conan Doyle to resign from the SPR.

His publications in the field of psychic research include Crystal Gazing (1924), In the Way of Heaven (1926), Library Catalogue of the Society for Psychical Research (1927), and Some Modern Mediums (1930). With Sir William Barrett, he produced The Divining Rod: An Experimental and Psychological Investigation (1926). Besterman severed his relationship with the society and with psychic research in 1935 and enjoyed a distinguished career as a bibliographer and editor. A final work of earlier writings was published in 1968 as Collected Papers on the Paranormal. He died November 11, 1976.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Besterman, Theodore. A Bibliography of Annie Besant. London: Theosophical Society in England, 1924.

———. Collected Papers on the Paranormal. New York: Garrett Publicaions, 1968.

———. Dictionary of Theosophy. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1927.

———. The Mind of Annie Besant. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1927.

———. Mrs. Annie Besant: A Modern Prophet. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1934.

Bersterman, Theodore, and Sir William Barrett. The Divining Rod: An Experimental and Psychological Investigation. 1926. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

Bethurum, Truman (1898–1969)

Truman Bethurum, one of the original flying saucer contactees of the 1950s, jumped into the spotlight with his 1954 book, Aboard a Flying Saucer. He claimed contact with inhabitants of the otherwise unknown planet Clarion. Clarion was a planet in our solar system, he explained, but had remained undiscovered because it was always hidden from Earth by the Moon.

Bethurum was born on August 21, 1898, in Gavalin, California. He had only a minimum of formal education and was a blue-collar laborer through most of his life. He was operating heavy equipment in the Nevada desert in 1952 when first contacted by extraterrestrials, he claimed. As he was dozing between shifts, several small creatures awakened him and escorted him to a flying saucer. Aura Rhanes, the captain of the spaceship, turned out to be a beautiful female of olive complexion and jet black hair. Bethurum, then in his 50s, estimated her to be in her 40s. This meeting was the first of many. Aura Rhanes came as a representative of those inhabited worlds that had already obtained interplanetary flight. They were concerned about Earth's nuclear capabilities and its potential for destroying the planet.

Bethurum initially told his story at the flying saucer convention at Giant Rock in 1952. An abbreviated account then appeared in the fanzine Saucers, the following year. In the wake of his 1954 book, Bethurum developed a significant following within the contactee world, and in 1955 Aura Rhanes advised him to begin soliciting contributions from the public to establish what was called the Sanctuary of Thought. It was opened several years later near Prescott, Arizona, and Bethurum would remain an active lecturer and exponent of the contactee perspective for the rest of his life. He passed away on May 21, 1969, in Landers, California. The sanctuary did not survive his death.

Bethurum's crude account of Clarion and its inhabitants generated a spectrum of responses, from the dismissals of most ufologists to the active support of fellow contactee George Adamski. Much of the critique originated from the scientific analysis of the impossibility of the existence of a planet such as Clarion that remained hidden from Earth due to its following an orbit similar to but beyond the Moon.

Sources:

Beckley, Timothy Green, ed. The People of the Planet Clarion. Clarksburg, W. Va.: Saucerian Books, 1970.

Bethurum, Truman. Aboard a Flying Saucer. Los Angeles: DeVorss & Co., 1954.

Reeve, Bryant, and Helen Reeve. Flying Saucer Pilgrimage. Amherst, Wis.: Amherst Press, 1957.

"The Betty Book"

A classical channeled text published in 1937 by Stewart Edward White from the statements made by his wife, Elizabeth "Betty" White, while in trance. Betty channeled for more than 20 years and White believed these channeled communications embodied valuable philosophical and religious messages for daily life. The Betty Book was but the first of a series of books developed from Betty's sittings. The third volume, Across the Unknown, (1939) rivals The Betty Book in popularity.

Sources:

Melton, J. Gordon. The Betty Book Literature of Stewart Edward White. Evanston, Ill.: The Author, 1971.

White, Stewart Edward. The Betty Book. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1937.

Beyond (Magazine)

Former British Spiritualistic monthly edited by trance medium W. H. Evans and published in London into the early years of the twentieth century.

Beyond Reality (Magazine)

American newsstand magazine published six times per year during the 1970s and 1980s. It carried articles covering the range of psychic and occult topics as well as such diverse subjects as Atlantis, time travel, and UFOs.

Bezoar

A red precious stone that was supposed to possess magical properties and was found in the bodies of certain animals. At one time these stones fetched ten times their weight in gold as a remedy against poison and contagion; and for this purpose they were taken both internally and worn round the neck. There were said to be nine varieties of bezoar that differed greatly in composition but were generally divided into those composed mainly from minerals and those composed of organic matter.

A strange origin was assigned to this stone by some of the early naturalists. It is said that aging Oriental stags fed upon serpents, which renewed their youth. In order to counteract the poison which was absorbed into their system they plunged into a running stream, keeping their heads only above water. This caused a viscous fluid to be distilled from their eyes, which was indurated by the heat of the sun and formed the bezoar.

Bezucha, Vlastimil (1928–)

Czechoslovakian chemist and member of the Czechoslovak Parapsychology Study Group, headed by Dr. Milan Ryzl. Bezucha was born January 10, 1928, at Nemyslovice and studied at High Chemical School, College of Chemical Technology, Prague. In 1955 he married Eva Ficková.

Bhagavad Gita

Of the large number of holy books revered within Hindu culture, the Bhagavad Gita, a short work originally written in Sanskrit, is by far the most popular. An epic poem, it lays out a path of mystical devotion to Krishna, one of the primary deities in the Hindu pantheon, and describes the Hindu perspective on such essential teachings as reincarnation and karma. It was one of the first books translated by Western scholars as they began to study Eastern teachings in the eighteenth century, and it was widely circulated among dissident religious groups such as the Transcendentalists of New England.

The Gita was written over a period of years between the fifth and second centuries B.C.E. At a later date, it was inserted into the larger Mahabharata, the great epic volume of Indian history and lore. The Mahabharata tells the story of the development of ancient India and the activities of the descendents of Bharata, the mythical character from whom India (or Bharat) takes its name. The story of the Gita is set as a war has broken out between two groups of Bharata's descendents, the Pandavas and the Kauravas, and concerns the problem that Arjuna, the leader of the Pandava army, has in participating in that war. He turns the problem he has been contemplating over to Krishna. Is it worth ruling a kingdom, to kill so many kinsmen?

Krishna responds by calling Arjuna to attend to his role in life as a member of the warrior caste, and not turn his back on his social duty (dharma). Duty should be followed without regard of results. More importantly, however, he offers an understanding of the human being. The human is not a body, but the eternal Atman (analogous to the soul in Western thought), and the Atman is indestructible. The Atman cannot die and it is reborn in this life a number of times. Just as humans change clothes, so the Atman changes bodies. Krishna goes on to outline the process of yoga and meditation through which a person can come to know the real amid the illusionary world of human life. His teaching culminates in a mystical moment in which Arjuna sees the vast universe lodged as a body within the God of gods.

In the relationship of Arjuna and Krishna, the Gita offers a model of the relationship between chela (pupil) and guru (teacher), so essential to Eastern culture, a structure that has been brought to the West in great force, and now without controversy, during the twentieth century. That structure has focused the question of the necessity of a guru in training a seeker in appropriating mystical states of consciousness.

Numerous translations of the Gita exist in English (and other Western languages), the different translations reflecting the variant understandings of the deity as personal or impersonal in Hindu thought. In the Western work, the Vedanta Societies offer an impersonalist interpretation of the deity while the International Society of Krishna Consciousness is a major exponent of the personalist approach.

Sources:

The Bhagavad Gita. Translated by Juan Mascaró. New York: Penguin Classics, 1962.

Oragan, Troy Wilson. Hinduism: Its Historical Development. Woodbury, Conn.: Barons' Educational Series, 1974.

Prabhupada, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami. Bhagavad Gita As It Is. New York: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1972 (frequently reprinted).

Bhagavan Sri Ramana Maharshi Center

American center devoted to the teachings of Sri Ramana Maharshi (1879–1950), a highly esteemed Hindu mystic. The center focuses on his method of self-realization and surrender to the Supreme Self through self-enquiry, expressed in the simple formula "Who Am I?" This is not merely a mental enquiry but is an attempt to locate the essential subtle self that is independent of ego and individuality and exists in all stages of consciousness—waking life, dreaming, and deep sleep.

The center maintains an urban ashram, Arunachala Ashram, named after the sacred hill at Tiruvannamalai, South India, where the Sri Ramana Ashram was first established during the sage's lifetime. In addition to the urban ashram, there is also an ashram farm in Nova Scotia for devotees who wish to follow an intensive spiritual schedule. Address: 342 East 6th St., New York, NY 10003.

Bhaktivedanta, Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977)

The religious name of Abhay Charan De, leader of the successful Hare Krishna movement that emerged in North America and Europe in the 1970s and is organizationally embodied in the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). Born in Calcutta, India, September 1, 1896, he studied philosophy, economics, and English at the University of Calcutta. As a young man he was a follower of Gandhi and advocated independence for India, and he refused to accept his degree in order to show solidarity with Gandhi. Intensely religious even as a child, he nevertheless followed his father's wishes by marrying and going into business. He was initiated into the Goudiya Vaishnava Society by Vaishnava holy man Shi Srimad Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati Goswami, and followed the Bhaki ("devotional") worship of Vishnu's incarnation as Krishna, which had been initiated by Chaitanya, a Bengali saint of the sixteenth century. Krishna's life is described in the Hindu scriptural texts Bhagavad-Gita and the Srimad-Bhagavatam.

Prabhupada managed a pharmaceutical business in order to support his family, but his guru, who died in 1936, ordered his disciples to preach the Chaitanya message in the West. The honorific name "Bhaktivedanta" was bestowed upon Prabhupada by the Gaudiya Vishnava Society. During this period he authored his first books, an Introduction to the Geetopanishad and the Bajgavad-Gita as It Is, a translation and commentary on the Gita from the Chaitaya perspective. In 1956, when his family duties were accomplished, Prabhupada renounced his secular life, including his family, to devote his whole life to religious teaching. His actions followed the ancient Hindu tradition of renunciation of everyday householder life when one's responsibilities were fully discharged.

At the age of 58 Prabhupada became a swami, and in 1965, shortly before the change in American immigration laws relative to India, he immigrated to America. He preached the worship of Krishna in New York and soon attracted students and dropouts, offering his brand of Vaishnava Hinduism in place of radicalism or drug counterculture. Large contributions were made to ISKCON funds by ex-Beatle George Harrison and B. M. Birla, a wealthy Indian textile magnate.

Swami Bhaktivedanta spent much of his time distributing his translation of the Bhagavad-Gita and completing his translation and commentary on Srimad-Bhagavatam and a variety of other writings. He kept up a voluminous correspondence and taught his devotees the basics of Krishna devotion. Like his devotees, he spent much time chanting the Hare Krishna mantra, and his devotees reported that he sometimes exhibited such emotional transports as weeping and dancing. They regarded him as a transcendental being and gave him the title H.D.G.—His Divine Grace.

Prabhupada saw his movement spread internationally, and he experienced the harsh criticism of the new anticult movement. Swami Bhaktivedanta died of heart failure on November 14, 1977, at the age of 81, at Vrindavana, India, the district in Mathura where Sri Krishna spent his childhood. By the late 1970s ISKCON had some 5,000 American disciples and had gained the support of many Indian Americans, who found it like the worship they had left behind when migrating. The movement was left in the control of initiating gurus and a governing board. It experienced intense attacks by anticult groups and suffered some tumultuous internal conflicts, but ISKCON has emerged in the 1990s as a stable Hindu body that has begun to integrate a second generation in its adult membership.

ISKCON has temples across North America, in most countries of Europe, and in numeorus locations around the world. For information, contact the ISKCON International Ministry of Public Affairs, 1030 Grand Ave., San Diego, CA 92109.

Sources:

Bromley, David G., and Larry D. Shinn, eds. Krishna Consciousness in the West. Lewisburg: Bucknell University Press, 1989.

Gelberg, Steven, ed. Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna. New York: Grove Press, 1983.

Goswami, Satsvarupa dasa. Srila Prabhupada-lilamrta. 6 vols. Los Angeles: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1980–83.

Prabhupada, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami. Bhagavad-Gita as It Is. New York: Bhativedanta Book Trust, 1972.

———. KRSHA: The Supreme Personality of Godhead. 3 vols. New York: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1970.

———. Letters from Srila Prabhupada. 5 vols. Culver City, Calif.: Vaishnava Institute, 1987.

———. The Nectar of Devotion. Los Angeles: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1970.

———. The Science of Self Realization. Los Angeles: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1977.

———. Teachings of Lord Chaitanya. Los Angeles: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1974.

Bhaktivedanta Institute of Religion and Culture

An informal and independent association of members of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). Founded in the 1970s by Subananda das (Steven Gelberg), the Bhaktivedanta Insititute concerned itself with intellectual and academic pursuits—particularly in the humanities and social sciences. Members of the institute were concerned with the scholarly study of ISKCON (the "Hare Krishna movement") as well as the application of Vaisnava thought to modern academic disciplines. During its brief existence, the institute issued several issues of the ISKCON Review, a biannual interdisciplinary publication intended to stimulate and communicate research and reflection on all aspects of the Hare Krishna movement.

Although sponsored by the ISKCON movement, the institute and its Review were independent and autonomous, thus providing a meeting place between ISKCON and informed scholars of religious history, theologians, sociologists, and others.

Bharati, Agehananda (1923–1991)

Scholar of Eastern religion and mysticism who was ordained as Acharya in Dashanami Mahavidyalaya, Benares, India, in 1951. Scholars in the West considered him an important interpreter of Hindu tradition, especially tantra. He became a professor and chair of the department of anthropology at Syracuse University, New York. He traveled throughout Thailand and Japan as a visiting professor and is the author of a number of scholarly but somewhat skeptical writings about Eastern mysticism. In 1974 he contributed an important paper on "Separate Realities: Sense and (Mostly) Nonsense in Parapsychology" to the Rhine-Swanton Interdisciplinary Symposium on Parapsychology and Anthropology. Bharati died in 1991.

Sources:

Bharati, Agehananda. The Light at the Center: Context and Pretext of Modern Mysticism. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Ross-Erickson, 1976.

———. The Ochre Robe. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

———. "Separate Realities: Sense and (Mostly) Nonsense in Parapsychology." In Extrasensory Ecology: Parapsychology and Anthropology. Edited by Joseph K. Long. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1977.

———. The Tantric Tradition. London: Rider, 1965.

Bhrigu-Samhita

An ancient Hindu astrological treatise, said to contain details of millions of lives, with horoscopes drawn for the time of consultation. The original Bhrigu was a Vedic sage and is mentioned in the Mahabharata. As the Bhrigus were a sacred race, it is difficult to identify the compiler of the Bhrigu-Samhita, but according to legend he lived 10,000 years ago and had a divine vision of everyone who was to be born in every country of the world. He compiled this information in his great treatise on astrology, originally written on palm leaves.

No complete manuscript is known, but large sections are rumored to exist somewhere in India. A printed version is said to comprise some 200 volumes, but most Indian astrologers who use the system work with loose manuscript pages. These are supposed to give the name of the client compiled from Sanskrit syllables approximating names in any language, with details of past, present, and future life, as well as previous incarnations.

In addition to his fee, the astrologer usually proposes the sponsorship of a special religious rite to propitiate the gods for past sins. Indian astrologers reported using the Bhrigu-Samhita include Pandit Devakinandan Shastri of Swarsati Phatak, in the old city of Benares; and Pandit Biswanath Bannerjee of Sadananda Road (near the Ujjala movie house) in Calcutta.

In Fate magazine (June 1982), David Christopher Lane, a noted scholar of spiritual movements and cults, described a personal consultation with Hindu astrologers in Hoshiarpur, Punjab, India, who were custodians of a set of Bhrigu-Samhita leaves. At the time Lane was researching the Radhasoami movement in India, on which he has become a world-famous authority. On July 22, 1978, Lane was taken by his friend Swami Yogeshwar Ananda Saraswati to a house in a back street of Hoshiarpur, where two astrologers had charge of a large set of Bhrigu-Samhita leaves tied in bundles.

The astrologers first compiled a graph, rather like a Western horoscope, but featuring the date of Lane's arrival at the house. According to Hindu tradition, all consultations with the Bhrigu-Samhita are preordained, and the moment of arrival is the key to discovery of the correct leaf, which indicates not only the life pattern and destiny of the inquirer, but also his name in a Sanskrit equivalent of the language of the inquirer.

Lane stated that after inspection of various bundles of leaves, taken down from the shelf and examined, the correct leaf was found in about 15 or 20 minutes. Lane was shown the leaf, and the Sanskrit inscriptions were translated: "A young man has come from a far-off land across the sea. His name is David Lane and he has come with a pandit [scholar] and a swami." Lane questioned how his name could be known, and the swami showed him the Sanskrit equivalent of the Bhrigu leaf. The reading continued: "The young man is here to study dharma [religious duty] and meet with holy men and saints." Other personal details were also given, including a sketch of Lane's past and present lives.

He expected to be able to make a copy of the leaf with its reading, but to his surprise he was told that he could keep the original leaf. The astrologer explained: "The Bhrigu-Samhita replenishes itself, sometimes with very old leaves and with some less aged. We do nothing; there is no need to. The astral records manifest physically at the appropriate time and place."

It was something of an anticlimax when the last lines of the horoscope stated that in order to expiate a sin in a previous life, Lane was advised to pay 150 rupees (approximately $20). But no pressure whatever was put on Lane to pay this modest sum, and the attitude of the astrologers and Swami Yogeshwar that there had been a divine revelation convinced Lane that this was no vulgar fraud. For such a small sum, the preparation of a fake Bhrigu leaf, and the willingness to allow Lane to take it away with him (and thus verify its antiquity) would have been out of all proportion to the work involved. Moreover, the specific details of the horoscope could not have been known in advance of Lane's visit.

Lane's experience was not unique, since a Canadian named H. G. McKenzie recorded that he used the Bhrigu-Samhita in the early 1970s and also verified its accuracy. He wrote: "I consulted Bhrigu-Samhita and found my name mentioned there, besides so many other things about my life that shows that one has no free will. . . . The Bhrigu-Samhita states about me that I, Mr. McKenzie from Canada, am here with such and such people. It states some events of my past life and also predicts the future course of my life."

In 1980 Lane met and talked with Anders Johanssen, a professional astrologer from Sweden who was then visiting Los Angeles. Johanssen stated that he had used the Bhrigu-Samhita at least seven times and was convinced that it was an authentic work and the most accurate treatise he had encountered. He believed that the copy in Hoshiarpur was the most complete, although other versions were known in Delhi, Meerut, and Benares.

However, it was not clear what the nature of a Bhrigu consultation was on subsequent visits. If the leaf from the first consultation was freely offered (as in the case of David Lane), were other leaves available for each of the later visits? In Lane's case, his Bhrigu horoscope contained the prediction: "This young man will come again several times." On the first visit, Lane accepted the offered leaf, but left it with Swami Yogeshwar to make an exact English translation, planning to collect the original leaf and translation a few weeks later. However, Lane curtailed his trip due to illness and was later unable to contact the swami. Lane made a second visit to Bhrigu-Samhita at Hoshiarpur three years later, in 1981, in company with Prof. Bhagat Ram Kamal. He gave two days' notice of the intended visit, but no leaf for the visit could be discovered, arguing for the genuineness of the astrologers, since no fee was requested. (See also Astrology)

Sources:

Kriyananda, Swami. The Book of Bhrigu. San Francisco: Hansa Publications, 1967.

Lane, David Christopher. Fate (June 1982).

Pagal Baba. Temple of the Phallic King: The Mind of India; Yogis, Swamis, Sufis, and Avataras. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1973.

Bianchi, P. Benigno (ca. 1890)

Professor of psychiatry at Naples, director of the Salerne Insane Asylum, and later minister of education, who investigated the phenomena of medium Eusapia Palladino. He was present at the sitting in March 1891 that was also attended by Cesare Lombroso.

On Marco Falcomer's invitation, Bianchi attended a séance with Nilda Bonardi and, in a spirit of skepticism, asked if the intelligent force directing the movement of the table could indicate the names of two of his uncles, deceased, and also reveal a family secret. The table immediately gave the name of both and proceeded to disclose the secret with so much exactitude that Bianchi hastily cried "Stop!" Subsequently he wrote in a letter to Falcomer: "The entirety of the facts observed and noted by me in the course of various sittings have profoundly shaken my scepticism; and now I can no longer give myself out to be a sceptic, as, for the time being, numerous facts incline me to believe in spiritualism."

Bible, Occultism in the

The Bible, the holy book revered by Jews and with the addition of the New Testament, by Christians worldwide, has been interpreted in the modern world, generally, as hostile to the occult. This has especially been the case in the wake of the late medieval trials in which witchcraft was reinterpreted as the work of Satan. In the post-Enlightenment world, in which many occult practices have disappeared, readers of the Bible may miss the occult element in the text, as for example the casting of lots, a popular divinatory practice, to choose the successor of the Apostle Judas in the first chapter of the Book of the Act of the Apostles.

The Bible versus Popular Occultism

Among the major themes of the history of Israel was its struggle to institute the exclusive worship of Yahweh, the god of Abraham. This effort involved them in separating Jewish life from that of their Pagan neighbors, especially those who practiced human sacrifice, keeping to a minimum the influences of the steady stream of merchants who traveled through their land, and surviving during the Babylonian Captivity. As a result, the biblical text is replete with admonitions to abstain from following the religious/occult practices of Israel's neighbors. The most cited cases having to do with occultism concern King Saul's interaction with the woman of Endor and the encounter of Daniel with the Babylonian sorcerers and astrologers.

To understand the role of the occult in the biblical literature, however, it is necessary to recall that the Bible was written in pre-scientific times in which all people operated as if what came to be known as the supernatural or the psychic was a fact of life. Visions and dreams were a common means of receiving direction in one's life, and dream interpretation was a most valued skill, among the more famous incidents being those of Joseph interpreting the dreams of Pharaoh and of Daniel in Babylon (Gen. 41; Dan. 2). For many years Israel was ruled by psychic seers or judges, who regularly received extrasensory information, a word from the Eternal, and to whom the people could turn for guidance. Decisions were commonly made by the casting of lots. The role of judge was vividly illustrated in the incident in which the future king David met Israel's most renowned seer/judge Samuel and asked him to help find a herd of lost donkeys. (1 Sam. 9) It would be Samuel's duty to oversee the transition of Israel from the rule of the judges to that of a king and to choose the first king, Saul.

As the Jewish priesthood developed, a method of divining God's will for the nation revolved around the use of some stones known as the Urim and Thummin. These stones, worn as a breastplate by the high priest, have been lost to history, and there is much speculation as to their exact nature. However, it is agreed that they functioned as oracle stones and were used to answer questions (Deut. 33:8).

In possibly the single most famous account with occult implications in the Bible (1 Sam. 28), Saul had lost favor with God for his disobedience and had been cut off from the common means of divination used by the Jews—the Urim and Thummin and dreams. Samuel, from whom Saul had always sought advice, was dead. In desperation, Saul turned to an "ob," translated "witch" in many Bibles, but more properly translated "medium" or "oracle." The use of obs had been forbidden in the law (Deut. 18:10–12; Lev. 20:27). Saul had banished the obs from the land, but one resided near Endor where he was encamped. He asked her to call forth the spirit of Samuel. Instead of getting the advice he sought, Saul found that Samuel merely emphasized his abandonment by God. Saul lost the battle to the Philistines the next day. He and his sons were killed and as a result David emerged as the new undisputed king and God's favorite.

The most intense confrontation between the Israelites and their forms of divination and the magical practices of their neighbors occurred in the Babylonian court where Daniel had found some favor. He stood out as he followed the strict dietary regulations of Jewish law. When the king's advisors were unable to interpret King Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Daniel succeeded. He later had a number of dreams and visions which were recounted in the book that bears his name, including some of his most famous apocalyptic visions of the endtime. At one point in his confrontations with the Babylonian psychic advisors, their plotting against him led to his being cast in the famous den of lions. It appears that the Babylonian kings employed a wide variety of advisors, including astrologers, and the harshest words concerning astrology in the Bible come from this period (Dan. 2:27; 5:7–11).

Christianity

The New Testament opens with a more positive view of astrology, as three Magi (Zoroastrian astrologers) have discerned the new star in the heavens as a sign of Christ's birth and travel to Palestine to offer their worship and acknowledgement. Jesus, as an adult, emerges as a worker of signs and wonders who is able to heal, tell people things of which he had no normal knowledge, render accurate prophecies, and do amazing things such as walk on water. In the theology of the church, especially as the distinction between the natural and supernatural world is delineated, Jesus was seen as a worker of miracles, as someone possessed of supernatural power by which he was able to do things not normally possible in the natural order of things.

Saints were also seen to possess such powers but to a lesser extent. The Book of the Acts of the Apostles recounted numerous miraculous experiences of the Apostles and other church members, none more extensively than Paul, whose Christian life begins with a visionary encounter with the risen Christ. He later speaks of being caught up into the Third Heaven. The Bible closes with the visionary experiences of the Apostle John, the Revelation.

Paul spelled out the church's early understanding of its encounter with what today would be considered the psychic world (1 Cor. 12). Psychic gifts were seen as "gifts of the Holy Spirit" and included the words of wisdom and knowledge (clairvoyance and telepathy), prophecy, working miracles (psychokinesis), discerning spirits, and speaking in tongues (xenoglossia). The operation of the gifts was placed under the prime directive of love (I Cor. 13). However, these gifts operated in the early church and especially gifted people traveled among the congregations exercising their gifts. False prophets became a problem and by the second century had to be strictly dealt with. Later generations, especially after the church became a mass movement, had to contend with the demise of the gifts as commonplace phenomena. Thus did the church come to see the gifts as necessary to the establishment of the church, but as confined to the saints and occasional miracles in the present.

In the Middle Ages, as the world was viewed as divided into natural and supernatural realms, the church assumed a position as the focus of the miraculous realm on Earth. The supernatural was integral to the Roman Catholic Church's worldview (as was also true of the Eastern Orthodox Churches). That worldview was challenged by Protestantism, which called into question a variety of the more outrageous elements in the Roman Church's understanding of sainthood and the use of relics it encouraged.

The challenge of Protestantism was reinforced by the Enlightenment and the rise of science, and by the eighteenth century, voices arose decrying the whole division of the world into natural and supernatural. They looked for a claiming of the heretofore supernatural by the understanding of science. Many saw no need for either God or the miraculous.

The Modern World

In the wake of the early successes of science and its application to technological advances throughout the nineteenth century, new movements that were built around what had earlier been seen as miraculous experiences were launched by people such as Emanuel Swedenborg and Franz Anton Mesmer. They led to the most successful of these movements, Spiritualism, which emerged in the 1840s around the primary experience of mediums communicating with the spirits of the deceased. By the 1860s Spiritualism had spread across Europe and became a significant cultural force through the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Spiritualism claimed to reproduce the "miracles" of the Bible in a demonstrable manner. In England, in response to its appearance, a new science, psychical research, emerged and a new language developed to understand the phenomena.

Spiritualism presented a broad challenge to the church. Present within the movement were all of the biblical "gifts of the Spirit" but in a non-church setting. Church leaders responded that Spiritualism merely reproduced the Pagan phenomena forbidden in the Jewish Old Testament and cited the story of the woman of Endor as a clear prohibition of spirit contact. This interpretation still dominates the more conservative segments of Christianity. Spiritualists countered with a biblical exposition centered upon the New Testament, the encounter of the Apostles with the long-dead Moses and Elijah at the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17), and the appearances of the resurrected Jesus.

In the twentieth century, Spiritualism as a movement withered as many mediums became involved in efforts to fake extraordinary events in spirit contact, materialization, and psychokinesis. The continued exposures to which it was subjected pushed it to the fringe, led to the replacement of psychical research by parapsychology, and gave credence to the skeptical movement that disparaged the existence of all psychic phenomena.

In the last half of the twentieth century, while the mainstream of biblical interpretation has moved in other directions, a number of biblical interpreters have emerged who understand the Bible stories of miraculous events in the light of the more limited findings of parapsychology. Several church-based movements such as Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship and the Churches Fellowship for Spiritual and Psychical Studies (in the United Kingdom) have emerged to embody such perspective. However, they remain a minority voice within Christendom, and have themselves had to compete with a reborn Gnosticism as represented in the New Age Movement that has developed quite apart from traditional Christianity.

Sources:

Bretherton, Donald. "Psychical Research and the Biblical Prohibitions." In J. D. Pearce-Higgins and G. Stanley Whitby, eds. Life, Death and Psychical Research. London: Rider, 1973.

Sutphin, John E., Jr. The Bible and Spirit Communication. Starkville, Miss.: Metamental Missions, 1971.

Thurston, Herbert. The Church and Spiritualism. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing, 1933.

Wallis, E. W., and M. H. Wallis. Spiritualism and the Bible. London: The Authors, n.d.

Bible of the Devil

Believed to be a grimoire or similar work. Pierre De Lancre stated that the Devil informed sorcerers that he possessed a bible consisting of sacred books, having a theology of its own, which was dilated upon by various professors. De Lancre claimed the one great magician, who was brought before the Parliament of Paris, avowed that there dwelt at Toledo 63 masters in the faculty of magic who took for their textbook the Devil's Bible.

Bibliomancy

A method of discovering whether or not a person was innocent of sorcery, by weighing him against the great Bible in the church. If the person weighed less than the Bible, he was innocent of practicing witchcraft. A more popular system of bibliomancy was to open a Bible at random after asking a question. The passage on which one's finger rested was supposed to have special applicability to the question posed. Other books consulted in this way included Greek epics, classical poetry, or the works of Shakespeare, and the term rhapsodomancy also has been used for this practice. Another term for bibliomancy is stichomancy.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Biffant

A little-known demon, chief of a legion who was said to have entered the body of Denise de la Caille and who was obliged to sign with his claws the proces verbal of exorcisms.

Bifrons

A demon of monstrous guise who, according to Johan Weyer, often took the form of a man well versed in astrology and planetary influences. He excels in geometry, is acquainted with the virtues of herbs, precious stones, and plants, and, it is said, he is able to transport corpses from one place to another. He also lights the strange corpse lights above the tombs of the dead. Twenty-six of the infernal regions obey his commands.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Bigfoot Research Project

Organization concerned with information and reported sightings of the mysterious humanoid creature variously known as Bigfoot, Sasquatch, Omah, Yowie, Yeti, and the Abominable Snowman. The project was established by Peter Byrne in the 1960s as a central clearing house of information on Bigfoot. The organization issues a monthly Bigfoot News. Address: P.O. Box 126, Mount Hood, OR 97041. (See also Monsters)

Sources:

Byrne, Peter. The Search for Big Foot: Monster, Myth, or Man? New York: Pocket Books, 1976.

Bigois (or Bigotis)

A sorcerer in ancient Tuscany who is said to have composed a learned work on the nature of prognostications, especially those connected with thunder and lightning. The book is thought to be irretrievably lost. Some believed Bigois to be the same as Bagoe, a sibyl of Erithryea, but this is merely surmise.

BILK Newsletter

Publication concerned primarily with water monsters (such as the Loch Ness monster), but also dealing with other aspects of cryptozoology, such as mermaids and cephalopods. The title is an acronym formed from Behemoth (fresh-water monster), Isis (mermaids), Leviathan (sea serpents), and Kraken (giant cephalopods). Address: Ulrich Magin, Augustastrasse 85, 76437 Rastatt, Germany.

Billot, G. P. (ca. 1840)

French physician who practiced during the age of animal magnetism and was acquainted with most of the phenomena of Spiritualism. His Recherches psychologiques sur la cause des phénomènes extraordinaires observés chez les modernes voyans, improprement dits somnambules magnétiques, ou correspondance sur le Magnétisme vital, entre un solitaire et M. Deleuze (2 vols.) was published in Paris in 1839. It contains an interesting exchange of letters and discussions on the subject of mesmerism with J. P. F. Deleuze. Whereas Deleuze admitted many supernormal phenomena but remained very cautious as to their public avowal, Billot openly affirmed his belief in the existence of spirits and in communication with the departed.

Bilocation

Simultaneous presence in two different places. The term is often used in histories of saints, but there are also many secular examples. (See double)

Binah

In the supreme triangle of the Kabala, the three sides are reason, which is named Kether; necessity, Chochmah; and liberty, Binah.

Binski, Sigurd R(obert) (1921–)

German government official and parapsychologist who experimented with psychokinesis and with psi capacities in hypnosis. Born February 18, 1921, in Berlin, he studied at the University of Bonn (B.A., Ph.D.) and afterward served in the German army, 1939–65. After deportation, he suffered forced labor in the Soviet Union. Binski, a government official in Germany since 1957, has written articles for various journals, including the Journal of Parapsychology, and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

Bio-ching

Bio-ching, a therapy technique that combines the insights of biorhythms with the wisdom of the I Ching, was developed by two eclectic therapists, Roderic and Amy Max Sorrell. Roderic Sorrell grew up in London. His mother was a devotee of Subud and he developed an early interest in occult and Eastern religions. He also studied with a group utilizing the teachings of George I. Gurdjieff. As an adult he became a therapist and began to integrate the various alternative spiritual teachings into his work. He found a compatible partner in Amy Max and through the 1980s and 1990s, they have traveled widely to sample a spectrum of alternative spiritualities. They studied martial arts, beginning with aikido, and were led to Tai Chi. They spent time in Hawaii studying Zen and many years in the San Francisco Bay Area studying Taoism. In the mid 1990s, they both took the Reiki training and emerged as Reiki masters.

Most recently they have moved to Truth or Consequences, New Mexico, and developed a retreat center which has become the major point of dissemination for their own synthesis called bio-ching. The I Ching is an ancient form of divination that derives information from the reading of one of 64 different hexagrams. Each hexagram is composed of six lines, each line being either broken or solid. Biorhythms are the three biological cycles as defined by William Fliess and Alfred Teltscher early in the twentieth century and popularized by George S. Thommen. The state of these cycles, each of a different length, can be calculated for each individual. Bio-ching relates each of the 512 possible combinations of the biorhythm chart on any given day with a particular hexagram reading. This is done by assigning two lines in each hexagram to one of the biorhythm cycles.

The Sorrells have established a retreat center in New Mexico for those who wish to participate in their therapy. Those who attend the ongoing events receive a personal bio-ching reading and are taught the art of journal-keeping so they can record their progress. Each day begins with Tai Chi and meditation, and each person receives some personal psychotherapy. Attendees are also introduced to Reiki healing, though the program is developed to individual needs and desires.

The Sorrells may be reached at 512 Marr, Truth or Consequences, NM 87901. They have a bio-ching Internet site at http://www.teleport.com/~bioching/.

Sources:

Bio-ching. http://www.teleport.com/~bioching/. June 11, 2000.

Biocommunication

Preferred term for telepathy by Russian parapsychologists.

Biofeedback

A term covering a range of EEG (electroencephalographic) feedback instruments and techniques, as well as apparatus giving information on other biological functions. Biofeedback instruments can convey to the subject the characteristics of his own brainwaves, skin resistance, or heartbeats so that he can learn to modify these functions consciously. In this way, the subject can enhance his capacity for relaxation or reproduce some of the psycho-physiological control shown by yogis and Zen masters.

Modification of brainwaves by biofeedback machines was first introduced in the United States by Joe Kamiya in the late 1960s; Elmer Green of the Menninger Clinic promoted the practice through the 1970s. It appeared that biofeedback could become a major technique within transpersonal psychology, and that subjects could be trained to control or to generate brain wave activity at will, thus achieving altered states of consciousness leading to the production of various psychic, spiritual, and mystical experiences.

The chief brain waves identified within biofeedback studies are: alpha (related to relaxation and dream states), frequency 8 to 13 cycles per second (cps); beta (mental and visual activity), 14 to 50 cps; theta (dream and sleep states), 4 to 7 cps; and delta (deep sleep states), 0.5 to 3.5 cps.

The simple relationship first thought to exist between brain waves and psychic and spiritual development proved to be much more complicated and ambiguous than originally believed. At present biofeedback has been used mainly in teaching people to alter various body functions to improve their health; it has been particularly effective in cases of migraine headaches.

Sources:

Green, Elmer. "Biofeedback for Mind-Body Self-Regulation: Healing and Creativity." In The Varieties of Healing Experience: Exploring Psychic Phenomena and Healing. Los Altos, Calif.: Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine, 1971.

Kamiya, Joe. "Conscious Control of Brain Waves." Psychology Today 1, no. 11 (April 1968).

Stearn, Jess. The Power of Alpha-Thinking: Miracle of the Mind. New York: William Morrow, 1976. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1977.

Timmons, Beverly, and Joe Kamiya. "The Psychology and Physiology of Meditation and Related Phenomena." Journal of Transpersonal Psychology 1 (1970).

Bioinformation

Preferred term for extrasensory perception by Russian parapsychologists.

Bio-introscopy

Term for eyeless sight or "skin vision" used by parapsychologists in Russia. Among the more famous individuals demonstrating this faculty were Rosa Kuleshova (1955–78) and Tania Bykovskaia. Kuleshova was only five years old when the first newspaper coverage of her abilities appeared. She was later tested by the Nizhne-Tagil Pedagogical Instiituite, which found her abilities unusual but not paranormal. Bykovskaia was tested by a commission from Kuban Medical Institute in Krasnodar, which reported on her ability to distinguish the colors of two balls hidden from sight.

In 1965 at the Scientific Conference of the Ural Division of the Society of Psychologists in Perm, Dr. S. N. Dobronravov of Sverdlovsk stated that some 72 percent of children had skin sight potential, especially between the ages of seven and twelve years. Dr. Abram Novomeisky of the psychology laboratory at the Nizhne-Tagil Institute experimented with Vasily B., a metallurgist who had been totally blind for seven years, and found that Vasily could distinguish colors by touch and at a distance. As with other subjects, the ability diminished in the diminution or absence of light. Experiments suggested that bright electric light enhanced the faculty of eyeless sight. Another frequently reported observation was that different colors had specific sensations that aided identification. For example, red seemed to burn, orange to warm, yellow less so, green was neutral, light blue cooling, navy blue freezing. Other subjects reported that red had a sticky sensation and blue felt smooth. (See also Dermo-Optical Perception; Eyeless Sight; Jules Romains; Seeing with the Stomach; Transposition of the Senses)

Sources:

Ostrander, Sheila, and Lynn Schroeder. Psychic Discoveries behind the Iron Curtain. 1970. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1971.

Biolater

A small electronic calculator for charting biorhythm cycles to predict high, low, and danger points of one's personal biochemistry. It looks very much like a normal pocket-size battery-operated calculator with mathematical functions.

Biological Phenomena

Term used by parapsychologists for psychokinetic influences on living systems, such as accelerating or retarding growth of seeds, plants, or bacteria or apparently revivifying anesthetized mice. J. B. Rhine used the term "psychokinesis on living targets," (expressed in the acronym "PK-LT.")

Stimulating the growth of plants is a phenomenon occasionally met with in spiritualist literature. It was claimed that marked mango seeds were made to sprout by Charles Bailey, the Australian apport medium. An Indian myrtle developed from seed to a height of 16 inches in 20 minutes. A loquat seed similarly grew with accelerated speed. His investigators at Milan, Italy, in 1904 could not detect fraud in the performance. However, Bailey was once detected in fraud, which has thrown doubt upon his other phenomena. Moreover, the sudden growth of mango plants is a well-known conjuring trick performed by Hindu jugglers.

In Angelic Revelations published anonymously in 1875, William Oxley wrote of a séance with Elizabeth d'Esperance: "Yolande brought me a rose with a short stem not more than an inch long which I put into my bosom. Feeling something was transpiring, I drew it out and found there were two roses. I then replaced them and withdrawing them at the conclusion of the meeting, to my astonishment the stem had elongated to seven inches with three full blown roses and a bud upon it with several thorns."

In certain individuals, some vital force seems to destroy bacteria, prevent decomposition, and add vigor to dying flowers. (See also emanations)

Biological Review

A short-lived British Spiritualistic monthly that ran for a brief period in winter 1858–59 and was published by Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie. The chief contributor was Jacob Dixon.

Biomate

A manual computer used for charting biorhythm cycles to predict high, low, and danger points in an individual's biochemistry. (See also biolater)

Biometer of Baraduc

An instrument to register vibrations and nervous force of human bodies. It consists of a needle suspended by a fine thread under a glass shade. If the hand is brought near the shade, the needle is deflected. The angle of deflection, according to the inventor, Hyppolite Baraduc, depended on various mental, physical, and moral conditions of the experimenter. He believed that the biometer indicated aspects of such conditions.

Similar instruments intended to indicate nervous or psychic force include the sthenometer developed by Paul Joire and the De Tromelin cylinder. These are lightly suspended or balanced indicators that have been tested extensively to preclude the possibility of movement caused by air currents or heat from the hand of the operator. Such movement is believed to be connected with the dowsing faculty or with psychokinesis.

Bioplasma

A term used by Russian parapsychologists to indicate a theoretical energy field counterpart of the human body, involved in extrasensory perception and psychokinetic phenomena. Such a concept has some affinity with the astral body spoken of by Theosophists.

Sources:

Ostrander, Sheila, and Lynn Schroeder. Psychic Discoveries behind the Iron Curtain. 1970. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1971.

Biorhythm

Theory of biochemical phasing, which claims that human beings experience three major biological cycles: (1) a 23-day cycle of physical strength, energy, and endurance, (2) a 28-day cycle of emotional sensibility, intuition, and creative ability; and (3) a 33-day cycle of mental activity, reasoning, and ambition. Charts of these cycles indicate periods of maximum or minimum potential in any of the three cycles, as well as critical dates of stress when two or three of the cycles intersect. By studying such advantageous or disadvantageous points of the cycles, it is claimed that an individual can be aware of the best and worst dates to maximize effort for success and confidence and avoid over-stress at dates of minimal confidence and energy. The theory has some attraction as it relates to other natural cycles such as the ebb and flow of the tides and the menstrual cycle in women.

Since body cycles relate to birth dates, the system of biorhythms is analagous with medical astrology. During the 1970s the system became a popular fad. Some physicians attempted to use biorhythm diagnostically, and some used biorhythms to predict football games. Billie Jean King is said to have won her famous match against Bobby Riggs when at a "high" in two of her cycles. Practitioners claimed that Judy Garland and Marilyn Monroe committed suicide on their critical days. The Omi Railway in Japan credited biorhythms with their accident-free record of safety. Other Japanese firms and several European airlines tested the use of biorhythms.

The concept of biorhythms was first proposed by William Fliess, a German friend of Sigmund Freud. Fliess proposed two basic cycles, and Austrian engineer Alfed Teltscher added the idea of a third cycle. Herman Swoboda tied the cycles to the birth date. Other writers also explored the idea through the twentieth century, but in the early 1960s the writings of George S. Thommen succeeded in popularizing the idea. Thommen found a leading supporter in Bernard Gittelson. Apparatus designed to simplify charting of biorhythm cycles have been developed and include the biomate (a manual computer), and the biolater (a small electronic calculator with mathematical functions).

During the 1970s various trials attempted to verify the claims about biorhythm. The most notable were in the field of sports where, it was predicted, outstanding performances would tend to appear on days of biorhythmic highs. In fact, no such patterns emerged. No empirical data exists to support the biorhythm theory.

Sources:

Bainbridge, William S. "Biorhythms: Evaluating a Pseudoscience." Skeptical Inquirer (spring/summer 1978): 41–56.

Gittelson, Bernard. Bio-Rhythms: A Personal Science. New York: Warner Books, 1977.

Luce, Gay Gaer. Body Time: Physiological Rhythms and Social Stress. New York: Pantheon Books, 1971.

———. Biological Rhythms in Psychiatry and Medicine. Washington, D.C.: National Institute of Mental Health, 1970. Reprinted as Biological Rhythms in Human and Animal Physiology. New York: Dover Books, 1971.

Schadewald, Robert. "Biorhythms: A Critical Look at Critical Days." Fate (February 1979): 75–80.

Thommen, George. Is This Your Day? New York: Award, 1964.

Wernli, Hans J. Biorhythm: A Scientific Exploration into the Life Cycles of the Individual. New York: Crown, 1961.

Biosophia

Biosophia is one of two newsstand magazines serving the esoteric and psychic community of Portugal. It emerged in 1999 as a new periodical offering a new comprehensive view of life, the universe, and humanity. Biosophia is written in Portuguese and appears three times annually.

Each issue of Biosophia carries several feature articles relevant to its overall interests, which include such topics as theosophy, alternative science, astrology, holistic health, vegetarianism, and world peace. It also includes reviews of books and CDs. Biosophia is sponsored by the Centro Lusitano de Unificacao (Portuguese Center for a Unified Culture) headquartered in Lisbon. The Centro Lusitano is dedicated to solving those problems which it sees as most afflicting humanity and in that regard sponsors a variety of activities aimed at promoting the positive evolution of the species. It is assisted by GRACL, the Grupo de Amigos de Centro Lusitano (the Association of Friends of the Portuguese Center), and associated with the Curso de Naturologia, a naturopathic healing center in Lisbon that offers a range of naturopathic treatments including homeopathy and acupuncture.

The Centro Lusitano has placed peace as a keystone of its agenda, and each issue of Biosophia includes a supplementary insert concerning its proposals for a program of education and reconciliation in the cause of world peace. This topic has been focused on for the Portuguese in Portugal's former colonial possessions in the East Indies, especially what is now East Timor. The proposal calls for a comprehensive educational effort including a journal, communication through the Internet, and a school.

Biosophia is published three times annually from R. Pascoal de Melo, 4-1, 1170-294 Lisbon, Portugal.

Sources:

Biosophia. Lisbon, Portugal, n.d.

Biosophical Institute

Founded in the 1940s by Dr. Frederick Kettner to promote his system of biosophy. He defined biosophy (from the words bios, meaning life, and sophia, meaning intelligence) as "the science and art of intelligent living based on the awareness and practice of spiritual values, ethical-social principles and character qualities essential to individual freedom and social harmony." In his booklet, The Need for a Thousand Year Plan (1948), Kettner acknowledged the part played by the human mind in creating civilization but stated, "Humanity's next problem is to realize the creativity of the heart of man." Through biosophy he hoped to create a world-fellowship of peace-loving men and women who have overcome religious, national, racial, and social prejudices and who would work creatively for the growth of democracy and world peace.

Biosophy groups were founded in various U.S. cities and in South and Central America, Europe, Australia, and India. Kettner counted Albert Einstein, Pierre leComte du Nouy, Havelock Ellis, and Lal Sharma among his supporters. No sign of institute activity has been observed in recent years.

Bird, J(ames) Malcolm (1886–1964)

Author and research officer of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) from 1925 to 1931. His first contact with psychic research occurred in 1922. He was then secretary of a committee investigating physical phenomena of Spiritualism, which was sponsored by the Scientific American on which Bird was an associate editor. The committee administered the $2,000 reward offered by the magazine to anyone who could produce satisfactory paranormal physical phenomena. On Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's recommendation, Bird was sent to Europe to collect observations for a supplement to the report. He sat with John C. Sloan, Gladys Osborne Leonard, William Hope, Ada Emma Deane, Evan Powell, and Maria Vollhardt. In My Psychic Adventures (1924), he concluded that the phenomena were truly objective, that is, they were neither due to hallucination nor collective hypnosis, and that a good degree of probability existed for the genuineness of some of the psychic phenomena he witnessed. In "Margery," The Medium (1925) Bird traced the development of Mina Crandon's powers from the incipient stage and gave an account of the investigation of her mediumship to the Scientific American.

Though Bird was convinced that Margery's work was genuine, the committee could not reach a verdict. When his articles in the Scientific American created undue anticipation for a verdict in Margery's favor, he resigned his position on the committee and soon after severed his connections with the magazine. The American Society for Psychical Research appointed Bird as research officer alongside Walter F. Prince, which brought to a head the disagreement within the leadership of the ASPR over Margery. Prince, who believed her a fraud, resigned from the ASPR and with others founded the Boston Society for Psychical Research.

Bird's continuing fascination with the Margery phenomena, and his public endorsement of it as genuine, led to accusations of investigative incompetence and even to confederacy in fraud. At the time Bird strenuously denied the accusations, but many years later, a confidential report that Bird made to the ASPR trustees came to light. In it Bird claimed that he strongly doubted the paranormal character of much of the phenomena and on one occasion proposed that Margery engaged in fraud, this being the time when Harry Houdini was to investigate her mediumship. Apparently Bird's doubts on the phenomena caused consternation in the ASPR, which had been placed in the position of competent investigation and support for the phenomena. Publication of Bird's doubts and criticisms would have had an unfavorable influence on the credibility of the society, particularly in light of the scandal surrounding Bird himself.

In December 1930 Bird resigned from the society, after which a lengthy issue of the ASPR Proceedings that Bird had compiled was never published and apparently vanished from the archives. Bird himself disappeared from the scene of psychic research and there appeared to be no record of his subsequent career.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bird, J. Malcolm. "Margery," The Medium. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1925.

———. My Psychic Adventure. London: George Allen & Unwin, 1923.

Tiertze, Thomas R. Margery. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Birds

It was a common belief amongst primitive tribes that the souls of the dead were conveyed to the land of the hereafter by birds. Some West African peoples would bind a bird to the body of the deceased and then sacrifice it to carry the man's soul to the afterworld. The Bagos also offered up a bird on the corpse of a deceased person for the same reason. The South Sea Islanders used to bury their dead in coffins shaped like the bird that was to bear away the spirits, while the natives of Borneo represented Tempon Telon's Ship of the Dead as having the form of a bird. The Native American tribes of the Northwest had rattles shaped like ravens with a large face painted on the breast. The probable significance is that the raven was to carry the disembodied soul to the region of the sun.

The flight of birds was also studied as part of the methods of divination in ornithomancy.

Bird Voices

Paranormal messages supposedly conveyed through the medium of the twittering of budgerigars, as distinct from mere imitation of human voices. (See also electronic voice phenomenon; Friedrich Jürgenson; Raudive voices)

Birge, Raymond T(hayer) (1887– ?)

A professor of physics at the University of California, Berkeley, who made a special study of magic and superstition. He was born March 13, 1887, in Brooklyn, New York, and studied at the University of Wisconsin and University of California. His retiring vice-presidential address to the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1958 was "Science, Pseudo-Science, and Parapsychology."

Birog

A Druidess in ancient Irish legend. The Fomorian king Balor had a beautiful daughter named Ethlinn whom he kept imprisoned because of a Druidic prophecy that he would be slain by his grandson. Balor had stolen a magical cow from three brothers, Kian, Sawan, and Goban.

Through the magical spells of Birog, Kian, disguised as a woman, was able to enter the tower where Ethlinn was imprisoned. He then slept with Ethlinn, who in due course delivered three sons at one birth. Balor commanded them to be drowned, but one of them, named Hugh, survived, and in the course of time fulfilled the Druidic prophecy and slew Balor.

Birraark

Practitioners of necromancy in Australia.

Al-Biruni (973–1048)

Al-Biruni, born Abu'l-Rayhan Muhammad ibn Ahmad Al-Biruni, an outstanding eleventh-century astrologer whose writings compiled the astrological teachings of several cultures. Al-Biruni was born in Uzbek, a country until recently a part of the former Soviet Union, located just north of Iran and Afghanistan. He grew up under the multicultural influences of Persia, India, and the Greek empire of Alexander. Here Zoroastrian and Manichean teaching mingled with Hinduism and emerging Islam. In the areas of astronomy, mathematics, and astrology, this area of the world, making the transition to Islam, was far ahead of Europe, then only beginning to recover its classical tradition.

As a young man, Al-Biruni began to travel through Persia, Afghanistan, and India and to gather the material for one of his important books, Chronologies of Ancient Nations, detailing the histories of the peoples of the area. It was completed near the end of the century. Around 1010 he settled in his native land for a decade until the ruler (who was also his patron) was overthrown and the nobility was exiled. Al-Biruni then lived in India for an extended time and wrote a volume on the people of the Indus Valley as well as his most remembered text, The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology, generally called the Tafhim.

The Tafhim, designed as an introductory textbook for the young astrologer, addresses all of the subjects an astrologer would be expected to have mastered, including mathematics, geography, history, and astronomy, all of which are treated before any consideration of astrology. Al-Biruni picked up this learning from the foundational Tetrabiblos of Ptolemy, upon which astrology is built, and he compared Persian astrology with its Hindu counterpart.

The Tafhim was reproduced and widely circulated in Southern Asia and found its way to Europe, where it was read three centuries later by Guido Bonati and influenced his important Liber Astronomie. It was translated into English in 1934 by R. Ramsey Wright.

Sources:

Al-Biruni. The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology. Trans. R. Ramsey Wright. London: Luzac, 1934.

———. The Chronologies of Ancient Nations. Translated by Edward Sachau. London: W. H. Allen, 1879.

Biscar, Jeanette

An alleged sorceress of the Basque district of Labourd in France, who was said to have been transported to the witches' Sabbat by the Devil in the form of a goat. As punishment she was suspended in midair head downward. She was one of thousands of supposed witches persecuted through the efforts of witch-hunter Pierre de Lancre in the early seventeenth century.

Bisclaveret

The name of the werewolf in Brittany. It was believed to be a human being transformed by magic into a fearsome man-devouring beast that roamed about the woods, seeking people to kill.

Bisson, Juliette (Madame Alexandre Bisson)

Sculptress and wife of French playwright Alexandre Bisson. The Bissons conducted a series of séances between 1909 and 1913 with the celebrated materialization medium Marthe Beraud (known as Eva C.) In May 1909 Baron von Schrenck-Notzing joined the circle and began his detailed scientific observations.

Sources:

Schrenck-Notzing, Albert von. Materialisationspaenomene. Munich: Ernst Reinhart, 1914. Translated as Phenomena of Materialisation: A Contribution to the Investigation of Mediumistic Teleplastics. London, 1923.

Bitru

According to the demonologist Johan Weyer, Bitru is a great Prince of Hell, also known as Sytry. He appeared in the form of a leopard with the wings of a griffin. But whenever he adopted a human appearance, it was invariably one of great beauty. It is he who awakes lust in the human heart. Seventy legions obey his commands.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Bitumen

Bitumen was greatly used in magical practices. Images for the purpose of sympathetic magic were often made of this substance, and it was also used in ceremonies for the cleansing of houses in which any uncleanness had appeared—being spread on the floor like clay.

Bjelfvenstam, Nils Erik (1896– ?)

Swedish educator. He was born January 14, 1896, at Köping, Sweden, and educated at the University of Uppsala. He served as president of the Parapsychology Society, Stockholm, beginning in 1948, and of the Institute of Psychological Research, Uppsala, beginning in 1955. He contributed a section to the book Abnormal Hypnotic Phenomena: A Survey of Nineteenth-Century Cases in 1967.

Björkhem, John (1910–1963)

Swedish physician in psychiatry and neurology and a parapsychologist. He was born July 20, 1910, at Blekinge, Sweden, and educated at the University of Uppsala. He tested some 400 subjects for psychometric faculty and wrote and lectured on parapsychology in relation to hypnosis. His book Det Ockulta Problemet (1939) was translated into Finnish, Norwegian, Danish, and German. His other books dealing with parapsychology include Nervstralningens Problem (The Problem of Nerve Irradiation, 1940); De Hypnotiska Hallucinationera (Hypnotic Hallucination, 1942); Hypnos och Personlighetsforvandling (Hypnosis and Personality Change, 1959) and Livet och Manniskan (Life and Man, 1959).

Black Box

A general term for radionics devices used to diagnose disease. These devices supposedly tap the unknown forces involved in radiesthesia and dowsing, where instruments such as water-witching rods or small pendulums test for sensitivity to water, metals, or health conditions. The original "Black Box" was devised by Dr. Albert Abrams, an unconventional San Francisco physician in the early twentieth century. It consisted of a box, variously called the ERA or the Oscilloclast, with several variable rheostats and a thin sheet of rubber mounted over a metal plate. A blood sample from the patient would be put into the machine, which was connected with a metal plate placed on the forehead of a healthy person. By tapping on the abdomen of this person, the doctor determined the disease of the patient according to the "areas of dullness" identified by dial readings on the apparatus. This strange procedure brought together various techniques: Auscultation is part of normal medical practice, but the suggestion of a psychic relationship between a patient and his blood sample, plus the indications obtained from stroking the rubber sheet with the fingers, involved the paranormal sensitivities used in water witching with rod or pendulum.

Long after the death of Abrams in 1924, his theories and techniques were developed by Dr. Ruth Drown in the United States and George De la Warr in Britain. De la Warr devised a black box that produced photographs relating to the individual whose sample was placed in the machine. These photographs were more like thought processes than normal images. De la Warr claimed that they registered a radiation pattern related to the shape and chemical structure of the radiating body, and, given a suitable sample, the camera plate would register not only regional tissue but its pathology.

However, the black box did not operate uniformly, and thus it appears that the individual operators were greatly affecting the results. The inability to standardize results would deny its operation any scientific standing. One woman sued the De la Warr laboratories because she was unable to obtain satisfactory results. The case was dismissed on the grounds that there had been no intent to defraud, although the judge severely criticized the apparatus as bogus. Use of the black box is against the law in the United States. However, in a more sympathetic investigation of the apparatus, Lucian Landau suggested that success depended upon the special sensitivity of the operator. In this respect, the apparatus would be related to the phenomenon of thought photography as attempted by Ted Serios. For a negative view of Abrams, see the volume by Gardner.

Sources:

Abrams, Albert. New Concepts in Diagnosis and Treatment. Physico-Clinical, 1924.

Barr, Sir James. Abrams' Methods of Diagnosis and Treatment. London, 1925.

De la Warr, George, with Langston Day. New Worlds Beyond the Atom. London: Vincent Stewart Publishers, 1956.

Firebrace, R. C., and Lucien Landau. "The Delawarr Camera." Light: A Journal of Psychic Science 77, no. 3430 (March 1937).

Gardner, Martin. Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science. New York: Dover Publications, 1957.

Radionic Therapy (leaflet). Oxford, England: Delawarr Laboratories, 1953.

Black Hen, Fast of the

In Hungary and adjacent countries it was believed that if a person who had been robbed wished to discover the thief, then the victim must take a black hen and fast strictly for nine Fridays. The thief would then either return the plunder or die. This is called "taking up a black fast" against someone. A great deal of lore concerning black hens may be found in the works of Angelo de Gubernatis.

Black Magic

Black magic as practiced in medieval times may be defined as the use of the supernatural knowledge of magic for evil purposes; the invocation of diabolic and infernal powers to blind them as slaves and emissaries to man's will; in short, a perversion of legitimate mystical science. While black magicians certainly existed, there is every reason to believe that the majority of the reports of the spread of black magic were simply polemics against idealogical and personal enemies. Thus, members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn accused Aleister Crowley of practicing black magic while Crowley complained that black magicians had perverted his system.

The existence of the black art and its attendant practices can be traced from the time of the ancient Egyptians and Persians, from the Greeks and Hebrews, to the period when reports of black magic were most numerous, during the Middle Ages, thus forming an unbroken chain. In medieval magic may be found a degraded form of popular pagan rites—the ancient gods had become devils, their mysteries orgies, their worship sorcery.

Some historians have tried to trace the areas in Europe most affected by these devilish practices. Spain is said to have excelled all in infamy, to have plumbed the depths of the abyss. The south of France next became a hotbed of sorcery, branching northward to Paris and the countries and islands beyond, southward to Italy, finally extending into the Tyrol and Germany.

Many diseases, including catalepsy, somnambulism, hysteria, and insanity, were attributed to black magic. It followed that curative medicine was also a branch of magic, not a rational science, the suggested cures being such fantastic treatments as incantations and exorcisms, amulets and talismans of precious stones, medicines rendered powerful by spells and philters and enchanted drinks. The use of herbs and chemicals, which later became the foundation of modern curative science, then had more enchanted and symbolic significance when they were first prescribed by magicians.

Folk history surely exaggerated its intimations that the followers of the black art swarmed everywhere. The fraternity had grades from the pretenders, charlatans, and diviners of the common people to the various secret societies and orders of initiates, among whom were kings, queens, popes, and dignitaries of church and state. In these advanced levels, knowledge and ritual were carefully cherished and preserved in manuscripts, some of which still exist. These ancient grimoires, variously termed the Black, the Red, the Great Grimoire, are full of weird rites, formulas, conjurations, and evocations of evil malice and lust in the names of barbaric deities; charms and bewitchments clothed in incomprehensible jargon; and ceremonial processes for the fulfillment of imprecations of misfortune, calamity, sin, and death.

The deity who was worshiped and whose powers were invoked in the practice of black magic had many names: the Source and Creator of Evil, Satanas, Belial, the evil, a debased descendent of the Egyptian Set, the Persian Ahriman, the Python of the Greeks, the Jewish Serpent, Baphomet of the Templars, the Goat-deity of the Witches' Sabbat. He was said to have the head and legs of a goat and the breasts of a woman.

His followers called him by the names of forgotten deities as well as the Black One, the Black He-goat, the Black Raven, the Dog, the Wolf and Snake, the Dragon, the Hell-hound, Hell-hand, and Hell-bolt. His transformations were unlimited, as is indicated by many of his names; other favorite and familiar forms were a cat, a mouse, a toad, or worm, or again, the human form, especially a young and handsome man as he would appear on his amorous adventures. The signs by which he might be identified, though not invariably, were the cloven hoof, the goat's beard, cock's feathers, or the ox's tail.

In the Devil are embedded ancient mysteries and their symbols, the detritus of dead faiths and faded civilizations. The Greek Pan with the goat limbs masquerades as the Devil, also the goat as emblematic of fire and symbol of generation, and perhaps traces of the Jewish tradition where two goats were taken, one pure, the other impure, the first offered as sacrifice in expiation of sin, the other, the impure burdened with sins by imprecation and driven into the wilderness, in short, the scapegoat. In the Hebrew Kabala, Satan's name is Jehovah reversed. He is not a devil, but the negation of deity.

Beneath the Devil's sway were innumerable hordes and legions of demons and spirits, ready and able to procure and work any and every evil or disaster the mind of man might conceive and desire. In one grimoire, as presented in Francis Barrett's The Magus, it tells of nine orders of evil spirits, these being False Gods, Lying Spirits, Vessels of Iniquity, Revenge led by Asmodeus, Deluders by the Serpent, Turbulents by Merigum, Furies by Apollyon, Calumniators by Astaroth, and Tempters by Mammon. These demons again are named separately, the meaning of each name indicating the possessor's capacity, such as destroyer, devastator, tumult, ravage, and so forth.

Each earthly vice and calamity was personified by a demon—Moloch, who devours infants; Nisroch, god of hatred, despair, fatality; Astarte, Lilith, and Astaroth, deities of debauchery and abortion; Adramelek, of murder, and Belial, of red anarchy.

According to the grimoires, the rites and rules are multifarious, each demon demanding special invocation and procedure. The ends that might be obtained by performing the rites are indicated in such chapter headings as these: "to take possession of all kinds of treasure," "to live in opulence," "to ruin possessions," "to demolish buildings and strongholds," "to cause armed men to appear," "to excite every description of hatred, discord, failure, and vengeance," "to excite tempest," "to excite love in a virgin, or in a married person," "to procure adulteries," "to cause enchanted music and lascivious dances to appear," "to learn all secrets from those of Venus to Mars," "to render oneself invisible," "to fly in the air and travel," "to operate underwater for twenty-four hours," "to open every kind of lock without a key, without noise, and thus gain entrance to prison, larder, or charnel-house," "to innoculate the walls of houses with plague and diseases," "to bind familiar spirits," "to cause a dead body to revive," "to transform one's self," "to transform men into animals or animals into men."

These rites were classified as divination, bewitchments, and necromancy. Divination was carried out by magical readings of fire, smoke, water, or blood; by letters of names, numbers, symbols, or arrangements of dots; by lines of hand or fingernails; by birds and their flight or their entrails; by dice, cards, rings, or mirrors. Bewitchments were carried out by means of nails, animals, toads, or waxen figures and mostly to bring about suffering or death. Necromancy was the raising of the dead by evocations and sacrilegious rites, for the customary purposes of evil. These rites might take place around pits filled with blood, in a darkened and suffocating room, in a churchyard, or beneath swinging gibbets, and the number of ghosts so summoned and galvanized into life might be one of legion.

Regardless of desired outcome the procedure usually included profanation of Christian ritual, such as diabolical masses and administration of polluted sacraments to animals and reptiles; bloody sacrifices of animals, often of children; of orgiastic dances, generally of circular formation, such as that of the Witches' Sabbat.

For paraphernalia and accessories the sorcerers scoured the world and the imagination and mind of man and bent all things, beautiful or horrible, to their service. Because different planets were believed to rule over certain objects and states and invocations, such would be of great potency if delivered under the planets' auspices. Mars favored wars and strife, Venus love, Jupiter ambition and intrigue, Saturn malediction and death.

Vestments and symbols proper to the occasion were donned. The furs of the panther, lynx, and cat added their quota of influence to the ceremonies. Colors were also observed and suitable ornaments. For operations of vengeance, the robe had to be the hue of leaping flame, or rust and blood, with belt and bracelets of steel, and crown of rue and wormwood. Blue, green, and rose were the colors for amorous incantations; black for encompassing death, with belt of lead and wreath of cypress, amid loathsome incense of sulphur and assafoetida.

Precious stones and metals also influenced spells. Geometrical figures, stars, pentagrams, columns, and triangles were used; also herbs, such as belladonna and assafoetida; flowers, honeysuckle, being the witches' ladder, the arum, deadly nightshade, and black poppies; distillations and philters composed of the virus of loathsome diseases, venom of reptiles, secretions of animals, and poisonous sap, fungi, and fruits, such as the fatal manchineel, pulverized flint, impure ashes, and human blood. Amulets and talismans were made of the skins of criminals wrought from the skulls of hanged men, ornaments rifled from corpses and thus of special virtue, or the pared nails of an executed thief.

To make themselves invisible, it is said that sorcerers used an unguent compounded from the incinerated bodies of newborn infants mixed with the blood of nightbirds. For personal preparation, the sorceror fasted for 15 days, then got drunk every five days, after sundown, on wine in which poppies and hemp had been steeped.

For the actual rites the light came from candles made from the fat of corpses and fashioned in the form of a cross; the bowls were made from skulls, those of parricides being of greatest virtue; the fires were fed with cypress branches, with the wood of desecrated crucifixes and bloodstained gibbets; the magic fork was fashioned of hazel or almond, severed at one blow; the ceremonial cloth, was to be woven by a prostitute, and around the mystic circle were the embers of a polluted cross. Another potent instrument of magic was the mandragora, unearthed from beneath gallows where corpses were suspended, tied to a dog. The dog was then killed by a mortal blow, after which its soul was to pass into the fantastic root, attracting also that of the hanged man.

Widespread belief in black magic pervaded the Middle Ages. Machinations and counter-machinations engaged church and state, rich and poor, learned and ignorant. In persecutions and prosecutions, the persecutor and judge often met the same fate they dealt to the victim and condemned. In this dreadful phantasmagoria and procession can be found the haughty Templars, the blood-stained Gilles de Laval, the original of Bluebeard, Catherine de Medici the Marshals of France, as well as popes, princes, and priests. Literature divulges traces of black magic in weird legends and monstrous tales, in stories of spells and enchantments. The tale of Dr. Faustus recounts his pact with the Devil, his pleasures and their penalty when he must forfeit his soul to Hell. Traces exist in lewd verses and songs. Infernal influence is seen in pictures, sculptures, and carvings decorating palaces and cathedrals; the Devil's likeness peeps out from carven screen and stall, and his demons appear in gargoyles grinning and leering from niche and corner and clustering beneath the eaves.

The atmosphere of superstition and fevered imagination coexisted with religious dogma and repression. The great witchcraft manias flourished from the Middle Ages onward. The thousands of innocent men, women, and children who were brutally tortured and executed have left a deep stain on the church. (See also Black Mass; Evocation)

Sources:

Cavendish, Richard. The Black Arts. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967.

Black Mass

According to the inquisitors, the Black Mass epitomized the worship of Satan and perverted the most holy mystery of Christian worship—the Christian mass. Evidence of such occurrences was confirmed in the confessions forced from accussed witches and sorcerers, who claimed that the devil had mass said at his Sabbat. Pierre Aupetit, an apostate priest of the village of Fossas, France, was burned for celebrating the mysteries of the Devil's mass. Instead of speaking the holy words of consecration, the frequenters of the Sabbat were alleged to have said: "Beelzebub, Beelzebub, Beelzebub." The devil in the shape of a butterfly flew around those who were celebrating the mass, who then ate a black host, which they were obliged to chew before swallowing.

It is possible that the concept of the Black Mass derived from underground traditions of Cathar heretics, who were put down by orthodox Christianity during the fourteenth century. The Cathars believed in two gods, the God of light and the Prince of darkness, the maker of all material things. However, the idea of a Black Mass only became operative in the fifteenth century when the Roman Catholic Church turned on the "witches" as followers of Satan, whom because they believed in the magic of the Christian mass, hence could conceive a vulgar misuse of its powers. Several printed accounts which may have fueled the concept document strange occurrences, including the 1335 story of a shepherd found nude performing a parody of the mass and the 1458 story of a priest who mixed semen with the holy oil used for annointing people.

However, Satanism, as defined by the Church at the end of the fifteenth century, existed solely in the imaginaton of the inquisitors. Its ideas and practices were carried from generation to generation by the writings of Christians involved in the pursuit of witches and the stamping out of its practice. No evidence of anyone actually holding a Black Mass appears until the seventeenth century in France, when police arrested a fortuneteller named Catherine Deshayes, known as "La Voisin." Allegedly committing poisonings and sacrilege, La Voisin was a wellknown abortionist, and was suspected of providing infants for ritual sacrifice in a Black Mass conducted by a libertine priest, Abbé Guibourg.

These masses were purportedly celebrated on the body of a naked woman. It was claimed that at the moment of consecration of the host, an infant's throat was cut, the blood was poured into the chalice, and prayers were offered to the demons Asmodeus and Ashtaroth. Other obscene rites were associated with the host.

At the trial of La Voisin, evidence was given that some Black Masses had been held at the request of the royal mistress the Marquise de Montespan, in order to retain the favor of Louis XIV. Other masses were associated with murder and poison plots, and many famous names were involved. Over 300 individuals were arrested, although fewer than half were tried; de Montespan was spared. La Voisin was subjected to brutal torture for three days, but she would not confess to poisoning, and on February 22, 1680, she was burned alive.

The modern Black Mass seems to have appeared as part of the magical revival in late ninteeth-century France. J. K. Huysmans is generally credited with reintroduing Satanism and the Black Mass in his book La-Bas (Down There), which includes a detailed description of a Satanic service. More recently the Church of Satan in San Francisco has based its much publicized diabolism upon a rejection of the Christian ethics of self-denial and humility. Its founder, Anton La Vey, published his own version of a Black Mass. (See also Black Magic)

Sources:

Cavendish, Richard. The Black Arts. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967.

Huysmans, J. K. Down There (La-Bas): A Study in Satanism. Translated by Keene Willis. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1958.

LaVey, Anton. The Compleat Witch; or, What to Do When Virtue Fails. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1971.

———. The Satanic Bible. Seacaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1969. Reprint. New York: Avon Books, 1976.

———. The Satanic Rituals. Seacaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1972.

———. The Satanic Witch. Los Angeles, CA: Feral House, 1989.

Rhodes, H. T. F. The Satanic Mass. London, 1954.

Blackmore, Susan J. (1951–)

British parapsychologist, best known for her study of out-of-the-body experiences (OBEs). She completed a Ph.D. course in parapsychology in 1980 at the University of Surrey, England, then worked in the Parapsychological Laboratory at the University of Utrecht, in the Netherlands.

She held the Perrott-Warrick Studentship for four years, researching out-of-the-body and near-death experiences at the Brain and Perception Laboratory of Bristol University, England. She proposed a theory of OBEs as a psychological process involving memory and imagination, an altered state of consciousness like dream or drug states, and investigated relationships between OBEs, mental imagery, and other cognitive skills. Blackmore developed her theories in a series of research papers and the book Beyond the Body: An Investigation of Out-of-the-Body Experiences (1981).

Her special interest in the OBE phenomenon arises from the fact that she had an OBE years earlier. Lasting about three hours, it appeared to be a classic astral projection case, complete with the often-reported "silver cord" linking the astral and physical bodies. At the time, Blackmore was reading physiology and psychology at Oxford University, England. She became convinced that in spite of the vivid feeling of reality that accompanies the experience, there should be an acceptable explanation within terms of normal physiology and psychology, and that such an explanation might also explain other claimed paranormal phenomena such as ESP, psychokinesis, ghosts, poltergeists, and near-death experiences. Blackmore conducted many experiments to test a general theory of psi, which proposed that psi and memory are aspects of the same process. In the case of OBEs, she suggested that when an individual's cognitive system is disturbed and loses input control, its normal reality construct is replaced with one drawing upon memory. This might explain the intense sensation of reality during an OBE, as well as in vivid dreams.

However, her experimental efforts to replicate or validate psi phenomena were largely negative, and after some ten years of careful research, she became increasingly skeptical about the validity of parapsychology itself. Of course, other researchers have also grappled with the age-old problem of the inability to replicate spontaneous phenomena under scientific conditions, and it may be that the whole question of evidence, particularly in the case of OBEs, lies in qualities of consciousness rather than objective demonstration or repeatable material measurement.

Blackmore has raised important questions for parapsychology, and as a conscientious and thoroughly honest investigator, she has not hesitated to discuss such matters quite openly. Her somewhat rueful article, "The Elusive Open Mind: Ten Years of Negative Research in Parapsychology," was first presented at the 1986 CSICOP (Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal) Conference at the University of Colorado in Boulder, and details basic problems of parapsychology in a frank and stimulating way. She expanded upon the paper in a book, Adventures of a Parapsychologist (1986).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Blackmore, Susan J. Adventures of a Parapsychologist. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1986.

———. Beyond the Body: An Investigation of Out-of-the-Body Experiences. London: Heineman, 1981.

———. "The Elusive Open Mind: Ten Years of Negative Research in Parapsychology." The Skeptical Inquirer 9, no. 3 (spring 1987).

———. The Meme Machine. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

———. Parapsychology and Out-of-the-Body Experience. London: Society for Psychical Research; Hove, England: Transpersonal Books, 1978.

———. "A Psychological Theory of the OBE." In Research in Parapsychology 1984. Edited by Rhea A. White and Jerry Solfvin. 1985.

Blackmore, Susan J., and John Harris. "OBEs and Perceptual Distortions in Schizophrenic Patients and Students." In Research in Parapsychology 1982. Edited by William G. Roll, John Beloff, and Rhea A. White. 1983.

"The Black Pullet"

A French grimoire of black magic supposedly first printed in 1740, but probably much later. La Poule Noire actually bears the imprint of Egypt, "740," and the year 740, but this is manifestly false. It has been reprinted in Paris from time to time in editions for collectors, but without any indication of its true origin. The full title translates as The Black Pullet; or, the Hen with the Golden Eggs, comprising the Science of Magical Talismans and Rings, the Art of Necromancy and of the Kabalah, for the Conjuration of Aerial and Infernal Spirits, of Sylphs, Undines, and Gnomes, serviceable for the aquisition of the Secret Sciences, for the Discovery of Treasures, for obtaining power to command all beings, and to unmask all Sciences and Bewitchments. The whole following the Doctrines of Socrates, Pythagoras, Zoroaster, Son of the Grand Aromasis, and other philosophers whose works in MS. escaped the conflagration of the Library of Ptolemy. Translated from the Language of the Magi and that of the Hieroglyphs by the Doctors Mizzaboula-Jabamia, Danhuzerus, Nehmahmiah, Judahim, and Eliaeb. Rendered into French by A.J.S.D.R.L.G.F. It purports to be a narrative of an officer who was employed in Egypt. While in Egypt the narrator fell in with an occult magician to whom he rendered considerable service, and who at his death left him the secret of manufacturing a black pullet that would be skillful in finding gold.

Probably a nineteenth-century concoction, the story seems to be based on the the seventeenth-century volume Comte de Gabalis (see Elementary Spirits). The whole work, if interesting, is distinctly derivative. It contains many illustrations of talismans and magical rings. The procedure for bringing the black pullet into existence describes that a black hen should be set to hatch one of its own eggs, and that during the process a hood should be drawn over its eyes so that it cannot see. It is also to be placed in a box lined with black material. The chick thus hatched will have a particular instinct for detecting the places where gold is hidden.

Sources:

The Black Pullet: Science of Talismanic Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Blackwell, Anna (ca. 1870)

British author and publicist for Spiritualism and Spiritism, which is the name generally given to the form of Spiritualism developed in France by Allan Kardec. Spiritism differed from Spiritualism by its incorporation of reincarnation into its belief system. Blackwell became a follower of Spirtualism in the 1860s, a belief conformed by her own experiences. In 1869 she gave evidence to the Committee of the London Dialectical Society and contributed a paper dated July 1870 and published in their Report on Spiritualism (London, 1871). She had had some psychic experiences herself, having seen visions and had spirit forms appear on photographs that she had taken. During the 1870s she encountered Kardec's writings and began the process of translating them into English. She emerged as a prominent exponent of his teachings. Her mature thought was presented in her last book, co-authored with G. F. Green, The Probable Effect of Spiritualism upon the Social, Moral, and Religious Condition of Society (1876).

Sources:

Kardec, Allan. Heaven and Hell. Translated by Anna Blackwell. 1878.

———. The Mediums' Book. Translated by Anna Blackwell. 1876. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. The Spirits' Book. Translated by Anna Blackwell. 1875. Reprint, Sao Paulo, Brazil: Lake-Livraria Allan Kardec Editora, 1972.

Blackwood, Algernon (Henry) (1869–1951)

British author famous for his brilliant stories on occult themes. He was born March 14, 1869, in Kent, England. At the age of 17 his interest in the mystical and occult was first aroused after reading a translation of the Yoga Sutrus of Patanjali. In 1890 he immigrated to Canada at the age of 20 and had a varied career in Canada and the United States. He worked as a journalist, a dairy farmer, a hotel proprietor, and an actor among other occupations, suffering intense poverty until for a time he became secretary to James Speyer, a millionaire banker.

He returned to Britain in 1899, where he wrote most of his well-known occult stories. "The Willows" (1907) is considered by many as the finest supernatural tale in English. In 1900 he became a member of the famous occult society, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Blackwood was something of a mystic, particularly responsive to wild natural scenery, and believed that humons possessed latent occult faculties. He died in December 1951 at the age of 82.

Sources:

Ashley, Mike. Algernon Blackwood: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1987.

Blackwood, Algernon. Best Ghost Stories of Algernon Blackwood. Edited by E. F. Bleiler. New York: Dover Publications, 1973.

———. Episodes before Thirty. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1924.

———. The Human Chord. London: Macmillan, 1910.

———. Tales of the Supernatural. Woodbridge, England: Boydell Press, 1983.

———. Tales of Terror and Darkness. London; New York: Spring Books, 1977. Distributed by Transatlantic Arts.

———. The Willows, and Other Queer Tales. 1934.

Sullivan, Jack, ed. The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural. New York: Viking, 1986.

Blake, Elizabeth (d. 1920)

Unusually powerful direct voice medium of Bradrick, Ohio. The voices were regularly heard in broad daylight. James H. Hyslop published a favorable report on her mediumship in the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 7: 570–788).

Two expert conjurers, David P. Abbott of the ASPR and E. A. Parsons, investigated Blake in 1906 and became convinced of the identity of the spirit communicators. Blake used a 2-foot long double trumpet; putting the small end to her ear and the larger one at that of the sitter, it appeared as if the voices came from her ear. If she covered the small end with her palm, the result was the same. The voices grew from whispers to such loudness that occasionally they were heard at a distance of 100 feet.

The endorsement by David P. Abbott is of particular importance, since he created a wonderful trick in which voices appeared to come from a teapot when the spout was held to an ear; the teapot also answered questions. With his expert experience of such illusions, Abbott would have been expected to discover any similar tricks by Spiritualist mediums.

Blake, William (1757–1827)

Poet, mystic, painter, and engraver, Blake is one of the most enigmatic yet most significant figures in the history of English literature, and a man who has likewise exerted strong influence on the graphic arts. He was born in London, England, November 28, 1757. Little is known definitely about his family's ancestry, but it seems probable that his parents and other relatives were humble folk.

William Blake manifested his artistic predilections at a very early age, and his father and mother did not discourage him. They offered to place him in the studio of a painter. The young man refused, however, pointing out that the apprenticeship was a costly one and saying that his numerous brothers and sisters should be considered; he held that it was not fair to impoverish his family on his behalf. Then engraving was suggested to him as a profession, because it required less expensive training than painting and was likely to yield a speedier financial return. Accepting this offer, Blake went at the age of 14 to study under James Basire, an engraver not very well known today, but who then enjoyed considerable reputation and was employed officially by the Society of Antiquaries.

Blake worked under Basire for seven years and was engaged mainly in making drawings of Westminster Abbey to illustrate a huge book then in progress, the Sepulchral Monuments of Richard Gough. It is said that Blake was chosen by his master to do these drawings not so much because he showed particular aptitude for drafting, but because he was eternally quarreling with his fellow apprentices; the young artist apparently believed he was superior to his confréres and made enemies by failing to conceal his belief. While at the Westminster Abbey, Blake asserted that he saw many visions.

In 1778 he entered the then recently founded Royal Academy School, where he studied under George Moser, a chaser and enameller who engraved the first great seal of George III. Yet it was not to Moser that the budding visionary looked for instruction; he was far more occupied with studying prints of the old masters, especially Michelangelo and Raphael. A short time later Blake left the Royal Academy and began to work on his own.

He had to work hard, however, for meanwhile his affections had been engaged by a young woman, Catherine Boucher, and he needed funds for the pair to marry. Blake engraved illustrations for magazines and the like, and his marriage was solemnized in 1782. His wife's name indicates that she was of French origin, but it is not known if she was related to François Boucher or to the fine engraver of the French Empire, Boucher-Desnoyers. The marriage proved a singularly happy one.

Regarding Catherine's appearance there still exists a small pencil-drawing by Blake, commonly supposed to be a portrait of his wife. It shows a slim, graceful woman, just the type of woman predominating in Blake's other pictures, so it may be presumed that she frequently acted as his model.

After his marriage Blake took lodgings on Green Street in Leicester Fields, and he opened a print shop on Broad Street. He made many friends at this period; the most favored among them was Flaxman, the sculptor. Flaxman introduced him to Mr. Matthew, a clergyman of artistic tastes who manifested keen interest in the few poems Blake had already written and generously offered to defray the cost of printing them. The writer accepted the offer and brought out a tiny volume, Poetical Sketches.

Thus encouraged, Blake gave up his print-selling business, moved to Poland Street, and soon after published his Songs of Innocence, the letterpress enriched by his own designs. In addition, the whole volume was printed by the author himself by a new method of his own invention.

Blake lived on Poland Street for five years, during which time he achieved and issued The Book of Thel, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, and the first book of The French Revolution. In 1792 he moved to the Hercules Buildings in Lambeth, where dire poverty forced him to do much of his commercial work, notably a series of illustrations to Young's Night Thoughts, yet he also found time for original drawing and writing, including the Gates of Paradise and Songs of Experience.

Eventually he tired of London, however, and moved to Felpham, near Bognor in Sussex, taking a cottage close to where Aubrey Beardsley would live at a later date. Here Blake composed Milton, Jerusalem, and a large part of the Prophetic Books, and made a new friend, William Hayley, who repeatedly aided him monetarily. The Sussex scenery—afterward to inspire Whistler and Conder—appealed keenly to Blake, and in one of his lyrics he exclaimed, "Away to sweet Felpham, for Heaven is there," while to Flaxman he wrote: "Felpham is a sweet place for study, because it is more spiritual than London. Heaven opens here on all sides her golden gates; her windows are not obstructed by vapours, voices of celestial inhabitants are more distinctly heard, and their forms more distinctly seen and my cottage is also a shadow of their houses."

Eventually Blake returned to London, taking a house in South Molton Street in 1803. Here again he endured much poverty and was forced into doing illustrations for Virgil and also a series of designs for Blair's Grave; but later his financial horizon was brightened by help from John Linnell, the landscape painter. Shortly afterward Blake did some of his finest work, including his Spiritual Portraits and his drawings for The Book of Job, after which he began illustrating the Divine Comedy of Dante.

In 1821 he again changed his home to Fountain Court in Strand and continued to work at the Dante drawings, but only seven of them were ever published, for Blake's health was beginning to fail, his energies were waning, and he died August 12, 1827.

Sixteen years before his death, Blake held a public exhibition of his drawings, engravings, illustrations, and the like, and only one paper saw fit to print a criticism of it—The Examiner, edited by Leigh Hunt. It is customary for Blake's idolators today to scorn those who then disdained his work, but Blake's work emerged as somewhat of a novelty, especially the mysticism permeating his pictures, which had virtually no parallel in English painting prior to his advent. Also, Blake was still maturing as a technician and still had many grave limitations which are quite evident when placed beside that of his contemporaries.

If Blake the draftsman and illustrator was a fierce iconoclast who turned his back resolutely on the styles current in his time, most assuredly Blake the poet was sublimely contemptuous of the conventions of Augustanism, and thus he prepared the way for Burns, Wordsworth, and Shelley.

Had Blake written only his Poetical Sketches, his Songs of Innocence and the subsequent Songs of Experience, his contemporaries could never have leveled the charge of madness against him. It was his later writings like The Book of Thel and the Prophetic Books that branded him, for in these later poems the writer threw simplicity to the winds. Giving literary form to visions, Blake is so purely spiritual and ethereal, so far beyond the realm of normal human speech, that mysticism frequently devolves into crypticism. His rhythm, too, is often so subtle that it hardly seems rhythm at all.

Yet even in his weirdest flights Blake is still the master. And if, as already observed, the coloring in many of his watercolor drawings is thin, the very reverse is true of the poems written toward the close of his life. Their glowing and gorgeous tones have the barbaric pomp of Gautier's finest prose and the glitter and opulence of Berlioz's or Wagner's orchestration.

Sources:

Digby, George. Symbol and Image in William Blake. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1957.

Erdman, David, ed. The Illuminated Blake. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.

Keynes, Geoffrey, ed. Blake: Complete Writings. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974.

King, James. William Blake: His Life. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1991.

Nesfeld-Cookson, Bernard. William Blake: Prophet of Universal Brotherhood. U.K.: Crucible, 1987.

Raine, Kathleen. From Blake to "A Vision." Dublin: Dolman Press, 1979.

———. William Blake. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1971.

Wilke, Joanne. William Blake's Epic: Imagination Unbound. London: Croom Helm, 1986.

Wilson, Mona. The Life of William Blake. London: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Wolf-Gumpold, Kaethe. William Blake: Painter, Poet, Visionary: An Attempt at and Introduction to his Life and Work. London: Rudolf Steiner Press, 1969.

Blanchfleur

Granddaughter of the Duke of Ferrara and heroine of the old romance Florice and Blanchefleur, which was popular throughout Europe during the sixteenth century, and is probably of Spanish origin. Blanchfleur and Florice (son of the King of Murcia) loved each other from infancy, and she gave him a magical ring. He was banished for his love, and Blanchfleur was eventually shipped to Alexandria to be sold as a slave. Florice, however, found her there, partly by aid of the mystic ring, and they were happily united. Versions of the Florice or Florio romance seem to have existed in the thirteenth century.

Blatchford, Robert (Peel Glanville) (1851–1943)

Rationalist author, journalist, and socialist who was converted to the cause of Spiritualism in later life. Born March 17, 1851, in Maidstone, Kent, England, he was the son of two touring actors and grew up in a working-class background. He was apprenticed to a brushmaker at the age of 14, but six years later ran away, tramped from armouth to London, starved for some weeks, then enlisted in the army, becoming a sergeant.

After leaving the army in 1878, he worked for six years as a clerk and then turned to journalism. From 1885 to 1891 he wrote for the Sunday Chronicle. He contributed soldier stories and wrote on the land war in Ireland and the slums of Manchester. His experiences turned him to Socialism, and in 1891 he lost his job over it. With friends he started the Clarion as a socialist newspaper. His series of articles, Merrie England, was reissued in book form in 1893 and had a tremendous popular sale in a penny edition. The articles lifted the Clarion circulation to 60,000 and the book became famous as the first really popular work on socialism, selling over two million copies. It was followed by Britain for the British (1902), and God and my Neighbor (1903), a criticism of Christianity expressing his agnostic or atheistic convictions. He believed that the quality of individual life was positively determined by environment and training. In 1909 he warned Britain of Germany's determination to provoke war, but this lost him many readers. His book The Sorcery Shop (1907) expressed utopian views and has been compared to New from Nowhere by William Morris.

In 1920 Blatchford began to consider the claims of Spiritualism. He read widely on the subject, and after the death of his wife in 1921, he had sittings with Gladys Osborne Leonard and other mediums, through which he obtained definite and convincing evidence of the continued existence and affection of his wife. After several years of careful research, he published More Things in Heaven and Earth (1925), in which he argued that the evidence for Spiritualism was incontrovertible and that he was assured of his wife's continued presence and interest.

Because of the enormous popularity of his Socialist and agnostic writings, Blatchford is often quoted as a freethinker without reference to his later views. In 1931 he published his autobiography, My Eighty Years. He died at Norsham, Sussex, December 17, 1943.

Blätter Aus Prevorst (Periodical)

"Leaves from Prevorst," a psychic periodical founded by Dr. Justinus Kerner in 1831. After publication of 12 volumes, it was superseded in 1839 by Magikon: Archire für Beobachtunger aus dem Gebiete der Geisterkunde und des magnetischen vad magischa Lebens (Magikon; or, Archives for Observations Concerning the Realms of the Spirit World of Magnetic Life). This publication continued until 1853.

Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna (1831–1891)

One of the most influential occult thinkers of the nineteenth century, Blavatsky left behind conflicting images of adventuress, author, mystic, guru, occultist, and charlatan. Born at Ekaterinoslav, Russia, July 31, 1831, she was the daughter of Col. Peter Hahn, a member of a Mecklenburg family settled in Russia. With the aid of Col. Henry Steel Olcott and William Q. Judge, she founded the Theosophical Society in New York in 1875. In order to gain converts to Theosophy, she felt obliged to appear to perform miracles. This she did with a large measure of success, but her "methods" were on several occasions detected as fraudulent. Nevertheless, her commanding personality secured for her a large following.

An enigmatic personality, she was brought up in an atmosphere saturated with superstition and fantasy. She loved to surround herself with mystery as a child and claimed to her playmates that in the subterranean corridors of their old house at Saratow, where she used to wander about, she was never alone, but had companions and playmates whom she called her "hunchbacks."

She was often discovered in a dark tower underneath the roof, where she put pigeons into a mesmeric sleep by stroking them. She was unruly, and as she grew older she often shocked her relatives by her masculine behavior. Once, riding astride a Cossack horse, she fell from the saddle and her foot became entangled in the stirrup. She claimed that she ought to have been killed outright were it not "for the strange sustaining power she distinctly felt around her, which seemed to hold her up in defiance of gravitation."

According to the records of her sister, Blavatsky showed frequent evidence of somnambulism as a child, speaking aloud and often walking in her sleep. She saw eyes glaring at her from inanimate objects or from phantasmal forms, from which she would run away screaming and frighten the entire household. In later years she claimed to have seen a phantom protector whose imposing appearance had dominated her imagination.

Her powers of make-believe were remarkable. She possessed great natural musical talents, had a fearful temper, a passionate curiosity for the unknown and weird, and an intense craving for independence and action.

At the age of 17, she was married to General Blavatsky, an old man from whom she escaped three months later. She then fled abroad and led a wild, wandering life for ten years all over the world, in search of mysteries. When she returned to Russia she possessed well-developed mediumistic gifts. Raps, whisperings, and other mysterious sounds were heard all over the house, objects moved about in obedience to her will, their weight decreased and increased as she wished, and winds swept through the apartment, extinguishing lamps and candles. She gave exhibitions of clairvoyance, discovered a murderer for the police, and narrowly escaped being charged as an accomplice.

In 1860 she became severely ill. A wound below the heart, which she received from a sword cut in magical practice in the East, opened again, causing her intense agony, convulsions, and trance. After Blavatsky recovered, her spontaneous physical phenomena disappeared, and she claimed that they only occurred after that time in obedience to her will.

She again went abroad, and, disguised as a man, she fought under Garibaldi and was left for dead in the battle of Mentana. She fought back to life, had a miraculous escape at sea on a Greek vessel that was blown up, and, in 1871 in Cairo, she founded the Societé Spirite. It was a dubious venture that soon expired amid cries of fraud and embezzlement, reflecting considerably on the reputation of the founder.

Her closer ties with Spiritualism dated from her arrival in New York in July 1873. Blavatsky first worked as a dressmaker to obtain a living and, after her acquaintance with Col. Henry Steel Olcott at Chittenden, Vermont, in the house of the Eddy Brothers, she took up journalism, writing mostly on Spiritualism for magazines and translating Olcott's articles into Russian. "For over 15 years have I fought my battle for the blessed truth," she wrote in The Spiritual Scientist, published in Boston (December 3, 1874); "For the sake of Spiritualism I have left my house; an easy life amongst a civilised society, and have become a wanderer upon the face of this earth."

Her second marital venture, which occurred during this period, ended in failure and escape. The starting point of her real career was the foundation of the Theosophical Society in 1875. It professed to expound the esoteric tradition of Buddhism and aimed at forming a universal brotherhood of man; studying and making known the ancient religions, philosophies, and sciences; investigating the laws of nature; and developing the divine powers latent in man. It was claimed to be directed by secret Mahatmas, or Masters of Wisdom.

Olcott, who was elected president, was a tireless organizer and propagandist. His relationship to Blavatsky was that of pupil to teacher. He did the practical work, and Blavatsky the literary work. Their joint efforts soon put the society on a prosperous footing, and at the end of 1878 a little party of four left, under their leadership, for Bombay. Soon after the theosophical movement gained added impetus from the publicity launched by A. P. Sinnett, editor of the Pioneer, who had embraced Buddhism in Ceylon.

The publicity had its disadvantages as well. The attention of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was aroused at reports of the theosophic marvels, and Richard Hodgson was sent to Adyar, India, where the central headquarters of the theosophical movement was established, to investigate. The investigation had a disastrous effect for Blavatsky and dealt a nearly fatal blow to Theosophy. Hodgson reported that he found nothing but palpable fraud and extreme credulity on the part of the believers. The Coulombs, a couple who had joined Blavatsky in Bombay in 1880 and were her acquaintances from the time of the Cairo adventure, confessed to having manufactured, in conspiracy with Blavatsky, a large number of the theosophical miracles: they revealed the secret of the sliding panels of the shrine in the Occult Room through which, from Blavatsky's bedroom, the "astral" Mahatma letters were deposited; disclosed impersonation of the Mahatmas by a dummy head and shoulders; declared that the Mahatma letters were written by Blavatsky in a disguised hand and that they were projected through cracks in the ceiling by means of spring contrivances; and they produced the correspondence between them and Blavatsky in proof of their self-confessed complicity. Hodgson's investigations, which lasted for three months, entirely demolished the first private and confidential report of the SPR issued in December 1884, which was theoretically favorable to Blavatsky's claims. Hodgson's conclusions were published in the Proceedings of the SPR:

"In the first place a large number of letters produced by M. and Mme. Coulomb, formerly Librarian and Assistant Corresponding Secretary, respectively, of the Theosophical Society were, in the opinion of the best experts in handwriting, written by Madame Blavatsky. These letters, which extended over the years of 1880–1883, inclusive, and some of which were published in the Madras Christian College magazine for September, 1884, prove that Mme. Blavatsky has been engaged in the production of a varied and long-continued series of fraudulent phenomena, in which she has been assisted by the Coulombs. The circumstantial evidence which I was able to obtain concerning the incidents referred to in these letters, corroborates the judgment of the experts in handwriting.

"In the second place, apart altogether from either these letters or the statements of the Coulombs, who themselves allege that they were confederates of Mme. Blavatsky, it appears from my own inquiries concerning the existence and the powers of the supposed Adepts or Mahatmas, and the marvellous phenomena alleged to have occurred in connection with the Theosophical Society,

1. That the primary witnesses to the existence of a Brotherhood with occult powers—viz., Madame Blavatsky, Mr. Damodar K. Mavalankar, Mr. Bhavani Shankar and Mr. Babajee D. Nath—have in other matters deliberately made statements which they must have known to be false, and that, therefore, their assertions cannot establish the existence of the Brotherhood in question.

2. That the comparison of handwriting further tends to show that Koot Hoomi Lal Sing and Mahatma Morya are fictitious personages, and that most of the documents purporting to have emanated from these "personages" and especially from "K.H." (Koot Hoomi Lal Sing) are in the disguised handwriting of Madame Blavatsky herself, who originated the style of the K.H. handwriting; and that some of the K.H. writing is the handiwork of Mr. Damodar in imitation of the writing developed by Madame Blavatsky.

3. That in no single phenomenon which came within the scope of my investigation in India, was the evidence such as would entitle it to be regarded as genuine, the witnesses for the most part being extraordinarily inaccurate in observation or memory, and having neglected to exercise due care for the exclusion of fraud; while in the case of some of the witnesses there has been much conscious exaggeration and culpable misstatement.

4. That not only was the evidence insufficient to establish the genuineness of the alleged marvels, but that evidence furnished partly by my own inspection, and partly by a large number of witnesses, most of them Theosophists, concerning the structure, position and environment of the Shrine, concerning "Mahatma" communications received independently of the Shrine, and concerning various other incidents, including many of the phenomena mentioned in the Occult World, besides the numerous additional suspicious circumstances which I have noted in the course of dealing in detail with the cases considered, renders the conclusion unavoidable that the phenomena in question were actually due to fraudulent arrangement."

On the basis of Hodgson's findings, the committee of the SPR declared: "For our own part we regard her neither as the mouthpiece of hidden seers nor as a mere vulgar adventuress; we think that she has achieved a title to permanent remembrance as one of the most accomplished and interesting impostors in history."

The publication of the report, which followed the printing of the Coulomb letters in the Madras Christian Magazine, created an immense sensation. In response, Olcott, whose honesty was not impugned by the report, banished Blavatsky from Adyar. The proofs of her guilt were overwhelming, for the defense was built up with great difficulties. With the Theosophical Society thus discredited, recovery looked hopeless.

Nevertheless, Annie Besant, who would become Blavatsky's successor, and Sinnett valiantly took on the task. Hodgson answered and insisted on his conclusions. In the literature that subsequently grew up on the subject, V. S. Solovyoff claimed in A Modern Priestess of Isis (1895) that Blavatsky acknowledged her fraudulent practices to the author. Blavatsky's Posthumous Memoirs (1896) was a most curious artifact of the time that was said to have been dictated by Blavatsky's spirit. The text (which furnished strong, internal proofs of its apocryphal character) was obtained in independent typewriting on a Yost machine under the supervision of the spirit of its inventor, Mr. G. W. N. Yost.

Blavatsky nevertheless succeeded in living down every attack during her lifetime, continued her work, gained many new adherents to Theosophy, and published a work, The Secret Doctrine, which was claimed to have been written in a supernormal condition. Whatever conclusions are reached about her complex character, it must be admitted that she was an extraordinarily gifted individual and it does seem probable that she indeed possessed psychic powers which, however, fell far short of the miraculous feats she constantly aimed at. Even Solovyoff admits some remarkable experiences, and though he furnished natural explanations for many of them, the assumption that withstands challenge is that she had, as plainly pointed out by Olcott himself, unusual hypnotic powers.

Her famous feats of duplicating letters and other small objects are plainly ascribable to this source when common fraud does not cover the ground. She never troubled about test conditions. Most of her phenomena were produced under circumstances wide open to suspicion and strongly savoring of a conjuring performance; like the finding of an extra cup and saucer at a picnic at Simla in 1880 in the Sinnett garden under the ground at a designated spot; the clairvoyant discovery of the lost brooch of Mrs. Hume in a flower bed; the astral dispatch of marked cigarettes to places she indicated; and the Mahatma scripts imposed over the text of private letters which the post had just delivered.

There is no end of these and similar miracles, and the testimony of the truth is sometimes so surprising that one can conclude that imposture occasionally blended with genuine psychic performance. The general character of Blavatsky's phenomena is of a different order from those of the Spiritualist medium. Her early physical phenomena subsided at a later age, although the power to cause raps remained, and once, in New York, Olcott claimed that he witnessed the materialization of a Mahatma from a mist rising from her shoulders. As a rule the Mahatmas were not supposed to depend upon Blavatsky's organism for appearance, and controlled her body but seldom. Isis Unveiled and the Secret Doctrine were claimed to have been produced under such control.

Whereas there is a limit to the phenomena of every Spiritualistic medium, Blavatsky apparently knew none. From the materialization of grapes for the thirsty Col. Olcott in New York to the duplication of precious stones in India, or the creation of toys for children out of nothingness, she undertook almost any magical task and successfully performed it, to everyone's amazement.

Sinnett must have genuinely suffered in his admission: "That she sometimes employed the Coulombs, husband and wife, as confederates in trickery is the painful though hardly intelligible state of the facts. Even with me she has done this. For example on my return to India, after having published the Occult World—after she knew that I was rooted in a personal conviction not only that she possessed magic powers, but that I was in touch with the Masters and devoted to the theosophical cause, she employed M. Coulomb to drop a letter from the Master intended for me through a crack in the rafters above, trying to make me believe that it had been dropped by the Master himself—materialised then and there after transmission by occult means from Tibet. M. Coulomb told Hodgson that he had been so employed on this occasion, and his statement fits in with the minor circumstances of the incident."

The Hodgson Report left a deep shadow over Blavatsky's final years. Besant's conversion to Theosophy resulted after she had been requested by W. T. Stead to review The Secret Doctrine in 1889. Blavatsky suggested that she read the Hodgson Report before forming any firm conclusions, but Besant was not adversely affected and requested to be Blavatsky's pupil. Thereafter Besant provided a secure refuge for the aging Theosophist at her own home in London. In her last years here, Blavatsky became the center of a memorable group of talented individuals. She died peacefully May 5, 1891.

Blavatsky's character was too complex for instant judgments. She manifested elements of philosophical mastery and undoubtedly perpetuated numerous psychic frauds. The Hodgson Report, which cast such a shadow over Blavatsky's later years, is not itself beyond reproach. Hodgson was criticized for jumping to conclusions on inadequate evidence and for unsatisfactory examination of the handwriting evidence (though the main body of the report stands as written). The April 1986 edition of the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research published a persuasive contribution by Vernon Harrison, "J'Accuse: An Examination of the Hodgson Report of 1885," a paper later reissued in booklet form by the Theosophical History Centre in London.

It is somewhat easier to assess Blavatsky's long-term effect on Western culture. She exercised an enormous influence over some of the most talented individuals of her time, and they passed along her ideas to a wider culture. Through the Theosophical Society, she stimulated translation of important Hindu scriptures and philosophical works. She encouraged national pride in Indian culture, literature, religion, and aspirations for home rule, and she founded an important archive of Sanskrit manuscripts at Adyar, Madras.

The Theosophical Society she co-founded was a forerunner of the famous secret society the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and numeorus other occult groups. The Irish literary renaissance owes much to the Hindu mysticism of William Butler Yeats and George W. Russell, who were both influenced by the teachings of the Theosophical Society.

Sources:

Barker, A. T. Collected Writings. 14 vols. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1950–87.

Besant, Annie. H. P. Blavatsky and the Masters of Wisdom. London, 1907.

Blavatsky, Helena P. From the Caves and Jungles of Hindustan. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1892.

———. Isis Unveiled. 2 vols. New York: J. W. Bouton, 1877.

———. The Key to Theosophy. Pasadena, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1972.

———. The Secret Doctrine. 2 vols. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1889. Reprint, London: Thesophical Publishing House, 1928.

———. Theosophical Glossary. New York: Theosophical Publishing House, 1892.

Butt, G. Baseden. Life of Madame Blavatsky. London: Rider, 1926.

Cleather, Alice L. H. P. Blavatsky: A Great Betrayal. Calcutta: Thacker, Spink, 1922.

Endersby, Victor. Hall of Magic Mirrors. New York: Carlton Press, 1969.

Fuller, Jean Overton. Blavatsky and Her Teachers: An Investigative Biography. London: East-West Publications/Theosophical Publishing House, 1988.

Gomes, Michael. Dawning of the Theosophical Movement. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1987.

———. Theosophy in the Nineteenth Century: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.

Hodgson, Richard. "Report on Phenomena Connected with Theosophy." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 3 (1885).

Kingsland, William. The Real H. P. Blavatsky. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1928.

Lillie, Arthur. Mme. Blavatsky and Her Theosophy. London: Swan Sonnonschein, 1895.

Meade, Marion. Madame Blavatsky: The Woman Behind the Myth. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.

Olcott, Henry Steel. Old Diary Leaves. 6 vols. Reprinted as Inside the Occult: The True Story of Madame H. P. Blavatsky. Philadephia: Running Press, 1995.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Sinnett, A. P. Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky. London: George Redway, 1886.

Solovyoff, V. S. A Modern Priestess of Isis. London: Longmans, Green, 1895.

Wachmeister, Countess Constance. Reminiscences of H. P. Blavatsky and the Secret Doctrine. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1893.

Waterman, Adlai E. [Walter A. Carrithers] Obituary: The "Hodgson Report" on Madame Blavatsky, 1885–1960. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1963.

Williams, Gertrude M. Priestess of the Occult: Madame Blavatsky. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1946.

Yost, G. W. N. Blavatsky's Posthumous Memoirs. Boston: Joseph M. Wade, 1896.

Bleeding Statues

Since World War II (1939–1945), a relatively new phenomenon has begun to manifest in Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. Statues and pictures of Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the saints have appeared to bleed, and they bleed in significant ways, from the hands or the brow, places where Christ was wounded during His last days on Earth, or from the eyes, as if weeping. While such phenomena had been reported since antiquity, in the twentieth century such reports have taken on added significance in light of the attack on supernatural occurrences in the contemporary secular world. The number of such incidents has increased decade by decade during the last half of the century. Many traditional religionists view such miraculous occurrences as the bleeding statues and pictures in much the same way as Spiritualists view mediumistic phenomena, as a demonstration of a supernatural world.

Typical of such reports is the small statue of the Virgin Mary belonging to Olga Rodriguez, a woman in Santiago, Chile, that on November 14, 1992, began to bleed from its eyes. The people who began to stop by the Rodriquez home alerted police to the phenomenon, and the local Criminal Investigation Department took samples of the liquid for analysis. It turned out to be type-O blood. That same year similar reports came from Lake Ridge, Virginia, where a priest, Fr. James Bruse of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton Church, reported cold weather caused statues of the Virgin Mary to weep tears of blood. Not only had many parishoners seen the primary statue at St. Elizabeth Ann Seton Church weep blood, but various other statues that Bruse had been standing near. A third incident occurred in San Tomas, Mexico. It was first seen by a young girl praying before the statue for the healing of her mother. Returning home, she found her mother up and fixing supper, the first time she had been out of bed in three months.

In 1994, stories came from Ireland, Australia, and Puerto Rico. In 1996 reports came from Trinidad and Kansas, and in 1997, from Benin (Africa). Through the decade more than a dozen cases appeared in Italy alone. Blood from a statue of the Virgin in Las Vegas that began bleeding in 1998 has been caught on pieces of cotton and given away to the faithful. It has been tied to a number of healings.

As with the case in Chile, many of these cases have been investigated at least minimally, and the substance oozing from the pictures or statues is indeed blood, though the type of blood varies from incident to incident. Many have been seen by large groups and have occurred in such a way that the more obvious means of faking the phenomena have been ruled out. Nevertheless, few of the cases have been given what might be thought of as a thorough investigation.

Possibly the most spectacular modern case of a bleeding statue occurred in Akita, Japan, where a statue of the Virgin Mary wept, perspired, and bled from the right hand in what appeared to be a cross-shaped wound. This case passed a rigorous investigation by local scientists, the local diocesan authorities, and the Vatican. The phenomena were associated with the stigmata and three apparitions of the Virgin Mary received by a deaf Japanese Roman Catholic nun, Sister Agnes Sasagawa.

Skeptics such as Joe Nickell have suggested that many of the bleeding statues and pictures are due to conscious hoaxing and point to two prominent early cases as evidence. In the 1850s a picture of Jesus that bled belonged to Rose Tamisier, a French woman known in her village for her miracles, apparitions of the Virgin Mary, and stigmata. On November 10, 1850, she reportedly caused a picture of Christ to emit blood. Investigators examined the picture and initially pronounced the phenomenon genuine. However, this incident lost much of its impact when the following year Tamisier was charged with imposture and in a formal trial found guilty.

In 1914, psychical researcher Everard Fielding (1867–1936) investigated a more impressive case, a set of incidents that had begun some three years previously around Abbé Vachere in the town of Mirebeau-en-Poitou, France. Abbé Vachere claimed that a picture he owned bled, a statue at a nearby grotto sweated blood, and Eucharistic wafers he had consecrated (believed by Catholics to be the very body of Christ) dripped blood. In 1914, church authorities asked that the picture be turned over to them. After complying with their request, Abbé Vachere revealed a second picture like the first that also began to bleed. Fielding had samples of the substance analyzed in England. It proved to be blood.

Fielding returned to follow up his earlier investigation. However, this time he discovered that the church had reason to doubt the veracity of the priest and had excommunicated him. Fielding took added precautions and discovered the former Abbé in a hoax, though he had trouble accepting the facts, given the kindly demeanor of the elderly priest.

While skeptics have attempted a full reduction of the incidents of bleeding statues and pictures to the mundane, either deliberate hoaxing, an unusual natural phenomenon, or hallucination, parapsychologists have attempted to take the bleeding objects out of the supernatural realm and explain them psychically. In a large percentage of cases where an adequate investigation has been made, hoaxing has been detected. There are so many ways in which even amateurs have produced a seemingly spectacular flow of blood, that bleeding statues appear to hold within conservative Roman Catholic circles much the same position that materialization phenomena hold within Spiritualism. Apart from obvious hoaxing, the most common explanations relate them to poltergeists and/or psychokinetic occurrences.

The marked increase of phenomena such as the apparitions of the Virgin Mary and the bleeding and weeping statues and icons, the reports of which have primarily circulated in Roman Catholic circles, have been discussed in New Age circles as a further sign of the coming changes in human consciousness that many expect. Benjamin Creme, the head of Share International, has held up the phenomena as a further herald of the coming of Maitreya, and attributes them to the combined and coordinated efforts of the ascended masters.

Sources:

Nickell, Joe. Looking for a Miracle. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Press, 1998.

Rogo, Scott. Miracles: A Parascientific Inquiry into Wondrous Phenomena. New York: Dial Press, 1982.

Bleksley, Arthur Edward Herbert (1908–1984)

South African professor of applied mathematics and lecturer on science and parapsychology. Born April 27, 1908, in East Griqualand, South Africa, he had a distinguished academic career, becoming professor of applied mathematics at Zeiss Planetarium, Witwatersrand University, and president of South African Association for the Advancement of Sciences. He also became director of the South African Institute for Parapsychological Research, Johannesburg.

He conducted investigations into ESP, telepathy in the classroom situation, and random-number tables. He published various articles on parapsychology, especially on extrasensory perception during sleep. He has been credited with raising the status of parapsychcology in South Africa, and toward the end of his life he was given the Willliam McDougall Award for Distinguished Work in Parapsychology. In addition to various textbooks, he published The Secret of the Atom Bomb (1945) and Travellers through Space (1962).

Sources:

Bleksley, A. E. H. "An Experiment of Long-Distance ESP During Sleep." Journal of Parapsychology 27 (1963): 1.

Blewett, Duncan Bassett (1920–)

Canadian psychologist who has studied telepathy in relation to drug-induced psychedelic experiences. He was born October 28, 1920, in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, and studied at the University of British Columbia (B.A., 1947; M.A., 1950) and the University of London (Ph.D., 1953). Beginning in 1961, he was an associate professor of psychology at the Regina campus of the University of Saskatchewan. At the beginning of interest in psychedelic drugs in the mid-1950s, he conducted research on their power to affect telepathic abilities. He presented the results at the 1958 Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics in New York. He also contributed papers to the Journal of Mental Science.

Blind

Term used by parapsychologists in experiments where the evaluator of targets and responses to them is without knowledge of information that would reveal the target. (See also Double Blind)

Blindfolding a Corpse

The Afritans of the Shari River in Central America used to blindfold a corpse before burying it to prevent it from returning to haunt the survivors.

Blind-Matching

A term used by parapsychologists in relation to tests for clairvoyance with ESP cards. The subject holds the pack of Zener cards face downward and sorts them into five piles, which are later compared to key cards already hidden in envelopes.

Blockula

Believed to be the assembly place for the witches Sabbat at Mora, Sweden, during the great witchcraft hysteria of 1669–70. It was said to be a large meadow with a house where there was a long table set with "broth with colworts and bacon in it, oatmeal, bread spread with butter, milk and cheese." This fairyland repast sometimes "tasted very well, and sometimes very ill."

Blofeld, John (Eaton Calthorpe) (1913–1987)

Author and translator of books on Eastern religion and mysticism. Blofeld was born April 2, 1913, in London, England. During World War II he served as a captain with the British War Office (1940–42), and then as a cultural attache at the British Embassy, Chungking, China (1942–46), but returned to England after the war to complete his college work at Downing College, Cambridge (M.A., 1947) and the School of Oriental Studies, London. In 1947 he married Meifang Chang, a teacher. After completing his studies, he moved to Thailand where he would live for the rest of his life. In 1951 he became a lecturer in English literature at Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok, Thailand, a post he held for a decade. During the 1960s he was the chief of editorial services at the U.N. Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (UNECAFE), Bangkok, and in 1974 he became a lecturer in English at Kasetsart University, Bangkok.

Blofeld became a Buddhist in the 1930s and joined the Buddhist Society in London. His work in China and Thailand allowed him a great deal of freedom to wander around the Orient staying in Buddhist and Taoist communities. His visits provided him with material for his books and numerous articles (some written under the pseudonym Chu Ch'an). His popular books contributed to the spread of Eastern religion in the West through the 1970s and 1980s.

Sources:

Blofeld, John. Beyond the Gods. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974.

———. Bodhisattva of Compassion: The Mystical Tradition of KuaYin. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1977.

———. The Jewel in the Lotus: An Outline of Present-Day Buddhism in China. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1948.

———. Mahayana Buddhism in Southeast Asia. Singapore: Asia Pacific Press, 1971.

———. Mantras: Sacred Words of Power. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1977.

———. The Secret and Sublime. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1973.

———. Tantric Mysticism of Tibet: A Practical Guide. New York: Dutton, 1970. Reprinted as The Way of Power. London: Allen & Unwin, 1970.

———. The Wheel of Life. London: Rider, 1959. Rev. ed. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1972.

Bloxham, Arnall (ca. 1881– ?)

British hypnotherapist who spent over 20 years tape-recording hypnotic sessions with subjects whose memories apparently regressed to former incarnations. Bloxham followed up on his tapes and attempted to uncover corroborating evidence relative to his subject's claims of former earth lives, unlike Morey Bernstein, who did little research on the claims of his hypnotized subject Virginia Tighe, whose reveries of a former life as "Bridey Murphy" were the subject of a best-selling book. Bloxham assembled data on some 400 cases of claimed reincarnation.

He grew up in Pershore, a small village in Worcestershire, England, and was educated at Worcester Grammar School. During childhood, he had vivid dreams of people and events that suggested past lives, and some of the details of these dreams were later verified in adult life. His interest in hypnotism dated from his schooldays, when he discovered his ability for mesmerism, as it was then called, and used it to cure a friend's headache. He planned to become a doctor and thought that mesmerism might be a useful asset. However at the age of 18, Bloxham joined the Royal Navy on the outbreak of World War I. After being taken ill with typhoid fever, he was told that he could never work in a hospital, so he became a hypnotherapist and practiced for more than 40 years.

During World War II he again served in the navy, this time as a naval lieutenant, and afterward he settled in Cardiff, South Wales. Here his reputation as a hypnotist gained him a thriving practice. He gave public lectures, appeared on television shows, and cooperated with a dentist to prove that teeth could be extracted under hypnosis instead of anesthetic. Hypnotherapy became increasingly recognized by the British medical profession. In 1972 Bloxham served as president of the British Society of Hypnotherapists.

The activity for which he is best known took place with the assistance of his wife, Dulcie, hypnotizing subjects, regressing their memories to "former existences," and making tape recordings of the sessions. Some of these tapes were played at informal meetings with individuals interested in reincarnation or the law of karma (the Eastern philosophy of action and reaction extended over several lives). In 1958 Dulcie published a book titled Who Was Ann Ockenden? about one of her husband's subjects, a schoolteacher whose memories under hypnosis regressed to seven different "lives." The regular meetings came to an end soon after the death of Dulcie Bloxham.

The 400 cases that make up the Bloxham Tapes are of ordinary people who lived humdrum lives and whose memories of previous "lives" are equally ordinary, although studded with circumstantial information that seemed as if it could be corroborated. For example, the tapes detailed the account of a Welsh housewife who described the massacre of Jews in twelfth-century York, a press photographer who claimed to have seen the execution of Charles I in Whitehall, London, in 1649, a Welshman who told of life aboard a frigate as a press-ganged seaman in Nelson's Navy. Some of the subjects, like the Welsh housewife, recalled six or seven previous lives.

During the 1970s the vast collection of tape-recorded material was painstakingly investigated by BBC radio and television producer Jeffrey Iverson. With the cooperation of famous television presenter Magnus Magnusson, they presented a television program titled The Bloxham Tapes, featuring actual hypnotic sessions with some of Bloxham's subjects and detailing how the evidence of the claimed memories of former lives was corroborated. Iverson's book More Lives than One? (1976) presents the results of his research on the Bloxham Tapes.

A more skeptical view of the Bloxham claims was presented by Ian Wilson in his 1982 text Reincarnation? Wilson suggests that some of the claimed former lives of Bloxham subjects were due to cryptomnesia, the recasting of subconscious memories from secondary sources into apparently real past life experiences. In the case of "Jane Evans," one of Bloxham's cases, Wilson claims that the source of her apparent recall of a past life in the twelfth century could have been an unconscious reworking of a historical novel since traced by an investigator.

Whether hypnotism can be relied on to create significant proof of reincarnation is itself a controversial contention. Researchers have continually shown problems generated by the hypnotist leading the person in the creation of a fantasy. Individuals in a hypnotized state also show an extraordinary ability to create very convincing stories out of a storehouse of memories in the manner that some artists claim they produced their results and some authors their fictions. Although many authors consciously research and develop plot, characters, and backgrounds, others, such as Joan Grant, for example, have found that their stories are "dictated" fluently from the subconscious, as if they were dreams or real memories.

Sources:

Iverson, Jeffrey. More Lives than One? London, 1976.
Wilson, Ian. Mind Out of Time. London: Gollancz, 1981.

Blue Star Gazette

Monthly publication of the Palo Alto Society branch of ECKANKAR, "the ancient science of soul travel." Last known address: 880 Emerson St., Palo Alto, CA 94301.

Bo and Peep See Applewhite, Jr., Marshall Herff; Nettles, Bonnie Lu Truesdale; and Human Individual Metamorphosis

Bodhisattva

A Buddhist term for one who exists in enlightenment of truth and compassion guided by love and wisdom. In Mahayana Buddhism, the bodhisattva is the ideal of progress; in Theravada Buddhism, the bodhisattva is an aspirant for Buddhahood. In Theosophy the bodhisattva is the director of the spiritual development of each root-race and founder of religions, which he propagates through his messengers.

Sources:

The Bodhisattva Doctrine in Buddhism. Waterloo, Ontario: Canadian Corporation for Studies in Religion, Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1981.
Candragomin. Difficult Beginnings: Three Works on the Bodhisattva Path. Boston: Shambhala, 1985.
Dayal, Har. The Bodhisattva Doctrine in Buddhist Sanskrit Literature. Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass, 1970.

Bodhi Tree Book Review

The Bodhi Tree Book Review is a publication of the Bodhi Tree, possibly the most well-known bookstore in the United States specializing in New Age and alternative spirituality literature. The Bodhi Tree, named for the tree under which the Buddha found enlightenment, opened in 1970 in Los Angeles, California. Through the 1980s it became known for its extensive inventory as the place to locate obscure publications, especially those from small publishing houses and the many spiritual and New Age organizations.

At the beginning of the 1990s, the store launched its book review magazine as a service to its patrons to assist them in locating new books that were being published in their area of interest. At the same time it has served as a marketing tool through which publishers can reach a large and highly selected audience of book readers.

The Bodhi Tree Book Review is issued biannually in an oversized format. It includes several feature articles and/or interviews with prominent authors. The bulk of each 50-page issue, however, has numerous brief notices of new books, the notices being largely descriptive rather than critical material, much of the content being largely drawn from dust jackets and publicity material produced by the publishers. Each issue also carries a list of the best-selling books and the best-selling CDs from the month prior to the appearance of the new issue. The materials are divided under more than 40 headings reflective of the variety of topics and the diverse spiritual perspectives represented in the bookstore. Books by some of the more prominent authors of multiple titles are grouped in their own section.

The Bodhi Tree Book Review is published by the Bodhi Tree at 8585 Melrose Ave., Los Angeles, CA 90069-5199. The store has a large website that includes its complete inventory online at http://www.bodhitree.com/.

Sources:

Bodhi Tree Book Review. Los Angeles, n.d.
Bodhi Tree. http://www.bodhitree.com/. February 28,2000.

Bodin, Jean (1529–1596)

A jurist and student of demonology who died of the plague in 1596. An Angevin by birth, he studied law, classics, philosophies, and economics in his youth and became professor of Roman law at the University of Toulouse. In 1561 he went to Paris, where he served the king, but lost royal favor on publication of his book Republique, which contained concepts of monarchy that were ahead of his time. His most famous work was De la demonomanie des sorciers (Demonomania of witches), which played a large part in the growth of witchcraft persecutions, because it defined witchcraft and laid down methods of interrogation, torture, and execution.

His Colloquium heptaplomeron de abdites rerum sublimium varcanus, aroused very unfavorable opinions regarding his religious views. In it Bodin discussed the theological opinions of Jews, Moslems, and deists to the disadvantage of the Christian faith, and although he died a Catholic, he professed in his time the tenets of Protestantism, Judaism, sorcery, atheism, and deism.

The Demonomanie was published in Paris in 1580 and again under the title Flèau des demons et des sorciers at Wiort in 1616. In its first and second books Bodin demonstrated that spirits have communication with mankind, and he traced the various characteristics and forms that distinguish good spirits from evil. His topics include the methods of diabolic prophecy and communication; evocation of evil existences; of pacts with the devil; of journeys through the air to the sorcerers' Sabbath; of infernal ecstasies; of spells by which one may change himself into a werewolf, and of carnal communion with an incubus or succubus. The third book explains how to prevent the work of sorcerers and obviate their charms and enchantments, and the fourth divulges the manner in which sorcerers may be known. He concluded his study by refuting the work of Johan Weyer, or Wierus, who, he asserted, was in error in believing that sorcerers were fools and people of unsound mind. Bodin recommended that Weyer's books should be burned "for the honour of God."

Bodin participated in many witchcraft trials as judge and was responsible for the torture of many suspected witches, including children and invalids. He advised using hot irons to cauterize the flesh so that putrefaction could be cut out. One of his precepts was that presumption and conjecture of witchcraft ranked as proof.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Body, Mind & Spirit Magazine

New title for former Psychic Guide Magazine, adopted with the November/December 1987 issue. The title reflected the broad identification of editor Paul Zuromski with the New Age movement. Address: Box 701, Providence, RI 02901.

Boehme, Jakob (1575–1624)

Famous German mystic. His name is sometimes spelled Beem, Behm, Behmon, or Behmont, but the most common form is Boehme, although it is probable that the family name was really Böhme, and Boehme most closely matches the German version.

Born in 1575 at Altsteidenberg in Upper Lusatia, Boehme came from peasant stock, and accordingly his education consisted of brief study at the nearby village school in Seidenberg, and for the greater part of his childhood he tended his father's flocks on Mount Landskrone. Not strong enough physically to make a good shepherd, Boehme left home at the age of 13 to seek his fortune at Görlitz, the nearest town of any size.

To this day, Görlitz is famous for its shoemakers, and it was to a cobbler that the boy went first in search of employment. By 1599 he became a master shoemaker, and soon afterward married Katharina, daughter of Hans Kantzschmann, a butcher. The young couple took a house near the bridge in Neiss Voistadt—their dwelling is still pointed out to tourists—and some years later Boehme improved his business by adding gloves to his stock in trade, a departure which sent him periodically to Prague to acquire consignments.

It is likely that Boehme began to write soon after becoming a master cobbler. About the year 1612 he composed a philosophical treatise, Aurora, oder die morgenröte in Aufgang. Though not printed until much later, the manuscript was copied and passed from hand to hand. The writer soon found himself the center of a local circle of thinkers and scholars, many of them people far above him in the social scale. As a result, a charge of heresy was brought against him by the Lutheran church; he was loudly denounced from the pulpit by Gregorius Richter, pastor primarius of Görlitz, and then the town council, fearing to contend with the ecclesiastical authorities, took possession of the original manuscript of Boehme's work and prohibited him from writing.

It seems that he obeyed instructions for a little while, but by 1618 he was busy again, compiling polemical and expository treatises, and in 1622 he wrote short pieces on repentance, resignation, and the like. These last were the only writings published in book form during his lifetime with his consent, but in any event they were not likely to excite clerical hostility. However, Boehme later circulated a less cautious theological work, Der Weg zu Christa, which brought a fresh outburst of hatred on the part of the Church. Boehme left town for a period and met with some of his admirers in Dresden. However, while there he was struck down by fever. He was carried with great difficulty to his home at Görlitz, where he died in 1624.

Boehme's literary output falls into three distinct sections. At first he was concerned simply with the study of the deity, and to this period belongs his Aurora. Second, he grew interested in the manifestation of the divine in the structure of the world and of man, a predilection which resulted in four great works: Die Drei Principien Gottlichens Wes Wescus, Vom Dreifachen Leben der Menschen, Von der Menschwerdung Christi, and Von der Geburt und Bezlichnung Aller Wescu. Finally, he devoted himself to advanced theological speculations and researches, the main outcome being his Von Christi Testamenten and his Von der Chadenwahl: Mysterium Magnum. Other substantive works include his seven Quellgeister and his study of the three first properties of eternal nature.

Although not an alchemist himself, Boehme's writings demonstrate that he studied Paracelsus closely, and they also reflect the influence of Valentine Weigel and the earliest Protestant mystic, Kaspar Schwenhfeld. Boehme never claims to have conversed with spirits, angels, or saints nor of miracles worked on his behalf, the one exception being a passage where he tells how, when a shepherd boy on the Landskrone, he saw an apparition of a pail of gold. At the same time, he seems to have felt a curious and constant intimacy with the invisible world and he appears to have had a strangely perspicacious vision of the Urgrund, or primitive cause.

His wide influence over people inclined to mysticism has been attributed to the clarity with which he sets down his ideas and convictions. Throughout the latter half of the seventeenth century, his works were translated into a number of different languages. They proved an inspiration to William Law, the author of Christian Perfection and A Serious Call to a Devout Life. Since then various religious bodies that regard Boehme as their high priest have been founded in Great Britain and in Holland, while in America, the sect known as the Philadelphians owe their dominant tenets to him.

Sources:

Boehme, J. Aurora. London: John M. Watkins, 1960.

———. The Confession of Jacob Boehme. New York: Harper, 1954.

———. Mysterium Magnum. London: John M. Watkins, 1965.

———. The Signature of All Things. London: James Clarke, 1969.

———. Six Theosophic Points. Lansing: University of Michigan Press, 1970.

———. The Three Principles of the Divine Essence. Jacksonville, Fla.: Yoga Publication Society, 1909.

———. The Way to Christ. New York: Paulist Press, 1978.

Hartmann, Franz. The Life and Doctrines of Jacob Boehme. New York: McCoy Publishing, 1929.

Martensen, H. L. Jacob Boehme. Rockliff, 1949.

Stoudt, J. J. Sunrise to Eternity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1957.

Bogey

An evil spirit. The term may derive from the Slavonic bog (god). Other forms of the name of this ancient sprite, specter, or goblin are bug-a-boo, boo (Yorkshire), boggart, bogle (Scotland), boggle, bo-guest, bar-guest, boll, bo-man, and bock. Bullbeggar is probably a form of bu and bogey allied to boll (Northern England), an apparition. (See also Boh)

Sources:

Briggs, Katherine. An Encyclopedia of Fairies: Hobgoblins, Brownies, Bogies, and Other Supernatural Creatures. New York: Pantheon Books, 1976.

Boggle-Threshold

Term coined by parapsychologist Renée Haynes to indicate the level at which the mind "boggles" or is thwarted by the degree of improbability of a phenomenon. It is similar to other measures of the strangeness level of a phenomenon expressed by others.

Boguet, Henri (ca. 1550–1619)

Grand Justice of the district of Saint Claude in Burgundy, France, during the seventeenth-century European witchcraft mania. He was the author of a work full of ferocious zeal against sorcerers.

This book, entitled Discours des sorciers, was published at the beginning of the seventeenth century and was later burned because of the inhumanities crowding its pages, but it went into 12 editions in two decades. The book is a compilation of procedures for judging sorcerers and their alleged acts, most of which the author himself presided over. They exhibit the most incredible absurdities and criminal credulity.

Its pages contain the proceedings against little Louise Maillat, who at the age of eight was said to be possessed of eight demons; Françoise Secretain, a sorceress who had meetings with said demons and who had the Devil for her lover; and the sorcerers Gros-Jacques and Willirmoz. Claude Gailiard and Roland Duvernois and many others figured in the author's dread judgments.

Boguet detailed the horrible doings of the witches' Sabbat, how the sorcerers caused hail to fall, of which they made a powder to be used as poison, how they used an unguent to carry them to Sabbat, how a sorcerer was able to slay anyone by means of a mere breath, and, when arraigned before a judge, they could not shed tears. He described Devil's mark found on their skins, of how all sorcerers and magicians possess the power to change their forms into those of wolves, and how for these offences they were burned at the stake without sacrament, so that they were destroyed body and soul.

The work ended with instructions to the judges of cases of sorcery, which is often known as the Code des sorciers.

Sources:

Boguet, Henri. Discours des sorciers. Translated as Examen of Witches. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1971.

Boh (or Boo)

A magical word often used to frighten children. Boe is a Greek word synonymous with the Latin Clamor, signifying the English word "cry," and it is possible that the cry of the ox—"boo"—may have suggested this exclamation, since this sound would quite naturally be very terrifying to a young child. There may be some connection between this monosyllable and the "Bogle-boe" or "bwgwly" of Welsh people. According to one writer, it was the name of a fierce Gothic general whose name like those of other great conquerors was remembered as a word of terror. (See also Bogey)

Bohmius, Jean

Author of a work entitled Pyschologie, a treatise on spirits, published at Amsterdam in 1632. Nothing is known of the author.

Boirac, Emile (1851–1917)

Rector of the Dijon Academy and noted French psychical researcher. In the course of his study of human emanations, he revived Franz A. Mesmer's theories concerning animal magnetism, which he saw as the cause of psychokinesis and other physical phenomena of Spiritualism. His observations on the obscure phenomena of exteriorization of sensitivity carried the researches of Paul Joire and Albert de Rochas a step farther. His major book, La Psychologie inconnue (1908), was awarded the Emden Prize by the French Academy of Sciences.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Boirac, Emile. L'Avenir des sciences psychiques. Paris, 1917. Translated as The Psychology of the Future. London, 1918.

———. La Psychologie inconnue. Paris, 1908. Translated as Psychic Science. London, 1918. Translated as Our Hidden Forces. New York, 1917.

BOLIDE See Ball-of-Light International Data Exchange

Bolton, Gambier (d. 1929)

British author and lecturer on natural history who also investigated various aspects of psychical phenomena. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He published a large series of animal photographs that he took while traveling in Europe, America, Canada, the Hawaiian Islands, Japan, China, Java, the Malay Peninsula, Burma, India, and South Africa. He accompanied the duke of Newcastle on his world tour 1893–94. Bolton died July 29, 1929.

Sources:

Bolton, Gambier A Book of Beasts and Birds. London: G. Newnes, Ltd., 1903.

———. Ghosts in Solid Form. London: W. Rider and Son, Ltd., 1919.

Bon, Henri (1885– ?)

French physician and parapsychologist. Born August 1, 1885, at Dijon, France, he studied at the University of Lyons Medical School (M.D., 1912). In 1919 he was founder of the Clinique Médicale of Arguel (Doubs) and served as its director for more than 30 years (1919–52). He is best known outside his native land for his several books, which include La Mort et ses problèmes (Death and Its Problems, 1941), Les Guérisons miraculeuses modernes (1952; trans. Modern Miraculous Cures [1957]) and Le Miracle devant la science (Miracle and Science, 1957).

Bonati (or Bonatus), Guido (d. 1300)

Florentine astrologer who flourished in the thirteenth century. He lived in a most original manner and perfected the art of prediction. When the army of Martin IV besieged Forli, a town of the Romagna that was defended by the count of Montferrat, Bonati announced to the count that he would repulse the enemy but would be wounded in the fray. The event transpired as Bonati had predicted, and the count, who had taken with him the necessary materials to staunch his wound in case the prophecy came true, became a devout adherent of astrology.

Bonati became a Franciscan toward the close of his life and died in 1300. His works were published by Jacobus Cauterus under the title Liber Astronomicus at Augsberg, 1491. Another Florentine astrologer of the same name died 1596.

Bond, Frederick Bligh (1864–1945)

Ecclesiastical architect, archaeologist, and excavator of the lost chapels of Glastonbury Abbey. Born June 30, 1864, at Marlborough, Wiltshire, England, he was editor of Psychic Science from its inception until 1926, editor of the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research in 1930, and author of a number of books based on automatic writing. Received mostly in conjunction with "John Alleyne" (John A. Bartlett) and Hester Dowden, involved a form of dual mediumship in which Bond provided the special mental contact.

His vocation and his studies of ancient abbeys apparently predisposed him to receive a range of psychic communications. The Gospel of Philip the Deacon was entirely different from the communications habitual in Dowden's mediumship. It is an open question whether The Scripts of Cleophas, the first two sections of which came under precisely similar conditions, would have been received by Geraldine Cummins without Bond's initial mental impetus. The inspiring influences spoke of themselves as "The Company of Avalon," "The Company of the Watchers," etc. The bulk of the philosophical writings which they inspired was published under the title The Wisdom of the Watchers (New York, 1933).

Besides these and his own inspirational writings, Bond conducted experiments in psychic photography with Ada E. Deane (see Thoughtforms) and pursued various other lines of research. He considered the survival of mind, memory, and personality as proved facts. In The Gate of Remembrance he proposed that the recall of the olden-time memories were due to a cosmic reservoir of human memory and experience in which the element of personality is preserved and welded into a collective association extending through all times. This, he claimed, would not only perpetuate individual character but actually emphasize the force and clarity of its expression by enriching it with added elements of a sympathetic nature.

Thus individual personality is, in Bond's view, progressively developed and perfected through the multiplying of its sympathetic contacts. He outlined this conception of immortality in a series of articles in 1929 in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research. He pictured the subliminal consciousness as a magnet that is constantly attracting other elements of personality sympathetically linked with the physical being of their host.

Hence we are all alike, sharers in the great life of the subliminal world, and are an integral part of it, the only barriers being our own intellectual and emotional limitations. The communications are based upon sympathetic spiritual association. Where this exists there will always be the probability of a recall of the veridical memories of old and of their right translation into language. But where no such spiritual link is present, there is only the reflection of the personal subconscious mind of the medium, and there will be no sure indication of the entry of a really independent personality. This theory brings the extreme psychological and Spiritualistic views into a well thought-out harmony. Although it has been widely accepted that Bond's claim that psychically acquired information successfully guided the discovery of the lost chapels at Glastonbury, some critics do not accept the case as proved, maintaining that the Glastonbury Scripts disclosed nothing that might not have been deduced from existing historical records, as well as containing incorrect statements. This does not necessarily impugn the honesty of Bond.

In November 1927 Bond moved to the United States, where he became educational director of the American Society for Psychical Research at the time of the controversy over the mediumship of "Margery" (Mina Crandon). Although at first Bond endorsed her mediumship as genuine, he subsequently expressed grave doubts; in the May 1935 Proceedings of the ASPR, he defended the research officer E. E. Dudley, who had been accused of tampering with the famous "Walter" wax thumbprints. In effect, this clearly supported the claim that the prints were fraudulent, and as a result Bond was dismissed. Soon afterward he returned to England, where he retired to North Wales.

Bond is sometimes referred to as "The Rev." This stems from the fact that while in America he was ordained as a priest (1932) and consecrated as a bishop (1933) of the Old Catholic Church in America by Archbishop William Henry Francis Brothers.

Bond died March 8, 1945, in Wales. He left behind an unpublished manuscript comprising claimed communications from Captain Bligh of the H.M.S. Bounty, received through an American psychic. Bligh was Bond's great-uncle.

Sources:

Bond, Frederick Bligh. "Athanasia." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (January–May 1929).

———. The Company of Avalon. Oxford: B. H. Blackwell, 1924.

———. The Gate of Remembrance. Oxford: B. H. Blackwell, 1918.

Bond, Frederick Bligh, and Thomas Simcox Lea. Gematria: A Preliminary Investigation of the Cabala. Wellingborough, England: Thorsons, 1977.

Goodman, Jeffrey. Psychic Archeology: Time Machine to the Past. New York: Berkley Publishing, 1977.

Kenawell, William W. The Quest at Glastonbury. New York: Helix Press, 1965.

Lambert, G. W. "The Quest at Glastonbury." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43, no. 748 (June 1966).

Ward, Gary L. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Bonewits, P(hilip) E(mmons) I(saac) (1949–)

A Pagan priest who has attained some measure of fame as America's first "academically accredited" practitioner of magic. He holds the first (and only) Bachelor of Arts degree with a major in magic from the University of California, Berkeley. Bonewits (pronounced Bon-a-wits) was born October 1, 1949, in Michigan, and came to Berkeley from Laguna Beach in 1967. He originally studied psychology, but found this limiting, and succeeded in finding a professor who agreed to sponsor a major in occult science. This degree was granted June 16, 1970, after which Bonewits published a very successful book about his academic sojourn under the title Real Magic (1971).

While at Berkeley, Bonewits roomed with Robert Larson, who had previously attended Carleton College. In the 1960s Carleton was the site for the formation of the Reformed Druids of North America. The idea of Druidism appealed to Bonewits, and he and Larson formed a Druid grove in Berkeley. Bonewits was ordained as a Druid priest in 1969.

In 1974 he moved to Minneapolis to become editor of the occult journal Gnostica (1974–75). He also established a Druid group in Minneapolis and founded the Aquarian Anti-Defamation League, a short-lived Pagan defense organization. In 1976 Bonewits returned to Berkeley. He finished the compilation of the Druid holy writings, which he published as the Druid Chronicles (Evolved), and in 1978 he established the periodical Druid Chronicles (later Pentalpha Journal).

In the early 1980s Bonewits separated from the Druids and was initiated as a priest in a Gardnerian Pagan group, the New Reformed Orthodox Order of the Golden Dawn (no relation to the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn). In 1983 he moved to New York, where he and Shenain Bell founded Ar nDraiocht Fein (Gaelic for "Our Own Druid Faith"). Bonewits was named Archdruid. In 1988 he married Deborah Lipp, a Gardnerian priestess. Together they run a Pagan Way group, and Bonewits remains as head of Ar nDraiocht Fein. A national leader in the Pagan/Wicca community, Bonewits is a major advocate of formal theological training for Pagan leaders.

Sources:

Bonewits, P. E. I. Authentic Thaumaturgy. Albany, Calif.: The CHAOSium, 1978.

———. Druid Chronicles (Evolved). Berkeley, Calif.: Berkeley Drunemetron Press, 1976.

———. Real Magic. Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1971. Rev. ed. Berkeley, Calif.: Creative Arts Book Co., 1979.

Boniface VIII (Benedetto Gaetano) (ca. 1228–1303)

Pope who gained an unenviable notoriety in Dante's Inferno as "Prince of the new Pharisees" and was regarded by many people as an exponent of black magic. A noted jurist, Boniface was born at Anagni in a noble family and was elected pope in 1294. In 1296 he quarreled seriously with Phillippe le Bel, king of France, who wanted to tax the church, and prepared to excommunicate the king. The quarrel arose when Boniface was determined to extend the rule of the papacy throughout the kingdoms of the world and to build up great estates for his family.

In 1303, Phillippe's ministers and agents boldly accused Boniface of heresy and sorcery, and the king called a council at Paris to hear witnesses and pronounce judgment. The pope resisted and refused to acknowledge a council not called by himself. Then the king planned to abduct Boniface and bring him to France. The French attacked the pope in his residence, but could not carry off their escape, and the mistreatment to which Boniface was exposed proved too much for him. He died the same year, in the midst of these vindictive proceedings. His enemies spread abroad a report that in his last moments he had confessed his league with the demon, and that his death was attended with "so much thunder and tempest, with dragons flying in the air and vomiting flames, and such lightning and other prodigies, that the people of Rome believed that the whole city was going to be swallowed up in the abyss."

His successor, Benedict XI, undertook to defend his predecessor's memory, but he died in 1304, the first year of his pontificate (some said he was poisoned), and the holy see remained vacant for 11 months. In mid-June 1305 the archbishop of Bordeaux was elected to the papal chair under the title Clement V. This election was ascribed to the influence of the king, who was said to have stipulated as one condition that Clement should support proceedings against Boniface that would make his memory infamous. However, the prosecution was dropped, and in 1312 Boniface was declared innocent of all offenses with which he had been charged. These had included wild accusations of infidelity, skepticism, and communication with demons. One witness deposed that he had a demon enclosed in a ring which he wore on his finger; one friar (Brother Bernard de Sorano) deposed that when Boniface was a cardinal, he was seen to enter a garden adjacent to the palace of Nicholas III and perform a magical ceremony with a sacrificed cock and a book of spells, conjuring up demons. Such statements must be judged in the light of the king's opposition to Boniface and the superstitions of the time.

Bonnevault, Pierre (ca. seventeenth century)

A self-confessed sorcerer of Poitou in the seventeenth century, the son of Maturin De Bonnevault. Bonnevault engaged in devil worship and was arrested on his way to the Devil's Sabbat. He stated that the first time he had attended an unholy meeting he had been taken there by his parents and dedicated to the Devil, to whom he had promised to leave his bones after death, but that he had not bargained to leave his immortal soul to his infernal majesty.

Bonnevault admitted that he called Satan "Master," that the Devil had assisted him in various magical acts, and that he had slain various persons through Satanic agency. In the end he was condemned to death. His brother Jean, accused of sorcery at the same time, prayed to the Devil for assistance, and was raised some four or five feet from the ground and dashed back thereon, his skin turning at the same time to a blue-black hue. He confessed that he had met at the Sabbat a young man through whom he had promised one of his fingers to Satan after his death. He also told how he had been transported through the air to the Sabbat, how he had received powders to slay certain people whom he named, and for these crimes he received the punishment of death.

Book of Celestial Chivalry

A work of Spanish origin that appeared in the middle of the sixteenth century. It documents supposed knightly adventures in a semi-romantic, semi-mystical vein.

Book of Shadows

The "bible" of the modern witch coven. It contains basic beliefs, rituals, charms, spells, and incantations. There is no authentic definitive edition, since the form and scope of the book differs from coven to coven. Normal procedure is for a witch to copy the work in her own handwriting and destroy the original, but in many covens, copies are made without destroying the original. However, no copy is intended to be kept by a witch who leaves the coven, and this rule is enforced by various threats and curses.

Although the act of copying the book in manuscript suggests a centuries-old secret tradition, there is little doubt that the material contained in most modern versions of the Book of Shadows derives from sources such as Aradia; or The Gospel of the Witches (1899) by Charles Godfrey Leland, a compilation of witchcraft folklore reportedly collected by Leland from a Florentine fortune-teller and hereditary. It was the first English-language publication of its kind. The average modern Book of Shadows derives from the one constructed in stages by Gerald B. Gardner for use in his revived Witchcraft group in Great Britain during the 1940s and 1950s. He borrowed heavily from the writings of Aleister Crowley, especially for the third degree. During the 1960s and 1970s various Witches mixed the Gardnerian Book of Shadows with material from modern occult and folklore texts.

The Gardnerian Book of Shadows was actually released in 1964 by a hostile ex-member, and over the years additional variations on the text have been published, as have new Books of Shadows inspired by it. Wide circulation was given to Lady Sheba's Book of Shadows, released in 1973.

Sources:

The Book of Shadows and Substance. Owlexandrian Multimedia/Hermetic Educational Institute, n.d.

Budapest, Zsuzsanna Emese. The Feminist Book of Lights and Shadows. Venice, Calif.: Luna Publications, 1976.

Rex Nemorensis [Charles Cardell]. Witch. London: Privately published, 1964.

Sheba, Lady. The Book of Shadows. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1973.

Tarostar. A Book of Shadows. New Brunswick, N.J.: Inner Light Publications,1987.

Book of Spirits (or The Spirits' Book)

The English translation of Le Livre des esprits, a famous book on Spiritualism by Allan Kardec (pseudonym of H. L. D. Rivail, 1804–1869). The original French work was published in 1856. It was translated into English in 1975 by Anna Blackwell and frequently reprinted, especially in Brazil, where Kardec has a large following.

Sources:

Kardec, Allan. The Spirits' Book. Translated by Anna Blackwell. 1875. Reprint, Sao Paulo, Brazil: Lake-Livraria Allan Kardec Editora, 1972.

Book of the Damned

First of the famous four "Books" of Charles Fort (1874–1932) that challenged conventional divisions of thought and science by collating and interpreting phenomena that were usually denied, explained away, or ignored. The "damned" described by Fort as the data that science has excluded, referred to a wide variety of scientific anomalies. The Book of the Damned was first published in 1919. It was followed by New Lands, 1923; Lo! 1931; and Wild Talents, 1932. A complete collected edition, The Books of Charles Fort, was published in 1941.

Sources:

Fort, Charles. The Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941.

Book of the Dead

An arbitrary title given to a funerary work from ancient Egypt called pert em hru, the translation of which is "coming forth by day," or "manifested in the light." Several versions or recensions of this work are known, namely those of Heliopolis, Thebes, and Sais, differing only inasmuch as they were edited by the colleges of priests founded at these centers. Many papyri of the work have been discovered, and passages from it have been inscribed upon the walls of tombs and pyramids and on sarcophagi and mummy-wrappings. One very complete copy is on display at the Egyptian Museum in Turin, Italy.

It is undoubtedly of extremely early date; exactly how early it would be difficult to say, but in the course of centuries it was greatly added to and modified. It contains about 200 chapters, but no complete papyrus has been found. The chapters are quite independent of one another, and were probably all composed at different times. The main subject is the beatification of the dead, who were supposed to recite the chapters in order that they might gain power and enjoy the privileges of the new life.

The work abounds in magical references. The whole trend of the Book of the Dead is thaumaturgic, as its purpose is to guard the dead against the dangers they have to face in reaching the other world. As in most mythologies, the dead Egyptian had to encounter malignant spirits and was threatened by many dangers before reaching his haven of rest.

He also had to undergo judgment by Osiris, and to justify himself before being permitted to enter the realms of bliss. This he imagined he could in great part accomplish by the recitation of various magical formula and spells, which would ward off the evil influences opposed to him. To this end every important Egyptian of means had buried with him a papyrus of the Book of the Dead, containing at least all the chapters necessary for encountering the formidable adversaries at the gates of Amenti, the Egyptian Hades. These chapters would assist him in making replies during his ceremony of justification. First among these spells were the "words of power." The Egyptians believed that to discover the "secret" name of a god was to gain complete ascendancy over him.

Sympathetic magic was in vogue in Egyptian burial practice, which explains the presence, in tombs of people of means, of paintings of tables laden with food and drink, with inscriptions attached conveying the idea of boundless liberality. Inscriptions like the following are extremely common—"To the ka [essential double or soul] of so-and-so, 5,000 loaves of bread, 500 geese, and 5,000 jugs of beer." Those dedications cost the generous donors little, as they merely had the objects named painted upon the wall of the tomb, imagining that their ka or astral counterpart would be eatable and drinkable by the deceased. This of course is merely an extension of the Neolithic conception that articles buried with a man had their astral counterparts and would be of use to him in another world.

Pictorial representation played a considerable part in the magical ritual of the Book of the Dead. One of the pleasures of the dead was to sail over Heaven in the boat of Ra, and to secure this for the deceased one must paint certain pictures and mutter over them words of power. Regarding this belief, E. A. Wallis Budge states in his book Egyptian Magic (1889):

"On a piece of clean papyrus a boat is to be drawn with ink made of green abut mixed with anti water, and in it are to be figures of Isis, Thoth, Shu, and Khepera, and the deceased; when this had been done the papyrus must be fastened to the breast of the deceased, care being taken that it does not actually touch his body. Then shall his spirit enter into the boat of Ra each day, and the god Thoth shall take heed to him, and he shall sail about with him into any place that he wisheth. Elsewhere it is ordered that the boat of Ra be painted 'in a pure place,' and in the bows is to be painted a figure of the deceased; but Ra was supposed to travel in one boat (called Atet) until noon, and another (called Sektet) until sunset, and provision had to be made for the deceased in both boats. How was this to be done? On one side of the picture of the boat a figure of the morning boat of Ra was to be drawn, and on the other a figure of the afternoon boat; thus the one picture was capable of becoming two boats. And, provided the proper offerings were made for the deceased on the birthday of Osiris, his soul would live for ever, and he would not die a second time. According to the rubric to the chapter in which these directions are given, the text of it is as old, at least, as the time of Hesept, the fifth king of the 1st. dynasty, who reigned about 4350 B.C., and the custom of painting the boat upon papyrus is probably contemporaneous."

The words of power were not to be spoken until after death. They were "a great mystery," but "the eye of no man whatsoever must see it, for it is a thing of abomination for every man to know it. Hide it, therefore, the Book of the Lady of the Hidden Temple is its name." This would seem to refer to some spell uttered by Isis-Hathor that delivered the god Ra or Horus from trouble, or was of benefit to him, thus was concluded to be equally efficacious in the case of the deceased.

Many spells were included in the Book of the Dead for the purpose of preserving the mummy against molding and for assisting the owner of the papyrus to become as a god and to be able to transform himself into any shape he desired. Painted offerings were also provided so the deceased would be able to give gifts to the gods. It is apparent that the Book of the Dead was undoubtedly magical in character, consisting as it did of a series of spells or words of power, which enabled the speaker to have perfect control over all the powers of Amenti.

The only moment in which the dead man is not master of his fate is when his heart is weighed by Thoth before Osiris. If it does not conform to the standard required for justification, he is cast out; except for this, an absolute knowledge of the Book of the Dead safeguarded the deceased in every way from the danger of damnation. A number of the chapters consist of prayers and hymns to the gods, but the directions as to the magical uses of the book are equally numerous; the concept of supplication is mingled with the idea of circumvention by sorcery in the most extraordinary manner.

Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin

A magic manual by "Abraham the Jew," a magician of the Middle Ages, translated and edited by S. L. MacGregor Mathers from a rare manuscript dated 1478 at the Bibliotheque de l'Arsenal, Paris. This translation was first published 1898 and has been frequently reprinted. (See also Abraham the Jew)

Sources:

The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin the Mage. Translated by S. L. MacGregor-Mathers. 1898. Reprint, Chicago: de Laurence, 1932. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Book of Thoth

An interpretation of the symbolism of the tarot cards written by Aleister Crowley toward the end of his life (1875–1974). In 1912 Crowley published "A Description of the Cards of the Tarot" in his biannual journal, Equinox (vol. 1, nos. 7–8), about the tarot cards of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Each member had to make a copy from the original deck, but it was not until Israel Regardie published a set of the Golden Dawn tarot cards in the 1980s that the pictures that Crowley was describing became available to the public.

In the 1940s Crowley wrote a commentary on the tarot, which carried the Egyptian symbolism that had come to dominate the thelemic magic system he had developed. He teamed with artist Frieda Harris to create a new deck of tarot cards. The commentary, The Book of Thoth, was published in 1944. The Book of Thoth was released as Vol. 3, no. 5, of the Equinox. It is part of the standard curriculum for members of the OTO.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Book of Thoth. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.

Book Tests

Experiments in psychic research to exclude the working of telepathy in mediumistic communications. In answer to questions or for reasons of personal relevance, the communicator indicates a certain book upon a certain shelf in the home of the sitter and gives the text on a certain page.

In such experiments far more successes were registered than chance would justify. The books selected are usually those of which the communicator was fond in his lifetime, thus offering another suggestion of personal identity. Many excellent cases of book tests are recorded in Lady Glenconner's The Earthen Vessel (1921) and in Some New Evidence for Human Survival (1922), by the Rev. Drayton Thomas. In the preface he wrote to Thomas's book, Sir William Barrett reported to have received this communication from the deceased psychical researcher F. W. H. Myers:

"There were some books on the right-hand side of a room upstairs in your house in Devonshire Place. On the second shelf, four feet from the ground, in the fourth book counting from the left, at the top of page 78, are some words which you should take as direct answer from him (Myers) to so much of the work you have been doing since he passed over. Asked if the name of the book could be given, the reply was 'No,' but that whilst feeling on the cover of the book he got a sense of 'progression.' Two or three books from this test book are one or two books on matters in which Sir William used to be very interested, but not of late years. It is connected with studies of his youth."

Barrett pointed out that Gladys Leonard, the medium who brought in this communication from Myers, never visited his house. He had no idea what books were referred to, but on returning home found that in the exact position indicated, the test book was George Eliot's Middlemarch. On the first line at the top of page 78 were the words: "Ay, ay. I remember—you'll see I've remembered 'em all." The quotation was singularly appropriate, because much of Barrett's work since Myers passed over had been concerned with the question of survival after death and whether the memories of friends on earth continued with the discarnate.

But the most remarkable part of the test was yet to be discovered. Unknown to Barrett, the maid, when in dusting the bookshelves, replaced two of Eliot's novels by two volumes of Dr. Tyndall's books, namely, his Heat and Sound, which were found exactly in the position indicated. In his youth Barrett was for some years Tyndall's assistant, and these books were written during that time.

By what process does the discarnate intelligence find a relevant passage in closed books? One of the preliminary statements that Thomas received from his father was that he "sensed the appropriate spirit of the passage rather than the letters composing it." After 18 months he appeared to acquire a power of occasionally seeing the words by some sort of clairvoyance. Giving the page number is one of the greatest difficulties. The impression left on Thomas's mind was that when a page had been fixed upon as containing a thought suitable for the test, the operator counted the pages between that and the beginning. He usually started where the flow of thought began and when it ceased and recommenced higher up he concluded that he passed from the bottom of one page to the top of another. This was how they computed the number of pages between the beginning and the passage fixed upon for the test. When verifying, one usually counted from the beginning of the printed matter, disregarding fly-leaves and the printer's numbering.

The experiments were just as successful when a sealed book was used, which was deposited by a friend in Thomas's house; with an unseen bookshelf; with a parcel in which an antiquarian at random packed in some books and which was unopened; and with books placed in the dark in an iron deed-box.

If these results are to be explained by the medium's supernormal powers, she has to be endowed, as Thomas points out, with such a degree of clairvoyance as would permit the making of minute observations in distant places and retaining a memory of things seen there; with ability to extract the general meaning from printed pages in distant houses, despite the fact that the books concerned are not open at the time; with ability to obtain knowledge of happenings in the sitter's home and private life relating both to the present and to the distant past; and with an intelligence which knows how to select from among our host of memories the suitable items for association with the book of passage, or conversely, of finding a suitable passage for the particular memory fished from the depths of our mind. Thomas's own conclusion was that the book tests were obtained by a spirit who gleaned impressions psychometrically and obtained an exact glimpse now and again by clairvoyance.

The underlying idea of book tests goes back to the experiments of Sir William Crookes. A lady was writing automatically with the planchette and he tried to devise a means for the exclusion of "unconscious cerebration." He asked the invisible intelligence if it could see the contents of the room, and on receiving an affirmative answer, Crookes randomly placed his finger on a copy of the Times (of London), which was on a table behind him, without looking at it, and asked the communicator to write down the word covered by his finger. The planchette wrote the word "However." He turned around and saw that this was the word covered by the tip of his finger. This experiment was first published in January 1874 in the Quarterly Journal of Science.

The first plain book tests were recorded by Stainton Moses. He wrote automatically, under the dictation of "Rector": "Go to the book case and take the last book but one on the second shelf, look at the last paragraph on page 94, and you will find this sentence. . . ." The sentence was found as indicated. The experiment was repeated a number of times.

Of other mediums, William Eglinton was particularly successful in direct-writing book tests. Many cases are described in John S. Farmer's Twixt Two Worlds (1886). The page and line were selected by tossing coins and reading the last numbers of the dates. In some cases they were still further complicated by prescribing the use of colored chalk in a set order of the words. Book tests combined with incidents of xenoglossia are described in Judge Ludwig Dahl's We Are Here, published in 1931. The Norwegian judge wrote of the mediumship of his daughter, Ingeborg, and described how her two (deceased) brothers "were represented as going into another room and reading aloud passages from a book still on the shelves, the number of which was selected by one of the sitters—the medium successfully repeating or transmitting what they read in a foreign language and far beyond her comprehension."

Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, in her study of the problem of books tests in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (April 1921), arrived at the conclusion, "On the whole, I think, the evidence before us does constitute a reasonable prima facie case for belief in the perception of external things not known to any one present, but known to someone somewhere."

Sources:

Baird, Alexander T. One Hundred Cases for Survival after Death. New York: Bernard Ackerman, 1944.

Besterman, Theodore. Collected Papers on the Paranormal. New York: Garrett/Helix, 1968.

Smith, Susy. The Mediumship of Mrs. Leonard. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Thomas, C. Drayton. Some New Evidence for Human Survival. London: Collins, 1922.

Booth, Gotthard (1899– ?)

Born May 26, 1899, in Nuremberg, Germany, Booth became a psychiatrist and moved to New York in 1935 to assume duties as a consultant at the General Theological Seminary, New York, and adviser to the Program in Psychiatry and Religion at Union Theological Seminary, New York. In the field of parapsychology he took a special interest in spontaneous psi phenomena occurring in psychotherapy, spiritual healing, and psi phenomena in climbing plants, on which he published numerous articles.

Borak (or Al Borak)

The animal brought by the angel Gabriel to convey the prophet Mahommad to the seventh heaven. The name means "the lightning" and Al Borak had the face of a man but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but as bright as stars; it had eagle's wings that glistened with radiant light; and it spoke with a human voice. It traveled at each step as far as the keenest sight could see, and it was one of the only ten animals (not of the race of men) received into paradise.

Borderieux, Carita (Mrs. Pierre Borderieux) (1874–1953)

Secretary to Gabriel Delanne, editor of La Revue scientifique et morale spiritisme and founder and editor of the review Psychica from 1921 until it ceased in 1940. She organized regular weekly meetings in Paris with speakers on Spiritualism and parapsychology. Such famous individuals as Camille Flammarion, Gabriel Delanne, Juliette Bisson, Rene Warcollier, Leon Chevreuil, Robert Tocquet, and Maurice Maeterlinck spoke at these meetings. Borderieux had a special interest in clairvoyance and so-called "thinking animals." She published a book on the subject, Les Nouveaux Animaux pensants (The New Thinking Animals), and also trained the dog "Zou," which was alleged to answer questions put to it telepathically. Borderieux died February 20, 1953.

Borderland (Magazine)

Quarterly magazine dealing with psychical research and Spiritualism founded by William T. Stead and published in Britain from July 1893 until October 1897. Stead was assisted editorially by Ada Goodrich-Freer. The title was suggested by the famous Spiritualist J. J. Morse, and the magazine's stated aim was "seeking the scientific verification of the life and immortality which were brought to light nineteen hundred years ago."

Borderland Library, The W. T. Stead

Founded by Estelle W. Stead in 1914, for the purpose of continuing the work of Julia's Bureau, organized to facilitate psychic communication with the afterlife. The president was Mrs. Bayley Worthington. The Stead Bureau closed in 1936.

Borderland Sciences Research Foundation

Organization founded in 1945 by Meade Layne as Borderland Sciences Research Associates, concerned with the "borderland" region between fantasy and reality, fields of parapsychology, the occult, psychic research, hypnosis, dowsing, radiesthesia, radionics, telepathy, and other phenomena. Layne showed a special concern with flying saucers. BSRA published many mimeographed bulletins, including Flying Roll and Meade Lane's Round Robin, now known as the Journal of Borderland Research.

Around 1960, the organization evolved into Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, Inc. It explores phenomena that orthodox science cannot or will not investigate, and it offers recognition, understanding, and encouragement to individuals who are having unusual experiences of the borderland type or are conducting research in the occult. The foundation maintains a library on occult science and related fields and publishes the many flying saucer contactee writings of Riley Hansard Crabb. The address of the foundation is: P.O. Box 6250, Eureka, CA 95502. Website: http://www.borderlands.com/.

Sources:

Crabb, Riley Hansard. An Attempt at Cosmic Fellowship. Vista, Calif.: Borderland Science Research Foundation, 1964.

Layne, Meade. The Coming of the Guardians. 5th ed. Vista, Calif.: Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, 1964.

———. The Ether Ship Mystery. San Diego: Borderland Sciences Research Associates, 1950.

Borderline Magazine

Popular American occult magazine published from 1965 to 1966, edited by Shelly Lowenkopf and astrologer Sydney Omarr. Publication ceased after vol. 2, no. 2 (February 1966).

Borderline Science Investigation Group

A now-defunct organization formed to investigate folklore, UFOs, ghosts, and fairy incidents in the Suffolk area of Britain.

Borri, Josephe-François (1627–1695)

An alchemical imposter of the seventeenth century who was born at Milan in 1627. In youth his conduct was so wayward that at last he was compelled to seek refuge in a church to escape the vengeance of those he had wronged. There he hid his delinquencies under the cloak of imposture and hypocrisy, and he pretended that God had chosen him to reform mankind and to reestablish God's reign below. He also claimed to be the champion of the papal power against all heretics and Protestants, and he wore a wondrous sword that he alleged had been given to him by Saint Michael.

Borri said that he had seen in heaven a luminous palm branch that was reserved for him. He uttered a number of heretical views, including that the Virgin was divine in nature, that she had conceived through inspiration, and that she was equal to her Son, with whom she was present in the Eucharist, that the Holy Spirit was incarnate in her, and that the second and third Persons of the Trinity were inferior to the Father. All of these views are rejected by the Roman Catholic Church.

According to some writers, Borri later proclaimed himself to be the Holy Spirit incarnate. In any case, he was arrested after the death of Innocent X by order of the Inquisition, and on January 3, 1661, he was condemned to be burned as a heretic. He succeeded in escaping to Germany, where he received money from Queen Christina, to whom he asserted his mastery of alchemy and his ability to manufacture the Philosophers' stone. He afterward fled to Copenhagen and hoped to sail to Turkey, but he was tracked to a small village nearby and arrested, along with a conspirator.

Borri was sent back to Rome, where he died in prison August 10, 1695. It is claimed that he was the author of The Key of the Cabinet of the Chevalier Borri, which bore the imprint of Geneva in 1681, a volume chiefly concerned with elementary spirits. In the nineteenth century, Abbé de Villars seems to have drawn upon this book for his work Le Comte de Gabalis. However, some commentators suggested that the Borri book is merely a faulty translation and expansion of de Villars's volume, complete with a false publication date to support its claim to priority.

Bors (or Bohors or Boort)

One of King Arthur's knights. He was associated with Sir Galahad and Lancelot in their search for the Holy Grail. He is the hero of many magical adventures such as the following. During the quest for the Holy Grail, a damsel offers him her love, which he refuses; then she, with 12 other damsels, threatens to throw herself from a tower. Bors, though of a kindly disposition, thinks they had better lose their souls than his. They fall from the tower, Bors crosses himself, and the whole vanishes, being a deceit of the devil. After the quest is ended, Bors comes to Camelot, where he relates his adventures, which, it is said, were written down and kept in the Abbey of Salisbury.

Bose, Sir Jagadis Chunder (1858–1937)

An Indian scientist who pioneered research into plant physiology. He was born November 30, 1858, in the village of Rarikhal in Vikrampur, East Bengal, India, and educated at Calcutta and in England at Cambridge University. His accomplishments were recognized in his election as president of the Indian Science Congress in 1927 and his being named a member of the International Committee on Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations. He also received many honors from scientific communities in Europe.

Bose attempted to demonstrate that the gap between living and nonliving matter was less distinct than normally supposed, and he claimed that even stones had some rate of life related to that of living organisms. In 1901 he demonstrated to the Royal Society in Britain that the responses of metals to poison and other stimuli resembled muscular response in living organisms.

In his delicate experiments with plant physiology, Bose anticipated the work of contemporary experimenters like Cleve Backster. As early as 1903 the Royal Society, London, published in their Philosophical Transactions Bose's reports of experiments with plants from which he concluded that "all the characteristics of the responses exhibited by the animal tissues, were also found in those of the plant." Bose devised sensitive apparatus to demonstrate plant reactions, many of which resembled nervous responses in animal or human life, and he even measured the electrical forces released in the death-spasms of vegetables. In 1917 Bose was knighted for his many valuable services to science. He died November 23, 1937.

From 1950 on, some of his experiments with plant sensitivity were extended by Dr. T. C. N. Singh of the Department of Botany, Annamalai University, India, who claimed that plants responded measurably to music and to prayer.

Sources:

Bose, J. C. Growth and Tropic Movements of Plants. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1929.

———. Motor Mechanisms of Plants. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1928.

———. The Nervous Mechanism of Plants. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1926.

———. The Physiology of the Ascent of Sap. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1923.

———. The Physiology of Photosynthesis. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1924.

———. Plant Autographs & Their Revelations. Washington, 1915.

———. Plant Response as a Means of Physiological Investigation. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1906.

———. Researches in Irritability of Plants. London/New York: Longmans Green and Co., 1913.

———. Response in the Living and Non-Living. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1902.

Geddes, Patrick. The Life and Work of Sir Jagadis C. Bose. London/New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1920.

Boston Society For Psychic Research

Founded in May 1925 by Elwood Worcester, William McDougall, Lydia W. Allison, and Walter Franklin Prince. Worcester, a distinguished Episcopal minister and founder of the healing movement in that church, served as the first president. Prince, having resigned as research officer of the American Society for Psychical Research, became the new society's research officer. Allison oversaw the publications program. The occasion for the break was the ASPR's strong advocacy of the mediumship of Mina S. Crandon ("Margery"). Under Prince's direction, the Boston Society carried on an active research program, the results of which were published in a set of books and a series of bulletins.

After the death of Walter Franklin Prince in 1934, the Boston SPR began to flounder, and because the issue that brought it into existence had faded in importance, it was formally reunited with the ASPR in 1941.

Sources:

Allison, Lydia W. Leonard and Soule Experiments in Psychical Research. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1929.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Prince, Walter F. The Case of Patience Worth: A Critical Study of Certain Unusual Phenomena. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1927.

———. Noted Witnesses for Psychic Occurrences. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Thomas, John F. Beyond Normal Cognition. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1937.

———. Case Studies Bearing on Survival. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1929.

Botanomancy

A method of divination by means of burning the branches of vervein and brier, upon which were carved the questions of the practitioner. Variant methods involved indications from scattering the leaves of vervein or heather in a high wind. (See also halomancy)

Bottazzi, Filippo (1867–1941)

Professor of physiology and director of the Physiological Institute at the University of Naples where his work in physiology was distinguished by its close relationship to biological and physical chemistry. Bottazzi was born in Apulia, Italy, on December 23, 1867. He received his higher education in Rome, becoming an M.D. in 1893. He began his distinguished career as an assistant in physiology at the Institute of Higher, Practical, and Postgraduate studies of Florence (now the University of Florence).

Bottazzi became a member of the pioneer Italian psychic research organization, Societa di Studi Psichici, founded in 1901. Bottazzi held sittings with the famous medium Eusapia Palladino in 1907. The manifestations, witnessed in the presence of professors De Amicis, Scarpa, and Pansini, were controlled by instruments. Bottazzi became convinced of the reality of the physical phenomena and declared, "The certitude we have acquired is of the same order as that which we attain from the study of chemical, physical or physiological facts." Two years later, he published his findings in Fenomeni Medianici.

In Botazzi's later years he taught the history of science at Cambridge University and went on to do numerous studies on Leonardo da Vinci until his death on December 19, 1941 in Diso, Italy.

Sources:

Gillispie, Charles Goulston, ed. Dictionary of Scientific Biography. 16 vols. New York: Scribner, 1970–80.

Bottle Imps

A class of German spirits similar in many ways to familiars. The following is a paraphrase of the prescription in an old manuscript in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, England (MS. Ashmole 1406), for the purpose of securing one of these fairies:

"First, take a broad square crystal or Venetian glass, about three inches in breadth and length. Lay it in the blood of a white hen on three Wednesdays or three Fridays. Then take it and wash it with holy water and fumigate it. Then take three hazel sticks a year old; take the bark off them; make them long enough to write on them the name of the fairy or spirit whom you may desire three times on each stick, which must be flat on one side. Bury them under some hill haunted by fairies on the Wednesday before you call her; and on the Friday following dig them out, and call her at eight, or three, or ten o'clock, which are good times for this purpose. In order to do so successfully one must be pure, and face toward the East. When you get her, tie her to the glass."

Bourru

French monkish apparition spoken of in many tales as that of an imaginary phantom which appears to the Parisians, walking the streets in the darkest hours of the night, and glancing in at the windows of timid folk—passing and repassing a number of times. Nurses used to frighten small children with the Monk Bourru. The origin of the specter is unknown.

Boursnell, Richard (1832–1909)

British spirit photographer who is supposed to have obtained psychic markings on his plates as early as 1851, but when accused by his partner of spoiling the plates, he stopped taking photographs himself until 40 years later. A repetition of the same annoyance then occurred. W. T. Stead, a journalist interested in psychic subjects, claimed that the markings were psychic and prevailed upon Boursnell to sit for spirit photographs. He was strikingly successful, and in 1903 the Spiritualists of London presented him with a signed testimonial and a purse of gold as a mark of their high esteem. A spirit photography exhibition of 100 chosen photographs was displayed in the rooms of the Psychological Society at Portman Square. Eighty-nine negatives taken by Boursnell in conjunction with S. W. Woolley between 1897–1907 were preserved at the British College of Psychic Science.

Like almost every person engaged in a form of psychic photography, Boursnell was accused of fraud. William Usborne Moore wrote in Glimpses of the Next State (1911) that he provided complete proof of a fraudulent production to the London Spiritualist Alliance. Duplicates, triplicates, and quadruplicates of Boursnell's spirit pictures were numerous. A tracing could be made from one form in one photograph to the form in another, and not the slightest difference in detail could be discovered. Nevertheless, Admiral Moore believed that Boursnell had genuine powers and was an excellent clairvoyant, for Boursnell repeatedly described the spirit forms before he made an exposure, and the extra on the plate completely corresponded with his description. However, this is hardly satisfactory as proof, since Boursnell could have been describing extra spirit forms already prepared.

Bowditch, H(enry) P(ickering) (1840–1911)

Physiologist who studied in Europe under Claude Bernard and Jean Charcot. He had an outstanding career as a professor of physiology at Harvard University Medical School and served from 1883 to 1893 as the school's dean. He also became a founding member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and a friend of William James and Richard Hodgson.

Bowditch was born April 9, 1840, in Boston, Massachusetts, and studied at Harvard University (B.A., 1861; M.A., 1866; M.D., 1868). His education was interrupted by the Civil War, during which he rose to the rank of major with the Massachusetts Volunteer Cavalry (1861–65). He contributed many papers to medical and scholarly journals and published Hints for Teachers of Physiology (1899; 1904).He died on March 13, 1911.

Sources:

Gillispie, Charles Goulston, ed. Dictionary of Scientific Biography. 16 vols. New York: Scribner, 1970–80.

Boxhorn, Mark Zuerius (1612–1653)

A celebrated Dutch historian and philologist born at Bergen-op-Zoom. His Oratio de Somniis (Treatise on Dreams) (Leyden, 1639) is of great rarity.

Bozzano, Ernesto (1862–1943)

The dean of Italian psychic researchers and Spiritualists during the formative years of psychic research. His attention was first directed to psychic phenomena in 1891 by Prof. Theodore Ribot, who forwarded to him the first number of the Annales des Sciences Psychique. He accompanied Profs. Enrico Morselli and Porro at many sittings with Eusapia Palladino and ended by accepting the spiritualistic hypothesis and by becoming a most prolific writer on psychic subjects. He wrote over two dozen books and contributed, for a period of 30 years, hundreds of articles to the Luce e Ombra and the Revue spirite. His psychic library at Savona was believed to be unique.

He summarized his belief:

"Whoever, instead of losing himself in idle discussions, undertakes systematic and deep researches in metaphysical phenomena, and who perseveres in them for long years, accumulating immense material in happenings and applying to these the methods of scientific inquiry, must, without fail, end by convincing himself that metaphysical phenomena constitute an admirable assemblage of proofs, all converging as to a centre toward the rigorously scientific demonstration of the existence and of the survival of the Spirit. This is my firm conviction, and I do not doubt that time will show that I am right."

Having accepted the Spiritualist explanation of mediumship, Bozzano was looked upon by his English contemporaries as much too uncritical. In 1930 Theodore Besterman wrote a scathing criticism of Bozzano's reports of sittings in his home. (Besterman's article led Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle to resign from the Society for Psychical Research.) In retrospect, however, his methodology of gathering numerous reports of sittings and subjecting them to comparative analysis has been more fully understood and appreciated.

Bozzano's pioneer researches have not been fully recognized outside Europe, because most of his many books have not been translated into English. Among the few available to English-speaking readers are Animism and Spiritism (1932), Polyglot

Mediumship (1932), and Discarnate Influence in Human Life (1938). Bozzano also contributed a preface and articles to Modern Psychic Mysteries by Gwendolyn K. Hack (1929).

Sources:

Alvarado, C. S. "The Life and Work of an Italian Psychical Researcher; A Review of Ernesto Bozzano: La Vite a l'Opera by Giovanni Iannuzzo." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 81 (1987): 37.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bozzano, Ernesto. Polyglot Mediumship. London: Rider, 1932.

Bracesco, Giovanni (ca. 1550)

A physician, prior, and alchemist of Brescia, Italy, who flourished in the sixteenth century. He gave much study to the Hermetic philosophy, and commented upon the work of the Arab alchemist Geber. His publications include The Tree of Life, a dissertation upon the uses of the Philosophers' stone in medicine, published in Rome in 1542.

Bradlaugh, Charles (1833–1891)

Bradlaugh was an English Spiritualist, freethinker, and political agitator. Bradlaugh was born to a poor clerk in London on September 26, 1833. From 1850 to 1853 he served as an army private in Ireland. At the same time he taught himself languages and law. Becoming a prominent member of the Committee of the London Dialectical Society, he was appointed in 1869 to investigate the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism. He served on subcommittee No. 5, which held séances with the celebrated medium Daniel D. Home at which the phenomena were not all satisfactory. Bradlaugh therefore signed a minority report, containing a careful and critical treatment of the evidence. The Report on Spiritualism of the Committee of the London Dialectical Society, first published in London in 1871 and reissued in 1873, is something of a landmark in the development of enlightened interest in Spiritualism and psychical phenomena, and in standards of evidence.

Bradlaugh's association with the investigation of Spiritualist phenomena is noteworthy because of his reputation as a freethinker and atheist. His atheism and his political convictions were based on eighteenth century individualism.His associate in the cause of Freethought and birth control was Annie Besant, who later became the president of the Theosophical Society.

Born September 26, 1833, Bradlaugh early on became a disciple of Richard Carlile. By 1853 Bradlaugh was a lawyer's clerk and began to lecture and write in the cause of freethought under the name "Iconoclast." From 1860 onward he published the National Reformer, which the government prosecuted for alleged sedition and blasphemy. In 1874 Besant became coeditor of the paper. The Bristol publisher of Bradlaugh's Fruits of Philosophy (concerned with birth control) was prosecuted in 1876 for indecency, and the pamphlet was suppressed. However, Bradlaugh and Besant boldly republished it in the cause of liberty of thought and were both convicted and sentenced, although the indictment was ultimately quashed on a technicality.

From 1885 onward Besant moved away from Bradlaugh and his ideas into socialism and labor agitation and, as a pupil of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, into Theosophy.

Bradlaugh was elected to Parliament as an advanced radical in 1880 but was unseated after refusing to take the Parliamentary oath, because it invoked God. He was successively unseated and reelected, until he eventually took his seat in 1886 because of the passage of Bradlaugh's Affirmation Bill of 1888. Arrogant, dogmatic, but courageous in the cause of freedom of thought and speech, he was a great natural leader in the radical causes of his time. He died January 30, 1891.

Sources:

Autobiography of Mr. Bradlaugh: A Page of His Life. London: Watts, 1873.

Besant, Annie. Charles Bradlaugh: A Character Sketch. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1941.

Bonner, Hypatia Bradlaugh, and J. M. Robertson. Charles Bradlaugh: His Life and Work. London, 1898.

Chandrasekhar, Sripati. "A Dirty Filthy Book." Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981.

Manvell, Roger. The Trial of Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh. London: Elek/Pemberton, 1976.

Bradley, Donald A. (1925–1974)

Early scientific researcher in astrology. Bradley was born in Nebraska on May 16, 1925. He emerged as a professional astrologer in the years immediately after World War II. He is most noted as an advocate of the fixed, or sidereal, zodiac, which had been championed by Irish astrologer Cyril Fagan in a 1950 book, Zodiacs Old and New. The argument over the sidereal zodiac was basically about the adjustment of the horoscope chart to reflect the "procession of the equinoxes." The tropical, or moving, zodiac begins each year at the point where the sun is located at the spring equinox. However, that position changes slightly each year. Thus the divisions of the zodiac no longer reflect the actual position of the constellations in the heavens. The sidereal zodiac retains the actual position of the 12 signs.

Had Bradley merely been a champion of Fagan's unfashionable ideas, he would not be remembered today. However, he became the director of the Llewellyn Foundation for Astrological Research and in the later 1940s conducted statistical studies that anticipated the work of Françoise and Michel Gauquelin. Most notable was the astrological analysis of 2,492 clergymen. His research was published in a series of publications beginning in 1950.

In his later years Bradley wrote several books under the name Garth Allen. He eventually became the editor of American Astrology, a position he held at the time of his death from cancer in Tucson, Arizona, on April 25, 1974.

Sources:

Allen, Garth [Donald Bradley]. Taking the Kid Gloves Off Astrology. Tucson, Ariz.: Clancy Publications, 1975.

Bradley, Donald A. Picking Winners. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1954.

———. Profession and Birthdate. Los Angeles: Llewellyn Publications, 1950.

———. Stock Market Predictions. Los Angeles: Llewellyn Foundation for Astrological Research, 1950.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Bradley, H(erbert) Dennis (1878–1934)

British author who wrote in support of Spiritualism and psychic phenomena. He was also a direct voice medium, an ability he claimed he developed after his experiences with the medium George Valiantine in America.

The story of his first sittings and Valiantine's first visit to England is told in Bradley's book, Towards the Stars (1924). His second volume, The Wisdom of the Gods (1925), narrates Valiantine's second visit and gives an account of the author's own séances, at which many prominent people attended. He was approached by the Society for Psychical Research (SPR; London) for test sittings, but, on the advice of his controls, he refused. Later Bradley declared open enmity to the SPR, resigned his membership, and in March 1931 issued a pamphlet of indictment.

Bradley was the greatest propagandist and champion of Valiantine's mediumship. He cleared the medium of three exposure charges, only to launch the most serious accusation himself in And After, published in October 1931. As a result, R. Sproull took action for libel against the author, obtained a judgment with £500 damages, and the book was withdrawn after July 1932. By now, Bradley's own enthusiasm had considerably abated. In an interview to the London*Daily Express* on October 8, 1931, he declared that the general tendency of Spiritualism in its present public form was toward evil, that as a religion it was a farce, and that, nevertheless, "genuine phenomena do occur and genuine communication with spirit entities is, in certain cases, possible and practicable." Bradley died November 20, 1934.

Bradley, Marion Zimmer (1930–1999)

Marion Zimmer Bradley, popular writer of fantasy fiction with occult themes, was born on June 3, 1930, in Albany, New York. Her literary skills manifested in her childhood, and at the age of 11 she founded an alternative school newspaper. The choice of themes in her works was heavily influenced by her early interests in magic, mythology, and Arthurian legends. She attended the New York State Teachers College for three years, during which time she married Robert A. Bradley (1949). The Bradleys moved to Texas, where he worked on the railroad and she bore their first child. She also joined the AMORC Rosicrucians, from whom she received her initial occult training.

Bradley began her serious writing during the early 1950s. She published a few pieces of short fiction and finally in 1955, her first novel, Seven from the Stars, appeared. In 1959 she separated from her husband and moved to Abilene, Texas, where she finished college at Hardin Simmons University. By the time she graduated, her novels were selling so well that she was able to become a full-time author. In 1963 she moved to Berkeley, California. The following year she divorced her husband and married Walter Breen. In 1963, Breen had been consecrated as a bishop in the Evangelical Catholic Communion, an independent liturgical church, in which he was named Bishop of Berkeley. Bradley and Breen joined in the formation of a new occult group, the Aquarian Order of the Restoration, dedicated to restoring worship to the Goddess. The group, which at its height had less than 20 members, continued until 1982.

In the late 1970s Bradley joined with a number of other women in the Bay Area to form what became known as The Dark Circle. Though primarily a women's group and not a witchcraft coven, it did include Wiccans among its members. Bradley withdrew after several years, but her participation fueled speculation that she was a Wiccan, a fact that she vehemently denied. Speculation peaked following the publication of her most successful book, The Mists of Avalon (1983), a retelling of the King Arthur legend from a feminist perspective. It has appeared on many Pagan reading lists and reviewers suggested that much of it must have come by way of channeling. In response, Bradley asserted her Christian beliefs (though of a somewhat feminist and unorthodox variety), and the lack of any channeled material in her work. She also believed that a return to an agricultural religion in an age of high technology did not make sense.

Bradley emerged at the top of her profession in the 1990s. In 1988 she launched a periodical, Marion Zimmer Bradley's Fantasy Magazine. She continued to write bestselling novels known for featuring strong women characters; edited an annual anthology, Sword and Sorceress; and left several unfinished manuscripts in the works at the time of her death in Berkeley on September 25, 1999.

Sources:

Bradley, Marion Zimmer. Lady of Avalon. New York: Viking, 1997.

———. Mists of Avalon. New York: Del Rey, 1983, 1987.

Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Bragadini, Mark Antony (d. 1595)

A sixteenth-century alchemist of Venice, who was beheaded in 1595 because he boasted he had made gold from a recipe that he had received from a demon. He was tried at Munich, by order of Duke William II. Two black dogs that accompanied him were also arrested, charged with being familiars, and duly tried. They were shot with an arquebuse (portable "hook-gun") in the public square.

The Brahan Seer

Sixteenth- or seventeenth-century Scottish seer named Coinneach Odhar (Kenneth Mackenzie). Although Coinneach Odhar is still spoken of and believed in as a seer throughout the Highlands of Scotland, and especially in the county of Ross and Cromarty, his reputation is of comparatively recent growth.

The first literary reference to him was made by Hugh Miller in his Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland (1834). About half a century later, a collection of the seer's predictions was published by Alexander Mackenzie of Inverness, the author of several clan histories. Many of these alleged foretellings are of a trivial character. The most important prophecies attributed to Coinneach (Kenneth) are those that refer to the house of Seaforth Mackenzies.

One, which dates to the middle of the seventeenth century, foretold that the last of the Seaforths would be deaf. It was uttered at Brahan Castle, the chief seat of the Seaforths, near Dingwall, after the seer had been condemned to death by Lady Seaforth for some offensive remark. He declared to her ladyship that he would go to heaven, but she would never reach it. As a sign of this he declared that when he was burned, a raven and a dove would hasten toward his ashes. If the dove was the first to arrive it would be proved his hope was well founded.

Notably, the same legend is attached to the memory of Michael Scott. According to tradition, Kenneth was burned on Chanonry Point, near Fortrose, although no record survives of this event.

The first authentic evidence regarding the alleged seer was unearthed by William M. Mackenzie, editor of Barbour's Bruce, who found among the Scottish parliamentary records of the sixteenth century an order, which was sent to the Ross-shire authorities, to prosecute several wizards, including Coinneach Odhar. This was many years before there was a Seaforth.

It is quite probable that Kenneth was burned, but the legendary cause of the tale must have been a "filling in" of late tradition. Kenneth's memory apparently had attached to it many floating prophecies and sayings, including those attributed to Thomas and Michael Scott. The sayings of "True Thomas" were hawked through the Highlands in Gaelic chapbooks, and so strongly did the bard appeal to the imaginations of the eighteenth-century folk of Inverness, that they associate him with the Fairies and Fingalians (Fians) of the local fairy mound, Tom-na-hurich.

A Gaelic saying runs, "When the horn is blown, True Thomas will come forth." Thomas took the place of Fingal (Finn or Fionn) as chief of the "Seven Sleepers" in Tom-na-hurich, Inverness. At Cromarty, which was once destroyed by the sea, Thomas is alleged to have foretold that it would be thrice destroyed.

Of course, the Rhymer was never in Cromarty and probably knew nothing about it. As he supplanted Fingal and Inverness, so at Cromarty he appears to have supplanted some other legendary individual. The only authentic historical fact that remains is that Coinneach Odhar was a notorious wizard of mature years in the middle of the sixteenth century. Wizards were not necessarily seers. It is significant that no reference is made to Kenneth in the letters received by Pepys from Lord Reay regarding second sight in the seventeenth century, or in the account of Dr. Johnson's Highland tour, although the learned doctor investigated the problem sympathetically.

There is little support for the "Brahan Seer" legends, especially when it is found that Kenneth died before the Seaforth branch of the Mackenzies came into existence. Whoever foretold the fall of that house, it was certainly not the "notorious wizard" of the Scottish parliamentary records.

No doubt Kenneth made himself notorious by tyrannizing over a superstitious people in the sixteenth century and was remembered on that account. During his lifetime he must have been credited with many happenings supposed to have been caused by his spells. After his death his reputation for prophecy and piety snowballed through folklore, a not unfamiliar happening in the history of the Scottish Highlands, where Sir William Wallace, St. Patrick, St. Bean, and others were reputed to have been giants who flung glaciated boulders from hilltop to hilltop across wide glens and lochs.

One interesting aspect of the claimed visionary powers of the Brahan Seer is that he was said to use a white or blue stone in which he saw distant or future events, as in crystal gazing.

Sources:

MacGregor, Alexander. Highland Superstitions. Eneas Mackay, 1901.

———. The Prophecies of the Brahan Seer. Inverness, 1896. Reprint, London: Constable, 1977.

Miller, Hugh. Scenes and Legends in the North of Scotland. Nimmo, 1834.

Sutherland, Elizabeth. Ravens and Black Rain. London: Constable, 1985.

Brahe, Tycho (1546–1601)

Tycho Brahe, sixteenth-century Danish astronomer and astrologer, was born on December 14, 1546, in the town of Skane, Denmark (now Sweden) into a noble family. He received a fine education at the Universities of Copenhagen and Leipzig, and because of his status in life was able to further his studies at other schools in Germany and Switzerland. By the time of his return to Denmark in 1570 he had begun studies in astronomy and alchemy. Astronomy was still in a rather primitive state, and Brahe saw the need of improving the standards of accurate observation. The king of Denmark funded a new observatory, named Uraniborg, on the island of Hven.

Brahe made notable advances during his two decades at Hven. He published several books (some published on his own printing press), designed new instruments for measuring the movement of the various heavenly bodies, and trained a new generation of astronomers. He instituted the regular continuous observation of the planets, making note of a number of anomalies in their orbits. Then in 1597, he had a falling-out with the king and he packed up his possessions and left the country. While disrupting his life, it was a fortuitous move and he eventually settled in Prague, where he would live the rest of his life. There he hired a young assistant named Johannes Kepler who would take the calculations Brahe had made and determined that the planetary orbits were elliptical, not circular. Taken together, the work of Brahe and Kepler did much to destroy the older earth-centered view of the solar system and facilitate the transition to the heliocentric (sun-centered) view.

What is often forgotten, or simply ignored by historians of science, was that Brahe was also a mundane astrologer. Mundane astrology studies the charts of nations that are read much as are charts of individuals. Among the events of most interest to mundane astrologers are comets, and Brahe is remembered for his very accurate observations of the comet of 1577, an enigma of some importance in understanding the fate of Denmark, but which also contributed to the destruction of the Aristotelian idea of heavenly spheres. Brahe also did work on the relationship of natural disasters and planetary conjunctions (when two planets come very close to each other in the heavens). This work led to his preliminary understanding of aspects, key angular relations (0, 60, 90, 120, and 180 degrees) between planets as observed from the Earth, at the time still an important part of astronomy. Astronomers tended to focus their observations of planets to evenings when they reached an important aspect. Kepler would take Brahes' observations and develop the comprehensive theory of aspects that is now commonly used in astrological chart interpretation.

Brahe died on October 21, 1601, in Prague.

Sources:

Dreyer, J. L. E. Tycho Brahe: A Picture of Scientific Life and Work in the Sixteenth Century. Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black, 1890.

Kitson, Annabella, ed. History and Astrology: Clio and Urania Confer. London: Mandala, 1989.

Thoren, Victor E. The Lord of Uraniborg: A Biography of Tycho Brahe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Braid, James (1795?–1860)

Scottish surgeon who originated the word "hypnosis" following his investigations into the phenomena of mesmerism. He was born at Rylaw House, in Fifeshire, Scotland, about 1795. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, apprenticed to a doctor in Leith, then became member of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh (M.R.C.S.E.). He became surgeon to coal miners in Lanarkshire, then practiced with a doctor in Dumfries. Here Braid assisted a man injured in a stagecoach accident who persuaded him to move to Manchester, where Braid distinguished himself for his medical skill.

In 1841 he attended a lecture on animal magnetism given by Charles Lafontaine. Braid began his own experiments becuse he suspected that the subject was illusory or a matter of collusion between operator and subject. He soon believed in the reality of the mesmeric state but concluded that it did not arise from any "magnetic influence" passing from operator to subject. Braid found that an abnormal condition of sleep or suggestibility could be induced by the subject concentrating the gaze on an inanimate object. He designated this condition "neuro-hypnotism," a term later shortened to hypnotism. He delivered his paper, "A Practical Essay on the Curative Agency of Neuro-hypnotism," to the British Association at Manchester on July 29, 1842. He used hypnotism to produce anesthesia in some of his surgical patients.

Braid's findings and his writings were translated into French and German. Braid died March 25, 1860, in Manchester.

Sources:

Braid, James. Observations on J. C. Colquhoun's History of "Magic, Witchcraft, and Animal Magnetism." Manchester, England: J. T. Parkes, 1852.

———. Neurypnology: or, The Rationale of Nervous Sleep. London: J. Churchill, 1843; 1899. New York: Arno Press, 1976.

———. Observations on the Nature and Treatment of Certain Forms of Paralysis. London: T. Richards, 1855.

———. Observations on Trance; or, Human Hibernation. London: J. Churchill 1850.

———. The Physiology of Fascination, and the Critics Criticised. Manchester, England: Grant and Co., 1855.

———. The Power of the Mind Over the Body. 1846.

Brain/Mind Bulletin See New Sense

Bram Stoker Club

In 1986 the Bram Stoker Society in Dublin, Ireland, reorganized as a club affiliated with the Philosophical Society of Trinity College, Dublin. Since Bram Stoker, the author of the novel Dracula, was at one time president of the Philosophical Society, the affiliation of the two societies seemed a natural fit.

The inauguration of the club occasioned the opening of the Bram Stoker Archives, which included the Leslie Shepard collection of Bram Stoker first editions, autographed material, related literature, and other memorabilia. Housed in the Graduates Memorial Building at Trinity College, the archives were open to the general public. With the Philosophical Society unable to maintain proper security of the Leslie Shepard collection, the exhibit suffered some disorganization, so Shepard withdrew his materials in 1988, pending availability of a safer permanent venue.

Membership of the Bram Stoker Club, which is open to the general public, involved associate membership of the Philosophical Society. Members receive the club's newsletters and may participate in club activities, including lectures on themes related to Bram Stoker and Irish supernatural literature, the showing of rare Gothic films, and the promoting of public recognition of Bram Stoker and his work.

After the disruption concerning the archives, the Bram Stoker Society reemerged as the parent body of the Bram Stoker Club. The club may be contacted c/o David Lass, Hon. Secretary, Regent House, Trinity College, Dublin 2, Ireland.

The Bram Stoker Society

An organization to encourage the study, appreciation, and presentation of the work of Bram Stoker in his own country, to maintain friendly relations with the Dracula Society and similar organizations on matters of common interest, to facilitate research into the Irish associations of the Stoker family, to advise or promote tourist visits to locales associated with Bram Stoker and other Gothic novelists, to campaign for plaques to be placed on Irish sites associated with the Stoker family, to plan social events (such as lectures, film shows, and discussions) connected with Bram Stoker and related Irish authors, and to press for the establishment of a permanent Bram Stoker Museum in Dublin. The society was founded in 1980 by Leslie Shepard, the current chairman.

In 1983, through the efforts of the society, the Dublin Tourist Board erected a plaque at No. 30 Kildare St., Dublin, which was Bram Stoker's first independent address in 1871 after the birthplace at Fairview, Dublin, was sold. The unveiling was performed by Ann Stoker, granddaughter of the novelist; Ivan Stoker-Dixon, Stoker's grandnephew, also attended. In honor of the occasion, the National Library, Kildare Street, Dublin, opened an exhibition of Bram Stoker books and other materials.

The society suspended its independent status in 1986 and reorganized as the Bram Stoker Club of the Philosophical Society, Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland. Since Bram Stoker himself had served as president of the Philosophical Society at Trinity College, the affiliation seemed appropriate and was marked by the inauguration of the Bram Stoker Archives at Trinity College. This exhibition in the Graduates Memorial Building displayed the Leslie Shepard collection of Bram Stoker first editions, autographed material, related literature, and other memorabilia and was open to the general public.

It was intended to be a permanent exhibition, but the Philosophical Society was unable to provide proper security, and after the collection suffered some disorganization, it was withdrawn by Leslie Shepard, pending the availability of a safer permanent venue.

Certain items from Leslie Shepard's collection were subsequently donated to the Dublin Writers Museum on a long-term loan basis, where they may be viewed by the public. The Bram Stoker Society then reemerged as the international body to which the Bram Stoker Club in Trinity College is affiliated. Since 1991 the society has cosponsored the Bram Stoker International Summer School for a weekend each June. The school is held at Clontarf, Dublin, near Stoker's birthplace. The society may be contacted c/o David Lass, Hon. Secretary, Regent House, Trinity College, Dublin 2, Ireland. It publishes a monthly newsletter and annual journal.

Sources:

Shepard, Les. The Dracula Book of Great Vampire Stories. New York: Citadel Press, 1981.

Bray, Charles (1811–1884)

British philosopher and author born in Coventry, England, on January 31, 1811. His father was a ribbon manufacturer and he too learned the trade, taking over the business in 1835. As a young man he became interested in many social issues and established an infants' school in one of Coventry's poorest neighborhoods. At that time he also began writing.

Bray wrote The Philosophy of Necessity (1841) and several volumes touching on Spiritualist/occult themes. In On Force, its Mental and Moral Correlates; and on that which is Supposed to Underlie All Phenomena; with Speculations on Spiritualism, and other Abnormal Conditions of Mind (1866), Bray postulated that the force which produced the phenomena of Spiritualism is "an emanation from all brains, the medium increasing its density so as to allow others present to come into communion with it; and the intelligence new to every one present is that of some brain in the distance acting through this source upon the mind of the medium, or others of the circle." He also spoke of "a mental or thought atmosphere the result of cerebration, but devoid of consciousness till it becomes reflected in our own organisations." In The Science of Man (1868), he dealt with the occult powers of man.

A few weeks before his death on October 5, 1884, he wrote as part of a postscript to Phases of Opinion and Experience, "For fifty years and more I have been an unbiassed and an unprejudiced seeker after truth, and the opinions I have come to however different from those usually held, I am not now, at the last hour, disposed to change. They have done to live by, they will do to die by."

BRAZIL

Brazil has always been a vast melting-pot of various Spiritist and psychic traditions, from the shamanistic magic of the original Tupi Indians, to the mixture of the beliefs of many different African tribes brought to Brazil as slaves by Portuguese settlers, to the French Spiritism that developed from circulation of the works of Allan Kardec in the nineteenth century.

Through the twentieth century, there have been two main strands of occult religion in Brazil: the magical Afro-Brazilian groups, Umbanda and Macumba, both analogous to Haitian voudou, and Kardec-style Spiritism. Both have possession by spirits as central to their practice. Brazil is officially a Roman Catholic country. Still it is estimated that there are nearly four million people following these various alternative religions, many continuing to regard themselves as nominal Catholics. The complex interchange of religious and cultural traditions over the centuries makes precise distinctions difficult, since many nominally non-Christian blacks incorporate the figure of Jesus into tribal magic, while many Christians have fused tribal magic with Catholicism.

One of the most striking developments of the last few decades has been the emergence of a form of psychic surgery in which it is claimed that psychic healers without medical training perform surgical operations, sometimes with their bare hands, or with such primitive instruments as old penknives.

The wounds, it is claimed, are paranormally closed and healed. Two of the most famous Brazilian psychic surgeons are Edivaldo Oliveira Silva and Jose Arigó, who performed thousands of operations. Although psychic surgery remains a controversial subject and there have been accusations of fraud, there is also strong evidence of genuine operations, endorsed by competent American and European investigators.

Psychic healing has flourished in Brazil, in spite of the fact that both the Roman Catholic Church and the medical society have brought lawsuits for witchcraft or for illegal practice of medicine. Many high officials believe in the efficacy of such healing, a fact illustrated by former Brazilian president Juscelino Kubitschek's bringing his daughter to Arigó for psychic healing. Arigó has also successfully treated statesmen, lawyers, scientists, and doctors from many countries.

A Brazilian of Italian parentage, Carlos Mirabelli, emerged in the 1920s and 1930s as the most remarkable physical medium in the world. Due to the Roman Catholic state, Mirabelli was brought to court 15 times to answer charges that were raised against him. Because of his extroverted behavior and ways that were considered wildly Bohemian, even Brazilian Spiritists often avoided him. Yet documentation of his remarkable gifts and the phenomena that surrounded him—he was reported to be able to literally light up a room as he glowed in the darkness of a seance—was respected by researchers and investigators worldwide.

In 1939, the São Paulo State Spiritist Federation was founded to provide information and assistance to those in need. It has 200 unpaid volunteers and deals with some 1000 individuals daily. In 1963, Hernani Guimàraes Andrade, a São Paulo engineer and civil servant, founded the Brazilian Institute for Psycho-Biophysical Research. Since then, the institute has collected many case histories, conducted research, and published theoretical papers. Unfortunately most of Andrade's writings have yet to be translated into English. Andrade has been joined by Waldo Vieira, who concentrated his study on out-of-the-body travel. Today, the Institutio de Pesquisas, Interdisciplinares das Areas, Fronteiricas ca Psicologia (Rua Vicente Jose de Almeida 226, Jardin Cupece-Sao Paulo/SP, CEP: 04652-140) is an active if not overwhelming presence in Brazil. The population at large remains hesitant to engage in practices so long associated with the superstitions of the uneducated, and the unorthodox practices of the Spiritists.

Sources:

Andrade, Hernani Guimàraes. A material psi. Matao: Clarim, 1972.

———. Novos rumos à experimentacao espiritica. São Paulo: Livraria Batuira, 1960.

———. Parapsicologia experimental. São Paulo: Calvario, 1967.

———. A teorià corpuscular do espirito. São Paulo: The Author, 1958.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fuller, John G. Arigó, Surgeon of the Rusty Knife. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1972. Reprint, London: Panther, 1975.

Kardec, Allan [H. L. D. Rivail]. The Book of Spirits. N.p., 1893.

Langguth, A. J. Macumba: White & Black Magic in Brazil. New York: Harper and Row, 1975.

McGregor, Pedro. Moon and Two Mountains. London, 1966.

Noah's Ark Society (Great Britain). "The Mediumship of Carlos Mirabelli." http://home.freeuk.net/noahsark/mirab.htm. June 6, 2000.

Playfair, Guy Lyon. The Flying Cow. London, 1975. Reprinted as The Unknown Power. New York: Pocket Books, 1975.

St. Clair, David. Drum and Candle. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Breathing

Traditional yoga practice is associated with mystical and psychic powers developed through special breathing techniques known as pranayama. According to Hindu teaching, there is a subtle vitality known as prana in the air that we breath, and management of prana has a special effect on the human organism in energizing the chakras, or subtle centers in the body associated with spiritual development and psychic side effects. Pranayama involves special techniques of breathing alternately with right and left nostrils, with a special period of retention. Other exercises involve rapid breathing.

In some instances, levitation is said to be achieved by breathing exercises. Baron Schrenck-Notzing recorded the case of a young man who thus levitated his own body 27 times. In his book Mysterious Psychic Forces (1907), Camille Flammarion stated: "The breathing seems to have a very great influence. In the way things take place it seems as if the sitters released by breathing an amount of motor energy comparable to that which they release when rapidly moving their limbs. There is something in this [that is] very curious and difficult to explain."

Hereward Carrington and other psychic researchers have often drawn attention to the so-called "lifting game," in which four persons lift a fifth by their fingertips, each of the four rapidly inhaling and exhaling in unison, then lifting the subject by a fingertip under each arm and leg. Sometimes the subject is seated on a chair to facilitate the positioning of fingertips.

Carrington tried the experiment on the platform of a large self-registering scale, and in The Story of Psychic Science (1930) commented:

"On the first lift the recorder stated that the needle on the dial had fallen to 660 lbs. (the combined weight was found previously to be 712 lbs.), a loss of 52 lbs. On the second lift there was an apparent loss of 52 lbs.; on the third lift of 60 lbs.; on the fourth lift of 60 lbs.; and on the fifth lift of 60 lbs. No gain of weight was at any time recorded (owing to the muscular exertion), invariably a loss, which, however, slowly returned to normal as the subject was held for some considerable time in the air. I have no theory to offer as to these observations, which I cannot fully explain."

However, modern commentators suggest that the apparent ease with which the subject is lifted by fingertips is related to the distribution of weight on several points, rather like the principle involved when a fakir lies on a bed of sharp nails without injuring himself. Carrington's method of measuring weight loss was too simple a procedure, ignoring such factors as sudden thrust exerted by the lifters.

The association of pranayama with levitation has been revived more recently by the special "siddhi" program of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, whose system derives from such standard Hindu texts as the Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali. Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, another modern Indian religious leader, also prescribed special breathing techniques for his followers, although these did not appear to have similar spectacular psychic results. They were more reminiscent of the techniques of the Western mystic Gurdjieff, whose followers often demonstrated remarkable physical control through special breathing.

Breathing techniques have effects on the human organism and contribute to some yogic feats, and also by the related systems of Japanese martial arts, especially kung-fu, where it is claimed that a subtle energy named ch'i (analagous to the Hindu prana) is accumulated, amplified, and directed by willpower to specific parts of the body, developing astonishing strength and resilience. This process is normally preceded by a sudden exhalation of breath, sometimes accompanied by a shout or yell. The intake of breath that follows appears to result in hyperventilation of the system, generating vitality that can be directed to hands, feet, or other parts of the body. Practitioners demonstrate the ability to break bricks, tiles, or heavy planks of wood with a bare hand.

It is interesting to note that special techniques of breathing associated with mystical and psychic development are common to many Asian countries, from India, to Tibet, China, and Japan. These all postulate that a subtle principle exists in the air, and a system of management of that principle occurs in the subtle centers of the body. Of course, traditional Indian yoga teachings present psychic feats as merely side effects of spiritual development, to be discarded for the higher goals of mysticism, and that advanced pranayama techniques, as well as the special physical positions of hatha yoga, should be preceded by strict preliminary practices of yama and niyama (moral observances and ethical restraints). Pranayama is said to begin spontaneously with the perfection of hatha yoga positions, and proper breathing facilitates the advanced techniques. Also with the development of pranayama, a mystical force known as kundalini is aroused and led from the lowest chakras to the highest, culminating in a mystical center in the head, conferring higher consciousness.

Sources:

Bernard, Theos. Hatha Yoga. London: Rider, 1950. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Chia, Mantak. Awaken Healing Energy through the Tao. New York: Aurora Press, 1983.

Dvivedi, M. N., trans. The Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1890.

Gopi Krishna. The Secret of Yoga. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Huard, Pierre, and Ming Wong. Oriental Methods of Mental and Physical Fitness: The Complete Book of Meditation, Kinesitherapy, and Martial Arts in China, India, and Japan. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1971.

Kuvalayananda, Swami. Pranayama. Bombay, India: Popular Prakashan, 1931.

Luk, Charles. The Secrets of Chinese Meditation. London: Rider, 1964.

———. Taoist Yoga: Alchemy and Immortality. London: Rider, 1970.

Prasad, Rama. The Science of Breath and the Philosophy of the Tattvas, Translated from the Sanskrit, with Introductory and Explanatory Essays on Nature's Finer Forces. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1889.

Ramacharaka, Yogi [William W. Atkinson]. The Hindu-Yogi Sciences of Breath. Chicago: Yogi Publication Society, 1904.

Van Lysebeth, Andre. Pranayama. London: Mandala Books, 1979.

Vishnudevananda, Swami. The Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga. New York: Julian Press, 1960. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1971.

Volin, Michael, and Nancy Phelan. Yoga Breathing. N.p.: Information Inc., 1966.

Brédif, C. (ca. nineteenth century)

Nineteenth-century French medium who was investigated by the famous astronomer Camille Flammarion, who reported that Brédif produced strange apparitions.

Brewster, Sir David (1781–1868)

Famous nineteenth-century scientist whose brief investigation of Spiritualism in 1855 led to bitter public acrimony. Brewster was born on December 11, 1781, in Jedburgh, Scotland. His formal education was as a divinity student at the University of Edinburgh, but while there, he maintained and interest in physical science which he had become interested in as a child. The controversy was sparked when Brewster attended a séance with a Lord Brougham in Cox's Hotel in Jermyn Street in London's West End. The medium was D. D. Home, to whom Brewster was introduced by Lord Brougham. Reportedly both were deeply impressed. Home subsequently wrote to a friend in America, describing the visit and stating that they were unable to account for the phenomena by natural means. The letter, published and commented upon in America, found its way into the London press. Sir David Brewster who, in the meantime, had had another séance at Ealing in the house of Mr. Rymer, a London solicitor, promptly wrote to the Morning Advertiser, forcefully disclaiming all belief in Spiritualism and ascribing all the phenomena to imposture. His letter ended: "I saw enough to satisfy myself that they could all be produced by human hands and feet."

A heated newspaper controversy arose. Edward W. Cox, sergeant-at-law, who was present at the séance, wrote to the Morning Advertiser, to contradict Brewster, and citing Brewster's expression of astonishment: "This upsets the philosophy of fifty years." When Brewster replied that he had not been allowed to look under the table, both Cox and the well-known author T. A. Trollope (brother of novelist Anthony Trollope) also present at the Ealing séance, contradicted him. Yet another statement, one by Benjamin Coleman, quoting Sir David Brewster's admission of the reality of the phenomena in private conversation, was published.

Brewster replied in an angry tone, gave a description of the sitting, and declared: "Rather than believe that spirits made the noise, I will conjecture that the raps were produced by Mr. Home's toes, and rather than believe that spirits raised the table, I will conjecture that it was done by the agency of Mr. Home's feet, which were always below it." He further said that the spirits were powerless above the table but were very active beneath a large round table with copious drapery, beneath which nobody was allowed to look. After describing how a handbell from the neighborhood of Mr. Home's feet came across and placed itself into his and afterward into Lord Brougham's hands, he concluded: "How these things were produced neither Lord Brougham nor I could say, but I conjecture that they may be produced by machinery attached to the lower extremities of Mr. Home."

Throughout this passionate controversy Lord Brougham preserved an inflexible silence. Brewster never appealed to him. D. D. Home, on the other hand, challenged Lord Brougham's testimony. This was half promised but not given. However, a conversation is recorded by Cox in his book The Mechanism of Man (1876), in which he claimed that Lord Brougham stated to him: "We were both perfectly satisfied at the time that it was no trick, and that some unknown power was in action." I said 'Well, Brewster, what do you think of it?' and he said only 'There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in our philosophy.' "Lord Brougham also declared that Brewster never told him that he had changed his opinion. The only reason why he himself did not pursue the investigation was that he was then deeply immersed in experiments in optical science and did not have the necessary leisure.

The late earl of Dunraven, in his preface to the original private edition of Lord Adare's records on his experiences with D. D. Home, expressed the belief that Brewster acted out of fear of ridicule. He wrote: "He was present at two séances of Mr. Home's where he stated as is affirmed on the written testimony of persons present, his impression that the phenomena were most striking and startling, and he does not appear then to have expressed any doubt of their genuineness, but he afterwards did so in an offensive manner. I mention this circumstance because I was so struck with what Sir David Brewster—with whom I was well acquainted—had himself told me, that it materially influenced me in determining to examine thoroughly into the reality of the phenomena."

In Home's Incidents in My Life (1863), Home wrote that Brewster treated certain of his scientific contemporaries even worse than he treated Home, claiming the credit for other people's inventions. Brewster threatened a libel action but despite Home enlarging the evidence in the second edition of his book, Brewster never carried out his threat.

The final word in this public debate was uttered in 1869 when The Home Life of Sir David Brewster was published, after his death in February 1868, by his daughter, Mrs. Gordon. A note is printed from the private diary of the scientist, which narrated the phenomena he witnessed in company with Lord Brougham:

"Last of all I went with Lord Brougham to a séance of the new spirit-rapper, Mr. Home, a lad of twenty, the son of a brother of the late Earl Home. He lives in Cox's Hotel, Jermyn Street; and Mr. Cox, who knows Lord Brougham, wished him to have a séance and his Lordship invited me to accompany him in order to assist in finding out the trick. We four sat down at a moderately-sized table, the structure of which we were invited to examine. In a short time the table shuddered, and a tremulous motion ran up all our arms; at our bidding these motions ceased and returned. The most unaccountable rappings were produced in various parts of the table; and the table actually rose from the ground when no hand was upon it. A larger table was produced and exhibited similar movements. A small hand-bell was then laid down with its mouth on the carpet: and, after lying for some time, it actually rang when nothing could have touched it. The bell was then placed on the other side, still upon the carpet, and it came over to me and placed itself in my hand. It did the same to Lord Brougham. These were the principal experiments. We could give no explanation of them and could not conjecture how they could be produced by any kind of mechanism."

The version from Brewster's posthumous book conflicts with his letter to the Morning Advertiser, in which Sir David expressly stated that the bell did not ring and that the table "appeared" to rise. A detailed comparison of the two statements reveals many other discrepancies. The Spectator stated in its review of Home's book, "The hero of science does not acquit himself as we could wish or expect."

There is no doubt that Brewster came out of the affair badly. He was guilty of misrepresentation when he refused to stand by his original puzzlement at the séance, and thereby was criticized for later contradicting himself. What he actually exclaimed at the time was typical of the last ditch materialist unable to believe his own senses: "Spirit is the last thing I will give in to!"

Briah

In the Kabala, Briah is the third of the three stages of spirit progress, the three original ranks or classes. Men are called upon to proceed from the lower to the higher. In the Apocalypse Briah is represented as the feet of "the mighty angel with the face of the sun."

Briccriu

An Ulster chieftain surnamed "of the Poisoned Tongue," mentioned in the myth of Cuchulain, a medieval Irish romance. It is said that on one occasion he asked certain warriors to a feast and raised the question which of them was the greatest. Conall, Laery, and Cuchulain were selected, and a demon called "The Terrible" was requested to decide the point. He suggested that whoever could cut off his (The Terrible's) head today, and allow his own head to be cut off on the following day would be the most courageous, and therefore must deserve the title of champion. Cuchulain succeeded in beheading the devil, who immediately picked up his head and vanished. The next day he reappeared in his usual form in order to cut off Cuchulain's head. On his placing his head on the block, the demon told him to rise, and acknowledged that he was champion of Ireland.

Bridge of Souls

The superstition that the souls of the dead crossed to the other world by means of a bridge is widely disseminated. Rev. S. Baring-Gould stated in A Book of Folklore (1913):

"As peoples became more civilised and thought more deeply of the mystery of death, they conceived of a place where the souls lived on, and being puzzled to account for the rainbow, came to the conclusion that it was a bridge by means of which spirits mounted to their abode above the clouds. The Milky Way was called variously the Road of the Gods or the Road of Souls. Among the Norsemen, after Odin had constructed his heavenly palace, aided by the dwarfs, he reared the bridge Bifrost, which men call the rainbow, by which it could be reached. It is of three colours; that in the middle is red, and is of fire, to consume any unworthy souls that would venture up the bridge. In connection with this idea of a bridge uniting heaven and earth, up which souls ascended, arose the custom of persons constructing bridges for the good souls of their kinsfolk. On runic grave-stones in Denmark and Sweden we find such inscriptions as these: 'Nageilfr had this bridge built for Anund, his good son.' 'The mother built the bridge for her only son.' 'Holdfast had the bridge constructed for Hame, his father, who lived in Viby.' 'Holdfast had the road made for Igul and for Ura, his dear wife.' At Sundbystein, in the Uplands, is an inscription showing that three brothers and sisters erected a bridge over a ford for their father.

"The bridge as a means of passage for the soul from this earth to eternity must have been known also to the Ancients for in the cult of Demeter, the goddess of Death, at Eleusis, where her mysteries were gone through, in order to pass at once after death into Elyisium, there was an order of Bridge priestesses; and the goddess bore the name of the Lady of the Bridge. In Rome also the priest was a bridge-builder pontifex, as he undertook the charge of souls. In Austria and parts of Germany it is still supposed that children's souls are led up the rainbow to heaven. Both in England and among the Chinese it is regarded as a sin to point with the finger at the bow. With us no trace of the idea that it is a Bridge of Souls remains. Probably this was thought to be a heathen belief and was accordingly forbidden, for children in the North of England to this day when a rainbow appears, make a cross on the ground with a couple of twigs or straws, 'to cross out the bow.' The West Riding recipe for driving away a rainbow is: 'Make a cross of two sticks and lay four pebbles on it, one at each end.'" (See also Brig of Dread)

Bridge to Spiritual Freedom

The Bridge to Spiritual Freedom is the first of a number of groups to emerge from the "I AM" Religious Activity that had been founded in the 1930s by Guy W. Ballard and his wife, Edna W. Ballard. Guy Ballard claimed to be in contact with a number of evolved beings he described as ascended masters, and he as their messenger regularly brought forth communications from them. However, Ballard died in 1939, only a few years after initiating the "I AM" Activity. In the several decades following his death, Edna Ballard did not function as a messenger, even though she had been designated as a messenger of the Masters, and some members of the organizations yearned for immediate fresh contact from the Ascended beings.

As early as 1944, Geraldine Innocente, a member of the "I AM" in New York, claimed that she had been contacted by the Ascended Master El Morya (the same master with whom Helena Petrovna Blavatsky had had special communication with in the 1880s). She prepared herself over the next seven years and formally began to operate as a messenger in 1951. She began to reproduce and circulate copies of these messages and found some initial response from those associated with the "I AM" sanctuaries in New York and Pennsylvania. She also sent copies of the messages to Edna Ballard at the "I AM" headquarters.

Ballard demanded that Innocente cease the circulation of unauthorized messages. When she refused, the break occurred and in the mid-1950s the Bridge to Freedom was created.

Innocente was from the Caribbean and among the issues in the break with the "I AM" was its refusal to allow the translation of the messages from the masters into other languages, Spanish in particular. Innocente had translated and circulated the messages from El Morya in Cuba and Puerto Rico.

In the Bridge to Freedom messages, El Morya operated under a pseudonym, Thomas Printz, and appears as such on Bridge literature to this day. Innocente died in 1961 and the role of messenger for El Morya and the masters was assumed by Lucy W. Littlejohn. She served in that capacity until 1989. Since that time the name of the current messenger has not been published. The beliefs and practices (including the use of the affirmative prayers called decrees) are similar to those found in the "I AM." The primary difference between the Bridge activity and the "I AM" is the presence of a messenger in immediate contact with the masters.

Among the early associates of Innocente was Florence K. Ekey, who headed an independent "I AM" center in Philadelphia that she called the Lighthouse to Freedom. Ekey would later become the sponsor of a young man whom she believed to be a genuine messenger of the masters named Mark Prophet. In 1959, Ekey was one of several people who resigned from the Bridge to Freedom and joined in the inauguration of the Summit Lighthouse, known today as the Church Universal and Triumphant.

The Bridge to Freedom became the New Age Church of the Christ in the 1980s but has most recently been named the Bridge to Spiritual Freedom (and not to be confused with the Bridge to Freedom, the program of advancement within the Church of Scientology). The messages received by the Bridge to Freedom have been compiled into books at various times (and still circulate among independent "I AM" groups), but are primarily released to the public through its periodicals, The Bridge to Spiritual Freedom Journal and the Shamballa Letter. The Bridge may be contacted at Box 333, Kings Park, NY 11754.

Sources:

Printz, Thomas [Ascended Master El Morya through Geraldine Innocente]. Memoirs of Beloved Mary, Mother of Jesus. Philadelphia: Bridge to Freedom, 1955.

———. The Seven Beloved Archangels Speak. Mt. Shasta, Calif.: Ascended Master Teaching Foundation, 1986.

Bridging Heaven and Earth

Bridging Heaven and Earth is national New Age television talk show that originates from the community access television station in Santa Barbara, California. Beginning as a local broadcast, it drew attention for the quality of its production and its ability to attract numerous national New Age leaders and personalities.

Bridging Heaven and Earth began in 1995 following a conversation in which Allen Silberhartz (1947–), his girlfriend Wistancia, and others who identified with New Age spirituality decided to create a television show that would offer an alternative to the common format being adopted by most national talk shows. It was felt that these shows tended to focus upon negative realities and the lowest side of human nature. They decided to create a show that would emphasize the potentials within humanity and express the sense of Oneness with which Silberhartz had lived since a profound mystical experience he had in the 1970s.

When the show went on the air in the fall of 1995, Silberhartz and Wistancia shared hosting duties. The show consisted of music, frequently folk music representing different ethnic communities, and interviews with one or more guests. Among the more prominent guests have been the Dalai Lama, Kevin Ryerson, Marianne Williamson, Buddhist actor Richard Gere, and Barbara Marx Hubbard. Silberhartz has hosted the show alone since 1997. When not hosting the show, Silberhartz is an investment counselor and an independent meditation and spiritual development teacher in Santa Barbara.

Bridging Heaven and Earth airs on Friday evenings at its home station, and tapes are distributed for airing at stations across the United States. Each show is an hour in length. The show has an Internet presence at http://www.heavenonearth.com/.

Sources:

Bridging Heaven and Earth. http://www.heavenonearth.com/. March 23, 2000.

Manville, Rhonda Parks. "Local Metaphysical Talk Show Resonates With Viewers." Santa Barbara News Press (March 7, 1999).

The Brig of Dread

There is an old belief, alluded to by Sir Walter Scott, that the soul, on leaving the body, has to pass over the brig of dread, a bridge as narrow as a thread, crossing a great gulf. If the soul succeeds in passing it he enters heaven; if he falls off, he is lost. (See also Bridge of Souls)

Briggs, K(atharine) M(ary) (1898–1980)

British folklorist, critic, novelist, former president of the Folklore Society, London, and expert on folk tales and fairy lore. She is best remembered for her many books on the folklore of the British Isles. Born November 8, 1898, in Hampstead, London, she studied at Lansdowne House, Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford University (M.A., Ph.D.). For fifteen years, she headed an amateur touring company, produced plays in the air force, and wrote and produced plays locally in Perthshire and Oxfordshire. During World War I, she served in the Women's Auxiliary Air Force, then became a free-lance writer. She was a member of the Bibliographical Society, the Historical Association, the American Folklore Society, and the English Folkdance and Song Society. In 1969, she was awarded a D.Litt. by Oxford University.

Her Dictionary of British Folktales in the English Language is widely regarded as a monumental scholarly achievement; her various works on fairy lore also established her as a preeminent scholar in this field. However, in spite of her encyclopedic knowledge of fairy lore and her enthusiasm for the subject, she did not believe in the reality of fairy life, stating specifically: "This is not an attempt to prove that fairies are real. . . . I am agnostic on the subject."

Briggs died October 15, 1980, in Kent, England.

Sources:

Briggs, Katherine. The Anatomy of Puck: An Examination of Fairy Beliefs among Shakespeare's Contemporaries and Successors. London: Routledge & Paul, 1959.

———. A Dictionary of British Folktales in the English Language. 4 vols. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970–71.

———. An Encyclopedia of Fairies: Hobgoblins, Brownies, Bogies, and Other Supernatural Creatures. New York: Pantheon Books, 1976.

———. The Fairies in English Tradition and Literature. 1967. Reprinted as The Fairies in Tradition and Literature. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1967.

———. Folktales of England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.

———. The Personnel of Fairyland: A Short Account of the Fairy People of Great Britain for Those Who Tell Stories to Children. 1953. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1971.

Brimstone

Pliny (ca. 23–79 C.E.) stated that houses were formerly hallowed against evil spirits by the use of brimstone.

Brinkley, Danion (1950–)

Danion Brinkley, a contemporary personality in the post-New Age community, has attained a level of fame as the result of his best-selling autobiography centered upon his near-death experiences, a dramatic narrative that rivals the account of psychiatrist George Richey in its impact. Brinkley grew up in the 1950s in South Carolina. He emerged in school as somewhat of a bully who was proud of his ability as a fighter. After high school he joined the Marines and was assigned to an intelligence unit in Cambodia and Laos. For a time he worked as an assassin. After his tour of duty, he retured to Aiken, South Carolina, where he entered into several business ventures.

Brinkley's life changed on September 17, 1975, when a bolt of lightning struck the telephone line as he was engaged in a conversation. He was electrocuted. His wife, Sandy, called an emergency unit, but on the way to the hospital, he was pronounced dead. He revived some 28 minutes later in the morgue. As he later recounts the story, he was initially thrown out of his body by the electrical jolt and saw the arrival of the CPR unit and their attempts to revive him in what was a classic out-of-the-body travel experience. However, as he was pronounced dead, he began a more spectacular adventure.

According to Brinkley's later account, he was whisked through a dark tunnel to an encounter with a spirit being and was taken into a crystal light city. He also was engaged in a review of his life and met with 13 angelic beings who told him of events that were to occur over the next quarter of a century. Included were the nuclear accident at Chernobyl, the Gulf War, and the economic crisis during the Bush administration. The lengthy recovery from the effects of the lightning wiped him out financially even as the near-death event profoundly affected his spiritual life.

A short time after returning home, he learned of the work of Raymond Moody on near-death experiences and made an effort to meet him on the occasion of Moody's delivering a lecture at the University of South Carolina. His meeting with Moody helped him deal with the trauma of his death and gain some perspective on his life. He also learned that many others had had similar experiences. Following the publication of Life after Life, the book that turned Moody into a celebrity figure, Brinkley went to work assisting him. During this time he discovered that he was also experiencing a psychic awakening.

In 1989 Brinkley had a second near-death experience when his heart gave out while he was sick with pneumonia. He again visited the crystal city. He was given a vision of a new direction in his life that resulted in his going to work in a hospice caring for and helping dying people. He published the story of his life in 1994 and has subsequently become a popular guest on radio and television talk shows, including multiple appearances on the popular late-night show hosted by Art Bell. He now lectures widely on the near-death experience, works with various forms of alternative medicine, and heads Compassion in Action, an organization to train volunteers to assist the dying founded in 1997.

Sources:

Brinkley, Danion. At Peace in the Light. New York: Harper, 1996.

———, with Paul Perry. Saved by the Light. New York: Villard Books, 1994.

Brisin

An enchantress who figures in the Arthurian romance Morte d'Arthur. She played an important part in the annunciation of Galahad and the allurement of Lancelot. (See also King Arthur)

British College of Psychic Science

An institution founded in April 1920 in London by Mr. and Mrs. Hewat McKenzie to work on lines similar to the Institut Métapsychique in Paris. They spared neither time nor expense in their effort to collect evidence for genuine phenomena and to spread the knowledge by means of the college. After Mr. McKenzie's death in 1929, Mrs. McKenzie took charge, but in 1930 she relinquished her post, and Mrs. Champion de Crespigny was elected honorary principal.

From 1922 to 1939 the college published Quarterly Transactions, subsequently titled Psychic Science until 1945, after which it appeared briefly as Experimental Metaphysics. In December 1938 the college amalgamated with the International Institute for Psychical Research, becoming the Institute for Experimental Metaphysics. During World War II, the society languished and eventually closed in 1947, and its excellent library and records were dispersed or destroyed.

When McKenzie founded the college, the London Spiritualist Alliance was already in existence but McKenzie's college had broader aims in providing a center for information, advice, and guidance, where psychic mediums of good reputation could be consulted, and where scientific research into psychic phenomena could take place. After World War II the London Spiritualist Alliance broadened its own aims on similar lines to the college, and in 1955 reorganized under the new name of College of Psychic Studies.

The British & Irish Skeptic (Newsletter) See The Skeptic

British Journal of Psychical Research

Established in 1926 as the official organ of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research in London, England, the journal appeared every two months, replaced in the following year by Proceedings and later by Bulletins. No longer active.

British National Association of Spiritualists

A society formed in 1873 mainly through the instrumentality of Dawson Rogers to promote the interests of Spiritualism in Great Britain. The British National Association of Spiritualists (BNAS) numbered among its original vice-presidents and members of council the most prominent Spiritualists of the day—Benjamin Coleman, Mrs. Macdougall Gregory, Sir Charles Isham, Mr. Jacken, Dawson Rogers, Morell Theobald, Dr. Wyld, Dr. Stanhope Speer, and many others. Many eminent people of other countries joined the association as corresponding members.

In 1882 BNAS changed its name to the Central Association of Spiritualists. Among its committees was one for systematic research into the phenomena of Spiritualism, in which connection some interesting scientific experiments were made in 1878.

Early in 1882, conferences, which were held at the association's rooms and were presided over by William Barrett, resulted in the formation of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). Many members of the SPR were recruited from the council of the BNAS, such as the Rev. Stainton Moses, Dr. George Wyld, Dawson Rogers, and Morell Theobald. The BNAS was at first associated with the Spiritualist, edited by W. H. Harrison, but in 1879 the reports of its proceedings were transferred to Spiritual Notes, a paper which, founded in the previous year, came to an end in 1881, as did the Spiritualist. In the latter year Dawson Rogers founded Light, with which the society was henceforth associated.

From the beginning, the BNAS held itself apart from religious and philosophical dogmatism and included among its members Spiritualists of all sects and opinions.

In 1884 the association reorganized as the London Spiritualist Alliance. The journal Light is now published by the College of Psychic Studies, London, which developed on similar lines to the former British College of Psychic Science.

Sources:

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. New York: Charles H. Doran, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

British Society of Dowsers

A long-established society of water-diviners (water-witchers) and people interested in dowsing and related skills. The society was formed to encourage the study of all matters connected with the perception of radiation by the human organism with or without an instrument (divining-rod, pendulum, etc.), and has issued its Journal since 1933, published quarterly from the society's present address: Sycamore Barn, Hastingleigh, Ashford, Kent TN25 5HW, England. Website: http://www.dowsers.demon.co.uk.

British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union

Founded in Manchester in 1889, bearing the same relation to Spiritualist churches as the Sunday School Unions to the churches of other religious communities. It aimed at the intellectual, moral, and spiritual development of children along the lines of Andrew Jackson Davis's vision of children in the Summerland. The BSLU encountered financial difficulties in 1940, and it eventually merged with the Spiritualists' National Union in 1948.

British Spiritual Telegraph

An early Spiritualist newspaper, which was founded as the Yorkshire Spiritual Telegraph in April 1855 in Keighley and was renamed the British Spiritual Telegraph in 1857. It was first issued weekly, then monthly by W. Horsell until December 1859, when it was superseded by the Spiritual Magazine, published in London from 1860 to 1874.

British UFO Research Association (BUFORA)

Originally founded in 1959 as the London UFO Research Organization, which issued a monthly mimeographed magazine LUFORO Bulletin. In 1962 LUFORO merged with seven other British UFO groups and incorporated as the British UFO Association, consolidated as BUFORA in 1964. It became legally constituted in 1975 as a nonprofit company, limited by guarantee, with the aims of in-depth research and investigation of UFO phenomena. BUFORA's membership was concentrated in London and the southeast of England, and in the mid-1970s one of the BUFORA investigators in northern England, Jenny Randles, created the Northern UFO Network.

BUFORA issues the BUFORA Bulletin published eight times a year for members, promotes regular lectures, sponsors conferences, and operates the UFOcall hotline. It may be contacted at BM BUFORA, London WC1N 3XX, England. Website: http://www.bufora.org.uk/.

British UFO Society

Group in Warminster, England, concerned with UFO-related events in the Warminster district of England. The society published the monthly Warminster UFO News. Last known address: Preston House, Warminster, Wiltshire, England.

British Vampyre Society

A vampire interest organization; issued a newsletter. Last known address: Allen Gittens, 38 Westcroft, Chippenham, Wiltshire, SN14 0LY, England.

Brittain, Annie (ca. 1930)

British trance medium well known during the 1920s. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle sent many people to her anonymously and kept records of the reports, which showed a very high average of success. Her psychic gifts were noticed in early childhood, when she is said to have played with spirit children and occasionally fallen into trance.

Sources:

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. New York: Charles H. Doran, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Britten, Emma Hardinge (1823–1899)

Inspirational speaker, medium, and early propagandist for Spiritualism. Born in the East End of London, Britten was the daughter of Capt. Floyd, a seafaring man. She demonstrated gifts as musician, singer, and elocutionist at an early age. At the age of 11 she was earning her living as a musical teacher. Under contract to a theatrical company in 1856, she went to America where she performed on Broadway and elsewhere in New York City. Through the mediumship of Ada Hoyt (Mrs. Coan), she converted to Spiritualism, developed her own psychic powers, and sat publicly for the Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge in New York. Her mediumistic gifts included automatic writing, psychometry, occasional healing, prophecy, and inspirational speaking, which disclosed great erudition. As was common at the time, she spoke extempore on a subject generally chosen by a committee from the audience.

In the early history of spirit return, Britten furnished one of the better attested cases. After the mail steamer Pacific sank in the high seas, a member of the crew possessed her body in trance and disclosed the facts of the tragedy. Britten was threatened with prosecution by the owners of the steamer when the story was made public, but it was found to be true.

In 1865 she went back to England, But returned to New York in 1869 to meet with publishers about a book she was writing. In the voyage from England, dhe met her future husband, William Britten, with whom she began an occult magazine, The Western Star. A fire ended that effort.

Britten is best remembered today, not as a medium but as a spokesperson and advocate of Spiritualism, for which she traveled widely across North America and the British Empire. In Manchester, England, she founded and for five years edited Two Worlds, long a prominent Spiritualist magazine. Her two chronicles of emergent Spiritualism, Modern American Spiritualism (1870) and Nineteenth-Century Miracles (1884) became important sources for understanding the origin and spread of the movement worldwide. Among her other writings, Ghost Land; or, Researches into the Mysteries of Occultism (1876) and her translation and editing of the anonymous Art Magic (1875) were most important. She also for a time edited the American periodical Western Star (1872) and the British publication Unseen Universe (1892–93). Her early musical talent reemerged in a number of musical compositions and songs written under the name Ernest Reinhold.

Britten was also among the founders of the Theosophical Society in New York in 1875, but soon severed her connection with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Britten's life is told in a biography edited by her sister, Margaret Wilkinson.

She died in England October 2, 1899. The Britten Memorial Institute and Library and the Britten Memorial Museum were named in her honor.

Sources:

[Britten, Emma Hardinge.] Art Magic. Boston, 1875. Reprint, Chicago: Progressive Thinker Publishing House, 1898.

———. Ghost Land; or, Researches into the Mysteries of Occultism. Chicago: Progressive Thinker Publishing House, 1897.

———. Modern American Spiritualism. New York, 1870. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

———. Nineteenth-Century Miracles. New York: William Britten, 1884.

Britten Memorial Institute and Library

Originally founded in 1900 at 64A Bridge St., Manchester, England, as "a school of prophets" for the training of mediums, an idea proposed by nineteenth-century Spiritualist writer Emma Hardinge Britten. A trust fund was raised by Mr. A. W. Orr with trustees E. W. Oaten, W. A. Herring, and E. A. Keeling. Its library had over 3,000 volumes, many from a collection donated by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. The institute and library are no longer in operation.

Britten Memorial Museum

British museum devoted to exhibits relating to Spiritualism and psychic phenomena. Situated in the grounds of the Arthur Findlay College, it is administered by the Spiritualists' National Union. The name of the museum derives from the work of pioneer Spiritualist Emma Hardinge Britten, who was instrumental in the founding of the Spiritualists' National Federation of Great Britain (later the Spiritualists' National Union).

The museum contains over 1,000 exhibits, including diaries, posters, paintings, books, clothing, regalia, photographs, examples of automatic writing and slate writing, wax hands (formed in materialization séances), apports, paranormal paintings, and personal effect of famous Spiritualists. The address is Britten Memorial Museum, Britten House, Stansted Hall, Stansted, Mountfitchet, Essex, England.

Bro, Harmon Hartzell (1919–1997)

Professor of philosophy and religion and specialist in parapsychological aspects of religious life, including meditation, faith-healing, mystical experience, and conversion. He was born December 14, 1919, in Nanking, China to missionary parents. He studied at Williams College and the University of Chicago (B.A.); he pursued graduate education at St. Olaf College, Harvard Divinity School, and the University of Chicago Divinity School (Ph.D.). He was ordained a minister in the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in 1943.

Bro served as associate professor of religion and psychology, George Williams College, Chicago, Illinois (1949–55), and held various academic positions and developed experimental programs. He was W. Earl Ledden Associate Professor of Religion and director of Institute for Religious Education at Syracuse University, New York (1956–59) and director of the Institute for Research in Psychology and Religion (1960–65). He has written widely on psychological and pastoral counseling issues. With his wife, Reverend June Avis (Larson), Bro directed the Pilgrim Institute for the study of contemporary spirituality.

Bro's friendship with Edgar Cayce led to his long relationship with the Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE). His doctoral thesis, The Charisma of the Seer, examined the life and work of Cayce. Bro has been a frequent speaker at the ARE and has written a number of books on the Cayce material, including Edgar Cayce on Dreams (1968), Dreams in a Life of Prayer: The Approach of Edgar Cayce (1970), Edgar Cayce on Religion and Psychic Experience (1970), and A Seer Out of Season: The Life of Edgar Cayce (1989).

Bro died on September 13, 1997, in Hyannis, Massachusetts.

Sources:

Bro, Harmon Hartzell. Begin a New Life: The Approach of Edgar Cayce. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

———. Dreams in a Life of Prayer: The Approach of Edgar Cayce. New York: Paperback Library, 1970.

———. Edgar Cayce on Dreams. New York: Castle Books, 1968.

———. Edgar Cayce on Religion and Psychic Experience. New York: Paperback Library, 1970.

———. High Play; Turning on without Drugs. New York: Coward-McCann, 1970.

———. A Seer Out of Season: The Life of Edgar Cayce. New York: New American Library, 1989.

Broad, C(harlie) D(unbar) (1887–1971)

Professor of philosophy and president of the Society for Psychical Research, London, 1935–36 and 1958–60. Dr. Broad had a distinguished academic career and was a prominent researcher and theorist in the field of parapsychology, although known chiefly for his work in epistemology and the philosophy of science.

Born December 30, 1887, in Harlesden, Middlesex, England, he was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge University, as a scholar in natural science. His dissertation became the basis of his book Perception, Physics, and Reality (1914). He was assistant professor of logic at St. Andrews University, Scotland (1912–20), lecturer at University College, Dundee, Scotland (1914–20), professor of philosophy at Bristol University (1920–23), then began his long tenure at Trinity College, Cambridge (1933–53), where he was eventually named Knightbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy. He wrote numerous books in the philosophy of science and ethics and was noted for his clarity of thought on the many abstruse aspects of philosophy.

Even as a young man Broad was interested in psychic research. He joined the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1920, where he served as president twice, and trained his analytical mind on this field. His early book, Mind and Its Place in Nature (1923) caused a stir in philosophical circles because it included evidence of psychic phenomena that suggested the possibility of human life after death. However, as with his other writings, skeptics of psychic phenomena praised the clarity and accuracy of his reasoning. His more mature Religion Philosophy, and Psychical Research: Selected Essays (1953) set forth the idea of "basic limiting principles" which Broad believed formed the framework of modern technological society. Accordingly, any event outside that framework can fittingly be labeled "paranormal."

Broad lived in Cambridge after his retirement and died there on March 11, 1971.

Sources:

Broad, C. D. Lectures on Psychical Research, Incorporating the Perrott Lectures Given in Cambridge University in 1939 and 1960. New York: Humanities Press, 1962.

———. The Mind and Its Place in Nature. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1925.

———. Perception, Physics, and Reality: An Inquiry into the Information that Physical Science Can Supply about the Real. 1914.

———. Personal Identity and Survival. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1958.

———. Religion, Philosophy, and Psychical Research. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1953.

"In Memoriam: Professor C. D. Broad, 1887–1971." Journal of the SPR 46 (1971): 107.

Broceliande

A magic forest in ancient Brittany, identified with the forest of Piampont in modern-day Brittany, which figured in Arthurian legend. It was in this place that Merlin was enchanted by Nimue or Viviana, Lady of the Lake, and imprisoned beneath a huge stone. The name Broceliande is often employed as symbolic of the dim unreality of legendary scenery.

Sources:

Lacy, Norris J. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Brocken Tryst

A celebrated experiment in magical transformation performed by psychical researcher Harry Price in June 1932 in the Hartz Mountains, Germany, during the Goethe centenary. The Brocken is the highest peak of the Hartz range.

Price claimed that a fifteenth-century manuscript of a magic ritual for changing a goat into a beautiful youth was delivered mysteriously in his National Laboratory of Psychic Research, London, and he decided to test whether the magic worked. This "Blocksberg Manuscript" detailed a ritual from the High German Black Book, a classic manual of black magic, and required a magic circle drawn on top of the Brocken on a night of full moon, a fire of pinewood, a goat with a silver cord, and a maiden pure in heart. Price undertook this ritual before scores of pressmen, photographers, and a film cameraman. In fact, the goat was not metamorphosed after all, but Price achieved his objective of securing publicity for paranormal investigation, and magic and psychic phenomena became a talking point in the stifled atmosphere of the 1930s.

Sources:

Price, Harry. Confessions of a Ghost Hunter. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1936. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Brodie-Innes, J(ohn) W(illiam) (1848–1923)

An Edinburgh lawyer, born in Morayshire, Scotland, who became one of the leading members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn's Amen-Ra Temple in Scotland. Brodie-Innes was also a member of a bibliophile society, the Sette of Odde Volumes, London, and was its president in 1911. He wrote several novels on witchcraft and magic and is said to have taught Dion Fortune (Violet Mary Firth) the secret of developing and directing occult force. He was the model for the "soul-doctor" in Fortune's book The Secrets of Dr. Tavener (1926).

Throughout the dissensions of the Golden Dawn, Brodie-Innes remained loyal to MacGregor Mathers, and on the death of his chief in 1918, published an affectionate obituary in the Occult Review (vol. 29, no. 5 [May 1919]).

Sources:

Brodie-Innes, J.W. Scottish Witchcraft Trials. London: Chiswick Press, 1891.

Fortune, Dion. The Secrets of Dr. Tavener. London: Noel Douglas, 1926.

Gilbert, R. A., ed. The Sorcerer and His Apprentice: Unknown Hermetic Writings of S. L. MacGregor Mathers and J. W. Brodie-Innes. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

Richardson, Alan. Priestess: The Life and Magic of Dion Fortune. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

Brofferio, Angelo (1802–1866)

Italian scientist who was converted to Spiritualism by Eusapia Palladino's mediumship. His first book, Per lo Spiritismo (Milan, 1892), endorsed the spirit hypothesis.

Brohou, Jean (ca. seventeenth century)

A physician of Coutarces, France, in the seventeenth century. He was the author of an Almanack or Journal of Astrology, which contained prognostications for the year 1572 (Rouen, 1571), and a Description d'une Merveilleuse et Prodiigeuse Cométe, treatise on comets and the events they prognosticate (Paris, 1568).

Brooks, Nona Lovell (1861–1945)

Nona Lovell Brooks, a founder of the Divine Science Church, was born March 22, 1861, in Louisville, Kentucky, and grew up in Charleston, West Virginia, where her family moved to escape the Civil War. She was raised as a Presbyterian in a strongly religious home, and as a child had an intense experience of being engulfed by a supernatural light.

During her teen years, the family moved to Pueblo, Colorado, where Brooks came face to face with New Thought metaphysics. She had developed a sore throat that would not clear up. Her sister Althea suggested that she attend some classes being offered by Kate Bingham, an independent teacher of Christian Science. Bingham had gone to Chicago to seek help for an illness and had been cured by Mabel MacCoy, a student of Emma Curtis Hopkins. Hopkins's independent brand of Christian Science formed the basis of New Thought.

While sitting in Bingham's class, Brooks was particularly affected by Bingham's discussion of the omnipresence of God. As she came to this fresh understanding of God, she was healed, and that evening, for the first time in many months, she ate a normal meal without pain. The sisters shared the story with their minister, who invited them to speak, but the church elders stepped in. They prevented the talk and fired Brooks from her church school teaching job. She in turn quit the church.

After finishing her schooling in Pueblo, Brooks went east for a year where she attended Wellesley College. After she returned home, she taught school for two years before moving to Denver, where her other sister, Fanny, lived. Fanny was also influenced by Hopkins and Bingham and had been holding metaphysical classes. She also began corresponding with Melinda Cramer, who developed her own variation of Christian Science called Divine Science, and Fanny began to use that name for her work. The two sisters opened the Divine Science College in 1898. Responding to a call from the students that they hold Sunday services, Nona Brooks went to San Francisco to be ordained by Cramer. They held their first service in Denver on January 1, 1899.

Cramer died from injuries received in the April 1906 earthquake in San Francisco. The center of the Divine Science movement shifted to Denver, and Brooks became its key leader for the next four decades. By this time she had started the monthly magazine Fulfillment. During the years of World War I, when many metaphysical leaders came together to found the International New Thought Alliance, Brooks helped organize the opposition, primarily among leaders in the western states. However, by 1922 she had worked out her differences with the organization and led the ministers and members of the Divine Science movement into it. She became a prominent leader and popular speaker for the alliance.

The last decades of Brooks's life were ones of triumph. Divine Science grew speedily into an international association of metaphysical churches, and Brooks became a well-recognized religious leader in Denver, overcoming opposition both to her gender and her minority beliefs. In 1926 she was invited to join the local ministerial alliance. She served on a variety of civic boards and agencies, including the Colorado State Prison Board. She tried to retire and for a period in the early 1930s settled in Australia, where she opened several churches, but upon her return to Colorado in 1938 she was immediately asked to resume leadership of the movement. She retired a second time in 1943, two years before her death on March 14, 1945.

Sources:

Braden, Charles. Spirits in Rebellion. Dallas, 1963.

Brooks, Louise McNamara. Early History of Divine Science. Denver: First Divine Science Church, 1963.

Brooks, Nona L. Mysteries. Denver: The Author, 1924.

———. The Prayer that Never Fails. Denver: The Author, 1935.

———. Short Lessons in Divine Science. Denver: The Author, 1928.

Neale, Hazel. Powerful Is the Light. Denver: Divine Science College, 1945.

Broom

In Romania and Tuscany it was a folk belief that a broom laid beneath the pillow would keep witches and evil spirits away. Others suggested that witches and evil spirits could be kept at bay by two crossed brooms in front of a house door or cattle-shed. The British believed that if a girl should stride over a broom handle, she would be a mother before she was a wife. Other superstitions claimed that buying a broom in the month of May would sweep your friends away, hence it was unlucky to make brooms during May. Another popular belief was that a new broom should sweep something into the house before it swept dust out of the house.

Broomstick

Witches were said to ride through the air on switches or broomsticks on their nocturnal journey to the Sabbat. Various other mounts were supposed to be used by witches, including a cleft stick, a staff, a distaff, or even a shovel. These objects were smeared with a special witchcraft ointment before the flight. Other witches were believed to make their aerial journeys on such animals as a wolf or a goat. These flights were named transvection by demonologists.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Brotherhood of the Ram

The Brotherhood of the Ram was a short-lived Satanic group that operated out of an occult booksotre in the Los Angeles area during the 1960s and 1970s. Members reportedly made a pact with Satan renouncing all other devotions, especially any Christian elements in their past. The pact was then signed in blood. (See Satanism)

Brotherhood of the Trowel

A whimsical Masonic society founded in Florence, Italy, in 1512, composed of eminent architects, sculptors, and painters. Its emblems were the trowel, the gavel, and the square, and its patron was St. Andrew. The society may have been an offshoot of an older fraternity of Traveling Masons.

The rites are believed to have been a travesty of genuine Masonry, culminating in a banquet. The society existed until 1737.

Brotherhood of the White Temple

The Brotherhood of the White Temple is a theosophical occult organization founded in 1903 in Denver, Colorado, by Maurice Doreal (d. 1963), the religious name of Claude Doggins. A lifelong student of the occult, Doreal claimed to have spent eight years in Tibet during the 1920s. He also claimed to have made contact with the Great White Lodge, the advanced beings who completed their work on earth and who now, as masters, guide the destiny of humankind. Doreal was seen as the agent for the coming Golden Age. Associated with the brotherhood is the White Temple Church.

The brotherhood was headquartered in Denver for many years, but immediately after World War II, in the atmosphere of anxiety over a possible atomic war, the brotherhood built a new headquarters complex in Sedalia, Colorado, in a valley surrounded by high mountains. The headquarters were formally moved in 1951. Two years later Doreal predicted the coming biblical Battle of Armageddon for later in the year. It did not occur, but members continued to stockpile food and other resources they might need should war break out.

The brotherhood teaches a system of Gnosticism that draws heavily on theosophical and kabalistic writings. The human soul is pictured as a spark of the divine that has devolved into matter. This experience has overwhelmed the soul, which has lost the harmony it had after being created. Teachings emphasize methods of reestablishing harmony and, with the aid of the masters, returning to the divine realms.

New members complete a series of lessons and progress through neophyte and temple grades, which can take four to five years, after which members are invited into the real inner work of the group. Some of the older members reside at the center in Colorado, but the great majority live around the country and stay in contact through correspondence. The organizations publishes a periodical, Light on the Path, and a set of booklets written by Doreal called the Little Temple Library. The more than one hundred titles in the library cover a broad range of occult topics.

Sources:

Doreal, Maurice. Maitreya: Lord of the World. Sedalia, Colo.: Brotherhood of the White Temple, n.d.

———. Man and the Mystic Universe. Denver: Brotherhood of the White Temple, n.d.

———. Personal Experiences among the Masters and Great Adepts in Tibet. Sedalia, Colo.: Brotherhood of the White Temple, n.d.

———. Secret Teachings of the Himalayan Gurus. Denver: Brotherhood of the White Temple, n.d.

Brothers of Purity

An association of Arab philosophers founded at Basra in the tenth century. They had forms of initiation, and they wrote many works that were afterward much studied by the Jews of Spain.

Broughton, Luke Dennis (1828–1898)

Luke Dennis Broughton, the leading astrologer in the United States during the last decades of the nineteenth century, was born April 20, 1828, in Leeds, England, and grew up in an astrologically-oriented family. His grandfather had become a devotee of the stars after reading the Complete Herbal, a medical astrology text by Nicolas Culpepper and one of the few astrological texts to have survived the combined attack of Protestantism and the Enlightenment in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The elder Broughton inspired interest in astrology in his physician son and through him to Luke Broughton and his brothers. Luke Broughton's older brother Mark became the leader of an astrological society in England and then moved to the United States to begin Broughton's Monthly Horoscope in 1849.

Luke Broughton began studying astrology during his teen years, and he moved to the United States in the early 1840s to study natural medicine at the Eclectic Medical College in Philadelphia. He began a public career in 1860 when he revived his brother's periodical as Broughton's Monthly Planet Reader and Astrological Journal (1860–69). After anti-astrology laws were passed in Philadelphia, he moved his medical office to New York City in 1863, his home for the rest of his life. He emphasized astrological medicine and in 1866 began to teach astrology. His initial teaching efforts became the foundation upon which the nation's major astrological center would be built. He developed a distributorship of astrological literature, the great majority of which came from England.

As astrology grew and became the center of renewed controversy, Broughton assumed the dual role of astrology's defender from its enemies and protector from incompetent astrologers. He wrote and at times appeared as a witness in court on astrology's behalf. He also attacked people such as Hiram Butler, Eleanor Kirk, and C. W. Roback, astrologers who, he felt, had insufficient training for their work. At the time of his death in 1898, he left his practice to his daughter, who carried on his work and saw to the publication of his most substantive book, The Elements of Astrology (1898).

Sources:

Broughton, Luke D. The Elements of Astrology. New York: The Author, 1898.

———. Planetary Influence. New York: The Author, 1893.

Brown, Courtney

Courtney Brown, a professor of political science who has become known for his interest in UFOs and remote viewing, was born in the mid-1950s. He attended Rutgers University, where he majored in English. Following graduation in 1974, he earned his graduate degrees in political science from San Francisco State University (M.A., 1979) and Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri (Ph.D., 1982). He taught at the University of California at Los Angeles for two years (1984–86) before joining the faculty at Emory University in 1986. Along the way he had taken the basic course in transcendental meditation, a practice he continues to the present.

Quite apart from his expertise in political science, Brown developed an interest in what he terms "nonlinear interdependencies in human affairs," and in 1995 completed a book, Serpents in the Sand: Essays in the Nonlinear Nature of Politics and Human Destiny. He also developed an interest in remote viewing, a form of clairvoyance. In 1995 he also founded the Farsight Institute, which happened to coincide with the revelations of Project STAR GATE, the government-sponsored research on parapsychology that centered on remote viewing. It was the claim of the researchers that they had discovered a new perspective on psychic perception that could be taught to anyone and that offered more accurate results.

Brown was trained as a remote viewer by Edward Dames (who worked with the remote viewers at Project STAR GATE) of PSI-TECH, and also took courses at the Monroe Institute of Applied Sciences. Having mastered remote viewing, in March of 1996 Brown began to teach it at the institute. The current program offering is in Scientific Remote Viewing, which he describes as a trainable procedure that allows the person to extract data for distant locations and across time. The shifting of awareness occurs while in the waking state and does not involve trance.

Brown himself has produced two books from his experiences in remote viewing, Cosmic Voyage: A Scientific Discovery of Extraterrestrials Visiting Earth (1996) and its sequel, Cosmic Explorers: Scientific Remote Viewing, Extraterrestrials, and a Message for Mankind (1999). In these books he asserts that Martians now live among us and seek out help, and that the television series Star Trek was inspired by aliens as a means to prepare humanity for contact with extraterrestrials. In material that resembles channeling, he also claims contact with Jesus, Buddha, and Guru Dev (the Guru of Maharishi Mehesh Yogi, who brought transcendental meditation to the West).

Brown's opinions inadvertently led to his involvement in an unfortunate affair in 1997. In November of 1996, he was a guest on the Art Bell Show, a late-night radio show that features interviews with people who espouse a variety of psychic experiences. That evening the question arose of a photograph of the recently discovered Hale-Bopp comet. The photo seemed to show a white circular object following the comet. Brown stated emphatically that the object was a spacecraft. As it turned out, Brown's statement found its way to a small group of believers in San Diego, California, who were looking for a spaceship to arrive and carry them away from Earth. Their belief in his statement became one factor leading to the mass suicide of the Heaven's Gate group at the spring equinox. Brown was, of course, in no way responsible for the suicide; his statement just happened to fit into their worldview.

Sources:

Brown, Courtney. Cosmic Explorers: Scientific Remote Viewing, Extraterrestrials, and a Message for Mankind. New York: Dutton, 1999.

———. Cosmic Voyage: A Scientific Discovery of Extraterrestrials Visiting Earth. New York: Dutton, 1996. Reprint, New York: Onyx Books, 1997.

Perkins, Rodney, and Forrest Jackson. Cosmic Suicide: The Tragedy and Transcendence of Heaven's Gate. Dallas: Penteradial Press, 1997.

Brown, John (1826–1883)

The personal servant of Queen Victoria, (1819–1901) from December 1865 until his death. A rough-mannered Highland gillie (attendant on a Scottish chieftain), he became fascinated with the queen of England during her visits to Balmoral Castle, Scotland, and later at Osborne House, Isle of Wight. Their unusually close association gave rise to many rumors and spiteful gossip.

Brown was born at Crathie, near Balmoral, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, December 8, 1826. He first came to the notice of Queen Victoria during her visits to the Scottish Highlands, when Brown served as her outdoor personal attendant. After the death of her beloved Prince Albert, the widowed queen came to rely heavily on the companionship of Brown, after he had been summoned by her to Osborne House in 1864. He had brought the queen's favorite Highland pony "Lochnagar," and soon afterward, the kilted, red-whiskered Highlander became a privileged associate of the queen, and enjoyed powerful influence. Rumor had it that he was even her secret lover or that he took part in Spiritualist séances with her.

It was an open secret that the queen had a special interest in Spiritualism, particularly after the death of Prince Albert. She certainly held a number of séances and is said to have used the services of medium Robert James Lees.

Brown died March 27, 1883, at Windsor Castle and was buried at Crathie cemetery. He was praised by the queen in the Court Circular as her "best and truest friend," and she had a statue erected to him at Balmoral.

Sources:

Underwood, Peter. Queen Victoria's Other World. London: Harrap, 1868.

Victoria, Queen. Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands. Smith, Elder, 1868.

Williams, Henry L. Life of John Brown. . . . for 30 Years Personal Attendant of . . . The Queen. London: E. Smith, 1883.

Brown, John Mason (1837–1890)

American lawyer who lived among Indian tribes and studied their beliefs and customs. In 1866 he reported on the gift of prophecy by a medicine man.

Brown, Rosemary (1917–)

A modern British medium who performs musical compositions on the piano which she claims originate from dead composers. Born in London on July 27, 1917, Brown grew up to become a housewife. She had no musical training, nevertheless, she came to perform in the manner of Beethoven, Mozart, Liszt, and other well-known composers. Her psychic performances, which recall those of Jesse Shepard, another famous musical medium who died in 1927, have been endorsed by famous concert pianist John Lill, winner of the International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow in 1970.

Brown has also drawn watercolors and charcoals and painted oils, which she claims are the original work of dead artists; she has written poems from dead poets, equations purportedly from Einstein, philosophical statements from Bertrand Russell, and psychological observations from C. G. Jung.

In 1973 she started to write a play, Caesar's Revenge, which she claimed was dictated to her by the playwright George Bernard Shaw, who died 23 years earlier. Brown stated that she had not previously read any play by Shaw and had only seen a television production of Pygmalion. Caesar's Revenge was staged at the Edinburgh Festival in Scotland on Tuesday, August 22, 1978. Patrick Roberts, an English lecturer at University of London and an expert on Shaw commented: "The idea of the play is reminiscent of the hell scene in Shaw's Man and Superman, where characters can indulge their fantasies without being interrupted. There is the same light-hearted debate that Shaw enjoyed so much. But the style isn't Shaw's at all. . . . this is colloquial, more in keeping with a play of today." Christopher Gilmore, director of the Mountview Theatre, Hornsey, North London, who staged the two-act play at the Edinburgh Festival, stated: "I'm positive it's Shaw. It rings of him with its length of scenes and satiric remarks couched in sweet language." (See also Pepito Arriola)

Sources:

Brown, Rosemary. Immortals at My Elbow. London, 1974. Reprinted as Immortals by My Side. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1975.

———. Unfinished Symphonies: Voices from the Beyond. London, 1971. Reprint, New York: William Morrow, 1971.

May, Antoinette. Haunted Ladies. San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 1975.

Brown, William (1881–1952)

British psychologist, psychiatrist, and psychic researcher. Brown was born December 5, 1881, at Morpeth, England. He studied at Collyer's School in Horsham and at King's College Hospital, London (D.Sc., M.R.C.P., F.R.C.B.). He was consulting psychologist and a reader in psychology at the University of London as well as King's College Hospital. He gave the Terry lectures at Yale University in 1928; in 1936 he became director of the Institute of Experimental Psychology at Oxford University, where he remained until his retirement in 1945. In 1951–52 he was president of the British Psychological Society.

Brown's interest in psychic research began early. He joined the Society for Psychical Research and served on its board for 17 years (1923–40). While on the board, he wrote two letters to the Times (London) (May 7 & 14, 1932) in which he spoke appreciatively if guardedly of medium Rudi Schneider's powers and declared that they were worthy of the closest scientific investigation. In a lecture delivered during the jubilee celebrations of the Society of Psychical Research, London, he reviewed the evidence collected and examined by the society and declared that it was "sufficient to make survival scientifically extremely probable."

He died in Oxford, England, on May 17, 1952.

Sources:

Brown, William. Mind and Personality. College Park, Md.: McGrath, 1927.

———. Mind, Medicine, and Metaphysics; The Philosohy of a Physician. London: Oxford University Press, 1936.

———. Psychological Methods of Healing; An Introduction to Psychotherapy. London: University of London Press, Ltd., 1938.

———. Suggestion and Mental Analysis. New York: Doran, 1922.

Browne, Sylvia (1936–)

Sylvia Browne, contemporary psychic and channel, was born Sylvia Shoemaker on October 19, 1936, in Kansas City, Missouri. She was one of those occasional children born with a caul (a thin membrane) over her face, an event which has differing significance in different cultures. In this case, her grandmother was a psychic, and Sylvia's caul was interpreted as her continuing in her grandmother's footsteps. Her future abilities began to manifest in childhood. When Sylvia was but three, she predicted the birth of her sister several years before her conception. She began to meet people whose faces would appear to melt. She soon learned that this phenomenon was a sign of their imminent death. She also saw the spirits of the deceased.

She attended a Roman Catholic college in Kansas City, after which she began teaching in a parochial school. In 1959 she married and had two children, but ultimately the marriage proved unhappy and in 1971 she and her husband parted. By that time they had moved to California. The next year she married Dal Browne, who shared her interest in things psychic. In 1974 they decided to open the Nirvana Foundation, a structure that would allow her to use her abilities as a professional psychic. It was originally located in their home but soon moved to an office front in Campbell, California. Browne was an immediate success and was soon engaged in a variety of psychic consultations, from investigations of haunted houses to investigations of crimes. She has authored several books and is a popular guest on television talk shows.

Through the years Browne had become comfortable with her psychic talents that frequently manifested as knowledge of the future, information about the present, or spirit contact. Since she was eight, she had had awareness of a presence whom she variously thought of as a psychic guide or guardian angel. It was the spirit of the sixteenth-century Aztec Indian woman named Iena, whom she came to call Francine. Over the years she had had conversations with Francine, but at the foundation she occasionally operated as a trance medium and allowed Francine to speak through her. In the late 1980s, she and her second husband parted company and the Nirvana Foundation was declared bankrupt. Following the divorce, Browne reorganized her business as the Sylvia Browne Corporation. In 1994 she married Larry Beck.

Meanwhile, in 1986 Browne took an additional step and founded a new religion that she called Norvus Spiritus, building upon her belief in God as a divine reality within each person. Also central to her belief was reincarnation, a belief which she professes was part of Christianity "Prior to its drastic restructuring under Pope Constantine at the Council of Nicea in the third century." [There is no evidence of a belief in reincarnation in the pre-Nicean church. There was never a pope named Constantine; he was emperor of Rome in the fourth century. The Council of Nicea took place in the fourth century and did not deal with the subject of reincarnation.] Novus Spiritus also affirms the feminine aspect of the Deity as a co-equal part of God along with the male. She envisioned the new religion as a focus of love and joy that would dissipate fear.

Sources:

Browne, Sylvia. The Other Side and Back. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1999.

———, and Antoinette May. Adventures of a Psychic. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1998.

Browne, Sir Thomas (1605–1682)

An English physician whose evidence in a witchcraft trial in 1664 is said to have assisted the conviction of two women. The accused were Amy Duny and Rose Cullender, arraigned before Sir Matthew Hale at Bury St. Edmunds. Asked by Hale for his opinion, Browne commented, "That the fits were natural, but heightened by the devils co-operating with the malice of the witches, at whose instance he did the villainies," citing similar cases in Denmark.

Browne was born on October 19, 1605, in London, England. After receiving degrees in medicine from the University of Leyden and Oxford, he practiced medicine in Norwich, England until his death on October 19, 1682. Besides his famous Religio Medici (1642) and Urn Burial (1658), Browne was chiefly celebrated by the manner in which he combated fallacies in a work entitled Pseudoxia Epidemica (1658), an essay on popular errors in which he examined beliefs accepted in his time as veritable facts, then proved them to be false or doubtful. Although the author frequently replaced one error by another, on the whole his book is accurate, especially considering the date of its composition. The work is divided into seven books, each of which deals with a particular set of errors: those springing from man's love of the marvelous; those arising from popular beliefs concerning plants and metals; absurd beliefs connected with animals; errors relative to man; errors recorded by pictures and cosmographical and historical errors and certain commonly accepted absurdities concerning the wonders of the world. The charges of atheism against him, which arose with the publication of this work, stimulated him to publish his famous Religio Medici.

His strangest literary conceit was The Garden of Cyrus (1658), an exhaustive survey of the quincunx (a special arrangement of five objects).

Browning, Robert (1812–1889)

Famous English poet, born on May 7, 1812 in London, England and died on December 12, 1889 in Venice, Italy. He sat at a séance with the medium Daniel D. Home, after which Browning published his satirical poem "Mr. Sludge, the Medium," which was generally thought to refer to Home. It contains these lines:

Now don't, sir! Don't expose me! Just this once!
This was the first and only time, I'll swear.
Look at me—see, I kneel—the only time,
I swear I ever cheated . . .
"Well, Sir, since you press—
(How do you tease the whole thing out of me!)
Now for it, then! . . .
I cheated when I could.
Rapped with my toe-joints, set sham hands at work,
Wrote down names weak in sympathetic ink,
Rubbed odic lights with ends of phosphor-match,
And all the rest—"

It was generally supposed that the poet detected in Home a fraud, but others suggested that Browning was motivated by spiteful jealousy on account of his wife's (Elizabeth Barrett) interest in Spiritualism. Evidence in the book Elizabeth Barrett Browning: Letters to Her Sister (London, 1929) suggests that Browning's husband strongly resented her attitude and that Spiritualism was tabooed in their house. Home himself discussed the incident in his book Incidents in My Life (1874) and preferred a psychological explanation for the poet's verse.

A wreath of clematis, which the children had gathered in the garden, moved from the table and started to glide toward Elizabeth Browning. Robert Browning, seated at the opposite side, came and stood behind his wife. Then the wreath rose and came to rest on Elizabeth's head. Some of the sitters thought Robert was annoyed at not getting the crown himself, but he voluntarily stated that imposture was out of question. Later he evolved a theory of artificial hands affixed to Home's chair.

In his biography of Browning, G. K. Chesterton ridicules the story and says that Browning "did not dislike Spiritualism but Spiritualists." At any rate, the poem harmed Home's reputation substantially. It was widely quoted in the press, even in America, where Sarah Helen Whitman, the poet to whom some of the finest gems of Edgar Allan Poe's poetry were written, felt prompted to write to a paper and brand it as a "blot on Browning's 'scutcheon."

In spite of Browning's hostility toward Home, tradition has it that Robert Browning was well versed in the Hermetic tradition of occult knowledge and used Hermetic imagery in some of his poems. In My Browning Family Album (1979), Vivienne Browning, president of the Browning Society, revealed that her father, Vyvyan Deacon, was a practicing medium and lecturer on the occult and Theosophy and told her that he was carrying on the tradition of his grandfather Reuben Browning, the poet's uncle, who was a Rosicrucian who shared his secret knowledge and training with his nephew Robert.

Sources:

Browning, Robert. Dramatis Personae. London: Chapman and Hall, 1864.

Browning, Vivienne. My Browning Family Album. London: Springwood Books, 1979.

Porter, Katherine H. Through a Glass Darkly: Spiritualism in the Browning Circle. Lawrence, Kans.: University of Kansas Press, 1958.

Bruce, H(enry) Addington (Bayley) (1874–1959)

Canadian author, newspaperman, and lecturer on psychology, education, and sociology. Bruce was born June 27, 1874, in Toronto, Ontario, Canada. He studied at the University of Toronto (B.A., 1859; M.S., 1896) and Harvard University. In 1897 he married Lauretta Augusta Bowers (died 1941). In the early 1920s, Bruce was a trustee of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR), but he broke with the ASPR in 1925 and became director of research for the Boston Society for Psychical Research. He authored a number of books on psychic subjects and contributed a number of articles to Tommorrow magazine. He died February 23, 1959, in Hartford, Connecticut.

Sources:

Bruce, Henry Addington Bayley. Historic Ghosts and Ghost Hunters. New York: Moffat, Yard, 1908.

———. Riddle of Personality. New York: Moffat, Yard, 1915.

———. Scientific Mental Healing. Boston, Little, Brown, 1911.

Bruening, J(oseph) H(erbert) (1929–)

Sociologist at University of Mississippi beginning in 1962 who investigated mediumship and survival. He was born February 10, 1929, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and studied at the University of Florida (B.S., 1954; M.S., 1956). He joined the Florida Society for Psychical Research, the Parapsychological Association, and the Society for Psychical Research, London.

Bruers, Antonio (ca. 1880–1954)

Italian author, editor, and parapsychologist. Bruers was actively interested in psychical research and parapsychology for many years and was president of the Societa Italiana di Metapsichica. He published books on psychic research and bibliography and was associated with the Istituto di Studi Psichici and edited their publication Luce e Ombra. He died November 30, 1954, in Rome, Italy. (See also Italy).

Brugmans, Henri J. F. W. (1885–1961)

Professor of psychology at University of Gronigen in the Netherlands and pioneer in performing laboratory experiments on psychic phenomena in his home country. He conducted experiments in telepathy after World War I. In one of his experiments he recorded physiological changes during psi testing. His work laid a foundation for the discipline of parapsychology as developed by J. B. Rhine. He attended the First International Congress on Psychical Research in Copenhagen in 1922. He died March 1, 1961.

Sources:

Brugmans, H. J. F. W., G. Heymans, and A. Weinberg. "Some Experiments in Telepathy Performed in the Psychological Institute of the University of Groningen." Compte-Rendu du Premier Congrés International de Recherches Phychiques. 1921.

"On the Experiments of Brugmans, Heymans, and Weinberg." European Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1978): 247.

Bruillant

One of the characters in the thirteenth-century romance Grand Saint Graal. Bruillant discovered the Grail Sword in Solomon's ship, and with it slew Lambor, father of the Fisher-King. For this use of the holy sword, however, the whole of Britain suffered, for no wheat grew, the fruit trees bore no fruit, and there were no fish in the sea. Bruillant himself was punished with death for using the sword.

Bruno, Jean (1909–)

Librarian at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris beginning in 1936 who published a number of articles dealing with parapsychology, yoga, and mystical experience. Born July 9, 1909, at La Rochelle, France, he studied at University of Poitiers (Licencié ès lettres, 1933).

Brunton, Paul (1898–1981)

British-born journalist who wrote important books on philosophy and comparative religion. He was educated at Central Foundation School, London, and McKinley-Roosevelt College, Chicago, Illinois. Early in life he became interested in Spiritualism. He developed mediumistic powers himself, notably clairvoyance and clairaudience, and thus verified the existence of psychic faculties from first-hand personal experience. Later he joined the Theosophical Society, but left after two years. He contacted various occult groups, comparing their teachings, and became a close friend of Ananda Metteya (Allan Bennett), who initiated Brunton into Buddhist meditation.

Brunton assisted Bennett to publish his journal the Buddhist Review. According to Brunton, Bennett developed a breath control that enabled him at times to alter the specific gravity of his body, so that while sitting in a yoga posture he could rise a foot or two into the air, and then float gently down to the floor again a short distance from the spot where he first sat. Brunton also stated that around the time of Bennett's death, Bennett had "sacrificed his body in an effort to extricate me from a dangerous position."

Brunton traveled in India and Egypt, and attracted tremendous interest with his famous book, A Search in Secret India (1934). This was followed by A Search in Secret Egypt, (1935), A Hermit in the Himalayas (1937), and The Quest of the Overself (1937). Although Brunton was at first concerned primarily with miracle-working holy men, he soon became attracted to the deepest metaphysical aspects of yoga and mysticism and was one of the first Europeans to draw attention to Sri Ramana Maharshi of Tiruvannamalai, South India, one of the greatest modern Hindu mystics.

Brunton's books greatly influenced the occult revival and growth of Eastern religion from the 1930s onward, stimulating popular interest in yoga, meditation, and the teachings of gurus. In 1956 he retired to Switzerland and devoted himself to meditation. During these years he wrote The Inner Reality (1959), The Hidden Teaching beyond Yoga (1959), and The Secret Path (1959). His thoughts and insights on the spiritual life, which he recorded in a series of notebooks numbering some 7,000 pages, were an exposition of the synthesis of Eastern mysticism and Western rational thought. They were published posthumously as The Notebooks of Paul Brunton: Perspectives (1984). Brunton died July 27, 1981, in Vevey, Switzerland.

Buchanan, Joseph Rhodes (1814–1899)

American professor of psychology and medical science born in Frankfort, Kentucky, on December 11, 1814. He became dean of the faculty and professor in the Eclectic Medical Institute (which practiced natural medicine) in Covington, Kentucky, and a pioneer researcher in the field of psychometry.

The discoverer of "phrenomesmerism," Buchanan published in 1843 a neurological map, a new distribution of the phrenological organs. He anticipated Prof. Ferrier's "center of feeling" by localizing as early as 1838 the "region of sensibility" in which, in a state of high development, he found traces of an unknown psychic faculty for which in 1842 he coined the word "psychometry," the measuring of the soul.

Episcopal Bishop Leonidas Polk (General Polk during the Civil War) told him of his curious sensitivity to atmospheric, electric, and other physical conditions. If he touched brass in the dark, he immediately knew it by its influence and the offensive metallic taste in his mouth. Buchanan began to experiment and soon found out that these sensations were not restricted to the sense of taste alone. Students of a Cincinnati medical school registered distinct impressions from medicines held in their hands. To eliminate thought transference, the substances were wrapped up in paper parcels and mixed.

Slowly the conviction forced itself on Buchanan that emanations might be thrown off by all substances, even by the human body, which certain sensitives might feel and interpret in their normal state. He was staggered by the implication of such a possibility and asserted:

"The past is entombed in the present, the world is its own enduring monument; and that which is true of its physical is likewise true of its mental career. The discoveries of Psychometry will enable us to explore the history of man, as those of geology enable us to explore the history of the earth. There are mental fossils for psychologists as well as mineral fossils for the geologists; and I believe that hereafter the psychologist and the geologist will go hand in hand, the one portraying the earth, its animals and its vegetation, while the other portrays the human beings who have roamed over its surface in the shadows, and the darkness of primeval barbarism. Aye, the mental telescope is now discovered which may pierce the depths of the past and bring us in full view of the grand and tragic passages of ancient history."

To the subtle emanation given off by the human body he gave the name "nerve aura." In the Journal of Man, which succeeded S. B. Brittan's Shekinah, one of the first Spiritualist monthlies, he published a complete exposition of his system of neurology, or anthropology. The paper was mainly devoted to his psychometric experiments, in the course of which he came to believe that an actual clue, something belonging to the person of whom reading is given, is not always necessary and that an index, which leads the mind of the psychometer to the subject, may suffice. He observed:

"Acting upon this view I wrote the name of a friend and placed it in the hands of a good psychometer, who had no difficulty, notwithstanding her doubts of so novel a proceeding, in giving as good a description of the character of Dr. N. as if she had made the description from an autograph. After that experiment I was accustomed to extend my inquiries to ancient and modern historical characters, public men and any person in whose character I was interested, as well as localities I wished to have described."

Buchanan regarded psychometry as a human faculty that did not involve the intervention of spirits. L. A. Coffin, however, in her preface to Buchanan's Manual of Psychometry (Boston, 1889) admitted that she was often impressed by spirits. This was not incongruous, as Buchanan himself was an avowed Spiritualist. He published an astounding narrative of his own experiences in the Light of Truth, Columbus, Ohio, in 1899.

He stated that from 1849 to 1855 he was the only medical scientist to defend the Fox Sisters and repel their assailants. He told his friends that he was "as well acquainted with the spirit world as they were with Europe." This knowledge was derived from instructions given by direct voices through Mrs. Hollis-Billing (Mary J. Hollis) and from direct scripts. He was further helped by psychometric explorations that he began in 1879–80 through Cornelia H. Buchanan. "The past was to her as open a book as the present, and during the years in which she portrayed historic characters of whom I knew nothing, I never found her deviating from the truth as far as I could discover."

In the course of these investigations, Buchanan received a direct penciled message signed by "St. John." This was followed by startling communications which, after having been held in reserve for 17 years, were published in 1897 under the title Primitive Christianity: Containing the Lost Lives of Jesus Christ and the Apostles and the Authentic Gospel of St. John. Buchanan stated that he tested the St. John script, properly concealed, through three psychometrists: Cornelia H. Buchanan, Mrs. W. R. Hayden, and Dr. James M. Peebles, and that all three agreed as to its source, giving similar descriptions of a great spirit devoted personally to Jesus Christ. The book was also adorned by an engraving of the spirit form of St. John, which Buchanan received between his own pair of slates held in his hand.

On other occasions but in a similar manner, he claimed to obtain between his slates a portrait of Moses and the Tables of Law, pictures of Aaron, Helen of Troy, and John the Baptist, and communications from Confucius. He asserted that subsequent psychometric reading bore out, in each instance, the genuineness of the manifestation. Buchanan died December 26, 1899, in San Jose, California.

Bucke, R(ichard) M(aurice) (1837–1902)

British-born writer who grew up in Canada and practiced as a psychiatrist. He was born March 18, 1837, in Methwold, Norfolk, England. When only a year old, his father took him to Canada, where he was educated at London Grammar School and studied medicine at McGill University, graduating in 1862. He pursued additional studies in England and France, then he returned to Canada in 1864 to take up medical practice. In 1876 he became medical superintendent of the insane asylum in Hamilton, Ontario, and in 1878 was medical superintendent of the insane asylum in London, Ontario.

He became a great friend of poet Walt Whitman (1819–1892) and was fascinated by the recurring themes of spiritualism, human experience, and individual development in Whitman's writings. Around 1872 Bucke had what became for him a life-changing mystical experience which he called an "intellectual illumination." He spent the next thirty years seeking out other people who had a similar experience and reflecting upon the significance of such altering of consciousness. The literary result of his study, the book Cosmic Consciousness (1901), became a classic work on the subject. He theorized that a higher consciousness was a natural faculty in man at a certain state of development.

He became Whitman's literary executor and helped edit Whitman's complete writings in 1902, then wrote the first major biography of the poet. Bucke died February 19, 1902, in London, Ontario. His Cosmic Consciousness gave mystical experience a place in the secular world and provided psychiatry with a means of viewing religious experience in other than pathological terms.

Borrowing from Whitman's poem "Song of Myself," he wrote, "I saw and knew that the Cosmos is not dead matter but a living Presence that the soul of man is immortal, that the universe is so built and ordered that without any peradventure all things work together for the good of each and all, that the foundation principle of the world is what we call love and that the happiness of every one is in the long run absolutely certain."

Buckland, Raymond (Brian) (1934–)

Author and Wiccan high priest who, with his wife, Rosemary Buckland, introduced Gardnerian Witchcraft into the United States. Buckland was born August 31, 1934, in London, England, where he attended high school. He served in the Royal Air Force, 1957–59, and earned a Ph.D. in anthropology at King's College, Cambridge.

When he was 12 years old, Buckland's uncle loaned him a book on Spiritualism. A vivacious reader, in the 1950s he became familiar with the books of Margaret Murray and Gerald Gardner on Witchcraft. Buckland contacted Gardner and established a relationship with him and his priestess Monique Wilson (Lady Olwen). Shortly before Gardner's death in 1964, Buckland and his wife became Gardner's first American initiates, and they assumed the religious names Robat and Lady Rowan. After they moved to the United States in 1962, they began the first Gardnerian coven (an assembly or band of usually 13 witches. Whenever Americans contacted Gardner and his followers in England, they were referred to the Bucklands, thus establishing the Gardnerian movement in the United States. They also opened a Witchcraft Museum on Long Island modeled on the museum Gardner had established on the Isle of Man. Buckland also authored a set of books on Wicca, including Ancient and Modern Witchcraft (1970) and Witchcraft from the Inside (1975).

In the early 1970s Buckland divorced and began to disagree with some of the elements of the Gardnerian tradition. In 1973 he turned the leadership of the Gardnerian movement over to another couple, Lady Theos and Phoenix, and created a new non-secret form of Witchcraft that he called Seax (or Saxon) Wicca. He presented this new Witchcraft in a 1974 book, The Tree: The Complete Book of Saxon Witchcraft. That same year he also married Joan Helen Taylor, who became his new high priest.

Buckland then developed a correspondence course in Seax Wicca, which he offered through the 1970s. He also moved to Southern California where his approach to the craft evolved. He continued to write on a wide variety of magical and Witchcraft themes and his latest books include Practical Color Magick (1983), Complete Book of Witchcraft (1986), and the Secrets of Gypsy Fortunetelling (1988), which is of a series of books on gypsy occult practices. As of the mid-1990s, Buckland has written more than 20 books. One, a spoof on the books of James Churchward, was called Mu Revealed and appeared under the Pseudonym Tony Earll (an anagram for "not really"). Buckland also wrote novels under the pseudonym Jessica Wells.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. New York: Viking Press, 1979. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press, 1986.

———. Buckland's Complete Book of Witchcraft. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1986.

———. Doors to Other Worlds. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Books, 1993.

Guiley, Rosemary E. Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Witches. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Buckley, James Lord (ca. 1867–1947)

Pioneer British spiritualist and medium. He attracted large audiences in Yorkshire by his remarkable gift of clairaudience. He died January 14, 1947.

Budapest, Zsuzsanna E. (1940–)

Founder of the main branch of Dianic (feminist) Wicca and author of a number of books. Budapest was born Zsuzsanna Mokcsay in Budapest, Hungary, on January 30, 1940, but left in the wake Hungarian revolt of 1956. She moved to Austria and then to the United States, where she studied at the University of Chicago. She married and had two children, but the marriage ended in the late-1960s. In 1970 Budapest moved to California and became involved in the women's movement and in Witchcraft. She opened a feminist bookstore and began to develop a form of Wicca that would meld Gardnerian Witchcraft (based on the teachings of John Gardiner) and her growing feminist ideals. In 1976 she published The Feminist Book of Lights and Shadows, the basic text of what is known as Dianic Wicca.

Budapest was by this time the priestess of a feminist coven, the Susan B. Anthony Coven, in Venice, California. The coven began a newsletter, Themis (now Thesmorphoria), and in 1979 she and the coven relocated in the San Francisco Bay Area. Budapest opened the Women's Spirituality Forum, which gave Dianic Wicca a public outreach. Among her many books are The Holy Book of Women's Mysteries (1979) and The Grandmother of Time (1989).

Sources:

Budapest, Zsuzsanna E. The Feminist Book of Lights and Shadows. Venice, Calif.: Luna Publications, 1976.

———. The Grandmother of Time. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1989.

———. The Holy Book of Women's Mysteries. Los Angeles: Susan B. Anthony Coven Number One, 1979.

Guiley, Rosemary E. Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Witches. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Buer

According to Johan Weyer, Buer is a demon of the second class who has the form of a star and is gifted with a knowledge of philosophy and of the virtues of medicinal herbs. He gives domestic felicity and health to the sick. He has charge over 15 legions.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

BUFORA See British UFO Research Association

Buguet, Édouard (fl. 1875)

French spirit photographer who, in an alleged partial trance, produced remarkable likenesses of high artistic quality of deceased relatives of his sitters. Most of these spirit photographs represented well-known people, but comparatively obscure people also reported obtaining surprising evidence of spirit presence. Buguet's reputation rose, and he was acclaimed for the feat of photographing the double of the Rev. Stainton Moses in Paris while the medium was sitting in trance in London.

However, his successes in London in 1874 were negated by the huge scandal over spirit photography that broke out in Paris in April 1875. Buguet was arrested for fraud. After he confessed, he was sentenced to one year of imprisonment and a fine of 500 francs. In his confession he admitted that his spirit photographs were produced by double exposure. First he dressed up his assistant to play the part of the ghost; later he constructed a doll to replace the human assistant for the body of the ghost. The doll and a large stock of heads were seized by the police at Buguet's studio.

A verbatim account of the trial was published in Leymaire's book Procès des spirites (Paris, 1875). Leymaire's husband, who was editor of the Revue Spirite, admitted having suggested to Buguet to follow in the footsteps of W. H. Mumler, and he was also sentenced to one year's imprisonment and a fine of 500 francs. Many witnesses were confronted during the trial with Buguet. Even when Buguet repeated his confession, many protested and refused to doubt the evidence of their senses.

Stainton Moses believed that at least some of Buguet's spirit photographs were genuine and said that the persecution bore traces of clerical origin, that the judge was biased, and that Buguet must have been bribed or terrorized to confess and to manufacture a box full of trick apparatus. In an article in Human Nature in May 1875, Moses stated that out of 120 photographs produced by Buguet, evidence of recognition or of the operation being produced under test conditions was available in 40 cases.

William Howitt also spoke of an organized conspiracy of the Jesuits against Spiritualism. Lady Caithness was quoted by Epes Sargent as declaring that out of 13 spirit photographs obtained by Buguet, "we distinctly recognized the spirit forms of five dear ones whom we had never hoped to see again on earth. We were perfect strangers to the medium, who had never heard of us before. That there may be no doubt about the identity of my late husband, he brings in his hand the family crest and emblem." After his liberation, Buguet himself agreed, retracted his confession, declared that he was tricked into it, and stated that a promise had been held out that in case of confession he would be acquitted.

However, Camille Flammarion was convinced that Buguet cheated. In Mysterious Psychic Forces (1907), he stated that Buguet, "having allowed me to experiment with him, let me conduct my researches for five weeks before I detected his fraudulent methods and mechanism. While I was pushing my investigation a little farther I saw with my own eyes Buguet's prepared negatives." Buguet was but one prominent example of fraudulent psychic photography.

Builders of the Adytum

The Builders of the Adytum (BOTA) is a Western magical group in the tradition of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. It was founded by Paul Foster Case, an authority on Tarot and the Qabalah, who had been among the small group of American members of the Golden Dawn. Basic to the BOTA is the Qabalah, which is viewed as the ancient mystical wisdom of the Hebrews that has been adapted to modern life. Case believed that the ancient Hebrew prophets and even Jesus were versed in the Qabalistic wisdom.

The Qabalah (also spelled Kabala or Kabbalah) describes the emanation of the cosmos from the transcendent God. The resultant structure is pictured in a diagram called the Tree of Life. The Tree of Life is a picture of both the objective world and the landscape of the human psyche. The major realms of the cosmos are described in ten realms called sephirots. The sephirots are connected by a system of paths, 22 in number. The different parts of the cosmos reflect the pattern of the whole and the whole of existence is tied together in a complex system of correspondences between the macrocosm and microcosm. The modern Tarot has been reworked so as to correlate with qabalistic symbology.

BOTA is organized as an ancient mystery school. As they grow spiritually members attempt to live out the truth of the Oneness of God, the brotherhood of man, and the kinship of all life. Their social outlook is stated in seven values: 1. Universal Peace; 2. Universal Political Freedom; 3. Universal Religious Freedom; 4. Universal Education; 5. Universal Health; 6. Universal Prosperity; and 7. Universal Spiritual Unfoldment. Members engage in a program of high magic aimed at the transmutation of personality using the Qabalah and Tarot. Once transformed, individuals are able to alter their environment as they desire.

BOTA is headquartered in Los Angeles, California. It is headed by a board of stewards. There is both an outer school and an inner school for the more serious students. A procurator general coordinates the activities of the two schools. There are a number of groups called pronaos located across the United States and in various countries of the world where members may gather for study and group work.

Both Case and his successor Ann Davies have written books covering the basics of BOTA teachings, especially the work with the Tarot.

Sources:

Case, Paul Foster. The Book of Tokens. Los Angeles: B.O.T.A., 1947.

———. The Tarot. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1947.

———. The True and Invisible Rosicrucian Order. The Author, 1928.

Davies, Ann. Thoughts on the Tarot. Burbank, Calif.: Candlelight Press, 1983.

Frazer, Felix J. Parallel Paths to the Unseen Worlds. Los Angeles: Builders of the Adytum, 1967.

Bull, Titus (1871–1946)

New York physician. He was a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science and the director of the James H. Hyslop Foundation for the treatment of cases of obsession by psychic methods.

Bull was a close friend of the distinguished psychic researcher James H. Hyslop (1854–1920). Hyslop had already concluded that some individuals believed to be insane might be victims of spirit obsession. When Hyslop was dying, he requested Bull to carry on investigating this hypothesis. As a responsible physician, Bull first sought conventional explanations and treatment of mental breakdowns, but in certain instances where normal diagnosis and treatment seemed ineffective, he looked for a psychic cause. His procedure in such cases was to bring the patient into contact with a medium who had no prior knowledge of the patient to elicit forgotten memories and sometimes describe obsessing entities.

Helen C. Lambert, secretary to Bull, wrote in Psychic Science (July 1927):

"Of patients whom I have seen cured by Dr. Bull's method, three had been in State institutions for the insane, and one of these had to be restrained in a straight jacket. This last is a young girl who is now trying to obtain a position that will enable her to leave the difficult home environment which had much to do with her breakdown. Another is a woman who had been in five different institutions, twice in the Boris Sidis Sanitorium, and was considered incurable when she came to Dr. Bull. Some of the patients are persons who had not reached the point of being put under restraint, and whose condition was only incipient. Certain nervous cases have been persons who were not actually obsessed, but rather overshadowed by entities who pressed too close to them, casting on the patients a reflection of their bodily memories and ills, and causing dissociation."

Mrs. Duke, Dr. Bull's medium through whom he pleaded with the obsessing entities, was a woman of education. At first she was completely conscious of the messages that were given through her, but later speech control developed and proceedings became easier and more efficient. Under the title Analysis of Unusual Experiences in Healing Relative to Diseased Minds and Results of Materialism Foreshadowed (1932), Bull published his conclusions after 20 years of research. He ascribed the possibility of obsession to some accidental alteration in the nervous system and fully endorsed the Spiritualistic methods of cure. Somewhat similar work to that of Bull was carried out by Dr. Carl A. Wickland in Los Angeles, California.

Sources:

Bull, Titus. "Mental Obsession and the Latent Faculty." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 32 (1938): 260.

———. "Resistance to Metaphysical Science." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 17 (1927): 645.

Bune

According to Johan Weyer, Bune is a most powerful demon, one of the Grand Dukes of the Infernal Regions. His form is that of a man. He does not speak save by signs only. He removes corpses, haunts cemeteries, and marshals the demons around tombs and the places of the dead. He enriches and renders eloquent those who serve him. Thirty legions of the infernal army obey his call. The demons under his authority are called Bunis and are regarded by the Tartars as exceedingly evil. Their power is great and their number immense. But their sorcerers are ever in communication with these demons by means of whom they carry on their dark practices.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils, and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.

Bunyip

Legendary roaring monster of aboriginal peoples of Australia. The bunyip is said to live at the bottom of lakes and water holes, into which it drags its victims. The name implies "devil," although bunyips have been given other local names, such as "yaa-loo" and "wowee-wowee."

Some claim that the creature really exists. In 1939, to verify its existence, Gilbert Whitely of the Australian Museum collected reports of a number of sightings. Throughout the nineteenth century, explorers reported seeing and sometimes hearing bunyips, which appeared to be furry, with a dog-like head, long neck, and fins. Whitely concluded, "The bunyip has been thought to have been an extinct marsupial otter-like animal, rumors of whose existence have been handed down in aboriginal legends, the latter corrupted and confused with crocodiles in the north of Australia and seals in the south."

Sources:

Costello, Peter. In Search of Lake Monsters. New York: Coward, McCann & Geohegan, 1974. Reprint, London: Panther, 1975.

Bureau for the Investigation of Paranormal Photographs

Organization concerned with research on psychic photography. It continued the work first launched by the Society for the Study of Supernormal Pictures, which was dissolved in 1923. Its archives contained a wide range of examples, ranging from Mumler's spirit photography of the 1860s to photographs of paranormal or psychic phenomena. Current address unknown.

Burgot, Pierre (d. 1521)

A werewolf burned at Besançon, France, in 1521 together with Michel Verdun. In his confession, Burgot stated that 19 years earlier he had been collecting his flock of sheep during a great thunderstorm, when he was accosted by three demon horsemen, clad in black. One of these demons asked what troubled him, to which Burgot replied that he was afraid that his sheep might be attacked by wild beasts. The demon told him that if he would serve him as master and renounce God, Our Lady, the company of Heaven, and his baptism, all his sheep would be safe. He would also have money.

Burgot acknowledged the demon. Later, in company with Michel Verdun, he attended a Sabbat of warlocks, where he stripped naked and was anointed with an unguent, after which his limbs became hairy and his feet like those of a beast. Verdun also changed his form, and they both ran like the wind. In the shape of wolves they pursued and attacked children and committed other hideous crimes.

Sources:

Summers, Montague. The Werewolf. London, Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 1933. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Burgoyne, Thomas H. (1855–1894)

Thomas H. Burgoyne, an astrologer and founder of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor, was born April 14, 1855, and grew up in his native Scotland. Spontaneously psychic, he claimed that as a child he came into contact with the Brotherhood of Light, a group of discarnate, advanced beings who attempt to guide the destiny of humankind. Today that group continues as the Church of Light. At a later date he met a M. Theon, purported to be an earthly representative of the brotherhood who taught Burgoyne about the Brotherhood.

Burgoyne moved to the United States around 1880 and soon afterward his writings began to appear in various periodicals. He was brought into contact with Norman Astley of Carmel, California, who also claimed to be in contact with the Brotherhood of Light. Astley suggested that Burgoyne write a set of lessons to introduce the brotherhood's teachings to the public, and Burgoyne accepted Astley's hospitality at Carmel while he worked on the lessons. They were published in 1889 as The Light of Egypt. The writing of the lessons occasioned the establishment of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor as an esoteric occult order and outer expression of the Brotherhood of Light. The Hermetic Brotherhood was structured with three leaders, a seer, a scribe/secretary, and an astrologer. Burgoyne became the scribe.

As Burgoyne understood it, the Brotherhood of Light was an occult order formed to oppose the dominant religious powers of the day in ancient Egypt. As the members died, they continued the brotherhood from their new plane of being.

Burgoyne wrote several more books, including The Language of the Stars (1892), Celestial Dynamics (1896), and a second volume of The Light of Egypt (1900). He died in March 1894, in Humboldt County, California, still a relatively young man, before the last two were published. Henry and Belle Wagner continued his work. Henry Wagner owned the Astro-Philosophical Publishing House in Denver, Colorado, which published Burgoyne's books. Belle M. Wagner succeeded Burgoyne as scribe of the Hermetic Brotherhood.

Occult historian Arthur Edward Waite claimed that Burgoyne was, in fact, a name assumed by Thomas Henry Dalton, who had been imprisoned in Leeds, England, in 1883, on charges of fraud. Waite asserts that it was only after his release that he met a Peter Davidson (also known as M. Theon and Norman Astley), the real founder of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor. Waite asserts that Dalton fled to the United States to escape the scandal of his arrest and continued the work of the order in California.

Sources:

Burgoyne, Thomas H. Celestial Dynamics. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing, 1896.

———. The Language of the Stars. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing, 1892.

———. The Light of Egypt. 2 vols. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing, 1889, 1900.

Burial with Feet to the East

It was an early custom for Christians to bury their dead with the feet toward the east and the head toward the west. Various reasons were given for this practice, some authorities stating that the corpse was placed thus in preparation for the resurrection, when the dead would rise with their faces toward the east. Others think this mode of burial was practiced in imitation of the posture of prayer.

A possibly related custom is the belief that a body must be carried into a churchyard or cemetery "with the sun," that is, in the direction of sunset, from east to west.

Burland, C(ottie) A(rthur) (1905–1983)

Ethnographer, author, and authority on mythology in relation to the occult. He was born September 17, 1905, in Kensington, London, and studied at Regent Street Polytechnic. Except for his time of service in the Royal Air Force during World War II, he served for 40 years as a civil servant in the Department of Ethnography, British Museum, London (1925–65). He was a fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute and a member of the Société de Americanistes de Paris, the British Society of Aesthetics, and the Folk-Lore Society (London). In 1965 he received the Imago Mundi Award.

Burland authored numerous books about ancient civilizations and primitive people, notably on the peoples of the ancient Americas—the Mayans, Incas, and Aztecs. His studies in these areas were of special importance, since the Incas had no written language, while the Mayan language was virtually obliterated by the destruction of Aztec manuscripts by early Spanish missionaries.

His studies led him into the study of magical practice among pre-industrial peoples, his 1953 Magic Books from Mexico being a first product of this interest. He later produced a series of books on magic in general including The Magical Arts: A Short History (1966), The Arts of the Alchemists (1967; 1968), Beyond Science: A Journey into the Supernatural (1972), Echoes of Magic: A Study of Seasonal Festivals Through the Ages (1972), and Secrets of the Occult (1972). He was a member of the editorial board of the comprehensive encyclopedia Man, Myth, and Magic (1970).

BURMA See MYANMAR

Burns, James (d. 1894)

Pioneer British Spiritualist and publisher, who founded the influential weekly newspaper the Medium in 1869, later absorbed with the Daybreak. Burns also established the Progressive Library and Spiritual Institution in Holborn, London, 1863. With their annual subscription, members were entitled to borrow from the thousands of Spiritualist publications available. The institute was also a center and meeting place for Spiritualists in London and organized programs of séances, developing circles and concerts. Burns was criticized because he opposed such other organizations as the National Association of Spiritualists. However, he established a great reputation as a courageous and tireless worker in the cause of Spiritualism. He died December 30, 1894.

Burt, Sir Cyril (Lodowic) (1883–1971)

Professor of psychology and psychic researcher. He was born March 3, 1883, in London and studied at Oxford University (M.A., D.Sc.). In 1932 he married Joyce Muriel Wood. Burt was psychologist for the London County Council (1913–32) and professor of education at the University of London (1924–31) prior to assuming his post as professor of psychology at University College, London (1931–50). During his career as a psychologist, he concentrated on the role of heredity in the development of intelligence and the application of psychology to education. He was the author of a number of books, edited the British Journal of Statistical Psychology, was president of the Psychological Section of the British Association in 1923, and was president of the British Psychological Society in 1942. He was knighted in 1946.

Burt had a special interest in parapsychology. He assisted the young student Samuel G. Soal, who began his career in parapsychology in Burt's laboratory. Burt carried on studies with mediums and did theoretical work on the nature of survival. He also promoted the need to understand perception in light of our knowledge of parapsychology. Besides a number of papers in parapsychological journals, he authored Psychology and Psychical Research (1968).

Burt died October 10, 1971. Since then it has been discovered that he doctored data to support his work on heredity and intelligence and appropriated other people's work as his own. The revelation of fraud and plagiarism has led to much of his early work being set aside.

Sources:

Burt, Cyril. Psychology and Psychical Research. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1968.

Hearnshaw, L. S. Cyril Burt, Psychologist. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1979.

Busardier (ca. seventeenth century)

A practitioner of alchemy of whom few particulars are recorded. He is said to have lived at Prague with a noble courtier. Falling sick and feeling the approach of death, he sent a letter to his friend Richtausen at Vienna, asking him to come and stay with him during his last moments. Richtausen set out at once but on arriving at Prague found that Busardier was dead.

On inquiring if the adept had left anything behind him, the steward of the nobleman with whom he had lived stated that only some powder had been left which the nobleman desired to preserve. Richtausen by some means got possession of the powder and took his departure. On discovering this, the nobleman threatened to hang his steward if he did not recover the powder. The steward, surmising that no one but Richtausen could have taken the powder, armed himself and set out in pursuit.

Overtaking him on the road, he drew a pistol on Richtausen and made him hand over the powder. Richtausen, however, contrived to keep a considerable quantity. Knowing the value of the powder, Richtausen presented himself to Emperor Ferdinand, himself an alchemist, and gave him a quantity of the powder. The emperor, assisted by his mine master Count Russe, succeeded in converting three pounds of mercury into gold by means of one grain of the powder. The emperor is said to have commemorated the event by having a medal struck bearing the effigy of Apollo with the caduceus of Mercury and an appropriate motto.

Richtausen was ennobled under the title of "Baron Chaos." A. E. Waite, in his Lives of Alchemistical Philosophers (1888), stated:

"Among many transformations performed by the same powder was one by the Elector of Mayence, in 1651. He made projections with all the precautions possible to a learned and skilful philosopher. The powder enclosed in gum tragacanth to retain it effectually, was put into the wax of a taper, which was lighted, the wax being then placed at the bottom of a cruet. These preparations were undertaken by the Elector himself. He poured four ounces of quicksilver on the wax, and put the whole into a fire covered with charcoal above, below and around. Then they began blowing to the utmost, and in about half an hour on removing the coals, they saw that the melted gold was over red, the proper colour being green. The baron said the matter was yet too high and it was necessary to put some silver into it. The Elector took some coins out of his pocket, put them into the melting pot, combined the liquefied silver with the matter in the cruet, and having poured out the whole when in perfect fusion into a lingot, he found after cooling, that it was very fine gold, but rather hard, which was attributed to the lingot. On again melting, it became exceedingly soft and the Master of the Mint declared to His Highness that it was more than twenty-four carats and that he had never seen so fine a quality of the precious metal."

Sources:

Waite, A. E. Lives of the Alchemical Philosophers. London: George Redway, 1888. Reprinted as Alchemists through the Ages. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1970.

Butcher, Samuel Henry (1850–1910)

Distinguished classical scholar and professor of Greek at University of Edinburgh (1882–1903). He was born April 16, 1850, in Dublin, Ireland, and studied at Marlborough College, and Trinity College, Cambridge (senior classic and chancellors medalist, 1873; M.A. 1876). He was a member of parliament for Cambridge University (1906) and an honorary fellow of University College, Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge.

Butcher was not himself involved in psychic research but was a close friend of some of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research, London. After his death he was claimed to be a leading "communicator" in a famous cross correspondence experiment. He died December 29, 1910.

Butler, Walter (Ernest) (1898–1978)

Author of books on magic and other occult subjects. He was born August 23, 1898, in England. In 1924 he married Gladys Irene Newell. After serving in the British Army (1917–29), he worked for many years as an engineer (1929–56). From 1956 to 1963 he was a member of the technical staff in charge of physical chemistry, department workshop, at University of Southampton, England.

He began experimenting with magical studies as a child and studied yoga while stationed in India with the British Army. In England, he became associated for a time with occultist Dion Fortune and her Fraternity of the Inner Light. In 1954 Butler was active in the Southampton Group of the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies. His teachings and many books formed the substance of the magical Servants of the Light Association. His The Magician: His Training and Work (1959) is a classic text for basic magical training.

Sources:

Butler, Walter E. Apprenticed to Magic. 1962. Reprint, Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1990.

———. How to Read the Aura, Practice Psychometry, Telepathy, and Clairvoyance. New York: Warner Destiny Books, 1978.

———. An Introduction to Telepathy. 1975.

———. Magic: Its Ritual, Power, and Purpose. London: Aquarian Press, 1952.

———. The Magician: His Training and Work. London: The Aquarian Press, 1959. Reprint, North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book, 1959.

Butter, Witches'

According to old superstition, the devil gave the witches of Sweden cats, which were called carriers, because they were sent by their mistresses to steal in the neighborhood. On such occasions, the greedy animals could not resist satisfying their own appetites. Sometimes they ate to repletion and were obliged to disgorge their stolen meal. Their vomit, found in kitchen gardens, was a yellow color, and it was called witches' butter.

C

C.O.G.

Initials for Children of God, a charismatic Christianity group founded in the late 1960s and now known as The Family.

Caacrinolaas

According to Johan Weyer, Caacrinolaas is the Grand President of Hell. He is also known as Caasimolar and Glasya and is represented in the shape of a god with the wings of a griffin. He is supposed to inspire knowledge of the liberal arts and to incite homicides. It is also believed that this fiend is able to render people invisible. He commands 36 legions of devils.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1991.

Cabinet

The curtain-enclosed space in which mediums claim to condense the psychic energy necessary for séance-room manifestations. Hereward Carrington suggested an electrical analogy: less expenditure of energy is required to charge a small electric conductor to a given voltage than a large one, so it may be with the cabinet, "which acts as a sort of storage battery, retaining the energy and liberating it in bundles of quanta during the séance."

Nineteenth-century biblical scholar Allen Putnam saw the ark of the covenant as an interesting model by which to understand the Spiritualist cabinet:

"The ark of the covenant was constructed expressly for use as a spirit battery, or an instrument through which to give forth the commands of the Lord. The special care taken to have the ark and all its appurtenances charged with the auras or magnetisms of a selected class of workmen, becomes very interesting in these days when much wonder is expressed at the customary stickling of spirits and mediums for right conditions. Biblical history furnishes precedent for great particularity, when constructing a cabinet for manifestations."

The cabinet is usually of very simple construction. It need not be more than a curtain thrown across a corner of the room. The Davenport brothers employed a special one. It had three doors; the middle door had a curtained opening on the top. Through this opening, phantom hands were immediately thrust out after the doors were shut on the mediums tied within to their seats. However, such an elaborate arrangement suggests a conjuror's apparatus, and the phenomenon of the Davenports is considered by many people to have been a stage illusion. It is described in some detail by Houdini in A Magician among the Spirits.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, many of the famous mediums, such as D. D. Home and Stainton Moses, had never used the cabinet. Through the course of the twentieth century it has gone almost entirely out of use; the majority of contemporary psychics and channels have never used the cabinet.

Sources:

Houdini, Harry. A Magician among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Putnam, Allen. Bible Marvel Workers. Boston, 1876.

Cabiri (or Cabeiri)

A group of minor deities of Greek origin. The name appears to be of Semitic origin, signifying the "great gods," and the Cabiri seem to have been connected in some manner with the sea, protecting sailors and vessels. The chief seats of their worship were Lemnos, Samothrace, Thessalia, and Boeotia. They were originally only two in number, the elder identified with Dionysus, and the younger with Hermes, who was also known as Cadmilus.

Their worship was later amalgamated with that of Demeter and Ceres, with the result that two sets of Cabiri came into being—Dionysus and Demeter, and Cadmilus and Ceres. A Greek writer of the second century B.C.E. states that they were four in number—Axisros, Axiokersa, Axiokersos, and Casmilus, corresponding, he states, to Demeter, Persephone, Hades, and Hermes.

The Romans identified the Cabiri with the Penates, the Roman gods of the household. A festival of these deities was held annually in Lemnos and lasted nine days, during which all domestic and other fires were extinguished and sacred fire was brought from Delos. From this fact it has been judged that the Cabiri may have been volcanic demons, although this view has largely been abandoned.

It was in Samothrace that the cult of the Cabiri attained its widest significance, and in that island as early as the fifth century B.C.E., their mysteries, or religious rites, were held with great enthusiasm and attracted almost universal attention. Initiation into this cult was regarded as a safeguard against misfortune of all kinds, and persons of distinction exerted all their influence to become initiates. Interesting details as to the bacchanal cult of the Cabiri were obtained in 1888 by the excavation of their temple near Thebes. Statues of a deity called Cabeiros were found, attended by a boy cupbearer. His attributes appear to be bacchic.

The Cabiri were often mentioned as powerful magicians, and Herodotus and other writers speak of the Cabiri as sons of Vulcan. Cicero, however, regarded them as the children of Proserpine, and Jupiter was often named as their father. Strabo, on the other hand, regarded them as the ministers of Hecate, and Bochart recognized in them the three principal infernal deities, Pluto, Proserpine, and Mercury. Although it is assumed that they were originally of Semitic origin, a temple of Memphis was found consecrated to them in Egypt. It is not unlikely, as Herodotus supposed, that the cult was Pelasgian in origin, as it is known that the Pelasgians occupied the island of Samothrace and established there certain mysteries, which they afterward carried to Athens. There are also traditions that the worship of the Cabiri originally came from the Troad (territory surrounding the ancient city of Troy), a Semitic center. In his book The Egypt of Herodotus (1841), John Kenrick brings forward the following conclusions concerning the Cabiri:

"1. The existence of the worship of the Cabiri at Memphis under a pygmy form, and its connection with the worship of Vulcan. The coins of Thessalonica also establish this connection; those which bear the legend 'Kabeiros' having a figure with a hammer in his hand, the pileus and apron of Vulcan, and sometimes an anvil near the feet.

"2. The Cabiri belonged also to the Phoenician theology. The proofs are drawn from the statements of Herodotus. Also the coins of Cossyra, a Phoenician settlement, exhibit a dwarfish figure with the hammer and short apron, and sometimes a radiated head, apparently allusive to the element of fire, like the star of the Dioscuri.

"3. The isle of Lemnos was another remarkable seat of the worship of the Cabiri and of Vulcan, as representing the element of fire. Mystic rites were celebrated here over which they presided, and the coins of the island exhibit the head of Vulcan, or a Cabirus, with the pileus, hammer, and forceps. It was this connection with fire, metallurgy, and the most remarkable product of the act, weapons of war, which caused the Cabiri to be identified with the Cureks of Etolia, the Idaei Dactyli of Crete, the Corybantes of Phrygia, and the Telchines of Rhodes. They were the same probably in Phoenician origin, the same in mystical and orgiastic rites, but different in number, genealogy, and local circumstances, and by the mixture of other mythical traditions, according to the various countries in which their worship prevailed. The fable that one Cabirus had been killed by his brother or brothers was probably a moral mythus representing the result of the invention of armor and analogous to the story of the mutual destruction of the men in brazen armor, who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus and Jason. It is remarkable that the name of the first fratricide signifies a 'lance,' and in Arabic a 'smith.'

"4. The worship of the Cabiri prevailed also in Imbros, near the entrance of the Hellespont, which makes it probable that the great gods in the neighboring island of Samothrace were of the same origin. The Cabiri, Curetes, and Corybantes appear to have represented air as well as fire. This island was inhabited by Pelasgi, who may have derived from the neighboring country of Thrace and Phrygia, and with the old Pelasgic mysteries of Ceres. Hence the various explanations given of the Samothracian deities, and the number of them so differently stated, some making them two, some four, some eight, the latter agreeing with the number of early Egyptian gods mentioned by Herodotus. It is still probable that their original number was two, from their identification with the Dioscuri and Tyndaridae, and from the number of the Pataeci on Phoenician vessels. The addition of Vulcan as their father or brother made them three, and a fourth may have been their mother Cabira.

"5. The Samothracian divinities continued to be held in high veneration in late times, but are commonly spoken of in connection with navigation, as the twin Dioscuri or Tyndaridae; on the other hand the Dioscuri are spoken of as the Curetes or Corybantes. The coins of Tripolis exhibit the spears and star of the Dioscuri, with the legend 'Cabiri.'

"6. The Roman Penates have been identified with the Dioscuri, and Dionysius states that he had seen two figures of ancient workmanship, representing youths armed with spears, which, from an antique inscription on them, he knew to be meant for Penates. So, the 'Lares' of Etruria and Rome.

"7. The worship of the Cabiri furnishes the key to the wanderings of Aeneas, the foundation of Rome, and the War of Troy itself, as well as the Argonautic expedition. Samothrace and the Troad were so closely connected in this worship, that it is difficult to judge in which of the two it originated, and the gods of Lavinium, the supposed colony from Troy, were Samothracian. Also the Palladium, a pygmy image, was connected at once with Aeneas and the Troad, with Rome, Vesta, and the Penates, and the religious belief and traditions of several towns in the south of Italy."

Kenrick also recognizes a mythical personage in Aeneas, whose attributes were derived from those of the Cabiri, and continues with some interesting observations on the Homeric fables. He concludes that the essential part of the War of Troy originated in the desire to connect together and explain the traces of an ancient religion. He also notes one other remarkable circumstance, that the countries in which the Samothracian and Cabiriac worship prevailed were peopled either by the Pelasgi or by the Aeolians, who of all the tribes comprehended under the general name Hellenes, approach the most nearly in antiquity and language to the Pelasgi.

"We seem warranted, then," Kenrick observes, "in two conclusions; first that the Pelasgian tribes in Italy, Greece and Asia were united in times reaching high above the commencement of history, by community of religious ideas and rites, as well as letters, arts, and language. Secondly, large portions of what is called the heroic history of Greece, are nothing else than fictions devised to account for the traces of this affinity, when time and the ascendancy of other nations had destroyed the primitive connection, and rendered the cause of the similarity obscure. The original derivation of the Cabiriac system from Phoenicia and Egypt is a less certain, though still highly probable conclusion."

Kenrick also concluded that "the name Cabiri has been very generally deduced from the Phoenician 'mighty' and this etymology is in accordance with the fact that the gods of Samothrace were called 'Divi potes.'"

Kenrick believed, however, that the Phoenicians used some other name, which the Greeks translated "Kabeiros," and that it denoted the two elements of fire and wind.

In his book India in Greece (1856), Edward Pococke claims the Cabiri were the "Khyberi," or people of the "Khyber," or a Buddhist tribe—a totally unlikely origin for them. In the Generations of Sanchoniathon, the Cabiri are claimed as Phoenicians, although in a mystical sense. According to the myth, the Wind and the Night gave birth to two moral men, Aeon and Protogonus. The immediate descendants of these two were "Genus" and "Genea," a man and woman. To Genus were born three mortal children, Phôs, Pur, and Phlox, who discovered fire, and these again fathered sons of vast bulk and height, whose names were given to the mountains in which they dwelt, Cassiul, Libanus, Antilibanus, and Brathu. The issue of these giant men by their own mothers were Meinrumus, Hypsuranius, and Usous. Hypsuranius inhabited Tyre; Usous becoming a huntsman, consecrated two pillars to fire and the wind with the blood of the wild beasts that he captured.

Much later, from the race of Hypsuranius issued Agreus and Halieus, inventors, it is said, of the arts of hunting and fishing. From these descended two brothers, one of whom was Chrysor (or Hephaestus), skilled in words, charms, and divinations; he also invented boats and was the first to sail. His brother first built walls with bricks, and their descendants in the second generation seem to have completed the invention of houses by the addition of courts, porticos, and crypts. They are called Aletae and Titans, and in their time began animal husbandry and hunting with dogs. From the Titans descended Amynus, a builder, and Magus, who taught men to construct villages and tend flocks, and of these two were begotten Misor (perhaps Mizraim), whose name signifies Well-freed, and Sydic, whose name denotes the Just; these discovered the use of salt.

From Misor descended Taautus (Thoth, Athothis, or Hermes Trismegistus), who invented letters; and from Sydic descended the Dioscuri, or Cabiri, or Corybantes, or Samothraces. According to Sanchoniathon, first built a complete ship and others descended from them who discovered medicine and charms. All this dates prior to Babylon and the gods of paganism, the elder of whom are next introduced in the Generations.

Finally, Sanchoniathon settles Poseidon (Neptune) and the Cabiri at Berytus, but not till circumcision, the sacrifice of human beings, and the portrayal of the gods had been introduced. He describes the Cabiri as husbandmen and fishermen, which leads to the presumption that the people who worshiped those ancient gods were at length called by their name. The method of initiation unto the cult was as follows:

"The candidate for initiation was crowned with a garland of olive, and wore a purple band round his loins. Thus attired, and prepared by secret ceremonies (probably mesmeric), he was seated on a throne brilliantly lighted, and the other initiates then danced round him in hieroglyphic measures. It may be imagined that solemnities of this nature would easily degenerate into orgies of the most immoral tendency, as the ancient faith and reverence for sacred things perished, and such was really the case. Still, the primitive institution was pure in form and beautiful in its mystic signification, which passed from one ritual to another, till its last glimmer expired in the freemasonry of a very recent period. The general idea represented was the passage through death to a higher life, and while the outward senses were held in the thrall of magnetism, it is probable that revelations, good or evil, were made to the high priests of these ceremonies." '

It is extremely difficult to arrive at any conclusion regarding the origin of the Cabiri, but they were probably of Semitic origin, arriving in Greece through Phoenician influence, and that they approximated in character the gods with whom the Greeks identified them is extremely likely.

Sources:

Bryant, Jacob. A New System; or an Analysis of Ancient Mythology. 3 vols. 1776. Reprint, New York: Garland, 1979.

Varro, Marcus Terrentius. De Lingua Latina. Translated as On the Latin Language. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958.

Cacodaemons

Ancient deities of inferior rank—one of whom it was believed was attached to each mortal from his birth as a constant companion—capable of giving impulses and acting as a sort of messenger between the gods and men. The cacodaemons were of a hostile nature, as opposed to the agathodaemons, who were friendly. It is said that one of the cacodaemons who appeared to Cassius was a man of huge stature and of a black hue. Early astrologers named the twelfth house of the sun Cacodemon, as its influence was regarded as evil.

It is said that the cacodaemons were the rebellious angels who were expelled from heaven for their crimes. They tried in vain to obtain settlement in various parts of the universe, with their final abode believed to be all the space between Earth and the stars. There they abide, hated by all the elements and finding their pleasure in revenge and injury. Their king was called Hades by the Greeks, Typhon by the Egyptians, and Ahrimanes by the Persians and Chaldeans.

Sources:

Kendrick, Tertius T. C. The Kako-daemon or The Cavern of Anti-Paros. London, 1825.

Cactomite

A marvelous stone believed by ancient peoples to possess occult properties. Anyone wearing it was supposed to be assured of victory in battle.

Caddy, Eileen (1917–) and Peter Caddy (1917–1994)

Peter and Eileen Caddy, cofounders of the Findhorn Community in Scotland, one of the major disseminating points of the New Age Movement of the 1970s and 1980s, were both born and raised in England. As a young man, Peter was apprenticed to learn the hotel and catering business. When World War II (1939–45) began, he joined the Royal Air Force. His real spiritual quest began in India where he met a holy man, Ram Sareek Singh. Eileen, in the meantime, had married a RAF officer and met Peter in Iraq, where both he and her husband had been stationed. They became friends and upon their return to England began an affair. When the affair became known, it led to her divorce. As the divorce process was going forth, Eileen traveled to Glastonbury, where she had a mystical experience in which a voice spoke to her. The voice, which she believed to be that of God, told her that she and Peter had been brought together to do a specific work.

In 1956, Peter and Eileen moved to Scotland and began to live together in a common-law relationship. Peter worked as a hotel manager and Eileen emerged as a channel and daily supplied guidance. All was well until 1963 when Peter was fired. They found themselves broke and they moved into a small trailer home in a caravan park on Findhorn Bay. They were joined by Dorothy McLean, a former employee who shared their spiritual life.

Several years after settling at Findhorn, some of the texts of Eileen's guidance were gathered into a pamphlet entitled "God Spoke to Me" and sent out to various groups who shared their basic view of the cosmos. These groups were generally called "Light" groups in that they believed in a mission of channeling spiritual light to the world. That mission had been derived from the teaching of theosophist Alice A. Bailey. The pamphlet added the Caddys to the network of Light groups and also led people to Findhorn, where a community began to grow.

In their early years at Findhorn, the Caddys had grown their own food and in the process learned to communicate with what they believed were nature spirits. This relationship led to some spectacular agricultural success in the poor soil and limited growing season of northern Scotland. The abundance of the Findhorn garden became part of the legend of Findhorn.

Among the people who joined the community in the early 1970s was David Spangler. He would be among the first people to lead the Light groups to a vision of the New Age, the idea that not only was it the task of the groups to channel spiritual light to the world, but that the end of the twentieth century was a particularly good time to engage in such activity. Spangler came to believe that a new level of spiritual energy was becoming available, and if enough humans cooperated with it, a planetary transformation to a new age of peace and light would emerge. As this teaching was accepted by the other Light groups, what became known as the New Age Movement was born.

Findhorn prospered as the New Age Movement became an international phenomenon. The Caddys traveled the world to teach and lecture. Eileen's channeled material became the source of several books, beginning with an expanded edition of God Spoke to Me. As she had predicted, in 1975, Peter purchased the Cluny Hill Hotel, which he had previously managed, to provide space for an expanded program and housing for the growing number of visitors.

Unfortunately, by the end of the 1970s, Eileen and Peter had drifted apart and in 1982, they were divorced. Eileen remained at Findhorn as part of the expanded leadership and authored several books, including her autobiography, Flight to Freedom. Peter moved to the United States and became the leader of a new center, The Gathering of the Ways. He remarried and continued to travel and teach until his death on February 18, 1994.

Sources:

Caddy, Eileen. The Dawn of Change. Forres, Scotland: Findhorn Foundation, 1979.

———. Flight to Freedom. Longmead, Dorset, UK: Element Books, 1988.

Elixer [pseudonym of Eileen Caddy]. God Spoke to Me. Forres, Scotland: The Author, 1967. Expanded edition, Forres, Scoland: Findhorn Foundation, 1971.

Hawken, Paul. The Spirit of Findhorn. New York: Harper, 1975.

Cadoret, Remi Jere (1928–)

Assistant professor, Department of Physiology, University of Manitoba Medical College, Winnipeg, Canada, and member of the Parapsychological Association and Canadian Physiological Society. He was born March 28, 1928, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and educated at Harvard University (B.A., 1949), Yale University (M.D., 1953).

Cadoret conducted tests in ESP, reported in the Journal of Parapsychology. In 1977 he was treasurer of the Parapsychological Association, Durham, North Carolina.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cadoret, Remi J. "Effect of Novelty in Test Conditions on ESP Performance." Journal of Parapsychology 16 (1952).

———. "An Exploratory Experiment: Continuous EEG Recoding During Clairvoyant Card Tests." Journal of Parapsychology 28 (1964).

Cadoret, Remi J., and J. Fahler. "ESP Card Tests of College Students With and Without Hypnosis." Journal of Parapsychology 22 (1958).

Cadoret, Remi J., and J. G. Pratt. "The Consistent Missing Effect in ESP." Journal of Parapsychology 14 (1950).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Caduceus

The caduceus, an esoteric symbol picturing two serpents coiled around a rod, is one of the most ancient symbols in the Middle East. Serpents always carried very opposite connotations. They were beautifully decorated creatures who symbolized wisdom. In many cases they also carried a deadly venom and their bite killed. The ancient Hebrews saw the serpent in the Garden of Eden as the instrument of humanity's fall from innocence. While in the wilderness, many were bitten by serpents and, according to the story, Moses lifted up a brass image of a serpent coiled around a rod (Num. 21:8–9). Those who looked upon the serpent were healed. Throughout Mesopotamia, the serpent was associated with healing deities. Thus did it find its most common use as the symbol of physicians. While probably originating in Mesopotamia, the caduceus found its way eastward to India and westward into the Mediterranean. It is associated with the use of paired serpents in general such as those on the Egyptian Pharaoh's headpiece or the serpents coiled around the body of Mithras. In Greek lore, Hermes (the Roman Mercury) came upon two serpents fighting. He thrust his rod between them. They coiled around the rod and remained attached to it. Thus, the caduceus emerged as the symbol of messenger of the God. In Greek thought, the caduceus acquired wings. In India, the caduceus became associated with the kundalini or serpent power, the latent power believed to lie as a coiled serpent at the base of the spine. As spiritual consciousness awakens, the energy travels up the spine to the top of the head. In Roman thought, the caduceus was a symbol of moral equilibrium and good conduct.

Over the centuries, the caduceus was brought into the esoteric Gnostic tradition and reappears as symbolic of power and the balance between positive and negative or darkness and light. It has a special place in the rich iconography of speculative Freemasonry. As Eastern and Western symbology has mixed and merged in the twentieth century, the ancient caduceus has emerged as a symbol of enlightenment and acquisition of the ancient wisdom.

Sources:

Cirlot, J. E. A Dictionary of Symbols. New York: Philosophical Library, 1962, 1971.

Hall, Manly Palmer. The Secret Teachings of All Ages. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1977.

Caer

The daughter of Ethal Anubal, prince of the Danaans of Connaught, mentioned in ancient Irish myths. It was said that she lived alternate years in the form of a maiden and a swan. She was loved by Angus Og, who also found himself transformed into a swan. All who heard the rapturous song of the swan lovers were plunged into a deep sleep, lasting for three days and nights.

Cagliostro (1743–1795)

Considered by some to be one of the greatest occult figures of all time. It was the fashion during the latter half of the nineteenth century to regard Cagliostro as a charlatan and fraud. This viewpoint was greatly aided by the savage attack perpetrated on his memory by Thomas Carlyle, who alluded to him as "the Prince of Quacks." Others, such as W. R. H. Trowbridge (1918), have argued that if Cagliostro was not a man of unimpeachable honor, he was by no means the quack and scoundrel so many have made him out to be.

Following is an outline of Cagliostro's life as known before Trowbridge's examination, after which the details of his career are explored in view of what may be termed as Trowbridge's "discoveries."

Cagliostro's Mysterious Life

The problem of assembling a biographical sketch of Cagliostro is difficult due to the significant amount of legendary material that surrounds him. It is therefore necessary to apply a critical eye when dealing with the myriad contradictions.

Cagliostro's father, whose name is alleged to have been Peter Balsamo, died young. From infancy, young Joseph Balsamo showed an unconventional individualism, and when placed in a religious seminary at Palermo he more than once ran away from it; usually found in undesirable company. He was sent next to a Benedictine convent, where he was under the care of a father superior. The father superior quickly discovered his natural aptitude, and Balsamo became the assistant of an apothecary attached to the convent, from whom he learned the principles of chemistry and medicine. Even then his desire was more to discover surprising and astonishing chemical combinations than to gain more useful knowledge. Tiring of the life at last, he succeeded in escaping from the convent, and went to Palermo.

In Palermo resided a goldsmith named Marano, a superstitious man who believed devoutly in the efficacy of magic. He became attracted to young Balsamo, who at the age of seventeen posed as being deeply versed in occultism and had been seen evoking spirits. Marano made his acquaintance and confided to him that he had spent a great deal of money upon quack alchemists, but he was convinced that by meeting him he had at last chanced upon a real master of magic. Balsamo willingly ministered to the man's superstitions, and told him as a profound secret that in a nearby field was a buried treasure, which he could locate by the aid of magic ceremonies. But the operation necessitated some expensive preliminaries—at least 60 ounces of gold would be required. To this very considerable sum Marano demurred, and Balsamo coolly asserted that he would enjoy the vast treasure alone. But the credulity of Marano was too strong for his better sense, and at length he agreed to furnish the necessary funds.

At midnight they sought the field where it the supposed treasure was hidden. Balsamo proceeded with his incantations, and Marano, terrified at their dreadful nature, fell to the ground in submission. He was then unmercifully attacked by a number of scoundrels whom Balsamo had collected for that purpose. Palermo rang with the affair, but Balsamo managed to escape to Messina, where he adopted the title "Count Cagliostro."

It was in this town where he first met with the mysterious Althotas. He was walking one day in the vicinity of the harbor when he encountered a person of singular dress and countenance. Attracted by his appearance, Cagliostro saluted him, and after some conversation the stranger offered to tell the pseudo count the story of his past and to reveal what was actually passing in his mind at that moment. Cagliostro was interested and made arrangements to visit the stranger.

Cagliostro duly appeared and was led along a narrow passage lit by a single lamp in a niche of the wall. At the end was a spacious apartment illuminated by wax candles and furnished with everything necessary for the practice of alchemy. Althotas expressed himself as a believer in the mutability of physical law (rather than magic), which he regarded as a science having fixed laws discoverable and reducible to reason. He proposed to depart for Egypt and to take Cagliostro with him—a proposal that the latter joyfully accepted. Althotas informed Cagliostro that he possessed no funds but told him that it was an easy matter for him to make sufficient gold to pay the expenses of their voyage.

Accompanied by Cagliostro, Althotas penetrated into Africa and the heart of Egypt, visiting the pyramids, making the acquaintance of the priests of different temples, and receiving from them much knowledge. Following their Egyptian tour, they visited the principal kingdoms of Africa and Asia, and were subsequently located at Rhodes pursuing alchemical operations. At Malta they assisted the grandmaster Pinto, who was infatuated with alchemical experiments, and from that moment Althotas completely disappeared, the memoir of Cagliostro stating that during their residence at Malta he passed away.

On the death of his comrade, Cagliostro traveled to Naples. There he met with a Sicilian prince who conceived a strong predilection for his society and invited him to his castle near Palermo. He had not been long in Palermo when one day he traveled to Messina, where he encountered by chance one of his confederates in the affair of Marano the goldsmith. This man warned him not to enter the town of Palermo, and finally persuaded him to return to Naples to open a gambling house for the fleecing of wealthy foreigners. This scheme the pair carried out, but the Neapolitan authorities regarded them with such grave suspicion that they prudently removed themselves to the papal states. There they parted company, and regarding this time the alleged memoir of Cagliostro is not very clear. Later, in Rome, he established a fraudulent medical practice where he retailed concotions for all the diseases that humans can acquire; a setup that provided considerable wealth and luxury.

It was at this time that he met the young and beautiful Lorenza Feliciani, to whom he proposed marriage; her father, dazzled by Cagliostro's apparent wealth and importance, consented, and the marriage took place with some ceremony. All biographers of Cagliostro agree in stating that Lorenza was a thoroughly good woman, honest, devoted, and modest. The most dreadful accusations have been made concerning the manner in which Cagliostro treated his wife, and it has been alleged that he thoroughly ruined her character and corrupted her mind.

At last Caglistro and Lorenza arrived in Spain by way of Barcelona, where they stayed for six months, proceeding afterward to Madrid and Lisbon. From Lisbon they sailed to England, where Cagliostro lived by duping unwitting foreigners. An English "life of Cagliostro" tells of his adventures in London, how he was robbed of a large sum in plate, jewels, and money, and how he hired apartments in Whitcomb Street, where he spent most of his time in studying chemistry and physics, and giving away money.

In 1772 he returned to France with Lorenza and a certain Duplaisir. At this time it is said that Duplaisir eloped with Lorenza, and when Cagliostro obtained an order for her arrest, she was imprisoned in a penitentiary, where she was detained for several months. At this time Cagliostro had attracted attention in Paris with his alchemical successes. It was the period of mystic enthusiasm in Europe, when princes, bishops, and the nobility generally were keen to probe the secrets of nature, and alchemy.

Cagliostro went too far and eventually his benefactors began to seriously doubt his honesty. He was forced to flee to Brussels, where he made his way to his native town of Palermo. He was immediately arrested by the goldsmith Marano. A certain nobleman, however, interested himself on his behalf, procured his release, and Cagliostro embarked with Lorenza for Malta. From that island they soon retired to Naples, and from there to Marseilles and Barcelona. Their progress was marked by considerable state, and having cheated an alchemist of 100,000 crowns under the pretence of achieving some alchemical secret, they fled to England.

During his second visit to London Cagliostro was initiated into Freemasonry and conceived his great idea of employing that system for his own gain. He incessantly visited the various London lodges and ingratiated himself with their principals and officials. At this time he supposedly picked up a manuscript at an obscure London bookstall that is said to have belonged to a certain George Gaston. This document dealt with the mysteries of Egyptian Masonry and abounded in magical and mystical references. It was from this, that Cagliostro allegedly gathered his occult inspirations.

After another tour through Holland, Italy, and Germany, he paid a visit to the Count de St. Germain. In his usual eccentric manner, St. Germain arranged their meeting for the hour of two o'clock in the morning, at which time Cagliostro and Lorenza presented themselves before the count's temple of mystery.

The Count de St. Germain sat upon the altar, and at his feet two acolytes swung golden censers. In the book Lives of the Alchemystical Philosophers, published anonymously in 1815, this interview is thus detailed:

"The divinity bore upon his breast a diamond pentagram of almost intolerable radiance. A majestic statue, white and diaphanous, upheld on the steps of the altar a vase inscribed, 'Elixir of Immortality,' while a vast mirror was on the wall, and before it a living being, majestic as the statue, walked to and fro. Above the mirror were these singular words—'Store House of Wandering Souls.' The most solemn silence prevailed in this sacred retreat, but at length a voice, which seemed hardly a voice, pronounced these words—'Who are you? Whence come you? What would you?' Then the Count and Countess Cagliostro prostrated themselves, and the former answered after a long pause, 'I come to invoke the God of the faithful, the Son of Nature, the Sire of Truth. I come to demand of him one of the fourteen thousand seven hundred secrets which are treasured in his breast, I come to proclaim myself his slave, his apostle, his martyr.'

"The divinity did not respond, but after a long silence, the same voice asked:—'What does the partner of thy long wanderings intend?'

" 'To obey and to serve,' Lorenza answered.

"Simultaneously with her words, profound darkness succeeded the glare of light, uproar followed on tranquillity, terror on trust, and a sharp and menacing voice cried loudly:—'Woe to those who cannot stand the tests.'

"Husband and wife were immediately separated to undergo their respective trials, which they endured with exemplary fortitude and which are detailed in the text of their memoirs. When the romantic mummery was over, the two postulants were led back into the temple with the promise of admission to the divine mysteries. There a man mysteriously draped in a long mantle cried out to them: 'Know ye that the arcanum of our great art is the government of mankind, and that the one means to rule them is never to tell them the truth. Do not foolishly regulate your actions according to the rules of common sense; rather outrage reason and courageously maintain every unbelievable absurdity. Remember that reproduction is the palmary active power in nature, politics and society alike; that it is a mania with mortals to be immortal, to know the future without understanding the present, and to be spiritual while all that surrounds them is material.'

"After this harangue the orator genuflected devoutly before the divinity of the temple and retired. At the same moment a man of gigantic stature led the countess to the feet of the immortal Count de St. Germain who thus spoke:

" 'Elected from my tenderest youth to the things of greatness, I employed myself in ascertaining the nature of veritable glory. Politics appeared to me nothing but the science of deception, tactics the art of assassination, philosophy the ambitious imbecility of complete irrationality; physics fine fancies about Nature and the continual mistakes of persons suddenly transplanted, into a country which is utterly unknown to them; theology the science of the misery which results from human pride; history the melancholy spectacle of perpetual perfidy and blundering. Thence I concluded that the statesman was a skillful liar, the hero an illustrious idiot, the philosopher an eccentric creature, the physician a pitiable and blind man, the theologian a fanatical pedagogue, and the historian a word-monger. Then did I hear of the divinity of this temple. I cast my cares upon him, with my incertitudes and aspirations. When he took possession of my soul he caused me to perceive all objects in a new light; I began to read futurity. This universe so limited, so narrow, so desert, was now enlarged. I abode not only with those who are, but with those who were. He united me to the loveliest women of antiquity. I found it eminently delectable to know all without studying anything, to dispose of the treasures of the earth without the solicitations of monarchs, to rule the elements rather than men. Heaven made me liberal; I have sufficient to satisfy my taste; all that surrounds me is rich, loving, predestinated.'

"When the service was finished the costume of ordinary life was resumed. A superb repast terminated the ceremony. During the course of the banquet the two guests were informed that the Elixir of Immortality was merely Tokay coloured green or red according to the necessities of the case. Several essential precepts were enjoined upon them, among others that they must detest, avoid, and calumniate men of understanding, but flatter, foster, and blind fools, that they must spread abroad with much mystery the intelligence that the Court de St. Germain was five hundred years old, and that they must make gold, but dupes before all."

Traveling into Courland (western Latvia), Cagliostro and his wife succeeded in establishing several Masonic lodges according to the rite of what he called Egyptian Freemasonry. Persons of high rank flocked around the couple, and it is even said that he plotted for the sovereignty of the grand duchy. It is also alleged that he collected a very large treasure of presents and money and set out for St. Petersburg, where he established himself as a physician.

A large number of medical cures have been credited to Cagliostro throughout his career, and his methods have been the subject of considerable controversy. But there is little doubt that the basis of them was a species of mesmeric influence. It has been said that he trusted simply to the laying on of hands, that he charged nothing for his services, and that most of his time was occupied in treating the poor.

Returning to Germany, he was received in most of the towns through which he passed as a benefactor of the human race. Some regarded his cures as miracles, others as sorceries, while he himself asserted they were effected by celestial aid.

For three years Cagliostro remained at Strasbourg, honored and praised by all. He formed a strong friendship with the cardinal-archbishop, the Prince de Rohan, who was fired by the idea of achieving alchemical successes. Cagliostro accomplished supposed transmutations under his eyes, and the prince, delighted with the seeming successes, lavished immense sums upon him. He even believed that the elixir of life was known to Cagliostro and built a small house in which he was to undergo a physical regeneration.

When he depleted the prince's finances, Cagliostro went to Lyons, where he occupied himself with the foundation of headquarters for his Egyptian Masonic rite. He then proceeded to Paris, where he assumed the role of master of practical magic and evoked phantoms that he caused to appear at the wish of the inquirer in a vase of clear water or in a mirror. Occult authority Arthur E. Waite suggested that in this connection fraud was an impossibility and appears to lean toward the theory that the visions evoked by Cagliostro were such as occur in crystal gazing and believed no one was more astonished than the Count himself at the results he obtained. Paris rang with his name and he received the appellation "the Divine Cagliostro."

Introduced to the court of Louis XVI, Cagliostro succeeded in evoking apparitions in mirrors before many spectators—these apparitions included many deceased persons especially selected by those present. His residence was isolated and surrounded by gardens, and there he established a laboratory. His wife affected great privacy and only appeared, in a costume, at certain hours and before a very select company. This heightened the mystery surrounding them, and the elite of Parisian society vied with one another to be present at their magic suppers, at which the evocation of the illustrious dead was the principal amusement. It is even stated that deceased statesmen, authors, and nobles took their seats at Cagliostro's supper table.

Cagliostro's grand objective, however, appeared to have been the spread of his Egyptian Masonic rite. The lodges he founded were androgynal—they admitted both men and women. The ladies were instructed by the master's wife, who figured as the grand mistress of the order, her husband adopting the title of Grand Copt.

There is little doubt that a good deal of money was subscribed by the neophytes of the various lodges. Each woman who joined sacrificed on the altar of mysticism no less than 100 louis, and Cagliostro's immense wealth was established from the numerous gifts that were showered upon him by the powerful and wealthy for the purpose of furthering his Masonic schemes. Although he lived in considerable magnificence, Cagliostro by no means led a life of abandoned luxury, for there is evidence that he gave away vast sums to the poor and needy, attended the sick, and played the part of healer and reformer.

A great deal of mystery surrounded the doings of the Egyptian Masonry in its headquarters in the Faubourg Saint Honoré, and the séances for initiation took place at midnight. The writer Louis Figuier and the Marquis de Luchet gave striking accounts of what occurred during the female initiations. Figuier observed:

"On entering the first apartment the ladies were obliged to disrobe and assume a white garment, with a girdle of various colors. They were divided into six groups, distinguished by the tint of their cinctures. A large veil was also provided, and they were caused to enter a temple lighted from the roof, and furnished with thirty-six arm-chairs covered with black satin. Lorenza clothed in white, was seated on a species of throne, supported by two tall figures, so habited that their sex could not be determined. The light was lowered by degrees till surrounding objects could scarcely be distinguished, when the Grand Mistress commanded the ladies to uncover their left legs as far as the thigh, and raising the right arm to rest it on a neighboring pillar. Two young women then entered sword in hand, and with silk ropes bound all the ladies together by the arms and legs."

"After a period of silence, Lorenza pronounced an oration which preached emancipation of womankind from the bonds imposed on them by the lords of creation.

"These bonds were symbolized by the silken ropes from which the fair initiates were released at the end of the harangue, when they were conducted into separate apartments, each opening onto the garden. There some were pursued by men who persecuted them with solicitations; others encountered admirers who sighed in languishing postures at their feet. More than one discovered the counterpart of her own love, but the oath they had all taken necessitated the most inexorable inhumanity, and all faithfully fulfilled what was required of them. The new spirit infused into the regenerated women triumphed along the whole line of the thirty-six initiates, who with intact and immaculate symbols reentered the temple to receive the congratulations of the sovereign priestess.

"When they had breathed a little after their trials, the vaulted roof opened suddenly, and, on a vast sphere of gold, there descended a man, naked as the unfallen Adam, holding a serpent in his hand, and having a burning star upon his head.

"The Grand Mistress announced that this was the genius of Truth, the immortal, the divine Cagliostro, issued without procreation from the bosom of our father Abraham, and the depositary of all that hath been, is, or shall be known on the universal earth. He was there to initiate them into the secrets of which they had been fraudulently deprived. The Grand Copt thereupon commanded them to dispense with the profanity of clothing, for if they would receive truth they must be as naked as itself. The sovereign priestess setting the example unbound her girdle and permitted her drapery to fall to the ground, and the fair initiates following her example exposed themselves in all the nudity of their charms to the magnetic glances of the celestial genius, who then commenced his revelations.

"He informed his daughters that the much abused magical art was the secret of doing good to humanity. It was the initiation into the mysteries of Nature, and the power to make use of her occult forces. The visions which they had beheld in the Garden where so many had seen and recognised those who were dearest to their hearts, proved the reality of hermetic operations. They had shewn themselves worthy to know the truth; he undertook to instruct them by gradations therein. It was enough at the outset to inform them that the sublime end of that Egyptian Freemasonry which he had brought from the very heart of the Orient was the happiness of mankind. This happiness was illimitable in its nature, including material enjoyments as much as spiritual peace, and the pleasures of the understanding."

At the end of this harangue the Grand Copt once more seated himself upon the sphere of gold and was borne away through the roof.

The Affair of the Diamond Necklace

It was during this period that Cagliostro became implicated in the extraordinary affair of a diamond necklace. He had been on terms of great intimacy with the Cardinal de Rohan. Countess de Lamotte had petitioned that prince for a pension on account of long aristocratic descent. De Rohan greatly desired to become first minister of the throne, but Marie Antoinette, the queen, disliked him and stood in the way of this an honor.

Lamotte soon discovered this and, for purposes of her own, told the cardinal that the queen favored his ambitions. She then either forged, or procured someone else to forge, letters to the cardinal claiming to come from the queen, some of which begged for money for a poor family in which her majesty was interested. Rohan was anxious to please the queen but was already heavily in debt and had also misappropriated the funds of various institutions; he was thus driven into the hands of moneylenders.

The wretched Countess de Lamotte met by chance a poor woman whose resemblance to the queen was exceedingly marked. This person she trained to represent Marie Antoinette, and arranged nightly meetings between her and Rohan, in which the disguised woman made all sorts of promises to the cardinal. Between them the adventuresses mulcted the unfortunate prelate of immense sums of money.

Meanwhile, a certain Bähmer, a jeweler, was very desirous of selling a wonderful diamond necklace in which, for over ten years, he had locked up his whole fortune. Hearing that Mme. de Lamotte had great influence with the queen, he approached her for the purpose of getting her to induce Marie Antoinette to purchase it. She at once corresponded on the matter with de Rohan, who proceeded posthaste to Paris, to be told by Mme. de Lamotte that the queen wished him to be security for the purchase of the necklace, for which she had agreed to pay 1,600,000 livres in four half-yearly installments.

The cardinal was naturally overwhelmed at the suggestion but signed the agreement, and Mme. de Lamotte became the possessor of the necklace. She speedily broke it up, picking the jewels from their setting with an ordinary penknife.

Matters went smoothly enough until the date when the first installment of 400,000 livres became due. De Rohan, never dreaming that the queen would not meet it, could not lay his hands on such a sum; and Bähmer, noting his anxiety, mentioned the matter to one of the queen's ladies-in-waiting, who retorted that he must be mad, as the queen had never purchased the necklace at all. Bähmer went at once to Mme. de Lamotte, who laughed at him, said he was being fooled, insisted it had nothing to do with her, and told him to go to the cardinal. The terrified jeweler did not take her advice, however, but went instead to the king.

The amazed Louis XVI listened to the story quietly enough, then turned to the queen who was present. Marie Antoinette at once broke forth in a tempest of indignation. As a matter of fact, Bähmer had for years pestered her to buy the necklace; but the crowning indignity was that de Rohan, whom she cordially detested, should have been made the medium for such a scandalous disgrace in connection with her name. She at once decreed that the cardinal should be arrested. The king acquiesced in this, and shortly afterward the Countess de Lamotte, Cagliostro and his wife (who were implicated by the countess), and others followed the cardinal to the Bastille.

The trial that followed was one of the most sensational and stirring in the annals of French history. The king was blamed for allowing the affair to become public at all, and there the evidence of such conduct as displayed by aristocrats inflamed public opinion and may have hastened the French Revolution.

Mme. de Lamotte not only charged Cagliostro with the robbery of the necklace, but also invented for him a terrible past, designating him an empiric, alchemist, false prophet, and Jew. This is not the place to deal with the trial at length, but suffice it to say that Cagliostro easily proved his complete innocence. The Parisian public looked to Cagliostro to supply the comedy in this great drama, and assuredly they were not disappointed, for he provided them with what must be described as one of the most romantic, fanciful, and absurd life stories in the history of autobiography.

His Last Years

Although proved innocent, he had offended so many people in high places that he was banished, amid shouts of laughter from everyone in the court. Even the judges were convulsed, but on his return from the courthouse the mob cheered him heartily.

If he had accomplished nothing else, he had at least won the hearts of the populace by his kindness and the many acts of faithful service he had lavished upon them; and it was partly owing to this popularity, and partly to the violent hatred of the court, that he owed the reception accorded him.

He was reunited with his wife and shortly afterward took his departure for London, where he was received with considerable éclat. There he addressed a letter to the people of France, which obtained wide circulation and predicted the French Revolution, the demolishment of the Bastille, and the downfall of the monarchy. Following this, the Courier de l'Europe, a French paper published in London, printed a so-called exposure of the real life of Cagliostro from beginning to end. From that moment, his descent was headlong. His reputation had preceded him in Switzerland and Austria, and he could find no rest there.

At last he and Lorenza journeyed to Rome. In the beginning he was well received and was even entertained by several cardinals. He privately studied medicine and lived quietly, but he made the great mistake of attempting to further his Masonic ideas within the bounds of the papal states. Masonry was of course anathema to the Roman church; and upon attempting to found a lodge in the Eternal City itself, he was arrested on September 27, 1789, by order of the Holy Inquisition and imprisoned in the castle of Saint Angelo.

His examination occupied his inquisitors for no less than eighteen months, and he was sentenced to death on April 7, 1791. He was recommended to mercy, however, and the pope commuted his sentence to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Saint Angelo. On one occasion he made a desperate attempt to escape. Requesting the services of a confessor, he attempted to strangle the brother sent to him, but the burly priest, in whose habit he had intended to disguise himself, proved too strong and quickly overpowered him.

Afterward he was imprisoned in the solitary castle of San Leo near Montefeltro, where he died and was interred in 1795. The manner of his death is unknown.

The Countess Cagliostro's wife was also sentenced by the Inquisition to imprisonment for life. She was confined in the Convent of St. Appolonia, a penitentiary for women in Rome, where it is rumored that she died in 1794.

Cagliostro's manuscript volume entitled "Egyptian Freemasonry" fell with his other papers into the hands of the Inquisition and was solemnly condemned by it as subversive to the interests of Christianity. It was publicly burned; but oddly enough the Inquisition set apart one of its brethren to concoct some kind of life of Cagliostro, which did include particulars concerning his Masonic methods.

Cagliostro as Occult Hero

W. R. H. Trowbridge, one of Cagliostro's biographers, made a convincing case that Cagliostro was not the same as Joseph Balsamo, with whom his detractors have identified him. Balsamo was a Sicilian vagabond adventurer, and the statement that he and Cagliostro were one and the same person originally rests on the word of the editor of the Courier de l'Europe, and upon an anonymous letter from Palermo to the chief of the Paris police.

According to Trowbridge, the fact that the names of Cagliostro's wife and the wife of Balsamo were identical amounted to little more than coincidence, as the name Lorenza Feliciani was a very common one in Italy. He also claimed in his biography that the testimony of the handwriting experts as to the remarkable similarity between the writing of Balsamo and Cagliostro was worthless and stated that nobody who had known Balsamo ever saw Cagliostro. He also pointed out that Balsamo, who had been in England in 1771, was "wanted" by the London police. How was it then that six years afterward they did not recognize him in Count Cagliostro, who spent four months in a debtors' prison there, for no fault of his own?

The whole evidence against Cagliostro's character rested with the editor of the Courier de l'Europe and his Inquisition biographer, neither of whom could be credited for various reasons. For instance, it must be recollected that the narrative of the Inquisition biographer was supposed to be based upon the confessions of Cagliostro under torture in the castle of Saint Angelo. Neither was the damaging disclosure of the editor of the Courier de l'Europe at all topical, as he raked up matter which was at least fourteen years old, and of which he had no personal knowledge.

Trowbridge also claimed that the dossier discovered in the French archives in 1783, which was supposed to embody Madame Cagliostro's confessions when she was imprisoned regarding the career of her husband, was a forgery. He further disposes of the statements that Cagliostro lived on the immoral earnings of his wife.

A born adventurer, Cagliostro was by no means a rogue, as revealed by his beneficence. It is unlikely that the various Masonic lodges that he founded and that were patronized by persons of ample means provided him extensive funds, and it is a known fact that he was subsidized by several extremely wealthy men, who, themselves dissatisfied with the state of affairs in Europe, did not hesitate to place their riches at his disposal for the purpose of undermining the tyrannical powers that then wielded sway.

There is reason to believe that he had at some period of his life acquired a certain working knowledge of practical occultism and that he possessed certain elementary psychic powers of hypnotism and telepathy.

But on the whole, Cagliostro remains a mystery, and in all likelihood the clouds that surround his origin and early years will never be dispersed. Although Cagliostro was by no means an exalted character, he was one of the most picturesque figures in the later history of Europe, and assuredly the aura of mystery that surrounds his origin does not in the least detract from his appeal.

Sources:

Funck-Brentano, Frantz. Cagliostro and Company. London, 1900.

Gervaso, Roberto. Cagliostro: A Biography. London, 1974.

Trowbridge, W. R. H. Cagliostro: The Splendour and Misery of a Master of Magic. London, 1910. Reprinted as Cagliostro: Savant or Scoundrel? New York: Gordon Press, 1975. Reprinted as Cagliostro: Maligned Freemason and Rosicrucian. Kila, Mont.: Kessiger Publishing, 1992.

Cahagnet, Louis-Alphonse (1805–1885)

A journeyman cabinetmaker who, attracted to the study of somnambulism in 1845, published three years later Magnétisme: Arcanes de la vie future dévoilé (English translation: The Celestial Telegraph, 1848), the first volume of a remarkable book containing a summary of his experiments with eight somnambulists and spirit communications from 36 entities that claimed to have died over a period dating back two hundred years. The communications give a detailed description of spirit spheres and afterlife.

In January 1849, a second volume of the same book was published. It included the testimonies of the sitters, many of whom were very skeptical and on their guard against deception. In 1860 a third volume appeared.

Adèle Maginot was the medium for these sittings. She furnished striking proof of the personal identity of the communicators. In his book, Modern Spiritualism (1902), spiritualist historian Frank Podmore observes, "In the whole literature of Spiritualism I know of no records of the kind which reach a higher evidential standard, nor any in which the writer's good faith and intelligence are alike so conspicuous."

Sources:

Cahagnet, Louis-Alphonse. Magnetisme arcanes de la vie future devoile. Paris, 1848. Translated as The Celestial Telegraph. 2 vols. New York, 1851.

———. Magnétisme: Encyclopédie magnétique spiritualiste. N.p., 1861.

———. Sanctuaire au Spiritualisme. Paris, 1850. Translated as The Sanctuary of Spiritualism: A Study of the Human Soul and of Its Relation with the Universe through Somnambulism and Ecstasy. N.p., 1851.

———. Thérapeutique du magnétisme et du Somnambulisme appropriée aux maladies les plus communes. N.p., 1883.

Darnton, Robert. Mesmerism and the End of the Enlightenment in France. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Podmore, Frank, Modern Spiritualism. 2 vols. London, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Cahiers Astrologiques

French-language bimonthly publication on history of astrology and approaches to different systems. Last known address: 27 Boulevard de Cressole, 06 Nice, France.

Cahn, Harold A(rchambo) (1922–)

A professor of biology who developed an interest in psychical research. Born July 1, 1922, in Minneapolis, Minnesota, he studied at the University of Minnesota (B.A., zoology, psychology), the University of Wyoming (M.A., zoology, biochemistry), and the University of Iowa (Ph.D., physiology). In 1962 he began teaching at Utica College of Syracuse University. He moved on to Northern Arizona University in 1971.

Cahn gave special attention to parapsychology in relation to problems of psychophysiology. He collaborated in experiments with Dr. Joseph Rush on subjects under mescaline narcosis and in experiments investigating sensory deprivation in relation to mental imagery. He reported on preliminary investigations of the Boulder (Colorado) Psychical Research Group at the first conference of the Parapsychological Association in 1958 and presented a paper entitled "Image Subsception as a Method of Eliciting Psi" at the fifth conference of the Parapsychological Association in 1962.

In later years, Cahn concerned himself with research in such areas as biosystem characteristics, the abstract structure of biological organization, circadian rhythms, and physiological correlates of claimed paranormal phenomena. Cahn has been a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Society for Psychical Research (London), the Parapsychological Association, and the Society for Psychophysiological Research.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Cailleach (or Harvest Old Wife)

In the Highlands of Scotland, there was a superstition that whoever was last with his harvesting would be saddled with the Harvest Old Wife to keep until the next year. The first farmer to be finished made a doll of some blades of corn, which was called "the old wife," and sent it to his nearest neighbor. He, in turn, when finished, sent it on to another, and so on until the person last finished had the old wife to keep. Needless to say this fear acted as a spur to the superstitious Highlanders.

Sources:

Thompson, Francis. The Supernatural Highland. London: Robert Hale, 1976.

Cain, John (1931–1985)

A British spiritual healer. Born on April 21, 1931 in Eastham, Wirral, England, he manifested healing ability at the age of six, when he used to stroke his mother's forehead to relieve her attacks of migraine. After his twenty-first birthday, he joined the Royal Ordnance Corp of the British army as a physical training instructor; he also acquired a reputation for his skill in massage and manipulation. He left the army in 1952, worked in the shipyard at Birkenhead, then worked at window cleaning, logging, and site demolition.

In 1956 he started his own business as a blacksmith and became financially successful, employing 30 people and driving a Rolls Royce. In the same year, he married. Haunted by the thought that he was born to heal, he lost interest in the business. One morning, his anxieties were dispelled by an ecstatic mood of peace, and he heard the voice of his dead father saying, "Do not worry; born to heal, Dad." In 1972 Cain became a full-time spiritual healer, treating a wide variety of disabilities. These included arthritis, diabetes, paralysis, hardening of the arteries, cervical spondilitis, and malignant growths.

Cain was an unconventional healer. He appeared to put people into an altered state of consciousness during which there seemed to be spontaneous improvement. Sometimes sufferers from muscular problems got up and danced; others performed what appeared to be yoga exercises. Cain believed spirit guides controlled his healing, and these were identified independently by other psychic mediums. Although Cain sometimes physically touched people, a great many of his cures were effected without any direct contact. He occasionally practiced absent healing.

Cain was investigated by parapsychologists and performed healing under laboratory conditions. He was tested by Japanese researchers in Tokyo in 1976, and also by Prof. John Taylor in London. In spite of Taylor's skepticism about paranormal phenomena, his findings on Cain's healing powers were positive. Cain also demonstrated successful healing sessions in Canada at Vancouver and Winnipeg.

Cain died in September 28, 1985, only a few days after publisher Peter Bander had approached him to discuss a second edition of the book Heal, My Son! He was one of the most celebrated British healers, whose talents were widely endorsed.

Sources:

Green, Peter. Heal, My Son! The Amazing Story of John Cain. London: Van Duren, 1977.

Sykes, Pat. You Don't Know John Cain? London: Van Duren, 1980.

Caiumarath (or Kaid-mords)

According to Persian legend, the first man. He lived 1,000 years and reigned 560. He produced a tree from the fruits of which came the human race. The devil seduced and corrupted the first couple, who after their fall dressed themselves in black garments and sadly awaited the resurrection, for they had introduced sin into the world.

Cala, Carlo (ca. seventeenth century)

A Calabrian nobleman (Duke di Diano and Marquis di Ramonte) who wrote on the occult in the seventeenth century. He published Memorie historiche dell'apparitione delle cruce prodigiose da Carlo Cala at Naples in 1661.

Calatin Clan

A poisonous multiform monster of Irish legend. The creature was composed of a father and his 27 sons, any one of whose weapons could, by the merest touch, kill a man within nine days. This monstrosity was sent against Cuchulain, who succeeded in catching its 28 spears on his shield. The clan, however, managed to throw him down and grind his face in the gravel. Cuchulain was assisted by the son of an Ulster exile, who cut off the creature's heads while Cuchulain hacked it to pieces.

Calen

Chilean sorcerers. (See also South America)

California Directory of Psi Services

Former annual directory of organizations, individuals, shops, and services in the fields of parapsychology, occultism, astrology, witchcraft, psychic science, and New Age spiritual studies. The earliest known edition appeared in 1974 as the Directory of Psychic Sciences Periodicals. The later editions had annotated listings of groups and individuals with addresses and telephone numbers to facilitate contact. It was edited by Elizabeth M. Werner, later a member of the editorial board of the comprehensive Whole Again Resource Guide.

California Institute of Transpersonal Psychology Newsletter

Quarterly newsletter listing Ph.D. programs, with articles on transpersonal psychology and expanded awareness. Includes news of workshops, conferences, and reviews. Address: P.O. Box 2364, Stanford, CA 94305.

California Parapsychology Foundation

Incorporated in 1957 as an educational and research organization. The foundation maintained a reference and lending library for associates and publishes a newsletter. Last known address: 3580 Adams Blvd., San Diego, CA 92116.

California Society for Psychical Studies

Meets monthly for lectures on various aspects of psychical studies; issues a newsletter Iridis. Address: P.O. Box 844, Berkeley, CA 94704.

California Sun

California Sun, subtitled The Journal for Optimum Health, has served the metaphysical and holistic health community of the West Coast of the United States through the 1990s. Its editor, Nicole Shoong, has seen it as providing truth and empowering information for those on a journey to enlightenment. Such information allows them to move out of a state of ignorance and thus take responsibility for their choices and actions. Each issue covers a wide variety of subjects concerning not only metaphysical and psychic matters, but areas of cutting edge science. Subjects of special interest are the environment, the freedom of holistic healers to practice their skills, and government actions that threaten public health.

California Sun struggled in the late 1990s. While many issues are sold through subscription, others are distributed freely in various metaphysical bookstores and holistic health centers in California. By 1998, both subscriptions and advertising had fallen below the level necessary to sustain production. At the same time Shoong expanded her work on radio and developed a weekly show with Spiritualist healer James Chappel, "The California Sun News Hour," a radio talk show that originates in Santa Barbara, California. Like the periodical, the show took a somewhat conspiratorial view toward what Shoong considers the mind-manipulating activities of the government and large corporations, especially those aimed at suppressing or denigrating alternative science. The Food and Drug Administration has been a special target of Shoong's wrath. After a year-and-a-half hiatus, California Sun reappeared as a tabloid at the beginning of 2000.

California Sun may be ordered at P.O. Box 1028, Summerland, CA 93067.

Sources:

California Sun. Summerland, California, n.d.

Callaway, Hugh G. (1885–1949)

Pioneer British experimenter in the field of astral projection or out-of-the-body traveling, about which he wrote under the pseudouym Oliver Fox. Born in Southampton, England, November 30, 1885, Callaway studied at the Harley Institute (later renamed Southampton University College), taking a three-year course in science and electrical engineering. In the summer of 1902 he experienced his first astral projection.

Callaway joined a theatrical touring company, but his career as an actor was brief. Afterward he invested in two business ventures, which were both unsuccessful. From 1908 to 1910 the Callaways lived in poverty, but in 1910 Hugh inherited a small legacy. He started writing short stories and poems, with which he had some success. Some had mystical themes based on his own astral experiences.

During the early part of World War I, he worked as a clerk, studying occultism in his spare time. In March 1917 he served in an army labor corps in Germany. After leaving the service in October 1919, he moved to London and continued to publish short stories, many of which have powerful occult themes.

Callaway also contributed articles on his out-of-the-body experiences to the Occult Review, edited by the Honorable Ralph Shirley, and in 1938 his pioneer work Astral Projection was published (under the pseudonym Oliver Fox). He compiled an equally remarkable work in association with "Paul Black" (G. Murray Nash), with whom he established occult rapport in recording The Golden Book of Azelda. Only fragments of this large work of automatic writing have so far been published, in pamphlet form. These extracts have a Gnostic character and are said to employ a code of celestial symbolism. Hugh Callaway died April 28, 1949.

Sources:

Fox, Oliver [Hugh Callaway]. Astral Projection. London: Rider, 1938. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Muldoon, Sylvan, and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929. Rev. ed. 1958.

Rogo, D. Scott. Leaving the Body: A Complete Guide to Astral Projection. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1983.

Calmecacs

Training college of Aztec priests. (See also Mexico and Central America)

Calmet, Dom Antoine Augustin (1672–1757)

A Benedictine of the congregation of Saint-Vannes and one of the most renowned Bible scholars of his day. Calmet was born February 16, 1672, at Minil-la-Horgne, Lorraine, France. He studied at the Benedictine monastery at Breuil and entered the order in 1688. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1696.

Calmet taught philosophy and theology at the abbey at Moyen-Moutier and during the early years of his career worked on a massive 23-volume commentary of the Bible, which appeared between 1707 and 1716. His biblical writings established him as a leading scholar, and he spent many years trying to popularize the work of biblical exegesis in the church.

Calmet is most remembered today for his single work, Dissertations sur les apparitions, des anges, des démons et des esprits, et sur les revenants et vampires de Hongrie, de Boheme, de Moravie et de Silésie (Paris, 1746 and 1951, the latter being the better edition), a broad survey of supernatural/occult events across Europe. The first volume of this work dealt with spirits and apparitions, but it was the second volume, on revenants and vampires, that stirred up controversy.

Like the work of his Italian colleague Archbishop Gioseppe Davanzati, Calmet's study of vampirism was set off by waves of vampire reports form Germany and eastern Europe. Vampirism, for all practical purposes, did not exist in France and was largely unknown to the scholarly community there until the early eighteenth century. Calmet was impressed with the detail and corroborative testimonies of incidents of vampirism coming out of eastern Europe and believed that it was unreasonable to simply dismiss them. As a theologian, he recognized that the existence and actions of such beings could have an important bearing on various theological conclusions concerning the nature of the afterlife. Calmet thought it necessary to establish the veracity of such reports and to understand the phenomena in light of the church's world view. Calmet finished his work a short time after the Sorbonne roundly condemned the reports and, especially, the desecration of the bodies of people believed to be vampires.

Calmet defined a vampire as a person who had been dead and buried and then returned from the grave to disturb the living by sucking their blood and even causing death. The only remedy for vampirism was to dig up the body of the vampire and either sever its head and drive a stake through the chest or burn the body. Using that definition, Calmet collected as many accounts of vampirism as possible from official reports, newspapers, eyewitness reports, travelogues, and critical pieces from his learned colleagues. The majority of space in his published volume was taken up with the anthology of all his collected data.

Calmet then offered his reflections upon the reports. He condemned the hysteria that followed several of the reported incidents of vampirism and seconded the Sorbonne's condemnation of the mutilation of exhumed bodies. He considered all of the explanations that had been offered to explain the phenomena, from the effects of regional folklore, to normal but little-known body changes after death, to premature burial. He focused a critical eye upon the reports and pointed out problems and internal inconsistencies.

In the end, however, Calmet was unable to reach a conclusion beyond the various natural explanations that had been offered. He left the whole matter open, but seemed to favor the existence of vampires, noting that ". . . it seems impossible not to subscribe to the belief which prevails in these countries that these apparitions do actually come forth from the graves and that they are able to produce the terrible effects which are so widely and so positively attributed to them." He thus set up conditions for the heated debate that was to ensue during the 1850s. Calmet's book became a best-seller. It went through three French printings, in 1746, 1747, and 1748. It appeared in a German edition in 1752 and in an English edition in 1759 (reprinted in 1850 as The Phantom World). Calmet was immediately attacked by colleagues for taking the vampire stories seriously. Although he tried to apply such critical methods as he had available to him, he never really questioned the legitimacy of the reports of vampiric manifestations.

As the controversy swelled following publication of his book, coupled by a new outbreak of vampirism reported in Silésia, a skeptical Empress Maria Theresa stepped in. She dispatched her personal physician to investigate. He wrote a report denouncing the incident as supernatural quackery and condemned the mutilation of the bodies. In response, in 1755 and 1756 Maria Theresa issued laws to stop the spread of vampire hysteria, including removing the matter of dealing with such reports from the hands of the clergy and placing it, instead, under civil authority. Maria Theresa's edicts came just before Calmet's death on October 25, 1757.

In the generation after his death, Calmet was treated harshly by French intellectuals, both inside and outside the church. Later in the century, Diderot condemned him. Possibly the final word on Calmet came from Voltaire, who sarcastically ridiculed him in his Philosophical Dictionary. Although Calmet was favorably cited by Montague Summers, who used him as a major source for his study of vampires, his importance lay in his reprinting and preserving some of the now obscure texts of the vampire wave of eighteenth-century Europe.

Sources:

Calmet, Dom Augustine. Dissertations sur les apparitions, des anges, des démons et des esprits, et sur les revenants et vampires de Hongrie, de Boheme, de Moravie et de Silésie. Rev. ed. Paris, 1751. Reprinted as The Phantom World. 2 vols. London: Richard Bentley, 1850.

———. Treatise on Vampires & Revenants: The Phantom World. Brighton, Sussex, England: Desert Island Books, 1995.

Digot, A. Notice biographique et littéraire sur Dom Augustin Calmet. Nancy, France, 1860.

Frayling, Christopher. Vampyres: From Lord Byron to Count Dracula. London: Faber and Faber, 1991.

Summers, Montague. The Vampire: His Kith and Kin. London: Routledge, Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1928. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1960.

Calundronius

A legendary magic stone without form or color said to have the virtues of resisting malign spirits, destroying enchantments, giving an advantage over enemies to the owner, and dissipating despair.

Cambions

According to Jean Bodin and Pierre De Lancre, the offspring of incubi and succubi. Some of these demons are said to be more kindly disposed to the human race than others. Luther says in his Colloquies that they show no sign of life before seven years of age. He further states that he saw one that cried when he touched it.

In his Discours des Sorciers (1608), Henri Boguet quotes a story that a Galician mendicant was in the habit of exciting public pity by carrying about a Cambion. One day a horseman, observing him to be much hampered by the seeming infant in crossing a river, took the "child" before him on his horse. But the "child" was so heavy that the animal sank under the weight. The mendicant later admitted that the child he habitually carried was a little demon he had trained so carefully that no one refused him alms when he carried it.

CAMBODIA

Known briefly from 1970–1975 as the Kymer Republic and Kampuchea, Cambodia is a Southeast Asian country that has been particularly and negatively affected by the rush to modernize and secularize since World War II. It is a land rich in occult history and lore, a heritage at essential conflict with the recent course of political history. In the tremendous upheavals following the Vietnamese war, many customs, traditions, and beliefs have been disrupted. Although the 1976 constitution of Cambodia granted freedom of worship to a people traditionally following the Theravada Buddhist faith, refugees report that religious practices are not permitted in the general political change to Marxist-Leninist ideology. The famous monument, Angkor, the capital of the ancient Khmer Republic, is now representative of the Buddhist religion. This temple, which exists second to the Pyramids in occult importance, was dedicated to the Hindu god, Vishnu, and is now considered, since 1992, a World Heritage site. The horrific excesses of the Khmer Rouge under the Pol Pot regime graphically dramatized in the film The Killing Fields (1984), represent one of the more horrific chapters in all of human history. In 1998 Cambodia's borders became open to international travel.

In the past, magic was mixed up to a surprising degree with the daily life of the people. They consulted sorcerers on the most trivial matters and were constantly at great pains to discover whether any small venture was likely to prove lucky or unlucky. There were two kinds of magical practitioners, the à thmop, or soothsayers, and the kru or medicine-sorcerers. Of these, the latter enjoyed the highest reputation as healers and exorcists, while the former were less respected, dealing in charms and philters for the sake of gain, or in evil incantations and spells.

The outcast kru, however, could be ministers of destruction as well as of healing. One of the means used to take the life of an enemy was the old device favored by sorcerers. They would make a wax figure of the victim, prick it at the spot where they wished to harm him or her, and thus bring disease and death upon the individual. Another plan was to take two skulls from which the tops had been removed, place them against each other, and secretly place them under the bed of a healthy man, where they were believed to have very evil results. Sometimes by means of spells the kru would transform wood shavings or grains of rice into a large beetle or worms, which were said to enter the body of the victim and cause illness, or even death. If the person thus attacked happened to possess the friendship of a more powerful sorcerer, however, a stronger magic could be obtained, and the original sorcery blocked. The more harmless occupations of the wizards consisted in making philters and amulets to insure the admiration of women, the favor of the king, and success at play.

The evil spirits, to whom were ascribed the most malicious intent, were called pray, the most fearsome variety being the khmoc pray, or wicked dead, which included the spirits of women who died in childbirth. From their hiding places in the trees these spirits were said to torment inoffensive passers-by with their hideous laughter, and shower stones down upon them. These practices were, of course, calculated either to kill or to drive the unfortunate recipients of their attentions insane. Among the trees there were also supposed to be concealed mischievous demons who inflicted terrible and incurable diseases upon mankind.

Those who suffered a violent death were also greatly to be feared. From the nethermost regions they would return, pale and terrible, to demand food from human beings, who dared not deny it to them. Their name, beisac, signifies "goblin," and they were believed to have the power to inflict all manner of evil on those who refused their request. So the average Cambodian, to avert such happenings, used to put his offering of rice or other food in the brushwood to appease the goblins. The pray generally required to have their offerings laid on the winnowing fan that enters so largely into Cambodian superstition.

The werewolf, both male and female, struck terror into the hearts of the people. By the use of certain magical rites and formulae, people could be endowed with supernatural powers, such as the ability to swallow dishes, and thereupon change into werewolves. Women who had been rubbed with oil a wizard had consecrated were said to lose their reason and to flee away to the woods. They retained their human shape for seven days. If during that time a man underwent the same process of being rubbed with consecrated oil, followed the woman to the woods, and struck her on the head with a heavy bar, then the Cambodians claimed she would recover her reason and return home. If, on the other hand, no such drastic remedy was to be found, at the end of seven days the woman would turn into a tigress. In order to cure a man of being a werewolf, one should strike him on the shoulder with a hook.

The Cambodians believed that ghosts issued from dead bodies during the process of decomposition. When this ceased the ghosts were no longer seen, and the remains changed into owls and other nocturnal birds.

Most hideous of all the evil spirits were the srei ap, or ghouls, who, represented only by head and alimentary canal, prowled nightly in search of gruesome orgies. They were known by their terrible and bloodshot eyes, and much feared, since even their wish to harm could inflict injury. When anyone was denounced as a ghoul she was treated with great severity, either by the authorities, who may have sentenced her to banishment or death, or by the villagers, who sometimes took the law into their own hands and punished the supposed offender.

Astrology was also widely practiced in Cambodia. Astrologers, or, as they were called, horas, were attached to the court, and their direct employment by the king gave them some standing in the country. At the beginning of each year they made a calendar, which contained, besides the usual astronomical information, weather and other predictions. They were consulted by the people on all sorts of subjects, and were believed to be able to avert the calamities they predicted. In modern Cambodia, the Songkran, or astrology festival, is still celebrated.

It is not surprising that in such a country, where good and evil powers were ascribed so lavishly, much attention should be paid to omens, and much time spent in rites to avert misfortune. The wind, the fog, and the trees were objects of fear and awe, to be approached with circumspection lest they send disease and misfortune, or withhold some good. For instance, trees whose roots grow under a house bring bad luck to it. Bamboo and cotton plants were also dangerous when planted near a house, for should they grow higher than the house, they would wish, out of a perverted sense of gratitude, to provide a funeral cushion and matting for the occupants.

Animals received their share of superstitious veneration. Tigers were regarded as malevolent creatures whose whiskers were very poisonous. Elephants were seen as sacred, and particularly so white elephants. Monkeys they would on no account destroy. Should a butterfly enter the house, it was considered extremely unlucky, while a grasshopper, on the contrary, indicated coming good fortune.

Sources:

Angkor Wat. http://ce.eng.usf.edu/pharos/wonders/Forgotten/angkor.html. June 16, 2000.

Cambridge Buddhist Association

Founded to provide instruction in Buddhist meditation in the United States and to make available study materials. The association is nonsectarian and meetings are conducted by priests of different Buddhist sects, in accordance with the wishes of the founder, Shinichi Hisamatsu.

The association has been served by a series of outstanding Buddhist teachers. The first president was Shunryu Suzuki (also of the San Francisco Zen Center). He was succeeded by Rev. Chimyo Horioka of the Shingon sect of Buddhism, who graduated from Koyasan University, Japan, then studied philosophy at the University of Berlin, and science and the history of religion at Hamburg University, becoming instructor of Oriental studies. He immigrated to the United States in 1953 and in 1956 was appointed assistant to the curator of the Asiatic department at the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

Horioka was succeeded by Maurine Stuart, a student of the late Soen Naakgawa. Stuart, also a musician, teaches Buddhism at the Philips Exeter Academy in New Hampshire as well. The association provides facilities for Zen meditation but is also open to a variety of Buddhist perspectives, and members are active in area interfaith activities. The association is housed in a residential neighborhood at 75 Sparks St., Cambridge, MA 02138.

Sources:

Cambridge Buddhist Association. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge Buddhist Association, 1960.

Fujimoto, Rindo. The Way of Zazen. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge Buddhist Association, 1969.

Renfrew, Sita Paulickpulle. A Buddhist Guide for Laymen. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge Buddhist Association, 1963.

The Cambridge Company

Lecture bureau specializing in representation of famous psychics and spiritual teachers for lectures and demonstrations. The company represented such well-known personalities as Jeane Dixon, Doris Collins, Leslie Flint, and Harold Sherman. Last known address: 9000 Sunset Blvd., Ste. 319, Beverly Hills, CA 90069.

Campagni, Roberto

Contemporary Italian psychic who reportedly demonstrated abilities of materialization and levitation. A surveyor by trade, Campagni discovered his psychic gifts at the age of sixteen after the death of his brother Ruggero. An aunt persuaded the family to hold séances, at which Campagni found himself the medium. Campagni continued to sit regularly with a séance group known as Circle 77 in Florence, at which, it has been claimed, apports materialized. Psychic researcher Gemma Lasta described how Campagni's hands lit up "like a neon sign" with a glow around his fingers. The medium then passed her what she described as a "cloud of light," a weightless glowing mass from which tiny flames leapt with a slight buzzing noise, after which she found a five-pointed star in embossed silver in her hand. Other witnesses have described a blue light around Campagni's hands when apports are materialized.

Father Eugenio Feriaroti, head of a Roman Catholic order in Genoa, attended one séance, at which he stated that the medium "put a luminous ball of light into my hands." The ball of light then materialized into a small silver angel. Psychic researcher Dr. Luigi Lapi of Florence claims at one séance he saw the medium levitate to the ceiling. Genoanese physicist Alfredo Ferraro states he has seen 30 materialized apports and believes trickery is not involved. Parapsychologist Ugo Dettore, who has also studied Campagni's phenomena, suggests that the blue light from the medium's hands is a form of psychic energy working outside the body.

Campagni himself is a shy individual who refuses to be photographed and has never accepted money for his demonstrations during more than 30 years of part-time psychic activity.

Campbell, Joseph (1904–1987)

A prominent American authority on mythology and leading exponent of the idea of "myth" as an inherent characteristic of humanity. Campbell was born March 26, 1904, in New York City. He studied at Dartmouth College, (1921–22) and Columbia University (A.B., 1925; M.A., 1927). He did additional graduate study at the University of Paris and the University of Munich. He taught for a year at Canterbury School, New Milford, Connecticut, before joining the faculty in the literature department at Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York (1934–72), where he taught until his retirement.

Campbell began his literary work as editor of the writings of his friend Heinrich Zimmer. His first independent work, The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949), examines a number of "hero" tales from around the world in which Campbell discerns the same basic outline. In the book he offers a thesis that myths provide instruction on how we should live, and says that the common themes of mythology throughout the world show these ideas are inherent in human biology. He also launches his search for what he terms the "monomyth," the single underlying story all the myths tell.

He followed The Hero with a Thousand Faces with a four-volume work, The Masks of God (1959–68), which traces the development of ancient mythology and argues for the need of a new worldwide mythology adaptable to the emerging worldwide culture.

Campbell's last years were spent writing the proposed six-volume Historical Atlas of World Mythology, of which only two volumes were completed. He did complete a series of interviews with Bill Moyers that were broadcast posthumously over the Public Broadcasting Service as "The Power of Myth." The television series brought Campbell's works a measure of acclaim the man himself never enjoyed in life.

Campbell died on October 31, 1987. His library and papers have been deposited at the Pacifica Institute in Santa Barbara, California.

Sources:

Campbell, Joseph. The Hero With a Thousand Faces. New York: Pantheon, 1949.

———. Historical Atlas of World Mythologies. 2 vols. New York: Harper, 1983–88.

———. The Masks of God. 6 vols. New York: Viking, 1959–68.

———. Myths to Live By. New York: Viking, 1972.

Campion, Nicolas (1953–)

Nicolas Campion, an astrologer known for his scholarly accomplishments, was born on March 4, 1953, in England. He traces his interest in astrology to his childhood, and was only 12 years old when his horoscope was cast. He began the study of astrology as a teenager. While pursuing that study, he also attended Queen's College, Cambridge, the School of African and Oriental Studies (B.A. History, 1974) and the London School of Economics (M.A., 1976). He taught school while establishing himself as an astrologer and in 1984 became a full-time professional. He was named to the managing committee of the Astrological Lodge of London. He served as president of the lodge on two occasions (1985–88 and 1992–present).

Above and beyond his work with individual clients, Campion has devoted himself to the study of astrological history and especially to the relationship between politics and astrology. Campion is himself very active in environment politics. His work led to his most important book to date, The Book of World Horoscopes. He has also written important essays on the history of astrology, the best known being his debunking of the idea of an "Age of Aquarius." While his conclusions about the non-existence of an Age of Aquarius were widely accepted, his work was weakened by his assumption that ancient astrologers were unaware of the progression of the equinoxes.

His work has been widely acknowledged by his contemporaries, and in 1992 he received the Marc Edmund Jones Award for his contributions to astrological studies by the National Astrological Society of the United States. He has lectured widely to astrological organizations across Europe and North America.

Sources:

Campion, Nicolas. "The Age of Aquarius: A Modern Myth." In Joan McEvers, ed. The Astrology of the Macrocosm. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990.

———. The Book of World Horoscopes. Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1988.

Camp Meetings

Camp meetings (also known as "assemblies") have occupied an important place in the advancement of Spiritualism since 1873, when the first camp meeting was initiated at Lake Pleasant, Massachusetts. These camp meetings were very like the revivalistic camp meetings of the early twentieth century and the successful summer chautauquas at Chautauqua Lake, New York. The meetings lasted throughout the summer season and many of the mediums took up residence on the grounds. Lily Dale in New York and Onset and Lake Pleasant in Massachusetts were the leading camps. Today, a small number of camps, such as Cassadaga (Florida), Chesterfield (Indiana), Silver Belle (Pennsylvania), and Lily Dale, still exist.

Sources:

Karcher, Janet. The Way to Cassadaga: A Look at Spiritualism, Its Roots, and Beliefs, and Cassadaga, Florida. Daltona, Fla.: J. Hutchinson Productions, 1980.

Camus, Philippe (or Felipe) (ca. fifteenth century)

A Spanish writer of romances who lived in the fifteenth century. To him is attributed a life of Robert the Devil, La Vida de Roberto el Diablo, later published at Seville in 1629. The legend itself probably dates from the thirteenth century.

Canadian Institute of Psychosynthesis, Inc. See Psychosynthesis Institute

Canadian Society of Questers

The Canadian Society of Questers is an organization dedicated to the study of what is popularly called dowsing, the natural abilities some have demonstrated to locate water, mineral deposits, and other items. The society was founded in 1979 in Vancouver, and most of its members hail from western Canada. The society seeks to correlate the philosophical and metaphysical deductions concerning their art (and related fields such as radiasthesia) with modern scientific findings. It also seeks to discover the means of developing the human sensing capabilities (both mental and physical) that allow dowsing to occur and to disseminate that knowledge. To carry out its goals, the society facilitates instructions of individuals and the public on matters related to parapsychology and the paranormal element in life.

The programs of the society have dealt with a wide range of topics. Questing is the name given to the key task of seeking for things lost—stolen goods, missing persons, misplaced objects, etc. Divining concerns the search for water and minerals, searching for ley lines, and locating ancient ruins. Radiasthesia uses some of the same abilities in healing endeavors.

Formed at about the same time as the Society of Questers was the Canadian Society of Dowsers. It is based in Ontario from where it draws most of its members. It has similar aims and programs as the Society of Questers and as the new millennium began, the two groups were engaged in discussions looking for a merger. The Ontario group has chapters in Hamilton, Ottawa, and Kingston.

The Canadian Society of Questers can be contacted at P. O. Box 4873, Vancouver, BC, Canada V6B 4A6. It publishes a quarterly journal, The Quester.

The Canadian Society of Dowsers may be contacted in c/o Klaus Stalschuss, 173 Plymouth Rd., Kitchner, ON, Canada N2G 3G7. It has an Internet page at http://www.angelfire.com/on/dowsers/.

Sources:

Canadian Society of Dowsers. http://www.angelfire.com/on/dowsers/. May 20, 2000.

Canadian Society of Questers. http://mypage.uniserve.ca/~questers/. May 20, 2000.

Canadian UFO Report

Former Canadian quarterly publication concerned with UFO activities and related mysteries, published by John Magor of British Columbia. It was incorporated in Journal UFO, published by UP Investigations Research Inc. Last known address: P.O. Box 455, Streetsville, Mississagua, ON, Canada L5M 2B9.

Canavesio, Orlando (1915–1957)

Surgeon and neurologist, born in Buenos Aires, Argentina. In 1946 Canavesio founded the Argentine Medical Association for Parapsychology, the first organization to encourage physicians to explore parapsychology, and commenced publication of the journal Revista Medica de Metapsiquica. He utilized the electroencephalograph (EEG) to research the relationship between ESP and brain physiology. In 1948 he was appointed head of the Institute of Applied Psychopathology, which the Argentine government had established to determine whether the Spiritualist movement was injurious to the public welfare. As the leading voice of parapsychology in the country, he was invited to speak at the International Conference on Parapsychology held at Utrecht, the Netherlands, in 1953. He was killed in an automobile accident in 1957.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Candles Burning Blue

There is a superstition that candles and other lights burn blue when spirits are present, because of the sulphurous atmosphere thought to accompany the specters. Some individuals claim to see apparitions and state that there is a change in the temperature and other properties of the ambient air when ghosts appear.

Candomblé Nagó

An Afro-Brazilian religion, one of several derived from the traditional religions of West Africa. Nagó refers to the West African Yoruban people, many of whom were taken to Brazil as slaves. Yoruban religion survives primarily among the African people of Brazil.

Candomblé is headed by priests and priestesses who are specialists in contacting the orixds, the ancester spirits of the Yoruban people. The orixds are usually identified with natural forces such as thunder, water, and the sea, but are also identified with Roman Catholic saints. One of the leading orixds is Oxalá, who is often identified with Jesus. Worship, which includes spirit possession, drumming, singing, and dancing, occurs in temples called terreiros.

Candomblé is strongest in Bahia, the northeast area of Brazil. In recent decades it has been closely associated with other spirit possession groups such as Umbanda and Spiritism.

Sources:

Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins Press, 1978.

Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.

Cannon, Alexander (1896–1963)

British psychiatrist, hypnotist, and author of books on occultism. He was born in Leeds, England, and educated at Leeds, London, Vienna, Hong Kong, and several other universities (eventually receiving both an M.D. and Ph.D.). Later he reinforced his medical qualifications with titles reflecting his training in various Eastern spiritual disciplines, such as "Kushog Yogi of Northern Thibet" and "Master-The-Fifth of the Great White Lodge of the Himalayas." He spent a number of years in Hong Kong, where he was vice president of Hong Kong Medical Society (1929 and 1934), medical officer in charge of prisons, head of the Department of Morbid Anatomy at the University of Hong Kong, and psychiatrist and medical jurist to the High Court of Justice. He also served as His Britannic Majesty's Consul and Port Medical Officer in Canton. He later returned to England, serving as psychiatrist and research scientist at Colney Hatch Mental Hospital. In 1939 he established the Isle of Man Clinic for Nervous Diseases.

During his years in the Orient, Cannon studied occultism and yoga and traveled in India and Tibet. His book The Invisible Influence (1933) created something of a sensation with its claim that during his travels he was levitated over a chasm in Tibet, together with his porters and luggage. Because of this claim, the London County Council dismissed him from his position as psychiatrist on the grounds that he was unfit to practice in charge of a mental hospital. However, Cannon was reinstated after bringing action for wrongful dismissal. He subsequently set up private practice in London, as a Harley Street consultant, and he used the services of psychic mediums in diagnosis.

Cannon was regarded as an eccentric in prewar Britain, when occultism was considered highly suspect, and the somewhat wild statements in Cannon's books did not help his reputation. In his book Sleeping Through Space (1938) he gives directions for bringing the dead back to life: "[administer] a severe kick with the knee between the shoulder blades" at the same time shouting in [the] left ear "Oye," "Oye," "Oye." He adds: "It is rarely necessary to repeat the operation before life is again resumed, but this can be repeated up to seven times in long-standing cases." Again, in an article, "Some Hypnotic Secrets," published in The British Journal of Medical Hypnotism (1949), he states, "If the patient wakes up at all before I have got my hypnotic sleep suggestions home to him, I place both of my thumbs on his carotid arteries vagus nerves and carotid body firmly . . . until he is 'off' again. . . ." It would seem that the unfortunate patient stood a fair chance of being strangled, but doubtless he could be resuscitated by the redoubtable doctor's "Oye, Oye, Oye" technique.

Cannon wrote a number of books on both psychiatry and the occult. He was also an early experimenter in suggestion therapy by means of gramophone recordings. In later life he retired to the Isle of Man, where he died circa 1963.

Sources:

Cannon, Alexander. Hypnotism, Suggestion & Faith-Healing. 1932.

———. The Invisible Influence. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1934.

———. The Power of Karma. N.p., 1936.

———. Powers That Be. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1935.

———. The Science of Hypnotism. N.p., 1936.

———. Sleeping Through Space. N.p., 1938.

———. "Some Hypnotic Secrets." The British Journal of Medical Hypnotism 1, 1 (1949).

Cannon, Delores (1931–)

Delores Cannon, hypnotist and past-life therapist, was born in 1931 in St. Louis, Missouri. She grew up there and in 1951 married a career navy man. She spent the next 20 years as a navy wife and the mother of four children. In 1968 her husband, who was an amateur hypnotist, stumbled across the phenomenon of past lives during a session with a woman who had a weight problem. Her husband retired in 1970 and they moved to the Ozark Mountain area of Arkansas. As her children reached adulthood, she used her new free time to study hypnosis and the idea of reincarnation. She developed her own techniques that seemed to be effective in releasing information in those who allowed her to hypnotize them.

At one point during the 1980s, an entity began to speak through one of her subjects who claimed to be Nostradamus, the fifteenth-century author of a number of prophetic poems. When the woman came out of her hypnotic state she was reluctant to continue but agreed to one additional session. Nostradamus indicated that he would be able to speak through different people hypnotized by Cannon and gave her a method to establish contact and to assure her that it was indeed he who was communicating. Over the next years he communicated through no less than a dozen people and discussed the meanings of his prophecies. These communications became the basis of a three-volume series, Conversations with Nostradamus, the first volume of which appeared in 1979.

Cannon has also used hypnosis to explore past history, and has concluded that much of what is taught as history in the schools is incorrect or distorted. It is also boring and dry. On the other hand, history as treated in novels and movies is so romanticized as to bear little resemblance to what actually occurred. She has offered as an alternative the rich record of experiences that have come through some of her subjects who have recounted their existence in previous incarnations. Separate books have, for example, treated life in the time of Jesus and his association with the Essenes and the experience of Hiroshima as World War II closed. The 1994 volume Legends of the Starcrash recounts the life of an ancient tribe of Native Americans who had a legend of their progenitors coming to Earth on a spaceship from another galaxy.

During her 20 years of work, Cannon has also explored the UFO abduction phenomenon and has cooperated with the Mutual UFO Network.

Sources:

Cannon, Delores. Conversations with Nostradamus. 3 vols. Huntsville, Ark.: Ozark Mountain Publishers, 1989–1992.

———. The Custodians: Beyond Abduction. Huntsville, Ark.: Ozark Mountain Publishers, 1998.

———. Jesus and the Essenes. Huntsville, Ark.: Ozark Mountain Publishers, 1999.

———. The Legend of Starcrash. Huntsville, Ark.: Ozark Mountain Publishers, 1994.

———. They Walked with Jesus: Past Life Experiences. Huntsville, Ark.: Ozark Mountain Publishers, 1999.

Canon Episcopi (or Capitulum Episcopi)

An early religious document of unknown origin, erroneously attributed to the Council of Ancyra, which met in 314 C.E. It was first quoted by Regino of Prüm, Abbot of Treves, in 906 C.E. In the twelfth century it was incorporated in the Corpus Juris Canonici by Gratian of Bologna and became part of canon law. The importance of this document is that it is an early ecclesiastical statement describing witchcraft as the practice of pagan religion and ascribing the acts of witches to dreams and fantasies. The document became important in the rise of the Inquisition, which was limited in its scope to heretics (those Christians who held nonorthodox doctrines) and apostates (those Christians who had rejected the faith). Since witchcraft was related to the practice of another religion, rather than being within the purview of either heretics or apostates, the Inquisition could not touch them.

The Canon Episcopai was overturned by a papal encyclical issued by Pope Innocent VIII in 1484. Summis desiderantes affectibus redefined witchcraft as devil worship, hence abandoning one's religious fault. The encyclical had the effect of unleashing the Inquisition on people accused of practicing witchcraft.

Sources:

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Cantilever

A theory of the physical action of ectoplasm during the phenomenon of telekinesis, or the movement of objects without contact or other physical means. The theory was developed by the psychical investigator Dr. W. J. Crawford, who attempted to measure the movement of ectoplasm during his investigations of the Goligher Circle in Belfast, Ireland, between 1917 and 1920.

Cao Dai

Cao Dai is a Vietnamese religion that began in 1925 with a vision of the Supreme Being given to Ngo Van Chieu. In the vision he was asked to spread the message of the unity of religion. God, as the source of all, began different religions at different times for different people. In the light of modern transportation and communication, however, it is time for all religions to unite around their common Source. Ngo was assured that other messages would be received from spiritual beings in God's service. Out of the original revelation, a new religion and hierarchy (somewhat modeled on Roman Catholicism) emerged. Integral to the structure has been a groups of mediums (some of whom practiced automatic writing) who have continued communications with various spiritual beings. Some of the revelations were received by a practice similar to the planchette. Mediums would turn a basket upside down and insert a pencil through it in such a way that the moving basket left a written message behind. All officers in the church are approved by such a spiritualist message. Their presence is a primary sign of the influence of theosophy and French Spiritualism on the movement from its beginning.

Cao Dai developed as a synthesis of religions, trying to take universal truths and insights common to Christianity, Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism, and Genism (all present in Vietnam), as well as Theosophy and Spiritualism. It later included Islam, Zorastrianism and Hinduism in its research. Among the common beliefs that the Cao Dai have asserted is the belief in the One God, the ongoing connection of each religion to its source, and the principles of love and justice. It is the assertion of Cai Dao, that any believer following the esoteric practice of their present religion will lead them to the same ultimate goal.

The Cao Dai also teach a set of esoteric practices that attempt to transform matter into vital energy and then into spiritual energy. A basic meditation exercise utilizes the subtle body anatomy derived from Tantra, including activation of the energy centers known as chakras and the raising of kundalini energy.

The Cao Dai grew across Vietnam, but was profoundly effected by the Vietnamese War and the suppression of religion under the post-war government. During this time it spread quietly within the Vietnamese expatriate communities around the world. In the 1990s it has suddenly emerged into public notice as it has attempted to break out of it ethnic enclaves into the larger European and North American religious and spiritual community. The international center of Cao Dai remains in Vietnam, at the Tay Ninh Cao Dai cathedral located about 60 miles from Ho Chi Minh City. The government has considered the spiritualist practices of the group but superstition and banned their continuance. Cao Dai spiritists have had to operate in secret. The most recent government regulations allow it to operate, but under such a system many believe is designed to eradicate the religion in Vietnam in a generation.

International headquarters are in Vietnam, but overseas headquarters have been established at 1608 Smiley Heights Dr., Redlands, CA 92373. There are a number of Internet pages devoted to Cao Dai, including one supported by the Sydney Centre for Studies in Caodaism, http://pandora.nla.gov.au/nla/pandora/caodaism.html. The primary Internet site for the movement can be found at http://www.caodai.org/.

Sources:

Sydney Centre for Studies in Caodaiism. http://pandora.nla.gov.au/nla/pandora/caodaism.html. April 20, 2000.

Cao Dai. http://www.caodai.org/. April 20, 2000.

Capnomancy

A form of divination in ancient times involving the observation of smoke and consisting of two principal methods. The more important was the smoke of sacrifices, which augured well if it rose lightly from the altar and ascended straight to the clouds, but the contrary if it hung about. Another method was to throw a few jasmine or poppy seeds upon burning coals. There was also a third method involving breathing the smoke of the sacrificial fire.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

"Caquet Bombec"

A fourteenth-century song by the poet Jonquieres. It details an operation in alectromancy, a form of divination using a cock.

Caqueux (or Cacoux)

A former caste of rope makers dwelling in Brittany who in some of the cantons of that country were treated as pariahs, perhaps because the ropes they manufactured were considered the symbols of slavery and death by hanging. They were forbidden to enter the churches and were regarded as sorcerers. They did not hesitate to profit by this evil reputation and dealt in talismans, which were supposed to render their wearers invulnerable. They also acted as diviners. They were further credited with the ability to raise and sell winds and tempests like the sorcerers of Finland.

It was believed that the Caqueux were originally of Jewish origin, and they were separated like lepers from other folks. Francois II, duke of Brittany, enacted that they should wear a mark composed of red cloth on a part of their dress where it could be readily seen. (They are mentioned in Jaques de Cambry's 1799 book Voyage dans le Finistére.

Carancini, Francesco (ca. 1863–1940)

Italian physical medium. He was widely tested by Baron L. von Erhardt and the Society for Psychical Research of Rome, further studied at Paris by Cesar Baudi De Vesme, Lemerle, and M. Mangin, and also investigated at Geneva by Professors Clarapede, Theodore Flournoy, and Batelli. He sat in darkness, tightly bound, and produced strong telekinetic phenomena, such as making objects float and levitation, and occasional materializations, of which flashlight photographs were taken.

Several times he was accused of cheating, but Baron von Erhardt remarked that the hypothesis of fraud in this case implied that the experimenters were absolute imbeciles. Nevertheless, such charges were made by W. W. Baggally (1910) and by others (see Annales des Sciences Psychiques, 1913, pp. 243–47).

Sources:

Baggally, W. W. "Some Sittings with Carancini." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 14 (June 1910). Reprinted in Everard Feilding, Sittings with Eusapio Palladino and Other Studies. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Physical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Carbuncle

In ancient belief this stone was supposed to give out a natural light without reflection; it was ranked fifth in value after diamonds, emeralds, opals, and pearls. It is among the gems ruled by the sun and is both male and female—the former distinguished by the brightness that appears to burn within it, and the latter by the light it throws off. It takes no color from any other gem applied to it, but imparts its own. The virtue of the carbuncle was said to be its power to drive away poisonous air, repress luxury, and preserve the health of the body. It was also supposed to reconcile differences among friends.

Cardan, Jerome (1501–1576)

Italian mathematician, physician, and astrologer, reputed to be a magician. He was a contemporary of Faustus and Paracelsus. He left in his Memoirs a frank and detailed analysis of a curiously complicated and abnormal intellect, sensitive, intense, and not altogether free from the taint of insanity. He declared himself subject to strange fits of abstraction and exaltation, the intensity of which became at length so intolerable that he inflicted on himself severe bodily pain as a means of banishing them.

Cardan described three personal peculiarities to which he was prone. The first was the faculty of projecting his spirit outside his body, to the accompaniment of strange physical sensations. The second was the ability to perceive through his senses anything he desired to perceive; as a child, he explains, he saw these images involuntarily and without the power of selection, but when he reached manhood he could control them to suit his choice. The third peculiarity was that before every important event in his life he had a dream that warned him about it. Indeed, he had written a commentary of considerable length on Synesius's treatise on dreams, in which he advanced the theory that any virtuous person can acquire the faculty of interpreting dreams. In fact, he believed anyone can draw up for himself a code of dream interpretations by merely studying carefully his own dreams.

In one instance, at least, Cardan's prediction was not entirely successful. He foretold the date of his own death, and, at age 75, was obliged to abstain from food in order to die at the time he had predicted.

He published books on mathematics, astronomy, astrology, rhetoric, and medicine, including Ars Magna (1545), De Subtilitate Rerum (1551), and De Rerum Varietate (1557).

Sources:

Morley, H. Jerome Cardan. London, 1854.

Waters, W. G. Jerome Cardan. London, 1898.

Carey, Ken

Ken Carey, a contemporary New Age medium and channel, was a postal worker as a young man. Frustrated, he and his family moved to a farm where they lived without most modern conveniences such as electricity, plumbing, radio, television, newspapers, and magazines. Carey apprenticed himself to an Amish farmer. At one point in the later 1970s, lying in bed with a severe cold, he felt a presence and heard a low humming he described as an energy field. Then a voice spoke to him.

During the winter of 1978–79 he channeled for 11 days. The entities that spoke through him sometimes appeared as angels (including the angel Raphael) or extraterrestrials. However, during the later sessions, an entity declared, "I am Christ. I am coming this day through the atmosphere of your consciousness. . . . I am the bridegroom, spoken of old. I came to you first through the man named Jesus." The transcripts of these sessions were published as The Starseed Transmissions in 1982 and became an early channeled New Age classic. The popular response led to the publication of further volumes based on the channelings.

The entities who spoke through Carey emphasized the central New Age message. They had emerged in order to assist human evolution. It was time to lift the spell of matter and to bring forth a new planetary being. Humankind, Carey argued, is poised on the brink of a momentous transformation: The earth is ripe for harvest. Two resources are available to assist humans in the transformative period: the advanced intelligences, such as those channeling through Carey; and the creative power of thought. As with other New Age channelings, Carey's emphasizes the problems of overreliance on rational thought in problem solving and living with guilt imposed in younger years.

Sources:

Carey, Ken. Flat Rock Journal: A Day in the Ozark Mountains. Thorndike, Maine: G. K. Hall, 1994.

———. Notes to My Children: A Simplified Metaphysics. Kansas City, Mo.: Uni-Sun, 1984.

———. Return of the Bird Tribes. Kansas City, Mo.: Uni-Sun, 1988.

——— [Raphael]. The Starseed Transmissions: An Extraterrestrial Report. Kansas City, Mo.: Uni-Sun, 1982.

———. Return of the Bird Tribes. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991.

———. Terra Christa: The Global Spiritual Awakening. Kansas City, Mo.: Uni-Sun, 1985.

———. The Third Millennium: Living in the Posthistoric World. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1995.

———. Vision: A Personal Call to Create a New World. Kansas City, Mo.: Uni-Sun, 1985.

Cargo Cults

Various forms of modern mythologies among the native peoples of Melanesia, arising from folk recollections of the riches brought by white traders, missionaries, or other colonizers. The earliest form of cargo cults appears to have developed in Fiji in the late nineteenth century when prophets would announce the imminent return of ancestors or white men on ships laden with luxuries.

During World War II, another form of cargo cult developed around the Red Cross planes transporting medical supplies to the Pacific Islands; modern leaders erected red crosses in the hope of bringing back supplies. In New Hebrides, there was a group that believed a white man would arrive in a red airplane laden with good things, and sticks were used to mark out a magic airstrip. In the New Hebridean island of Tanna, a strong movement emerged around the mythical messianic figure "John Frum." He appears to favor particular individuals and makes legendary trips to America to visit the president. His "Second Coming" will be manifest to the whole island, and he will bring the good things of the world so long denied to the Tannese.

Cargo cults represent a tragic combination of exploitation by explorers and traders and the culture shock of Christian missionaries displacing native religion.

Sources:

Burridge, Kennelm. Mambu. New York: Harper Torchbook, 1978.

Lawrence, Peter. Road Belong Cargo. Melbourne, Australia: Melbourne University Press, 1964.

Rice, Edward. John Frum He Come. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.

Worsley, Peter. The Trumpet Shall Sound. New York: Schocken Books, 1962.

Carington, W(alter) Whately (1884–1947)

British psychic researcher who investigated Mrs. Osborne Leonard and the Irish medium Kathleen Goligher of the Goligher Circle. He was born Walter Whately Smith in London. He studied science at Cambridge University, but had to postpone completion of his degree until after his service in the British army during World War I. In 1933 he adopted his older family name from Brittany, modifying the spelling from Carentan to Carington.

In 1920 he became a member of the council of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and worked with E. J. Dingwall and others investigating the French medium Marthe Beraud (see also Eva C.). By the early 1930s he had come to believe that further study of spontaneous cases was a dead end and began to advocate quantitative research. His first important paper was presented in several parts (1934–1937) as "The Quantitative Study of Trance Personalities" and was a watershed paper in parapsychology.

As with most parapsychologists, Carington turned his attention to the survival hypothesis. His initial quantitative studies in the 1930s had led him to believe that the mediums' controls were not separate entities but secondary personalities of the medium. He eventually came to postulate the "psyhcon hypothesis" of survival. He believed the mind is a cluster of sense-data and images that together constitute a single system, a system which may survive bodily death and even continue to evolve.

Carington founded and edited the journal Psychic Research Quarterly and wrote several books. He turned down an academic post and lived most of his life in poverty in order to devote his time to psychic research. In 1940 he was awarded a Perrott Studentship in Psychical Research and a short time later a Leverhulme Research Grant. He died March 2, 1947, at Sennen, Cornwall, England.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Carington, Walter Whately. The Death of Materialism. N.p., 1932.

———. The Foundations of Spiritualism. N.p., 1920.

———. Matter, Mind and Meaning. Completed by H. H. Price. London: Methuen, 1949.

———. "The Quantitative Study of Trance Personalities." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. Part 1, 42 (1934): 173. Part 2, 43 (1935): 319. Part 3, 44 (1937): 189.

———. Telepathy: An Outline of its Fact, Theory and Implications. London: Methuen, 1945. Reprint, New York: Gordon Press, 1972.

———. A Theory of the Mechanism of Survival. N.p., 1920.

Murphy, Gardner. "W. Wately Carington: In Memoriam." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 41 (1947): 123.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Carleson, Rolf Alfred Douglas (1910–)

Accountant and Spiritualist leader in Sweden. He was born January 29, 1910, in Montreal, Canada, but moved to Sweden during his adult life. He held posts as general secretary of the International Spiritualist Federation, editor of Spiritualisten (a Swedish psychic magazine), and general manager of Excelsior, a Swedish publishing house specializing in psychic literature.

Carleson was a founder of the Stockholm Spiritualist Society and served as its secretary for twenty years (1937–57). He then became general secretary of the Swedish Spiritualists Union in 1958–59. During this time he was a member of a Swedish psychic circle experimenting with materialization and direct voice phenomena.

Carleson was also a member of the Society for Parapsychological Research in Stockholm.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Carpocratians

A sect of Gnostics founded by Carpocrates of Alexandria. The sect claimed Christ derived the mysteries of his religion from the Temple of Isis in Egypt, where he was said to have studied for six years, and that he taught them to his apostles, who transmitted them to Carpocrates. Members used theurgic incantations and had their own peculiar greetings, signs and words, and symbols and degrees of rank. The Carpocratians believed in metampsychosis and the preexistence of the soul, but rejected the resurrection of the body. They had some beliefs in common with the Basilideans. The sect endured until the sixth century.

Sources:

Legge, Francis. Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity from 330 B.C. to 330 A.D. 2 vols. 1915. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Carrahdis

A class of aborigine priests in New South Wales, Australia.

Carrel, Alexis (1873–1944)

French surgeon and biologist with a philosophical interest in the unknown possibilities of mankind. Born at Sainte-Foy-les Lyons, France, June 28, 1873, Carrel studied at the Universities of Dijon and Lyons, obtaining his M.D. in 1900. In 1904 he went to Canada, hoping to raise cattle, but ended up instead pursuing his surgical skills at the Hull Physiological Laboratory, Chicago. In 1906 he became a staff member of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and in 1912 received a Nobel Prize in physiology and medicine for his work on vascular surgery and transplantation of organs. He joined the French army in World War I and with Henry Drysdale Dakin developed the Carrel-Dakin solution for sterilizing infected wounds. His philosophical interests came to the forefront in his first book, Man the Unknown (1935), which became a best-seller.

During World War II Carrel lived in France and held an appointment as director of the Foundation for the Study of Human Relations under the Vichy government. After the war he was dismissed as a collaborationist, although it is probable that he was more interested in human biology and physiology than politics. He died in Paris, November 5, 1944. Two of his books, The Prayer (1948) and Voyage to Lourdes (1949), were published posthumously.

Sources:

Carrel, Alexis. Man the Unknown. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1935.

———. Reflections on Life. New York: Hawthorn, 1953.

———. Voyage to Lourdes. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1950.

Carrington, Hereward (Hubert Lavington) (1880–1958)

Psychical investigator and author of many popular books on psychic subjects. Carrington was born October 17, 1880, in St. Heliers, Jersey, Channel Islands, Britain. He was educated in London and Cranbrook, and immigrated to the United States in 1899. His Ph.D. was obtained later at William Penn College, in Iowa. His interest was in psychical research and he followed an anti-Spiritualist line until the book Essays in Psychical Research by "Miss X" (Ada Goodrich Freer) shook his skepticism. In 1900, at age 19, he joined the American branch of the Society for Psychical Research and devoted the rest of his life to such studies. He became known for his intellect and knowledge and was a delegate to the First International Psychical Congress in Copenhagen in 1921 and to subsequent congresses in Warsaw (1923), Paris (1927), Athens (1930), and Oslo (1935).

After Richard Hodgson (1855–1905) died and the American branch of the Society for Psychical Research was reestablished as the American Society for Psychical Research under James H. Hyslop's leadership, Carrington became Hyslop's assistant and worked in that capacity until July 1908. Then, on behalf of the English Society for Psychical Research, and in company with Everard Feilding and W. W. Baggally, he went to Naples to investigate the phenomena of the medium Eusapia Palladino. His experiences, as described in Eusapia Palladino and Her Phenomena, moved him even further into the camp of believers. Summarizing his new stance, he stated,

"My own sittings convinced me finally and conclusively that genuine phenomena do occur, and, that being the case, the question of their interpretation naturally looms before me. I think that not only is the Spiritualistic hypothesis justified as a working theory, but it is, in fact, the only one capable of rationally explaining the facts."

This view was shaken after Palladino, on his invitation, visited America in 1909 and was exposed as a fraud on two occasions. Carrington stuck by his earlier opinions and did not publish the record of the sittings, which remained in his possession until 1954. In his Personal Experiences in Spiritualism (1918), he speculated that the phenomena were specifically of biological origin.

In 1921, with an interested group behind him, Carrington founded the American Psychical Institute and Laboratory, which was in active operation for about two years.

In 1924 he sat on a committee of the Scientific American investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism. He attended many sittings with Mina Crandon ("Margery") in Boston and initially considered her mediumship genuine. Then in 1932, following some revelations of probable fraud, his faith was again shaken. He wrote in the Bulletin of the Boston Society for Psychic Research, "Certainly this throws a cloud over the whole Margery case." Carrington also found fraud in his investigation of William Cartheuser.

Carrington believed in the strong pull of the positive evidence for human survival, yet as he grew older, he became far less committed to it. Summarizing his own researches in The Story of Psychic Science (1930), he states:

"I may say that I have never, in all that time, witnessed any phenomena which have appeared to me undoubtedly spiritistic in character—though I have, of course, seen many unquestionably supernormal phenomena. At the same time, I realize very fully that other very competent investigators have seen and reported manifestations far more striking than any it has been my good fortune to witness: and these findings have duly impressed me. I, therefore, maintain a perfectly open mind upon this question, while continuing my investigations and shall probably continue in this state of mental equilibrium until some striking and convincing phenomena turn the scales in one direction or in the other."

Those striking and convincing phenomena came Carrington's way with the visit of Eileen Garrett at the American Psychical Institute three years later. Having subjected her to psychoanalytic "association tests," combined with an electrical recording apparatus to decide whether the "communicators" were personalities distinct from the medium, he concluded, "I can now say that our experiments seem to have shown the existence of mental entities independent of the control of the medium, and separate and apart from the conscious or subconcious mind of the medium."

Throughout his active life Carrington wrote numerous books, some notable for their sharp perceptions and insightful observations, and others filled with incredible and unfounded opinions. In his later years he moved on to investigate astral projection and wrote a series of classic books with Sylvan J. Muldoon. He died December 26, 1958, in Los Angeles.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Carrington, Hereward. The Case for Psychic Survival. New York: Citadel Press, 1957.

———. Loaves and Fishes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1935.

———. Modern Psychic Phenomena. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1919.

———. The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism. New York: Herbert B. Turner, 1907.

———. The Problems of Psychic Research. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1921.

———. The Story of Psychic Science. London: Rider, 1930. Reprint, New York: Ives Washburn, 1931.

———. Your Psychic Powers, and How to Develop Them. New York: A. L. Burt, 1920.

Carrington, Hereward, and Sylvan J. Muldoon. The Phenomena of Astral Projection. London: Rider, 1951.

———. The Projection of the Astral Body. 1929. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Carrithers, Walter Adley, Jr. (1924–)

Writer and commercial artist, member of the American Society for Psychical Research, Society for Psychical Research, London, and the American Federation of Astrologers. He investigated the question of alleged fraud with a view to improving reporting methods. He wrote articles for Fate magazine and various theosophical and astrological journals. His essay "Re-Appraising Astrological Concepts, Old and New" won first prize in an international essay contest held by the American Federation of Astrologers and was published in its Bulletin of March-April 1959.

Over the years Carrithers devoted a significant amount of time to investigating and defending Helena Petrovna Blavatsky against the charges of fraud that plagued her during the last years of her life and have haunted the Theosophical Society ever since. These efforts led to literary works, the first appearing in response to Gertrude Williams's Priestess of the Occult, which had appeared in 1946. In the early 1960s Carrithers focused his attention on the Hodgson Report of 1885, the key document that compiled the greatest amount of evidence against Blavatsky. He wrote a series of articles for the American Theosophist in 1961 that were later gathered in booklet form and published by the Theosophical Society. In 1962 he also wrote another article that countered the Hodgson Report, which appeared in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research. Although he raised a few valid points, on the whole his attempt to refute Hodgson failed to convince many outside the theosophical movement.

Sources:

Carrithers, Walter A., Jr. "Madam Blavatsky: One of the World's Great Jokers." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 56 (July 1962).

———. The Truth about Madame Blavatsky: An Open Letter to the Author of the Priestess of the Occult. Covina, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1947.

Waterman, Adlai E. [Walter A. Carrithers, Jr.]. Obituary: The "Hodgson Report" on Madame Blavatsky. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1963.

Carter, Charles Ernest Owen (1887–1968)

Theosophist and astrologer, born in Poole, Dorset, England, in 1887. Carter attended the University of London, became a lawyer (1913), and served in the British army during World War I. As a young man he saw an ad for horoscopes by Alan Leo and at age 23 began his study of the subject. In 1917 Leo died, and the Theosophical Society's fledgling Astrological Lodge, of which Leo was the driving force, dwindled. In 1920 Carter picked up Leo's work and turned it once again into a vital force. He was elected president of the lodge and served in that post until his retirement in 1952.

Carter's influence came primarily through his writing. He launched Uranus, a periodical of the Astrological Lodge, in 1923, and the quarterly journal Astrology in 1926. He edited the magazine Astrology for 33 years. His breadth of knowledge of the field was demonstrated in his first book, The Encyclopedia of Astrology (1924), and in his textbook, The Principles of Astrology (1925), the basic introduction used by a generation of astrologers. It was followed by a host of additional books, including his most popular title, Astrological Aspects (1930), which went into ten editions during Carter's lifetime. His last and possibly most original book, An Introduction to Political Astrology (1951), stemmed from reflection on events surrounding World War II. His texts were well received on both sides of the Atlantic.

In his mature years Carter led in the founding of the Faculty of Astrological Studies, a facility to train the next generation of astrologers. Among his well-known students was John Addey, one of the first to receive the school's diploma in 1951. Carter joined with Addey in forming the Astrological Association, a professional organization for British astrologers.

Carter died in London on October 4, 1968.

Sources:

Carter, C. E. O. Astrological Aspects. London: L. N. Fowler, 1930.

———. The Encyclopedia of Astrology. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1924.

———. An Introduction to Political Astrology. London: L. N. Fowler, 1951.

———. The Principles of Astrology. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1925.

———. The Zodiac and the Soul. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1928.

Cassoli, Piero. "Parapsychology in Italy Today." In Parapsychology Today: A Geographical View. Edited by Allan Angoff and Betty Shapin. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1971.

Cartheuser, William (ca. 1930)

American direct voice medium. His father was a photo engraver who had lived near Vienna, and his mother was of Hungarian origin. Cartheuser was taken to Europe as a child and lived in Besztercze, Transylvania, until age 16, when the family returned to the United States. During the 1930s, Cartheuser resided at the famous Lily Dale Spiritualist Center in New York State.

Malcolm Bird reported in Psychic Research (1927, p. 166) on two series of séances that Cartheuser gave in October 1926 to the American Society for Psychical Research. He found that one of the voice communicators was actually a living person. Cartheuser's voice mediumship was also investigated by noted researcher Dr. Nandor Fodor in 1927 at the house of medium Arthur Ford in New York. Fodor noted that although Cartheuser had a harelip, there was no impediment in the voices manifesting during a trumpet séance. Finally, Cartheuser was investigated by Hereward Carrington, who concluded that "a high percentage of fraud enters into the production of Cartheuser's physical phenomena."

In 1933 nine gramophone recordings of Cartheuser's mediumship were made at the studios of the World Broadcasting Company in New York. The "spirit voices" were so loud that engineers had to ask for them to be lowered. Some voices were recorded by a microphone at ceiling level.

Sources:

Carrington, Hereward. The Invisible World. New York: The Beechhurst Press; B. Ackerman Inc., 1946.

Pincock, Mrs. J. O'Hara. The Traits of Truth. N.p., 1930.

Cartopedy

Modern term for the ancient Persian science of divination through the study of feet, similar to the study of hands in palmistry. An official cartopedist was employed by the rulers of ancient Persia and India, to be consulted on such important matters as the choice of a bride. Measurements and footprints were studied intensively, sometimes over a period of weeks, before interpretations were made. The size of the foot, the shape of the heel and toes, and the degree of arch were all considered, as well as the lines or markings on the foot itself. Together they were believed to indicate character, ability, and destiny. Cartopedy was also widely used in ancient Arabia.

Cartopedy is still practiced in India and Pakistan in conjunction with palmistry. Cartopedists are consulted by parents to assess the characteristics of potential brides or husbands for their children, and some employers engage them in hiring staff. In crime detection the police use the services of payyindas, or foot trackers, who can assess the characteristics of a wanted man from his footprints.

Sources:

Fahl, Toufic. La divination arabe. Paris: Sinbad, 1987.

Cashen's Gap

An isolated place on the Isle of Man, United Kingdom, known in the Manx dialect as Doarlish Cashen, that was the scene of a celebrated haunting by a talking mongoose named Gef. According to the Irving family, who lived at Cashen's Gap, this creature ate rabbits, spoke in various languages, learned nursery rhymes, and imitated other animals and birds.

The case was investigated personally by Harry Price in company with R. S. Lambert (then editor of the radio magazine The Listener), but the animal refused to manifest until after they had left. The case may have been related to poltergeist phenomena, since Voirrey Irving, the 13-year-old daughter in the family, was closely associated with the manifestations of the talking mongoose. Price failed to detect any evidence of fraud.

The case was also investigated by Dr. Nandor Fodor, then chief research officer of the International Institute for Psychical Research. He interviewed several witnesses, some hostile to the phenomenon, but the evidence to support it proved strong. Fodor did not accept a poltergeist explanation and suggested half seriously that Gef may have been a mongoose that had learned to talk.

Many years later, after the whole affair had died down, a strange unidentified animal was killed in the district. Some suggested that it might have been Gef.

Sources:

Price, Harry H., and R. S. Lambert. The Haunting of Cashen's Gap. London, 1936.

Cassadaga

Cassadaga, a Spiritualist camp in central Florida near DeLand, was founded in 1895, but grew out of a message given from the spirit world to a young Minnesota medium, George Colby (1848–1833), in 1868. He was told that he would be the instrument for the founding of a large Spiritualist camp in the southern United States. In 1875, directed by his spirit guide Seneca, Colby traveled to Wisconsin where he met T. D. Giddings. The two then traveled to Florida and found the land to which Seneca had directed him. In 1880 he filed a homestead claim for the land and in 1884, it was awarded to him. In 1893, the Spiritualist movement in the United States united to form the National Spiritualist Association (now the National Spiritualist Association of Churches). The following year, in cooperation with people from Camp Lily Dale in New York, who understood the task of managing a camp, Colby formed the Southern Cassadaga Spiritualist Camp Meeting Association. Colby granted the new association 35 acres (of the 145 he had been awarded in his homestead grant). The association's first meeting was held in Colby's home.

The new camp was named for Cassadaga, New York, a town near Lily Dale. It was designed as a winter haven for Spiritualists from the north, especially New England. Many built cottages that they inhabited when they came South for the season. The association also erected a hotel, a large auditorium, and various additional buildings. A small town of several hundred residents soon emerged. Some 300 permanent residents now live at Cassadaga, of which approximately 100 live on the camp grounds proper.

A fire ravaged the camp in 1926 and while the major structures were rebuilt, they were not paid for before the Depression hit. Several buildings, including the hotel, fell into private hands.

For many years, the programming was focused in several seasons when special classes and programs were concentrated. Today, the seasonal emphases have largely disappeared and classes are held year-round. The camp is the largest Spiritualist facility in the world.

Sources:

Henderson, Janie. The Story of Cassadaga. Cassadaga, Fla.: Pisces Publishing, 1996.

Karcher, Janet, and John Hutchinson. This Way to Cassadaga, Deltona, Fla.: John Hutchinson Productions, 1980.

Cassoli, Piero (1918–)

Physician and psychologist actively concerned with parapsychology. Cassoli was born July 25, 1918, in Bologna, Italy, and educated at the University of Bologna (M.D., 1943). In 1947 he became the secretary of a group of researchers investigating parapsychology. He was one of the founders (1954) and then president (1957–59) of the Centro Studi Parapsicologia. He also served as director of the center for many years.

A member of the Italian Society for Parapsychology, Cassoli's interests in parapsychology have been quite varied. He was among the first to promote experimental methods of psychical research in Italy and conducted experiments on precognition. He also investigated mediums, uncovering numerous tricks they were creating. As a physician, he also experimented in the use of hypnosis for anesthesia as an alternative to drugs.

Cassoli contributed articles on parapsychological subjects to Minerva Medica and Luce e Ombra. In 1971 he participated in the International Conference on Parapsychology held at St. Paul de Vence, France.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cassoli, Piero. "Parapsychology in Italy Today." In Parapsychology Today: A Geographical View. Edited by Allan Angoff and Betty Shapin. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1971.

Castaneda, Carlos (1925–1998)

An anthropologist and occultist who created a sensation with his best-selling book The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge, first published in 1968. The volume described his experiences with the mysterious Juan Matus, a Yaqui Indian from Sonora. Don Juan was represented as a sorcerer and metaphysical master of the Mexican border who taught a higher reality involving the visionary potentialities of drugs like mescaline. The books caught the imagination of a generation of spiritual seekers who were using various mind-altering drugs and the attention of social scientists who were opting for new theories about the subjective nature of reality.

Castaneda's background is somewhat obscure. His official biographies say that he was born in Sao Paulo, Brazil, in 1931. However, it is now known that he was born in Cajamarca, Peru, on December 25, 1925. He moved to Lima as a young man and studied at the Colegio Nacienal de Nuestra Senora de Guadalupe and the National Fine Arts School of Peru. He moved to San Francisco in 1951 and later attended Los Angeles City College (1955–59). He became an American citizen in 1959 and that same year enrolled in UCLA. He received his B.A. in anthropology in 1962. He pursued his graduate studies sporadically through the next decade, and he finally completed his Ph.D. in 1973.

In the meantime he published his first three books detailing the material he had learned from Don Juan. His third book, Journey to Ixtlan, had been presented as his doctoral dissertation. Anthropologists praised Castaneda, and Don Juan became a cult figure, although this elusive sorcerer seems to have manifested only to Castaneda and remained a mystery man.

There is, of course, no proof of the existence of Don Juan outside Castaneda's accounts, and his teachings are often recounted in language that sounds nearer to that of a popular thriller than that of a Yaqui Indian. Typically unconvincing phrases from Tales of Power (1975) are: "You're goofing," "You indulge like a son of a bitch," and "You nearly lost your marbles." Alan Brian, a British critic, pointed out in a London Sunday Times review (May 11, 1975) that Don Juan appears to be bursting with laughter every few pages.

In the absence of any convincing validation of the actual existence of Don Juan, many readers will prefer to regard him as a product of Castaneda's fertile imagination, a mystification of a similar kind to the Lopsang Rampa hoax. For a thoughtful and scholarly analysis of the Castaneda phenomenon, see Castaneda's Journey; The Power and the Allegory (1976) by Richard DeMille. DeMille discovered sources, published earlier, for the Don Juan material and views the books as fiction. DeMille's work created a storm within the scholarly community and led to a general discrediting of Castaneda. However, the large public tuned to his psychedelic spiritual vision seemed hardly concerned with the controversy. The reclusive Castaneda continued to publish new books in the Don Juan series through the 1980s.

Castaneda died April 27, 1998.

Sources:

Benitez, Fernando. In the Magic Land of Peyote. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1975. Reprint, New York: Warner Books, 1975.

Castaneda, Carlos. The Eagle's Gift. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1981.

———. Journey to Ixtlan: The Lessons of Don Juan. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1972.

———. The Power of Silence: Further Lessons of Don Juan. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.

———. The Second Ring of Power. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1977.

———. A Separate Reality: Further Conversations with Don Juan. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1971.

———. Tales of Power. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1974.

———. The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968.

DeMille, Richard. Castaneda's Journey; The Power and the Allegory. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra Press, 1976.

———, ed. Don Juan Papers: Further Castaneda Controversies. Santa Barbara, CA: Ross-Erickson, 1980. Reprint, Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1990.

Seeing Casteneda: Reaction to the "Don Juan" Writings of Carlos Castaneda. New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons, 1976.

Silverman, David. Reading Castaneda: A Prologue to the Social Sciences. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1975.

Castel-A-Mare

Castel-A-Mare, scene of a spectacular haunting in the early twentieth century, was a three-story residence located in rural Devon, near Torkay, England. Suspecting a haunting situation, in 1917 the owner cooperated with a group of Spiritualists in an investigation of the house. A female medium was engaged and Violet Tweedale (1862–1936), a Spiritualist writer, included in the investigation party. The account left by Tweedale provides the primary surviving record of the haunting.

The investigation occurred during two sessions with the medium who entered a trance state and was seemingly possessed by the entities who were haunting the building. In the first session, a violent male entity seemed to be the person manifesting through the medium. He delivered a series of expletives and attacked one of the party, drawing blood. However, little information was received. At the second sitting, a female entity appeared, and from her a story emerged a multiple murder. It appeared that a male house guest, a doctor, went berserk and killed the master of the house and strangled his maid. During the second session, when the murderer initially manifested himself, he was driven away with an exorcism. Then the maid appeared and reenacted a drama as if having just found her dead master and then being killed herself.

Following the session, Tweedale checked the name of the master with local records but found no record of any murders. It was speculated that possibly the doctor murderer had written the death certificate and had listed the death as natural. He could have said that the maid had merely moved on. If such is the case, however, it does not explain the continued haunting by the murderer's spirit.

In 1920, Castel-A-Mare was dismantled and the land turned into a garden.

Sources:

Chard, Judy. Devon Mysteries. Bodmin: Bossiney Books, 1979.

Tweedale, Violet. Ghosts I Have Seen. London: Herbert Jenkins, n.d.

Castelvitch, Countess (ca. 1920)

Early twentieth-century private medium of Lisbon, Portugal, whose powers of physical phenomena were carefully observed by Dr. d'Oliveira Feijao, professor of surgery in the Lisbon University and Mme. Madeleine Frondoni-Lacombe. According to Feijao's description:

"Blows were struck, the loudest being on the glass of the bookcase. Articles of furniture sometimes moved. Heavy chairs moved about the room; efforts were made on the locked doors of the bookcase, which were opened; large and heavy books were flung on the floor (our hands being linked all the time); an office bell and a handbell, the half open piano and a guitar in its case all sounded loudly. The table rose as much as 24 inches."

Once a heavy table weighing 160 pounds was raised on two legs when it was barely touched and a smaller table was torn into 200 pieces. Objects were brought into the séance room and out through closed doors and excellent materializations were witnessed, among which there was a unique phantom with a death's-head. This phantom and other claimed materializations were photographed.

The mediumship of the countess was discovered in January 1913. Like Katie King, in the celebrated case of Florence Cook, her control, who manifested for years, departed after a dramatic farewell on July 14, 1920. The history of the mediumship is well told in Frondoni-Lacombe's Merveilleux Phenomènes de l'au delà (Lisbon, 1920).

Sources:

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. London, 1923.

The Castle of the Interior Man

The mystical name given to the seven stages of the soul's ascent toward divinity, according to such Christian mystics as St. Teresa of Avila (1515–1582). These seven processes of psychic evolution are as follows: (1) the state of prayer in which one concentrates on God; (2) the state of mental prayer, in which one seeks to discover the mystic significance of all things; (3) the obscure night, believed to be the most difficult, in which self must be utterly renounced; (4) the prayer of quietism, complete surrender to the will of God; (5) the state of union, in which the will of man and the will of God become identified; (6) the state of ecstatic prayer, in which the soul is transported with joy, and love enters into it; (7) the state of ravishment, which is the mystic marriage, the perfect union, and the entrance of God and heaven into the interior man.

Sources:

Ramge, Sebastian. An Introduction to the Writings of St. Teresa. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1963.

Teresa of Avila, St. The Interior Castle. Translated by Kieran Kavanaugh and Oyilio Rodriguez. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.

Castruccio, Peter Adelbert (1925–)

Engineer, space technologist, and former director of Westinghouse's Astronautics Institute in Baltimore, Maryland. He was born January 11, 1925, in New York and studied at the University of Genoa, Italy, and Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. He had a distinguished career in such fields as space communications, space navigation, electrical rocketry, and space technology. Castruccio investigated telepathy and clairvoyance and the possible use of ESP in relation to astronautics.

Catabolignes

Demons who bore men away, killed them, and had the power to break and crush them. The sixteenth-century theologian L. Campester described how these demons treated their agents, the magicians and sorcerers.

Catalepsy

A condition involving the sudden suspension of sensation and volition and the partial suspension of vital functions. The body assumes a rigid appearance, sometimes mistaken for death, and the victim remains unconscious throughout the attack. On occasion, the cataleptic state may be marked by symptoms of intense mental excitement and by apparently volitional speech and action. Sometimes the symptoms are hardly distinguishable from those of hysteria.

The period covered by the attack may vary from a few minutes to several days, although the latter occurs only in exceptional cases. An attack may recur, however, on only trifling provocation in the absence of strong resistance by the victim.

Catalepsy is said to be caused by a pathological condition of the nervous system, generally produced by severe or prolonged mental emotion, and should not be confused with hypnotic trance. The belief that the condition may occur in a perfectly healthy person is probably fallacious. There is speculation that catalepsy, like ecstasy and mediumistic faculties, may at times prove contagious.

Catalepsy is associated with schizophrenia and hysteria, and there is reason to believe that it can be self-induced in certain cases. Eastern fakirs have been known to cast themselves into a cataleptic sleep lasting for months, and cases have even been reported where they permitted themselves to be buried, being exhumed when the grass had grown over their graves.

Some forms of trance induced by hypnotism appear similar to the cataleptic state.

Sources:

Dendy, W. C. Philosophy of Mystery. London, 1841.

Cathari

A medieval Christian gnostic heretical sect that flourished in southern France, especially in the Provençal region. One branch of the sect, originating in the region of Albi, gave rise to the name of followers as Albigenses.

As early as the 1100s, a form of dualism that held that Satan was, though a creature of God, an immensely powerful being, appeared in southern France and in the Rhine Valley. Its immediate source may have been beliefs brought back from the Holy Land by crusaders. Within a decade, a more extreme dualism that argued for the existence of Satan prior to the creation of the universe appeared. The dualists in France made common cause with the Bogomil dualists of the southern Balkans and by 1180 had become a significant force in southeastern France and northern Italy. Cathar belief was also strong in Lombardy and the Rhineland. The Roman Catholic Church started a crusade against the Cathars of southern France, centered upon the town of Languedoc. By 1230 the Albigensians were eradicated.

What little we know concerning the Cathar belief and practice derives largely from a Cathar ritual from Provence, recorded in a thirteenth-century manuscript, and from the proceedings of the Roman Catholic inquisitors who ruthlessly persecuted the sect. The group has roots that go back to Manicheanism and origins in the theological problem of the place of good and evil in Christian doctrine. The Cathars believed a dualist concept of two gods or principles. The evil god Satan or Lucifer ruled the material world, which was a purgatorial condition for angels or divine souls imprisoned in flesh after the primal war in heaven. Humans could only recover the divine kingdom through a spiritual rebirth, becoming a vehicle for the Holy Ghost, otherwise death would not bring release. A man who died without such a spiritual rebirth would face reincarnation again and again, in human or animal form.

An interesting modern echo of the Cathari and its doctrine of imprisonment in the flesh through various incarnations is found in the strange claim of a modern British physician Arthur Guirdham that he has verified information that he and a group of other individuals were reincarnations of Cathars who were brutally persecuted in Languedoc, France, during the twelfth century.

Sources:

Birks, Walter. The Treasure of Montsagur: A Study of the Cathar Heresy and the Nature of the Cathar Secret. U.K.: Crucible, 1987.

Guirdham, Arthur. The Cathars and Reincarnation. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Lea, H. C. History of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages. 3 vols. New York: Harper and Bros., 1888.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Wakefield, Walter, and Austin P. Evans. Heresies of the High Middle Ages. New York, 1969.

Catoptromancy (or Enoptromancy)

A type of divination using a mirror, described thus by the second-century Greek traveler Pausanius:

"Before the Temple of Ceres at Patras, there was a fountain, separated from the temple by a wall, and there was an oracle, very truthful, not for all events, but for the sick only. The sick person let down a mirror, suspended by a thread, till its base touched the surface of the water, having first prayed to the goddess and offered incense. Then looking in the mirror, he saw the presage of death or recovery, according as the face appeared fresh and healthy, or of a ghastly aspect."

Another catoptric method was to place the mirror at the back of the head of a boy or girl whose eyes were bandaged. In Thessaly, the response reportedly appeared in characters of blood on the face of the moon, probably represented in the mirror. The Thessalian sorceresses derived their art from the Persians, who always endeavored to plant their religion and mystic rites in the countries they invaded. (See also crystal gazing)

Cats, Elfin

These cats were said to be found in the Scottish Highlands and to be of a wild breed as large as dogs, black in color, and with a white spot on the breast. They had arched backs and erect bristles. According to superstition, elfin cats were witches in disguise.

Cattle Mutilations

Since 1973 there have been waves of reports of mysterious attacks on cattle in the midwestern United States. The first of these occurred in Minnesota and Kansas. Some features of these attacks seemed inconsistent with normal explanations of attacks by predatory animals. In many instances the dead cattle appeared to have been mutilated by precise surgery in which certain parts of the body (usually eyes, ears, mouth, rectum, or sex organs) had been removed and the carcass drained of blood. No footprints indicating mutilation by humans were found around the bodies. Authorities in Kansas suggested that "cultists" were probably the perpetrators. Several carcasses were brought in for autopsies, which showed the animals died of blackleg, a cattle disease. By this time, however, the early reports and allegations had circulated around the country.

In 1974 there were reports of cattle mutilations in northeastern Nebraska and eastern South Dakota. Some reports coincided with sightings of UFOs. Along with the absence of footprints or other tracks in the area, there were rumors of large helicopters being used for cattle rustling. Although modern rustlers often use mechanization, it is unlikely that they would leave carcasses behind, and they would have no rationale for mutilating individual cattle.

Some explanations were ingenious but not wholly convincing. The director of men's admissions at the South Dakota State Mental Hospital suggested that the mutilations were the work of a psychotic individual, perhaps a youth from a farm background with hostility toward authority figures. A persuasive suggestion was that the mutilations were the work of Satanist groups, and a few scattered cases of animals who had been drugged were found. However, the cattle mutilations covered a large area and continued undetected for three months, and the possibility of Satanist groups operating from helicopters over such a large area seems unlikely.

The suggestion that the mutilations might have been the work of entities from UFOs is offered by Linda Moulton Howe in her 1980 movie, Strange Harvest, and reinforced by additional accounts in her book published in 1989.

More definitive work was begun in 1979 by Kenneth Rommel, who received a grant from the Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Administration to investigate mutilation reports in

New Mexico. In 1980, after an extensive investigation of the New Mexico carcasses, and with agreement from sheriffs and pathologists in other states, Rommel announced that he had found no evidence of cattle mutilation apart from normal predator damage. The pattern of disturbance of the carcass was consistent with that of small animals attacking the softest part of the cow, which was largely protected by the extremely strong hide. In 1984 further extensive study of the reports around the nation was made by Daniel Kagan and Ian Summers. Their book, Mute Evidence (1984), remains the definitive account of the phenomenon. They examined the origin of cattle mutilation reports and found them based on inept observation and unfounded rumor. Where autopsy reports of "mutilated" cattle were acquired from competent pathologists, they indicated damage by small animals.

In spite of lack of evidence, reports of cattle mutilations and unfounded charges that aliens are attacking hundreds of thousands of the defenseless cows continue to circulate within some of the ufological networks, though most ufologists have dismissed the stories.

The modern-day reports of animal mutilations are not unprecedented. Other stories of attacks on cattle were compiled by the indefatigable chronicler of the bizarre, Charles Fort, in his book Lo! (1931). Fort recalls that in the winter of 1904–05, during an outbreak of religious revivalism in Wales, there were stories of strange lights in the air and mysterious air vessels, followed by reports of widespread attacks on sheep. In 1910 sheep were killed on a large scale by something that attacked half a dozen each night; rabbits were killed by having their backs broken. Since Fort there have been many similar reports of animal mutilations from various countries. Not all such attacks are mysterious. In October 1980, following reports of a sheep predator active for four years, a Scottish farmer baited a cage and caught a puma. Similarly persistent stalking and killing of sheep by wild dogs is well known to farmers in many countries.

Sources:

Mitchell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Phenomena: A Book of Wonders. N.p., 1977.

Rommel, Kenneth M. Operation Animal Mutilation. Report of the District Attorney, First Judicial District, State of New Mexico. Sante Fe, N. Mex.: District Attorney, 1980.

Stewart, James R. "Cattle Mutilations: An Episode of Collective Delusion." The Zetetic 1, 2 (Spring–Summer 1977): 55–66.

Cauda Pavonis (Newsletter)

Newsletter of the Hermetic Text Society, published twice a year. It includes scholarly material on all aspects of alchemy and hermeticism and their influence on literature, philosophy, art, religion, and the history of science and medicine. The approach is interdisciplinary and is not limited to any particular historical period, national emphasis, or methodology. Address: Cauda Pavonis, Department of English, Washington State University, Pullman, WA 99164-5020. Website: http://www.wsu.edu:8080/~english/CaudaPavonis.html

Sources:

Cauda Pavonis: Studies in Hermeticism. http://www.wsu.edu:8080/~english/CaudaPavonis.html. March 22, 2000.

Caul

A membrane that sometimes covers the head of a child at birth. It was regarded as a preservative against drowning at sea and was consequently much sought after by seamen. Superstitions concerning the caul are of some antiquity. In ancient Rome, Aelius Lampridius wrote about the life of Antonine Diadumeninus, stating that he was so called from having been brought into the world with a band of membrane round his forehead like a diadem, and that he enjoyed a perpetual state of felicity from this circumstance. Roman midwives offered cauls for sale in the Forum.

Even as late as the 1870s, British newspapers often carried advertisements from would-be purchasers of a caul, offering large sums of money. The caul was also used in a form of divination called amniomancy.

In the cultures of northern and eastern Europe, the caul, which marked babies as different, was associated with vampirism. A child born with a caul was thought to become a vampire after death. To prevent such a fate, the caul was removed, dried, ground into fine particles, and fed to the child on its seventh birthday.

CAUS See Citizens Against UFO Secrecy

Causimomancy

Divination by fire. It was supposed to be a good omen when combustible objects cast into the fire did not burn.

Cavanna, Roberto (1927–)

Biochemist, Istituto Superiore di Sanità, Rome, Italy. He was born November 3, 1927, in Rome, and educated at the University of Rome (Ph.D., chemistry, 1949). Cavanna investigated connections between states of consciousness affected by psychopharmacological and psi phenomena and edited several books on consciousness studies.

Sources:

Cavanna, Roberto, ed. Psi Favorable States of Consciousness. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

Cavanna, Roberto, and Emilio Servadio. ESP Experiments with LSD 25 and Psilocybin. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1964.

Cavanna, Roberto, and Montague Ullman, eds. Psi and Altered States of Consciousness. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1968.

Cayce, Charles Thomas Taylor (1942–)

Charles Thomas Taylor Cayce, the president of the Association for Research and Enlightenment, (ARE) also president of the Edgar Cayce Foundation, (ECF) and the grandson of seer Edgar Cayce, was born in Virginia Beach, Virginia, on October 7, 1942, the son of Hugh Lynn Cayce. The Cayce family had lived at Virginia Beach since 1925. Charles Thomas grew up there and worked in his father's office. He attended Hampden-Sydney College and later did graduate work at the University of California at Berkeley and the University of Maryland, from which he received his Ph.D. in child psychology in 1968. He taught college for several years and worked for the U.S. State Department before returning to Virginia Beach in 1972 and joining the ARE staff as the youth director. As a teenager, Cayce had become alienated from the ARE and had decided to pursue a career elsewhere. However, after delving into his grandfather's work, he found ideas and concepts personally helpful to him. His continued study of the readings made him both open and then supportive of the work.

Four years after Cayce began work at ARE, his father had a heart attack. In the wake of Hugh Lynn's illness, immediate plans for succession were made. With the approval of the board, Charles Thomas was named president of the corporation. In that position, Charles Thomas initially emerged as an administrator, rather than a writer or speaker like his father.

Throughout the 1990s and at the beginning of the 21st century Cayce evolved into one of the key writers, lecturers, and key spokesperson for the ARE and the ECF. He traveled across the United States, and internationally spoke on behalf of his grandfather's work, as well as his own work with children and youth. Both he and his wife, Leslie Cayce, devoted their time and talents to furthering the ARE's work with younger people. He has developed a research program testing gifted youth and studying the role of meditation and dreams in furthering psychic development. Cayce served on the Board of Advisors for the National Association for Transpersonal Psychology, with other notable psychologists, including Dr. Bernie Siegal.

In an interview with Daniel Redwood in 1995, Cayce talked about his grandfather, the ARE, and the programs and schools that have emerged from it. Much of his excitement was focused on the possibilities of the Internet as he gradually worked to make his grandfather's readings available online. Cayce noted that Edgar Cayce's readings were not meant to encourage a person to make a decision based solely on a reading. Rather, "The readings suggested that our purpose on the earth is to learn to make our will one with God's will. This is a simple little phrase, but very complex when we try to apply it. I think if we forego the opportunity to make decisions, and try to get psychics to do that for us, then we are foregoing opportunities to grow spiritually on the earth, forgoing our major purpose for being on the earth."

At the beginning of the 21st century, Cayce continues to participate in workshops and seminars at the Virginia Beach headquarters, offering such topics as, Your Soul's Purpose in the New Millennium, and Potential of the Human Mind and Finding Your Mission in Life. ARE Headquarters at Sea, offers cruises with Cayce and his colleagues for the Edgar Cayce Cruise of Enlightenment, on a regularly scheduled basis.

In the Redwood interview, Cayce emerged the idealist along with his role as the benevolent administrator when he stated that: ". . .my fondest dream for the A.R.E. . .would be for the A.R.E. to go out of business. . .the role of the A.R.E., through my grandfather's readings, is to help people awaken to their spiritual nature, to help people see ways to manifest that spiritual nature in this physical world. . .It would just be wonderful if that were to happen more and more, to the point where those structures weren't necessary, including the A.R.E."

Sources:

"Association for Research and Enlightenment." http://www.are-cayce.com/. April 11, 2000.

Redwood, Daniel. "A Daniel Redwood Interview with Charles Thomas Cayce," 1995. Available at: http://www.drredwood.com/interviews/cayce/html. April 11, 2000.

Smith, A. Robert. Hugh Lynn Cayce: About My Father's Business. Norfolk, Va.: The Donning Co., 1988.

Zuromski, Paul. "A Conversation with Charles Thomas Cayce." Psychic Guide (September–November 1984): 14–19.

Cayce, Edgar (1877–1945)

Outstanding American psychic and founder of the Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE). Cayce was born on March 18, 1877, in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, the son of businessman. He grew up in rural Kentucky and received only a limited formal education. He was a member of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). As an adult he began a career as a photographer.

Cayce's life took a radically different direction in 1898, after he developed a case of laryngitis. He was hypnotized by a friend and while in the trance state prescribed a cure that worked. Neighbors heard of the event and asked Cayce to do similar "readings" for them. In 1909 he did a reading in which he diagnosed and cured a homeopathic physician, Dr. Wesley Ketchum. Ketchum arranged for periodic sittings in which Cayce, who had learned by this time to go into trance without the assistance of a hypnotist, offered his medical advice for the ill. During the next years Cayce gave occasional sittings, but primarily worked in photography.

Then in 1923 Theosophist Arthur Lammers invited Cayce to Dayton, Ohio, to do a set of private readings. These readings were noteworthy because they involved Cayce's initial exploration of individual past lives and because of the imposition upon his readings of Lammers's theosophical opinions, especially concerning reincarnation. These readings encouraged Cayce to become a professional. He soon closed his photography shop and moved to Dayton, and then in 1925 to Virginia Beach, Virginia. Among his early supporters was businessman Morton Blumenthal, who gave financial backing for Cayce Hospital (1928) and a school, Atlantic University (1930). Unfortunately, Blumenthal was financially destroyed by the Great Depression and both enterprises failed.

In 1932 Cayce organized his following as the Association for Research and Enlightenment. With the resources generated by the association, complete records of all the readings for the next 12 years were made. These formed a huge body of material for future consideration, and more than any other characteristic make Cayce's career stand out above that of his contemporaries. Cayce's readings were later indexed, cross-referenced, and used as the basis of numerous books.

Cayce died in 1945, and his son Hugh Lynn Cayce continued the work of the association and promoted the abilities of his father, though he did not claim to possess any special psychic abilities himself. Cayce's work became known by a large audience outside the psychic community in 1967 through a biographical book by Jess Stern, Edgar Cayce, The Sleeping Prophet.

Cayce continues to fascinate a generation after his passing, and a steady stream of material created from his readings come from the Association for Research and Enlightenment. David Bell, whose doctoral dissertation was on Cayce, has launched an Internet journal of Cayce studies at http://www.cli.edu/cayce, and several new studies of his life and work were published in the 1990s.

Sources:

Bro, Harmon Hartzell. A Seer Out of Season: The Life of Edgar Cayce. New York: New American Library, 1989.

Cayce, Edgar. The Edgar Cayce Reader. 2 vols. New York: Paperback Library, 1969.

Cayce, Hugh Lynn. Venture Inward. New York: Paperback Library, 1966.

Johnson, K. Paul. Edgar Cayce in Context. The Readings: Truth and Fiction. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

Millard, Joseph. Edgar Cayce. Greenwich, CT: Fawcett, 1967.

Neimark, Anne E. With This Gift. New York: William Morrow, 1978.

Puryear, Herbert. The Edgar Cayce Primer. New York: Bantam Books, 1982.

———. A Prophet in His Own Country. New York: William Morrow, 1974.

Cayce, Hugh Lynn (1907–1982)

Son of psychic Edgar Cayce (1877–1945) and president for many years of the Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE). He was born on March 16, 1907, at Bowling Green, Kentucky. He grew up in Kentucky and Alabama, where his father worked as a photographer. His childhood was marked by one event that particularly influenced his life: He burned his eyes severely, and his father went against medical advice and would not allow the doctors to remove one of the eyes. The eye was saved and Hugh Lynn recovered completely.

He moved with his family to Virginia Beach in 1925. After graduating from high school, he entered Norfolk Business College and in 1926 began four years at Washington and Lee University. While there he met Thomas Segrue. Through Segrue, who was enthusiastic about his father's work, Hugh Lynn gained a new appreciation for what had become commonplace in his family. In 1929 the two began a periodical, The New Tomorrow, which centered upon Cayce's psychic readings. Later, Segrue would write one of the early biographies of Edgar Cayce, There is a River (1942).

After graduating from college, Cayce went to work for the ARE. He helped build the organization through the 1930s, but then went into the army during World War II. Both his parents died while he was in Europe, and when he returned the ARE was failing as a business. He soon set about reviving it and developing a program to replace the readings that were no longer available. His major resource was the library of transcripts of readings that Edgar Cayce gave during the last two decades of his life. Research on these readings began with indexing and cross-referencing them, followed by publication of excerpts from the readings on various topics.

Growth of the ARE was slow until 1966–67 when Cayce and Jess Stern published biographical studies of his father. These books became unexpected successes and led to a series of books on Cayce's teachings that appeared over the next decade, including The Edgar Cayce Reader (1969), a two-volume collection of excerpts from his readings compiled by Hugh Lynn. The association experienced rapid growth during that period.

Cayce led the foundation until 1976, when he was forced into semiretirement by a heart attack. His son Charles Thomas Cayce succeeded him as president of the ARE, and Hugh Lynn became chairman of the board. During his semiretirement Cayce was able to write several more books. He died July 4, 1982.

Sources:

Cayce, Hugh Lynn. Earth Changes Update. Virginia Beach, Va.: ARE Press, 1980.

———. Faces of Fear. New York: Berkeley Books, 1980.

———. The Jesus I Knew. Virginia Beach, Va.: ARE Press, 1984.

———. Venture Inward. New York: Paperback Library, 1966.

Smith, A. Robert. Hugh Lynn Cayce: About My Father's Business. Norfolk, Va.: Donning, 1988.

Cazotte, Jacques (1719–1792)

French romance writer and the reputed author of the famous Prophétie de Cazotte, concerning the French Revolution. As his sympathies were not with the revolutionary party, his letters were seized, and he and his daughter Elizabeth were thrown into prison. He was later beheaded. He was also the author of the celebrated occult romance Le Diable Amoureux (1787).

Sources:

Cazotte, Jacques. Le Diable. Paris: B. Grasset, 1921. Translated as The Devil in Love. London: Consortium, 1993.

CCCS See Centre for Crop Circle Studies

Celestial Light

According to mystical belief, the sacred light of all the ages, which is "as the lightning which shineth from the west to the east." It is the halo that surrounds certain visions of a mystical nature. The celestial light can only be seen by those who have lived ascetically, when respiration is feeble, and life has almost left the body.

The Celestine Prophecy

The Celestine Prophecy by James Redfield, the best-selling metaphysical book of the 1990s, became the premiere statement of the post-New Age spirituality. Redfield, a former psychological counselor, had quit his job to search for a new worldview that would unite all the material he had been absorbing from his reading in New Age and human potentials books. The original text was self-published in 1992 and sold several hundred thousand copies before it was picked up by Warner Books, who published a hardback edition in 1994. It soon became the number-one best-selling nonfiction book in America. It remained on the New York Times best-seller list for three years.

The Celestine Prophecy is a novel (Redfield calls it a parable) in which the narrator travels to Peru in search of a manuscript containing nine insights. The fictional setting becomes a simple tool for presenting these nine insights and discussing them. The insights begin with an awareness of a spiritual awakening that is occurring. It appears that a critical mass of people are coming to understand their life as a spiritual journey. The journey is marked by the recognition of the mysterious coincidence happening in our lives. The insights lead to an experiencing of the universal energy that is available to humans and which may be accessed through an inner connection.

Following the insights leads to the merging of one's individual journey into a common vision of where humankind is going in the twenty-first century. Eventually, whole groups of individuals will evolve into higher vibratory states and begin to experience what the post-New Agers call ascension. The concentration on this conscious evolution has been made possible by the technological advances that allow us to drop our almost total focus on mere material survival.

In a sequel to The Celestine Prophecy, Redfield explored The Tenth Insight, which set the current spiritual awakening into a larger historical context. Some humans through history have sought to implement the spiritual pathway outlined in the nine insights. As individuals today remember their own past and recover their understanding of a personal destiny, a further insight of a common world vision emerges and presents the option of working together with others of like mind to implement a new spiritual culture.

The response to The Celestine Prophecy and its sequels has led to the formation of numerous study groups, and an international association of people working to implement the tenth insight, the New Civilization Network. Redfield, in collaboration with Carol Adrienne, has produced study guides for the more serious students of the books. Redfield's books have been joined by a number of books, many of them the result of channeling, that propose very similar themes of individual and social evolution around the idea of ascension.

Sources:

Redfield, James. The Celestine Prophecy. New York: Warner Books, 1994.

———. The Celestine Vision: Living the New Spiritual Awareness. New York: Warner Books, 1997.

———. The Secret of Shambhala: Search for the Eleventh Insight. New York: Warner Books, 1999.

———. The Tenth Insight. New York: Warner Books, 1996.

Cellini, Benvenuto (1500–1571)

This celebrated Italian artist and craftsman was born in November, 1500, in Florence, Italy. Cellini lived a colorful life and his account of the working life of a sixteenth century artist in his Autobiography recounting relations with his family, friends, enemies, and patrons was celebrated in countless translations by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and served as the basis for an opera by Hector Berlioz, Benvenuto Cellini 1837. In his book he claimed to have had interesting adventures with demons and practitioners of black magic. The following excerpt from his Autobiography gives a vivid account of one such experience:

"It happened, through a variety of odd accidents, that I made acquaintance with a Sicilian priest, who was a man of genius, and well versed in the Latin and Greek authors. Happening one day to have some conversation with him, when the subject turned on the subject of necromancy, I, who had a great desire to know something of the matter, told him, that I had all my life felt a curiosity to be acquainted with the mysteries of this art. The priest made answer, 'That the man must be of a resolute and steady temper who enters upon that study.' I replied, 'That I had fortitude and resolution enough, if I could but find an opportunity.' The priest subjoined, 'If you think you have the heart to venture, I will give you all the satisfaction you can desire.' Thus we agreed to enter upon a plan of necromancy. The priest one evening prepared to satisfy me, and desired me to look out for a companion or two. I invited one Vincenzio Romoli, who was my intimate acquaintance: he brought with him a native of Pistoia, who cultivated the black art himself. We repaired to the Colloseo, and the priest, according to the custom of necromancers, began to draw circles upon the ground with the most impressive ceremonies imaginable: he likewise brought hither assafoetida, several precious perfumes and fire, with some compositions also which diffused noisome odors. As soon as he was in readiness, he made an opening to the circle, and having taken us by the hand, ordered the other necromancer, his partner, to throw the perfumes into the fire at the proper time, intrusting the care of the fire and the perfumes to the rest; and then he began his incantations. This ceremony lasted above an hour and a half, when there appeared several legions of devils insomuch that the amphitheatre was quite filled with them. I was busy about the perfumes, when the priest, perceiving there was a considerable number of infernal spirits, turned to me and said, 'Benvenuto, ask them something.' I answered, 'Let them bring me into the company of my Sicilian mistress, Angelica.' That night we obtained no answer of any sort; but I had received great satisfaction in having my curiosity so far indulged. The necromancer told me, it was requisite we should go a second time, assuring me, that I should be satisfied in whatever I asked; but that I must bring with me a pure immaculate boy.

"I took with me a youth who was in my service, of about twelve years of age, together with the same Vincenzio Romoli, who had been my companion the first time and one Agnolino Gaddi, an intimate acquaintance, whom I likewise prevailed on to assist at the ceremony. When we came to the place appointed, the priest having made his preparations as before, with the same and even more striking ceremonies, placed us within the circle, which he had likewise drawn with a more wonderful art, and in a more solemn manner, than at our former meeting. Thus having committed the care of the perfume and the fire to my friend Vincenzio, who was assisted by Agnolino Gaddi, he put into my hand a pintacula or magical chart, and bid me turn it towards the places that he should direct me; and under the pintacula I held the boy. The necromancer having begun to make his tremendous invocations, called by their names a multitude of demons, who were the leaders of the several legions, and questioned them by the power of the eternal uncreated God, who lives for ever, in the Hebrew language, as likewise in Latin and Greek; insomuch that the amphitheatre was almost in an instant filled with demons more numerous than at the former conjuration. Vincenzio Romoli was busied in making a fire, with the assistance of Agnolino, and burning a great quantity of precious perfumes. I, by the direction of the necromancer, again desired to be in the company of my Angelica. The former thereupon turning to me, said, 'Know, they have declared, that in the space of a month you shall be in her company.'

"He then requested me to stand resolutely by him, because the legions were now above a thousand more in number than he had designed; and, besides these were the most dangerous; so that, after they had answered my question, it behoved him to be civil to them, and dismiss them quietly. At the same time the boy under the pintacula was in a terrible fright, saying, that there were in that place a million of fierce men, who threatened to destroy us; and that, moreover, four armed giants of an enormous stature were endeavoring to break into our circle. During this time, whilst the necromancer, trembling with fear, endeavored by mild and gentle methods to dismiss them in the best way he could, Vincenzio Romoli, who quivered like an aspen leaf, took, care of the perfumes. Though I was as much terrified as any of them, I did my utmost to conceal the terror I felt; so that I greatly contributed to inspire the rest with resolution; but the truth is, I gave myself over for a dead man, seeing the horrid fright the necromancer was in. The boy placed his head between his knees, and said, 'In this posture I will die; for we shall all surely perish.' I told him that all these demons were under us, and what he saw was smoke and shadow; so I bid him hold up his head and take courage. No sooner did he look up, but he cried out, 'The whole amphitheatre is burning, and the fire is just falling upon us;' so covering his eyes with his hands, he again exclaimed that destruction was inevitable, and he desired to see no more. The necromancer entreated me to have a good heart, and take care to burn the proper perfumes; upon which I turned to Romoli, and bid him burn all the most precious perfumes he had. At the same time I cast my eye upon Agnolino Gaddi, who was terrified to such a degree that he could scarce distinguish objects, and seemed to be half-dead. Seeing him in this condition, I said, 'Agnolino, upon these occasions a man should not yield to fear, but should stir about and give his assistance; so come directly and put on some more of these perfumes.' Poor Agnolino, upon attempting to move, was so violently terrified that the effects of his fear overpowered all the perfumes we were burning. The boy, hearing a crepitation, ventured once more to raise his head, when, seeing me laugh, he began to take courage, and said, 'That the devils were flying away with a vengeance.'

"In this condition we stayed till the bell rang for morning prayer. The boy again told us, that there remained but few devils, and these were at a great distance. When the magician had performed the rest of his ceremonies, he stripped off his gown and took up a wallet full of books which he had brought with him. We all went out of the circle together, keeping as close to each other as we possibly could, especially the boy, who had placed himself in the middle, holding the necromancer by the coat, and me by the cloak. As we were going to our houses in the quarter of Banchi, the boy told us that two of the demons whom we had seen at the amphitheatre, went on before us leaping and skipping, sometimes running upon the roofs of the houses, and sometimes upon the ground. The priest declared, that though he had often entered magic circles, nothing so extraordinary had ever happened to him. As we went along, he would fain persuade me to assist with him at consecrating a book, from which, he said, we should derive immense riches: we should then ask the demons to discover to us the various treasures with which the earth abounds, which would raise us to opulence and power; but that those love-affairs were mere follies, from whence no good could be expected. I answered, 'That I would readily have accepted his proposal if I understood Latin': he redoubled his persuasions, assuring me, that the knowledge of the Latin language was by no means material. He added, that he could have Latin scholars enough, if he had thought it worth while to look out for them; but that he could never have met with a partner of resolution and intrepidity equal to mine, and that I should by all means follow his advice. Whilst we were engaged in this conversation, we arrived at our respective homes, and all that night dreamt of nothing but devils."

Cellini died in February, 1571, in Florence.

Sources:

Cellini, Benvenuto. Autobiography. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1961.

Pope-Hennessy, John Wyndham. Cellini. New York: Abbeville Press, 1985.

Symonds, J. A. The Life of Benvenuto Cellini. 2 vols. London, 1888.

Celonitis (or Celontes)

This fabulous stone was said to be found in the tortoise. It was believed to resist fire and to have healing virtues. In addition, when carried under the tongue on the day of the new moon and for the fifteen days following, during the lunar ascension, it inspired its fortunate possessor to foretell future events every day from sunrise to six o'clock.

Celts

The ethnic origins of the Celts are somewhat complex, and often obscured by Celtic-influenced languages. Ancient writers referred to the Celts as tall, fair-haired people with blue or grey eyes, but they are more often considered to be the shorter, dark-complexioned Celtic-speaking peoples of France, Great Britain, and Ireland. In general, the Celts are believed to be a warrior race of the early Iron Age, originating north of the Alps, and spreading through central Europe during the La Tène period (500 B.C.E.–1 C.E.).

The Celts who settled in the British Isles comprised two strains—the Brythons and the Goidels. The former became established in England and Wales, but the Goidels migrated from France to Ireland about the forth century B.C.E. At a later date Goidel contingents from Ireland formed settlements in England, Wales, and Scotland, eventually merging with the Brythons. The Gaelic-speaking Celts dominated in Ireland, Scotland, and the Isle of Man, whereas the Brythonic speakers were more common in Wales.

According to Lewis Spence, magic among the Celtic peoples in ancient times was closely identified with Druidism. Celtic origin and its relation to Druidism, however, is a question upon which much discussion has been lavished. Some authorities, including Sir John Rhys, believe it to have been of non-Celtic and even non-Aryan origin; that is, the earliest non-Aryan or so-called Iberian or Megalithic people of Britain introduced the immigrant Celts to the Druidic religion.

The Druids were magi as well as hierophants, in the same sense that the American Indian medicine man was both magus and priest. That is, they were medicine men on a higher scale, possessing a larger share of transcendental knowledge than the shamans of more barbarous races. They may be linked to the shaman and the magus of medieval times. Many of their practices were purely shamanistic, while others were more closely connected with medieval magical rites. The magic of Druidism had many points of comparison with other magic systems and seems to have approximated more closely to the type of black magic that desires power for the sake of power alone rather than any of the more transcendental type. It included the power to render oneself invisible, to change the bodily shape, to produce an enchanted sleep, to induce lunacy, and to cast spells and charms that caused death. Power over the elements was also claimed, as in the case of Broichan, a Caledonian Druid who opposed Saint Columba, as related in St. Adamnan's Life of St. Columba:

"Broichan, speaking one day to the holy man, says: 'Tell me, Columba, at what time dost thou propose to sail forth?' 'On the third day,' says the Saint, 'God willing and life remaining, we propose to begin our voyage.' 'Thou wilt not be able to do so,' says Broichan in reply, 'for I can make the wind contrary for thee, and bring dark clouds upon thee.' The Saint says: 'The omnipotence of God rules over all things, in Whose Name all our movements, He Himself governing them, are directed.' What more need be said? On the same day as he had purposed in his heart the Saint came to the long lake of the river Ness, a great crowd following. But the Druids then began to rejoice when they saw a great darkness coming over, and a contrary wind with a tempest. Nor should it be wondered at that these things can be done by the art of demons, God permitting it, so that even winds and waters are roused to fury.

"For it was thus that legions of devils once met the holy Bishop Germanus in mid-ocean, what time he was sailing from the Gallican Gulf (the British Channel) to Britain in the cause of man's salvation, and stirred up dangerous storms and spread darkness over the sky and obscured daylight. All which storms, however, were stilled at the prayer of St. Germanus, and, quicker than said, ceased, and the darkness was swept away.

"Our Columba, therefore, seeing the furious elements stirred up against him, calls upon Christ the Lord, and entering the boat while the sailors are hesitating, he with all the more confidence, orders the sail to be rigged against the wind. Which being done, the whole crowd looking on meanwhile, the boat is borne along against the contrary winds with amazing velocity. And after no great interval, the adverse winds veer round to the advantage of the voyage amid the astonishment of all. And thus, throughout that whole day, the blessed man's boat was driven along by gentle favouring breezes, and reached the desired haven. Let the reader, therefore, consider how great and saintly was that vulnerable man through whom Almighty God manifested His glorious Name by such miraculous powers as have just been described in the presence of a heathen people."

The art of rainmaking, bringing down fire from the sky, and causing mists, snowstorms, and floods was also claimed by the Druids. Many of the spells probably in use among the Druids survived until a comparatively late period—the names of saints being substituted for those of Celtic deities. In pronouncing incantations, the usual method employed was to stand upon one leg and point with the forefinger to the person or object on which the spell was to be laid, at the same time closing an eye, as if to concentrate the force of the entire personality upon that which was to be placed under the spell.

A manuscript preserved in the Monastery of St. Gall, dating from the eighth or ninth century, contains magic formulas for preserving butter and healing certain diseases in the name of the Irish god Diancecht. These bear a close resemblance to Babylonian and Etruscan spells, and this goes to strengthen the hypothesis often put forward that Druidism had an eastern origin. All magic rites were accompanied by spells. Druids often accompanied an army to assist by their magic in confounding the enemy.

The concept of a Druidic priesthood descended down to the beginning of the twentieth century in a more or less debased condition in British Celtic areas; thus the existence of guardians and keepers of wells, said to possess magic properties, and the fact that certain familiar magic spells and formulas are handed down from one generation to another are proof of the survival of Druidic tradition. Females are generally the conservators of these mysteries, and that there were Druid priestesses is fairly certain.

There are also indications that to some extent witchcraft in Scotland was a survival of Celtic religiomagical practice. Amulets were worn extensively by the Celts, the principal forms in use being phallic (to fend against the evil eye), coral, the serpent's "egg." The person who passed a number of serpents together forming such an "egg" from their collected spume had to catch it in his cloak before it fell to earth and then flee to avoid the reptiles' vengeance. Totemic amulets were also common.

Sources:

De Jubainville, H. d'Arbois. Les Droides et les dieux celtiques à forme d'animaux. Paris, 1906.

Gomme, G. L. Ethnology in Folklore. New York: D. Appleton, 1892.

Green, Miranda J. Dictionary of Celtic Myth and Legend. London: Thames and Hudson, 1992.

Laing, Lloyd Robert. Celtic Britain and Ireland, A.D. 200–800: The Myth of the Dark Ages. Dublin, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 1990.

Powell, T. G. E. The Celts. New York: F. A. Praeger, 1958.

Rhys, John. Celtic Britain. London, 1882.
Ross, Anne. Pagan Celtic Britain. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1967.
Spence, Lewis. Magical Arts in Celtic Britain. London: Rider, n.d.
Squire, Charles. Mythology of the Ancient Britons. London, 1905.

Census of Hallucinations

An early survey of public encounters with paranormal apparitions, occasioned by the publication of Phantasms of the Living, by Edmund Gurney, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore (1886), expanded on in 1889 by a committee of the Society for Psychical Research, London. Under Henry Sidgwick's chairmanship the committee consisted of Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, Myers, Podmore, and Alice Johnson. The report of the committee, drawn up by Mrs. Sidgwick, was published in 1894. Seventeen thousand people were canvassed, of which 1,684 answered claiming to have seen apparitions.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. 2 vols. London: Society for Psychical Research, Trubner & Co., 1886.
"Report of the Census of Hallucinations." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 10 (1894): 25.

Center for Archaeoastronomy

Founded in 1978 to investigate mysteries of ancient sites such as Stonehenge and the Nazca lines in Peru. It is a nonprofit organization concerned primarily with the science, astronomy, and archaeology of ancient peoples. It grew out of the work of people such as R. J. C. Atkinson, Alexander Thom, Gerald S. Hawkins, and Aubrey Burl on Stonehenge and other megalithic sites in Great Britain. The center publishes a quarterly newsletter, Archaeoastronomy & Ethnoastronomy News In 1997, the Center joined the International Society for Archaeoastronomy and also publishes their newsletter. The Center's former journal, Archaeoastronomy was taken over by the University of Texas press and continues to be published under the name, Archaeoastronomy: The Jourrnal of Astronomy in Culture. Address: Center for Archaeoastronomy, PO Box "X", College Park, MD 20741-3022. Website: http://www.wam.umd.edu/~tlaloc/archastro/index.html.

Sources:

Atkinson, R. C. J. Stonehenge. London: Pelican Books, 1960.
Burl, Aubrey. Prehistoric Astronomy and Ritual. Aylesbury, Bucks, England: Shire Publications, 1983.
Center for Archaeoastronomy. http://www.wam.umd.edu/~tlaloc/archastro/index.html. March 8, 2000.
Hawkins, Gerald S. Stonehenge Decoded. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1965.
Thom, Alexander. Megalithic Lunar Observatories. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Center for Borderline History

Founded in 1984 by individuals interested in borderline history (defined by the center as "the study of occult forces upon the evolution of the world"). It examines the influences of occult forces in past as well as contemporary history, identifies these forces, and defines their objectives. The center disseminates findings in various publications. Address: 2336 Bloor W., Box 84662, Toronto, ON, M6S 1T0 Canada.

Center for Frontier Sciences at Temple University

A center, founded in 1987, designed to encourage greater openness toward novel approaches in science, medicine, and technology. The center is dedicated to the open and unbiased examination of any theories, hypotheses, or model that challenge prevailing scientific views using sound scientific methods and reasoning. It does not promote or endorse particular positions, but encourages critical review and healthy skepticism. On its advisory and editorial boards are distinguished researchers, scientists, physicians, theoreticians, and engineers from throughout the world. It publishes a semi-annual journal, Frontier Perspectives. Address: Temple University, Ritter Hall 003-00, Room 478, Philadelphia, PA 19122. Website: http://www.temple.edu/cfs.

Center for Parapsychological Research

The research division of the former Association for the Understanding of Man, which conducted experimental studies of empirical, methodological, and theoretical problems in parapsychology. Its research was aimed at providing a scientific understanding of ESP and psychokinesis, with special attention to the logical linkage between the hypothesis being tested and the methods used to test them. The center was also active in parapsychological education through sponsorship of lectures, workshops, individual counseling, and dissemination of literature and reading lists concerned with the scientific study of psi events. The director of the center was Rex G. Stanford, a parapsychologist and brother of the center's founder, Ray Stanford.

Center for Scientific Anomalies Research (CSAR)

Founded by sociologist Dr. Marcello Truzzi in 1981 to bring together scholars and researchers concerned with the responsible, skeptical, and scientific inquiry into claims concerning anomalies—including UFOs, cryptozoology, and other similar phenomena originally cataloged by Charles Fort. Truzzi had earlier broken with the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal because he had come to reject its hardline debunking stance as opposed to the scientific inquiry he proposed. For a decade he edited the Zetetic Scholar (1978–87); CSAR grew out of the response to the journal. CSAR promotes an open and fair-minded inquiry that is also constructively skeptical, although with the discontinuance of the Zetetic Scholar its activity level has been greatly reduced. Much emphasis in the 1990s has been focused on the Institute for Anomalistic Criminology, one division of CSAR. Address: Center for Scientific Anomalies Research, P.O. Box 105, Ann Arbor, MI 48103.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.
"CSAR: Statement of Goals." Zetetic Scholar 12/13 (1987): 205–06.

Center for Spiritual Awareness

Organization devoted to the concept that religion is a personal relationship between the individual soul and God, with the goal of becoming dissolved in the mystery of divine essence. The center was incorporated in 1964 by H. Edwin O'Neal. Later in the decade, Roy Eugene Davis, a disciple of Paramahansa Yogananda, associated with the center and merged his organization, New Life Worldwide, with it. Davis succeeded O'Neal as head of CSA in 1977.

Under Davis's leadership, the Center for Spiritual Awareness expanded to become the Church of the Christian Spiritual Alliance (which in spite of its name teaches kriya yoga and Hinduism as originally expounded by Swami Yogananda and the Self-Realization Fellowship). The center is now the teaching department of the Church of the Christian Spiritual Alliance. Meditation retreats and seminars are offered at the headquarters as well as in several North American cities. It publishes the Truth Journal. Address: PO Box 7, Lakemont, GA 30552-0001. Website: http://www.csa-davis.org/.

Sources:

Center for Spiritual Awareness. http://www.csa-davis.org/. March 8, 2000.

Davis, Eugene Roy. An Easy Guide to Meditation. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1978.

———. God Has Given Us Every Good Thing. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1986.

———. The Path of Soul Liberation. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1975.

———. The Teachings of the Masters of Perfection. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1979.

Center for Spiritual Development

The Center for Spiritual Development in San Diego, California, is the home base for the activities of Druidess and metaphysical counselor Katherine Torres. Torres is a member of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, the oldest of the Druid organizations, and has operated as a New Age minister for several decades. She completed her Ph.D. in metaphysical science and transpersonal psychology at Westbrook University. Torres writes widely for New Age periodicals but is best known for her work on several divinatory tools, The Sacred Path Wheel and Faces of Womanspirit.

The Sacred Path Wheel was developed from Torres' years of experience at reading tarot cards assisted by her channeling activity. The wheel is a circular chart divided into twelve segments. Each segment represents one of the elements of power that are believed to be with each individual as they align with the soul. When the elements are in balance, the individual becomes aware of his/her inner power and can walk in love and strength. The information included in The Sacred Path Wheel was given to Torres from her angelic guardians. It primary use is for discovering one's life lesson. It is Torres' belief that each individual incarnates for a new life in embodiment to learn a particular lesson. It is believed that one will incarnate into a situation that would tend to force a confrontation with that lesson. Ultimately, the goal is to learn the lesson and move toward balance.

The Sacred Path Wheel also reveals the soul's connection to the basic elements of the universe (earth, air, fire, and water) and their manifestation in the guardians, animals, plants, and minerals. The elements provide the energy to pursue one's life journey.

Torres has also developed a new tarot-like deck of divination cards, the Faces of Womanspirit, designed to assist females to connect with their femininity and the Goddess. It is used as a New Age tool, assisted by the book guide that accompanies the deck, to facilitate one's particular move into the realm of light. In developing the Faces of Womanspirit, Torres drew especially on her Druid background.

Sources:

Torres, Katherine. Faces of Womanspirit. La Mesa, Calif.: Transpersonal Development, 1999.

———. The Sacred Path Wheel. Carlsbad, Calif.: Two Feathers Soaring Lightly, 1991.

———. Soul Magic: Understanding Your Journey. Tempe, Ariz.: New Falcon Publications, 1985.

Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR)

The Center for Studies on New Religions (il Centro Studi sulle Nuove Religioni), generally known by the acronym for its name in Italian, CESNUR, is the primary organization in continental Europe focusing on the study of occult and New Age religion. CESNUR was created in the mid-1980s by Italian lawyer/scholar Massimo Introvigne as an independent international educational association of scholars interested in new and alternative religions, occult and New Age religious and spiritual groups being prominent among them. The association held its first annual international conference in 1988, the most recent being in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania (1999) and Riga, Latvia (2000). While the CESNUR program covers the whole field of new and alternative religious activity, its work fills an important vacuum as the only international group expressing concern about the Western esoteric tradition by promoting information gathering and scholarly research on occult and New Age groups.

An important aspect of the CESNUR program has been the creation of a large research library now located at CESNUR's headquarters at Via Juvarra 20, 10122 Torino, Italy (to be moved in the course of 2001 to Via Confienza 19, 10121 Torino, Italy). It is the largest publicly accessible such library in Europe and includes thousands of volumes treating ceremonial magic, Wicca, Theosophy, Spiritualism, parapsychology, and related topics. Introvigne has also created an expansive Internet site at http://www.cesnur.org that includes selected research papers from the CESNUR conferences, opinion papers on various controversies, and special pages carrying ongoing updates concerning such groups as the Church of Scientology and AUM Shinrikyo/Aleph. The catalog of the CESNUR library is fully accessible through the Internet site. Among the site's unique features is a Popular Culture page whose largest segment covers news and issues related to vampires and vampirism.

CESNUR is headed by an international board of scholars. It maintains a cordial relationship with the Institute for the Study of American Religion in Santa Barbara, California, with which it shares common research and educational goals. Introvigne is the author of more than 25 books, primarily in Italian, including Il Cappello del Mago (1990); Il ritorno dello gnosticismo (1993); La sfida magica (1995); Il satanismo (1997); and New Age & Next Age (2000). He is also the general editor of a series of booklets on New Religious Movements that is currently appearing in Italian, Spanish, and English, and has written numerous articles for publication in English-language books and scholarly journals.

Sources:

CESNUR. http://www.cesnur.org/. June 11, 2000.

Introvigne, Massimo. Il Cappello del Mago. Milano: SugarCo, 1990.

———. New Age & Next Age. Milano: Opiemme, 2000.

———. Il ritorno dello gnosticismo. Milano: SugarCo, 1993.

———. Il satanismo. Torino, Italy: Editrice Elle DiCi, 1997.

———. La sfida magica. Milano: Editrice Ancora, 1995.

Center for UFO Studies See J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies

Center of Universal Truth

The Center of Universal Truth is an organization for the dissemination of the teachings of a spiritual teacher known only as Jeremiah. He had been an engineer until resigning in 1965. He subsequently was ordained as a minister and earned a doctor of divinity degree. However, after functioning as a minister, he claimed God told him to drop all of the trappings of institutionalized religion, including his ministerial titles. He subsequently spent three years on a South Pacific Island, during which time he received a revelation he believed to be directly from the Creator. The revelation consisted of some 70 discourses from the Creator and an additional revelation from the Master Jesus. After his return to the United States, he was told to found the center to assist as many humans as possible into the coming New Age.

It is the teaching of the center that in the beginning the Creator expressed himself and brought forth some mighty Spirits. These Spirits in turn created the solar systems, galaxies, and universes that compose the Creator Omniverse. The Creator then expressed himself again and brought forth other spirits to inhabit the universe previously created. These spirits include those who now exist as Earth's human race. Unfortunately, over the millennia, we have forgotten our origin as Spirit Light beings. Contributing to that forgetfulness are the structures of institutional religion.

The destiny of humans is spiritual enlightenment (God-consciousness) and ascension. Those who ascend join the legion of souls who work to assist humans in their attaining their enlightenment. They are popularly known as the Great White Brotherhood.

The center teaches that God is pure spiritual light. As with normal light, spiritual light can manifest as a spectrum of seven colors, each color a representation of an attribute of God. God's light permeates the universe and each thing in it. When men and women have the light of God within, it is possible for them to come to a realization of God and gain the spiritual consciousness required for ascension. This move is necessary due to the changes soon to manifest on Earth as the old is dissolved and replaced by a new fourth dimension reality.

The Center of Universal Truth is headquartered at P.O. Box 1274, Joshua Tree, CA 92252.

Sources:

Jeremiah. The Spiritual Hierarchy and the Great White Brotherhood. Joshua Tree, Calif.: Center of Universal Truth, 1992.

Central Association of Spiritualists See British National Association of Spiritualists

Central Premonitions Registry

Founded by Robert and Nancy Nelson in New York, the Central Premonitions Registry registers and checks predictions from any part of the country. The registry invites anyone with claims to premonition to send them full details for the special filing system, so that their predictions may be verified. Premonitions are date-stamped and filed under such categories as natural disasters, wars and international relations, aircraft and ship disasters, and prominent personalities—injury or death. All these predictions are monitored and checked. The registry has already verified many remarkably accurate predictions, mostly from ordinary individuals, rather than professional psychics. Robert Nelson first became interested in the paranormal through the telekinetic ability of his identical twin brother, William, to move small objects by mental concentration.

The Central Premonitions Registry is the first private agency in the United States dedicated to the scientific evaluation of precognitive perceptions and their use as an early warning system for assassinations, plane crashes, floods, fires, and other catastrophes. Psychically gifted individuals are encouraged to participate in dream and telepathy studies at local dream laboratories. The registry also provides lectures to civic groups, schools, and colleges on precognition and related faculties. Address: P.O. Box 482, Times Square Sta., New York, NY 10036.

Central Psi Research Institute

Founded in 1977 with a membership of statisticians, psychologists, physicists, and others interested in paranormal phenomena. The institute was dedicated to furthering the development of parapsychology and working to integrate parapsychology into the established academic and scientific arena. Activities included research projects, a midwestern premonitions registry, spontaneous case study files, and a comprehensive education file on parapsychology teachers and courses. The institute offered support services for persons who experience paranormal phenomena daily, conducted in-service educational programs, and arranged classes for educational groups locally. The emphasis was on skepticism and empiricism. The institute published a bimonthly newsletter and a journal, Insights. Last known address: 4800 N. Milwaukee Ave., Ste. 210, Chicago, IL 60630.

Centre de Cryptozoologie

Founded by zoologist Bernard Heuvelmans for the study of animals whose existence is conjectural (i.e., on a borderline between fact and myth). Heuvelmans has coined the term cryptozoology to characterize the study of such creatures as sea monsters, dragons, hairy dwarfs, and yetis or abominable snowmen.

Heuvelmans was born in Le Havre, France, in 1916, and earned his doctoral degree in zoological sciences at Brussels. His books include On the Track of Unknown Animals (1955) and In the Wake of the Sea-Serpents (1968), both translated from the French. Several of his later books have not been translated. In 1982 he became one of the founders of the International Society of Cryptozoology.

The center has a library of some two thousand volumes and a large collection of magazine articles and illustrations, fully indexed by a card catalog. Address: Verlhiac, St. Chamassy, 24260 Le Bugue, France.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Physical Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Heuvelmans, Bernard. "The Birth and Early History of Cryptozoology." Cryptozoology 3 (1984): 1–30.

———. In the Wake of the Sea-Serpents. New York: Hill and Wang, 1968.

———. On the Track of Unknown Animals. New York: Hill and Wang, 1958.

Centre for Crop Circles Studies (CCCS)

British organization concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles. CCCS publishes The Circular. Address: 12 Tintagel Close, Exeter, EX4 9EH, United Kingdom. Website: http://www.cropcircleconnector.com/anasazi/cccs97.html.

Centre House

A British fellowship founded in 1966 by New Age teacher Christopher Hills to provide training in yoga, meditation, awareness, and sensitivity development. The center consisted of a resident community that organizes special courses, lectures, and seminars. One activity was the Inward Bound course, which combined yoga and meditation with mountaineering and was designed to "discover and experience in depth the harmony between individuals and cosmos by development of the relationship between mind, body and Nature."

Hills left the community in the 1970s and went on to found the University of the Trees in Boulder Creek, California. Last known address: 10a, Airlie Gardens, London, W8 7AL, England.

Sources:

Hills, Christopher. Nuclear Evolution (a Guide to Cosmic Enlightenment). London: Centre Community Publications, 1968.

Centro di Ricerca Psichica del Convivio

The Centro di Ricerca Psichica del Convivio (Psychical Research Center of the Convivium) was founded in Rome, Italy. It was one of several such centers that emerged in Italy in the decades after World War II. The center focused its research on problems of the survival of death and conducted public education programs on the subject. Last known address: c/o Via del Serpenti 100/00184 Rome, Italy.

Centro Italiano de Parapsicologia

The Centro Italiano di Parapsicologia (Italian Center for Parapsychology) was founded in 1960 in Naples, Italy, by Giorgio Di Simone, a French professor who teaches at the University of Naples. The center was opened to investigate life after death, especially through an examination of mediumship. Di Simone has monitored a number of mediumistic sessions at which a series of communications were received from what was termed "Dimension X."

The center held monthly meetings for those interested in parapsychology. Its several research projects surveyed people's opinions and experiences on psychic phenomenon. It published a journal, Informazioni Parapsicologia. Last known address: Via Belvedere, 87/80127, Naples, Italy.

Centro Studi Parapsicologici

Italian organization founded in 1954 in Bologna for the study of parapsychological phenomena. Its founders broke their relationship with the Centro Emiliano de Metapsychica (psychical research organization), because they believed it was too dominated by Spiritualists. The leaders, including its director Dr. Piero Cassoli, also wished to emphasize laboratory experiments. It published a journal, Quaderni di Parapsicologia: Giornata Parapsicologica Bolognese. Last known address: Via Valeriani, 39, 40134 Bologna, Italy.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Centurione Scotto, Marquis Carlo (ca. 1928)

A famous medium who was a member of the Italian nobility. His family was one of the oldest in Italy, one of the titles of the marquis being Principe del Sacro Romano Impero. He was a member of Parliament for eleven years and undertook research work in the hope of communicating with his deceased son, the Marquis Vittorio dei Principi Centurione, captain of the Aerial Army, who, while flying over Lake Varese in testing a new machine for the Schneider Cup Race in America was killed on September 21, 1926.

The grief-stricken father was advised to seek comfort in reading H. Dennis Bradley's Towards the Stars (1924), which had been translated into Italian. He found hope, and with letters of introduction from Ernesto Bozzano, he went to London and participated in séances with the medium George Valiantine in Bradley's home. During one séance, he believed that his son spoke to him in a voice that he recognized and gave other evidential information. A trumpet also produced the particular noise of an airplane engine and then the sound of the plane falling. The performance was an imitation of the airplane of Vittorio Centurione, of whose tragic death neither Valiantine nor Bradley knew.

In séances held in New York a similarly noisy manifestation, apparently for identification, was noted in the spring of 1928. After the London séances, Valiantine had presented the marquis with an aluminum trumpet and begged him to sit for direct voice mediumship in his own house. Whether this acted as a suggestion to awaken latent faculties or not, the marquis obtained much success from subsequent séances.

However, it was not his dead son who communicated but one named Cristo d'Angelo, who said he had been a Sicilian shepherd. This spirit control took charge of the manifestations from the other side. Direct voice was the main feature, but many other supernormal manifestations were also witnessed—direct writing, unusual apports (for the production of which the presence of another medium, Fabienne Rossi, was involved), a wide range of lesser physical phenomena, materialization, and once his own teleportation from the locked séance room.

The direct voice usually issued from a corner of the ceiling, but sometimes it came from inside one of the trumpets standing upright. The voices spoke Latin, Spanish, and German, as well five dialects unknown to the medium: Piedmontese, Romagnolo, Neapolitan, Venetian, and Sicilian.

The scientific side of the experiments or the question of propaganda did not interest Centurione Scotto at all. To suggest test conditions was an extremely delicate matter for his chief investigator, Ernesto Bozzano. In the absence of these, strong criticisms of the phenomena were brought forward in Germany by Baron Albert von Schrenck-Notzing and Rudolf Lambert. In England, for similar reasons, the phenomena were questioned by Theodore Besterman of the Society for Psychical Research in a manner that the noted champion of Spiritualism Sir Arthur Conan Doyle found derogatory to Bozzano's reputation as a competent psychical investigator. As a result Conan Doyle resigned his membership from the society.

Sources:

Huck, Gwendolyn K. Modern Psychic Mysteries: Millesimo Castle, Italy. London, 1929.

Cephalomancy

Ancient form of divination using the head of a goat or a donkey.

Cepionidus

A stone of many colors, said to reflect the likeness of the beholder.

Ceraunius (or Cerraclus)

A magical stone said to fall from the clouds. It is described as a pyramidical stone and is supposed to preserve from drowning, from injury by lightning, and to give pleasant dreams.

Ceraunoscopy

Ancient system of divination practiced by examining the phenomena of the air.

Cercle International de Recherches Culturelles et Spirituelles

Cercle International de Recherches Culturelles et Spirituelles (International Circle for Cultural and Spiritual Research) is a French initiatic association founded early in the twentieth century, one of a number of magical esoteric orders inspired by the Templar tradition. In the years following the French Revolution of 1789, several groups arose claiming a lineage from a secret surviving Templar order. Over the succeeding decades the number of such groups claiming Templar roots has multiplied.

Cercle International is grounded in the idea that each era (defined by astrological ages) is unique in the way that the cosmos impact human consciousness. The previous Piscean era was keynoted by Jesus and his admonition to love one another. The keynote for the present era, the Aquarian, is the search for personal integration, in a manner previously modeled by mystics and sages. In this era, mysticism will become common.

In attempting to assist people in finding personal integration, Cercle International emphasizes that each individual must find his/her own path (rather than following a predetermined course) and that the discovery and following of the path can be enhanced by the insights of modern psychology. Thus, rather than presenting a single course for its members to follow, Cercle International offers a variety of techniques among which a member can pick and choose. The following of the spiritual path is placed within the overall acceptance of several ideals: chivalry, world peace, and the reduction of human suffering. Each member is encouraged to find the best way to bind these values into reality in his/her daily life.

The organization has several levels at which members may become involved. At the innermost level are several colleges, structures to focus research on the arcane sciences, the mundane sciences, and the creative sciences. There is also an inner Order of Sovereign Templar Initiates that focuses upon what are understood to be the traditional teachings of the Templars.

Cercle International is headed by the Grand Master, currently Fr. Raymond Bernard. There are national organizations in various countries and an English-speaking division, CIRCLES International, headquartered in Plainfield, Indiana.

Sources:

Bernard, Raymond. The Secret Houses of the Rose-Croix. London: Francis Bacon Lodge, 1981.

Ceremancy

Alternative term for ceroscopy, or divination through the shapes of molten wax dripped into water. (See also molybdomancy)

Ceremonial Magic

Ceremonial magic, also known as ritual magic, is a highly disciplined form of magic in which ceremony and ritual become the central tools used in the magical operation. As described in the older grimoires, the books that detail magical operations, ceremonial magic centers upon the art of the invocation (or evocation), and control of spirits. In its more contemporary versions, ceremonial magic concerns the discipline of the self and the art of controlling and directing personal and cosmic power, which may or may not be personified as a demonic or deific form.

In its pre-twentieth-century form, ceremonial magic's rites were religious actions, and the ritual format partook largely of the nature of religious observances. It was not, as generally supposed, a reversed Christianity or Judaism, though it departed radically from orthodox Christianity; nor did it partake of the profanation of religious ritual. It was in effect an attempt to derive power from God for the successful control of evil spirits. Even in the grimoires and keys of black magic, the operator was constantly reminded that he or she must meditate continually on the undertaking at hand and center every hope in the infinite goodness of the Great Adonai. The god invoked in black magic was not Satan but the Jehovah of the Jews and the Trinity of the Christians.

The foundation of practical magic was the belief in the power of divine words to compel the obedience of all spirits to those who could pronounce them. Such words and names were supposed to invoke or dismiss the denizens of the spirit world, and they, with suitable prayers, were used in all magical ceremonies. Again it was thought that it was easier to control evil spirits than to enlist the sympathies of angels.

He who would gain such power over demons was exhorted in the magical texts to observe continence and abstinence, to disrobe as seldom and sleep as little as possible during the period of preparation, to meditate continually on the magical work, and center all hopes on God. The fast should be most austere, and human society must be avoided as much as possible. The concluding days of the fast should be additionally strict—sustenance being reduced to bread (then a substantive food) and water. Daily ablutions in water, which had been previously exorcised according to the ritual, were necessary; these cleansings needed to be observed immediately before the ceremony.

Certain periods of the day and night, as found, for instance, in the book known as the Key of Solomon the King, were ruled by certain planets. The grimoires agreed that the hours of Saturn, Mars, and Venus were good for communion with spirits—the hour of Saturn for invoking souls in Hell, and the hour of Mars for invoking those who have been slain in battle. In fact these hours and seasons were ruled by the laws of astrology. In the preparation of the instruments employed, the ceremonies of purifying and consecrating were carefully observed. A brush, an aspergillum, was used to sprinkle a mixture of mint, marjoram, and rosemary. For fumigation, a chafing dish would be filled with freshly kindled coal and perfumed with aloe-wood or mace, benzoin, or storax. The experiment of holding converse with spirits, i.e., necromancy, was often made in the day and hour of Mercury, that is the first or eighth, or the fifteenth or twenty-second.

The Grand Grimoire notes that when the night of action has arrived, the operator shall take a rod, a goatskin, a blood-stone, two crowns of vervain, and two candlesticks with candles; also a new steel and two new flints, enough wood to make a fire, half a bottle of brandy, incense and camphor, and four nails from the coffin of a dead child. Either one or three persons must take part in the ceremony—one of whom only must address the spirit.

The Kabalistic circle is formed with strips of kid's skin fastened to the ground by the four nails. With the blood-stone a triangle is traced within the circle, beginning at the eastern point. The letters a e a j must be drawn in like manner, as also the name of the Savior between two crosses. The candles and vervain crowns are then set in the left and right sides of the triangle within the circle, and they with the brazier are set alight—the fire being fed with brandy and camphor. A prayer is then repeated. The operator must be careful to have no alloyed metal about him except a gold or silver coin wrapped in paper, which must be cast to the spirit when he appears outside the circle. The spirit is then conjured three times. Should the spirit fail to appear, the two ends of the magic rod must be plunged into the flames of the brazier. This ritual is known as the Rite of Lucifuge and is believed to invoke the demon Lucifuge Rofocale.

Modern Revival

Ceremonial magic declined in the eighteenth century and most of the ritual books became buried in libraries. The surviving knowledge was collected into a single volume by Francis Barrett in The Magus (1801). However, in the mid-ninteenth century, a revival of ceremonial magic began with the career and writings of Éliphas Lévi. Lévi not only made a new collection of magical knowledge, but, by drawing upon mesmerism, reworked it into a system more compatible with the scientific spirit of the age. He integrated divinatory work with the tarot into the new system, thus suppling enough information that readers who chose could begin to practice ceremonial magic once again.

Toward the end of the century, organizations based upon the practice of ceremonial magic began to appear, the most important being the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in England. Cofounder S. L. Mathers rediscovered many of the older grimoires, which he mined for material to include in the Golden Dawn teachings, and published several of them. His effort was followed by that of Aleister Crowley, who developed a more psychologically oriented magical system based upon the exercise of the will (thelema).

Through the twentieth century, ceremonial magic has spread through the West, though it has never been the most popular of activities due to its stringent requirements. Several groups, such as the Ordo Templi Orientis, have become international organizations.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: G. Redway, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Melton, J. Gordon, and Isotta Poggi. Magic, Witchcraft, and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Shah, Idries. The Secret Lore of Magic. London, 1957. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1957.

Waite, Arthur E. The Book of Black Magic and of Pacts. London: George Redway, 1898. Reprinted as The Book of Ceremonial Magic. London: William Rider & Sons, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961. Reprint, New York: Bell Publishing, 1969.

The Cereologist

British publication concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles. Address: Clements Farm, Wheatley, Bordon, Hants., GU35 9PA, England. Website: http://www.abel.net.uk/~sayer.

CERES See Circles Effect Research Unit, The

Cergy-Pontoise Hoax

The events that constitute what is now termed the Cergy-Pontoise Hoax began as report of a UFO abduction and climaxed with one of the spectators at the abduction channeling messages from the extraterrestrials whom he claimed were involved in the taking of his friend. On the morning of November 26, 1979, Jean-Pierre Prevost of the Paris suburb of Pontoise called the police to report that his friend Franck Fontaine had been abducted by aliens. According to the story, the pair, along with two other men, were preparing to drive to a nearby town to sell clothes at an open-air market. Fontaine, their driver, sat inside the car while the others went to gather their stock. A UFO appeared and Fontaine was taken from the car. As the men watched, it sped away in the sky. Fontaine reappeared a week later. He claimed to remember little of what had happened. He fell asleep at the wheel of the car and woke up in a cabbage field, unaware that a week had passed.

After Fontaine reappeared, the police investigation of the incident intensified and Groupe d'Etudes des Phénomènes Aérospatieux Non Indentifiés (GEPAN), France's main UFO investigation organization, joined the search for the truth. After interviewing the principals several times and looking for any collaborating evidence, GEPAN concluded that the incident was without any value in furthering knowledge of UFOs, a kind way of saying that they had concluded that it was a hoax.

As the story continued to unfold, flying saucer enthusiast Jimmy Guieu published a book-length account of the story entitled (in French) Contacts OVNI Cergy-Pontiose. Guieu, convinced of the truth of the story, contended that the target of the UFOs was not Fontaine, but Prevost, who had begun to channel messages from the abductor whom he referred to as intelligences from the beyond. Shortly thereafter Prevost published a book, The Great Contact, that centered upon the messages he had received, primarily from one Haurrio, about the deteriorating state of Earth life. He went on to found a publishing house and gather a following of people attracted to the message from outer space. This endeavor proved singularly unsuccessful. No group emerged and the publishing venture closed, leaving him with a heavy debt.

In 1983, Prevost finally confessed to the hoax. He confided to a French reporter that he had organized the event and hid Fontaine in a friend's apartment for the week of the supposed abduction. His motivation was the attempt to attract attention to his channeled messages and to assist in building a modern religion based on extraterrestrials.

Interestingly enough, Guieu refused to accept Prevost's story. He had come to know others who received messages from Haurrio. Possibly the most bizarre reaction to the confession came from ufologist Jacques Vallee who concluded, quite apart from any evidence suggestive of his belief, that the whole incident had been an operation by the intelligence community in an attempt to create a sect upon which various social science experiments could be conducted.

Sources:

Bonabot, Jacques. "1979 Fontaine Case Now Admitted to Be a Hoax." MUFON UFO Journal 190 (December 1983): 10.

Guieu, Jimmy, Frank Fontaine, Jean-Pierre Prevost, and Salomon N'Diaye. Contacts OVNI Cergy-Pontise. Monaco: Editions du Rocher, 1980.

Vallee, Jacques. Messengers of Deception: UFO Contacts and Cults. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1979.

———. Revelations: Alien Contact and Human Deception. New York: Ballantine Books, 1991.

Ceroscopy

System of divination by wax. Fine wax was melted in a brass vessel until it became a liquid of uniform consistency. It was then poured slowly into another vessel filled with cold water in such a way that the wax congealed in tiny disks upon the surface of the water. The magician then interpreted the wax figures.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. N.p., 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

CESNUR See Center for Studies on New Religions

Chagrin (or Cagrino)

An evil spirit believed in by European Gypsies. It was said to have the form of a hedgehog, to be yellow in color, and to be about a foot and a half in length. Heinrich von Wlislocki stated: "I am certain, that this creature is none other than the equally demoniac being called Harginn, still believed in by the inhabitants of Northwestern India. Horses were the special prey of the Chagrin, who rode them into a state of exhaustion, like the Guecubu of Chile."

When horses appeared to be sick and weary, with tangled manes and bathed in sweat, they were believed to have been attacked by chagrin during the night. When this was observed, they were tethered to a stake that had been rubbed with garlic juice, then a red thread was laid on the ground in the form of a cross, or else some of the hair of the animal was mixed with salt, meal, and the blood of a bat and cooked to bread, with which the hoof of the horse was smeared. The empty vessel containing the mixture was put in the trunk of a high tree while these words were uttered:

Tarry, pipkin, in this tree,
Till such time as full ye be.

Chain, Forming a

In Spiritualism, a popular practice entails the joining of hands of sitters around a table, whereby it is believed that a "magnetic" current is established and reinforced. Baron de Guldenstubbe gave the following directions for forming a chain: "In order to form a chain, the twelve persons each place their right hand on the table, and their left hand on that of their neighbor, thus making a circle round the table. Observe that the medium or mediums if there be more than one, are entirely isolated from those who form the chain."

Dr. Lapponi, in his Hypnotism and Spiritism (1906), gave an alternative account of the proper procedure for the forming a chain.

He [the medium] makes those present choose a table, which they may examine as much as they like, and may place in whatever part of the room they choose. He then invites some of the assistants to place their hands on the table in the following manner: The two thumbs of each person are to be touching each other, and each little finger is to be in communication with the little finger of the persons on either side. He himself completes the chain with his two hands.

The concept of forming a continuous circuit for the transmission of psychic force is also related to the procedures of mesmerism, in which the hands of all the sitter rest together on the edge of the table. (See also planetary chains; séance)

Chair Test

A parapsychology test in which a chair number is chosen randomly from a seating plan for a future meeting at which seats are not reserved or allocated to specific individuals. The person who is being tested attempts to describe the appearance, characteristics, or other details of the individual who will later attend the meeting and occupy the chair. The Dutch sensitive Gerard Croiset appears to have had remarkable success with this type of clairvoyant precognition, which also had been earlier demonstrated by the French psychic Pascal Forthuny.

Sources:

Pollack, Jack Harrison. Croiset the Clairvoyant. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1965.

Chakras

According to Theosophists, the sense organs of the etheric double that receive their name from their appearance, which resembles vortices. Altogether there are ten chakras (visible only to clairvoyants) but of these it is advisable to use only seven. They are situated not on the denser physical body, but opposite certain parts of it as follows: (1) the top of the head, (2) between the eyebrows, (3) the throat, (4) the heart, (5) the spleen (where vitality is drawn from the sun), (6) the solar plexus, and (7) the base of the spine. The remaining three chakras are situated in the lower part of the pelvis and normally are not used, but are brought into play only in black magic. It is by means of the chakras that the trained occultist can become acquainted with the astral world.

The Theosophical concept of chakras was adapted from the ancient Hindu understanding of kundalini, a cosmic energy believed to be latent in the human organism responsible for sexual activity and also conditions of higher consciousness. The Hindu mystics pictured kundalini as a coiled serpent situated at the base of the spine in the subtle body. When aroused by spiritual disciplines, which included breath control and meditation, the energy darted up the spine in any of three subtle channels, illuminating the seven major centers or chakras in the body. These centers have been tentatively identified with the major nervous plexi. The seventh chakra, known as the sahasrara or "Thousand Petalled Lotus," is located in the area of the crown of the head. Many Indian yogis have described blissful conditions of mystical consciousness resulting from the arousal of kundalini and its successful culmination in the sahasrara. This supreme experience is compared with the sexual embrace of the god Siva and his consort.

Today, the idea of chakras is somewhat universal in occult and New Age circles. There is some difference of opinion as to the actual nature of the chakras and the experiences associated with them but some uniformity as to their location. An early identification with the nervous plexi of the body was made by V. G. Rele in his book The Mysterious Kundalini: The Physical Basis of the "Kundali-Hatha-Yoga" According to our Present Knowledge of Western Anatomy and Physiology (1939).

For comparative Chinese mysticism and meditation techniques in relation to chakras, see the books of "Charles Luk" (pseudonym of K'uan yü Lu), notably The Secrets of Chinese Meditation (London, 1964).

Sources:

Avalon, Arthur. The Serpent Power. Madras: Ganesh, 1950. Reprint, New York: Dover Pubications, 1974.

Gopi Krishna. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1970.

Judith, Anodea. Wheels of Life: A User's Guide to the Chakra System. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.

Leadbeater, C. W. The Chakras. Wheaton, Iill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1972.

Rele, V. G. The Mysterious Kundalini: The Physical Basis of the "Kundali-Hatha-Yoga" According to our Present Knowledge of Western Anatomy and Physiology. Bombay: Taraporevala, 1939.

Chalcedony

A silica mineral related to quartz. Superstition credits chalcedony with magical and medicinal properties. It is a good specific against fantasy and illusions of evil spirits. It supposedly quickens the power of the body and renders its possessor fortunate in law. To achieve the latter effect, it is to be perforated and suspended by hairs from a donkey. The black variety is believed to prevent hoarseness and clear the voice.

Chamberlain, Houston Stewart (1855–1927)

British-born publicist for neopagan religion in Germany and precursor of Nazi racial theorists. Chamberlain was born at Sothsea, England, on September 9, 1855, the son of an admiral in the British navy. His mother died while he was still an infant, and he was raised by his grandmother and an aunt who lived in Versailles, France. In 1867 he returned to England to attend boarding school. He grew to adulthood with no true sense of his English identity, and in 1870 came under the influence of a German tutor who gave him both a love of Germany and an interest in botany. His father died in 1878, and with the financial independence it gave him he soon married a German woman and settled in Geneva to pursue studies at the university. He quickly finished his basic degree but took many years (because of recurring ill health) to finish his doctorate. During these years he also became an enthusiastic fan of the music of Richard Wagner.

In the 1890s Chamberlain combined his scientific background, which included a critique of Darwinian approaches to evolution, and his increasing mastery of Wagner's ideas into a comprehensive vision: he conceived the idea of producing an epic history of humanity. The result was his most famous and important book, Foundations of the 19th Century (1899). Lacking training in history, Chamberlain used artistic license to tell the story of human history in such a way as to substantiate two basic ideas: he argues that humanity is divided into various distinct races, each of which has its own physical structure and mental and moral capacity, and that history is best understood as the struggle between these different races.

Historical epochs were marked by the coming to the fore of a dominant racial type, according to Chamberlain, and modern European civilization was built on the Germanic or Teutonic race. As to the components of modern (i.e., nineteenth century) culture, he hypothesizes six major influences: Hellenic art and philosophy; Roman law and organization; the revelation of Christ; racial chaos in the wake of the fall of the Roman Empire; the negative and destructive influence of the Jews; and the creative and regenerative mission of the Teutonic (or Aryan) race. Chamberlain's anti-Semitism led him to reject the idea of the Jewish-born Messiah of Christianity and to propose an essentially Germanic religion deriving from the symbols of the Aryan race.

The mystical/occult underpinnings of Chamberlain's beliefs had a great influence on Hitler's Nazi faith. He wrote a number of other books, but none were as influential as Foundations of the 19th Century. He died at Beyreuth, Germany, on January 9, 1927.

Sources:

Field, Geoffrey G. Evangelist of Race: The Germanic Vision of Houston Stewart Chamberlain. New York: Columbia University Press, 1981.

Ravencroft, Trevor. The Spear of Destiny. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1973.

Sklar, Dusty. Gods and Beasts: The Nazis and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1977.

Williamson, Roger Andrew. "Houston Stewart Chamberlain: A Study of the Man and His Ideas, 1855–1927." Ph.D diss., University of California-Santa Barbara, 1973.

Chambers, Robert (1802–1871)

British writer and publisher who played no public part in Spiritualism but whose conversion and anonymous activity, especially his writing, were known to his contemporaries. For example, according to William Howitt, he contributed the description of a haunted house at Cheshunt in Mrs. Crowe's Night-Side of Nature (2 vols., 1848). It was this house that novelist Charles Dickens wanted to investigate. It was partly pulled down and altered at the time; he could not find it. Also, an article in Chambers' Journal, May 21, 1853, on the mediumship of Maria B. Hayden was understood to have been written by Robert Chambers.

Chambers gave an account of the séances of another American visitor, a Mrs. Roberts, concluding that it was difficult to formulate an opinion but that it seemed to him the phenomena appeared to be natural and the medium the victim of self-deception. A few weeks later, however, his opinion underwent a decided change. He obtained movements of the table and answers by it in his own family circle on matters known only to himself. He wrote: "I am satisfied, as before, that the phenomena are natural, but to take them in I think we shall have to widen somewhat our ideas as to the extent and character of what is natural." His 1859 pamphlet Testimony: Its Posture in the Scientific World examines the scientific idea of evidence with special relation to psychical phenomena. Chambers had many experiences with the famous medium D. D. Home, and he wrote both the anonymous preface to Home's Incidents in My Life and the appendix, "Connection of Mr. Home's Experiences with those of Former Times."

In 1860, in company with Robert Dale Owen, he sat with the Fox sisters in America. They suspended a dining table from a powerful steelyard balance. Under bright gas light and perfect control the table was made heavier and lighter on request, showing variation of weight between 60 and 164 pounds. He had puzzling experiences with Charles Foster, who produced inscriptions on his skin. Chambers sat with Judge Edmonds's daughter, Laura.

In February 1867 he wrote to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, "I have for many years, known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."

Chambers retained his interest in psychic phenomena until his death in 1871. A record of a séance written by him was published by Violet Tweedale, his granddaughter, in Mellow Sheaves. Extracts from further records as preserved by another granddaughter, Mrs. Edward Fitzgerald, were published by A. W. Trethewy in Light, January 6, 1933.

Chambers is best remembered today for his many books (on nonoccult themes), especially the many reference books he wrote, and his collections of Scottish poetry.

Sources:

Chambers, Robert. Testimony: Its Posture in the Scientific World. N.p., 1959.

Home, D. D. Incidents in My Life. First series. London: Green Longman, Roberts & Green, 1863. Second series. London: Whittingham & Wilkins, 1872.

Chams

A race of Indo-Chinese origin, numbering about 130,000, that settled in Annam, Siam; Cochin, China; and Cambodia. They had some reputation among the surrounding population as sorcerers, probably arising from the mythic influence of a conquered race. Their magicians claimed to be able to slay at a distance and to bring ruin and disease by the aid of magic formulas. Among the Cambodian Chams, sorcerers were detested by the common people, as they were believed to be the source of all the evil that befell them; the majority of them usually ended their days by secret assassinations.

Sorcerers were nearly always women. They entered the sisterhood by means of a secret initiation held in the forest at midnight. The woman who desired to become a sorceress sacrificed a cock on a nest of termites. The initiate cut the cock in two from the head to the tail and danced in front of it in the nude until, by force of her incantations, the two halves of the bird approached each other and became once more alive and started crowing again.

Sorceresses were said to be known by the tendency of their complexion to alter its hue and by their swollen and bloodshot eyes. They possessed numerous rites for gaining the favor of evil spirits, in which they implicitly believed. In building a house numerous propitiatory rites had to be observed, accompanied by invocation of the protecting deities. The Chams believed in lucky and unlucky days and were careful not to undertake anything of importance unless favored by benevolent omens.

The Chams also possessed many peculiar superstitions. They would not disturb grain that had been stored during the daytime, as they said it was then asleep; they waited until nightfall before gathering it. They also had many magic agricultural formulas, to ensure that harvests were worthy to be stored. The Brahmanic Chams believed that the souls of good men passed to the sun, those of women to the moon, and those of the coolie class into clouds, but these were only places of temporary stay until such time as all finally come to reside within the center of the earth. The belief in reincarnation was also highly popular.

Sources:

Aymonier, Etienne F. Les Tchames et leur Relìgions. Paris, 1891.

Chaton, Aymonier. Dictionnaire Cam-Française. Paris, 1906.

———. Nouvelles recherches sur les chams. Paris, 1901.

Chaney, William Henry (1821–1903)

Pioneer nineteenth-century American astrologer W. H. Chaney was born on January 13, 1821, in Chesterville, Maine. He was but nine when his father died and he left Maine when he was 16. He began a life of wandering that first led him to the sea. Nine months in the Navy drained him of visions of being a modern-day pirate, and he deserted and settled in Wheeling, West Virginia, where he studied law and eventually, in 1847, opened a legal practice. Little is known of his activity during the Civil War (1861–65), but in 1866 he was living in New York City and while there met Luke Broughton, the man largely responsible for the building of the astrological community in the United States.

Broughton introduced Chaney to astrology and led him in an intense study of the stars. Unfortunately, his new career ran into an immediate obstacle when in 1867 Chaney became a victim of an antiastrology crusade led by the New York Herald. He spent six months in jail and after his release, in 1869, he moved to the West Coast, where he resided for the next 17 years. After his move to California, his wife, who had remained in the East, obtained a divorce. In 1874 he married for what would be the fourth time, to Flora Wellman. As had his previous attempts at married life, this one would prove short-lived, but would have notable consequences. On January 12, 1876, his son Jack was born. After Chaney and Flora divorced, and Flora remarried, Jack would take the name of his stepfather and eventually grow up to write novels as Jack London.

Chaney continued to move about from town to town teaching astrology. By the end of the 1880s he had moved to St. Louis, Missouri, where he wrote and published a set of astrological texts including his most well-known, Chaney's Primer of Astrology and American Urania, published in 1890. He finally settled in Chicago, Illinois, and in 1897 married for the sixth and last time. He began a magazine which he named The Daisy-Chain, after his new bride.

Though he fell out with Broughton in his mature years, Chaney was his most famous and productive student and is remembered for helping create the profession of astrology on the West Coast and in the Midwest. He died in Chicago on January 6, 1903.

Sources:

Chaney, W. H. The Astrologer's Vade Macum. Baltimore: Eureka Publishing, [1902].

———. Chaney's Annual with the Magic Circle Astrological Almanac. St. Louis: Magic Circle Publishing, 1890.

———. Chaney's Primer of Astrology and American Urania. St. Louis: Magic Circle Publishing, 1890.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Chang, Garma Chen-Chi (1920–)

An authority on Buddhist philosophy, born in China and educated at Kong-ka Monastery, eastern Tibet. Chang came to the United States after World War II and was a research fellow at the Bollingen Foundation in New York from 1955 onward.

He wrote a number of books, including The Practice of Zen (1959), The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa (1962), and The Essential Teachings of the Tibetan Mysticism (1963). He also wrote an important review of the book The Third Eye (1958), by Lopsang Rampa, published in Tomorrow magazine as part of an exposé of the author. Chang showed that Rampa's knowledge of Buddhism and Tibetan occultism was "inaccurate and superficial" and characterized the book as "interesting and highly imaginative fiction." This review appeared alongside a second article, which noted that "Lopsang Rampa" had been born Cyril Henry Hoskins, son of a British plumber.

Sources:

Chang, Garma Chen-Chi. Esoteric Teachings of the Tibetan Tantra. Lausanne, Switzerland: Falcon's Wing Press, 1961.

———. Teachings of Tibetan Yoga. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

———. "Tibetan Phantasies." Tomorrow 6, 2 (Spring 1958): 13–16.

Chang, Garma Chen-Chi, ed. The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962. Reprint, Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1977.

Changelings

A manikin, or elf, secretly substituted for a young child. There are many tales of such occurrences in Scotland. The changeling grows up peevish and misshapen, always crying, and gives many proofs of its origin to those versed in such matters. There were many ways of getting rid of him, such as sticking a knife into him, making him sit on a gridiron with a fire below, dropping him into a river, and so on. The changeling sometimes gave himself away by reference to his age. (See also fairies)

Sources:

McNeil, F. Marion. The Silver Bough. Vol. 1, Scottish Folklore and Folk-Belief. Glasgow, Scotland: William Maclellan, 1957.

Channeling

A contemporary term for the earlier Spiritualist idea of mediumship, spirit entities conveying philosophical or spiritual advice or healing through mediums. Mediumship is generally thought of as the special activity of a few people who operate primarily to put people in contact with their dead friends and relatives. Channelers operate primarily to bring philosophical and theological teachings from a disembodied entity. Since the development of modern Spiritualism, mediums have also operated as channels and many channels also operate as mediums.

The channeling of philosophical teachings, especially on the nature of continued existence in the afterlife, began with Andrew Jackson Davis, who published a number of volumes of channeled material. Numerous platform mediums became known for their spirit discourses, which they would offer in place of lectures or Sunday sermons. Compiled into books, channeled material would often become the basis of new religious groups, one notable example being Oahspe: The New Age Bible (1881), channeled by John Ballou Newbrough and around which he organized the Faithist religion.

Through the twentieth century, other important channeled works such as Levi Dowling's The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus the Christ (1907) and James Edward Padgett's True Gospel Revealed Anew by Jesus have appeared in profusion. The channeled material of Grace Cooke became the basis of the White Eagle Lodge in Great Britain and those of Osker Ernest Bernhardt the basis of the Grail Movement in Austria.

A great deal of channeled material originates from ultraconservative Catholic sources as revelations from the Mother Mary. This phenomenon is known as apparitions of the Virgin Mary.

The term "channeling" as presently used seems to have arisen within the UFO contactee community, which found its focus around individuals who claimed to regularly channel material telepathically from the space brothers. In the 1950s Charles

Boyd Gentzel and Pauline Sharpe began their channeling activity, which still exists as Mark-Age, Inc. Violet Gilbert of the Cosmic Star Temple began her public work in 1960. Even earlier, flying saucer channel Dorothy Martin, better known by her spiritual name, Sister Thedra, became the subject of a classic sociological study, When Prophecy Fails.

The present popularity of channeling stems mainly from the activities of Jane Roberts (1929–1984), the channel for the entity "Seth" beginning in 1963. Roberts's first books, The Seth Material (1970) and Seth Speaks (1972), became best sellers, led to some 20 additional volumes, and gave channeling a popularity it had never previously experienced.

The Seth books expounded a coherent philosophy dealing comprehensively with alterations of consciousness, grades of reality, reincarnation, psychology, and a spiritual universe. Roberts also channeled communications claimed to be from psychologist William James and psychotherapist Carl G. Jung. Her first communications were by Ouija board, many were transcribed by her husband as she spoke them in trance, while others were recorded by automatic writing.

After the death of Jane Roberts in 1984, her husband Robert Butts edited new Seth manuscripts, which were published by Tam Mossman in his journal Metapsychology; The Journal of Discarnate Intelligence. Mossman himself also channels an entity named "James."

Other channelers appeared by the end of the decade, the most prominent through the 1980s being JZ Knight, who channels "Ramtha," and Jach Pursel, who channels "Lazaris." Channeling became an integral part of the New Age movement and numerous New Age channels arose. Included in their number are Ken Carey, Virginia Essene, Ruth Montgomery, and Penny Torres. Their number has continued to grow.

Also at the end of the eighties Janet McClure began to channel both spiritual and extraterrestrial information from her guides. Her Tibetan Foundation trained many others and a trend became established which continues to this day. With her boldness came a divergence from the traditional message of ageless spiritual wisdom. McClure's contactee messages center on our place in the universe, our origin as a planet whose life was seeded by other civilizations and our need to honor the Earth.

Actress Shirley MacLaine's several New Age books, especially Out on a Limb (1983), which was televised as a five-hour prime-time ABC mini-series in 1987, and Dancing in the Light (1985), further popularized the concept of spirit guides and underlined her spiritual odyssey and New Age beliefs. She also made special mention of JZ Knight. Knight began to channel "Ramtha" in the late 1980s. She now heads a school for the more serious students of "Ramtha's" gnostic teachings.

Alan Vaughan, who first became known as a writer on psychic topics, emerged as a channel in 1987. In a useful survey of the phenomenon in New Realities, he disclosed that he had commenced channeling in 1983. He had been teaching at a psychic seminar in Sedona, Arizona, and was asked by a couple if he could tell them something about their past lives. Although at the time he was editing Reincarnation Report, he was somewhat skeptical about past-life readings. He describes the incident:

"Suddenly a tremendous energy flooded over the top of my head. It was like watching a dream, as the Chinese entity Li Sung began to speak through me. He gave them [the couple] some detailed information about past lives and how they fit into their present life paths. The couple verified many specific details. For me, it was the beginning of an enlargement of consciousness."

Sixteen years earlier, Vaughan had been told by three British mediums that he would begin "channeling" the Chinese guide one day, but he was skeptical about the prospect of being invaded by some Chinese spirit. After the first channeling of "Li Sung," the Chinese guide continued to manifest and has offered treatment at healing sessions. Vaughan has now channeled "Li Sung" to thousands of people, including radio and television audiences.

Another well-known channeler is former insurance executive Jach Pursel. One day, while relaxing after a busy executive program, he went into the trance state in which he was first contacted by the entity "Lazaris." With the encouragement of his wife Penny, "Lazaris" began to manifest regularly to friends and small groups and gave both personal advice and philosophical teaching. Eventually Pursel gave up his business career and devoted himself full time to channeling "Lazaris."

Popular in the nineties are prolific channels named Neale Donald Walsch and Lee Carroll [Kryon] both of whom have a strong web presence. As the century drew to a close many channeled works made prophetic references to earth changes and ascension scenarios.

It has to be admitted that the names of spirit guides are often unconvincing and seem like parodies. In the heyday of nineteenth-century Spiritualism, Native American guides were more frequent, and even today such claimed personalities still appear to manifest, usually speaking in broken English but unable to communicate in Indian dialects. Other guides have represented themselves as famous characters in history, such as Socrates, Confucius, Abraham Lincoln, Shakespeare, St. John the Baptist, and even Jesus Christ or God. The communications channeled from such exalted guides were not always of the high intellectual or philosophical level that might be expected, and in many cases consisted merely of banal platitudes.

Many claimed entities of channeling may be regarded as fictional creations. The measure of their importance, at least to those who look to channeled entities as authorities, is whether they give information, insights, or philosophical teachings that are beyond the normal capacity of the channeler. For example, one of the spirit guides of the celebrated medium Eileen J. Garrett (1893–1970) was named "Uvani," a name that does not seem to belong to any known Oriental tradition of nomenclature, but the communications received through "Uvani" were of a highly evidential nature.

It may well be that in many cases a claimed spirit guide is merely a personification of an individual's unconscious or "higher self." In other cases, communications may emanate from an impersonal source of intelligence that establishes a channel by assuming a conventional personality.

Throughout history, popular religions have found it difficult to establish contact with a more austere impersonal deity, such as the concept of Brahman, the Infinite, in esoteric Hinduism, and have found it convenient to postulate a host of anthropomorphic gods and goddesses, which become a familiar focus for worshipers in societies based on interpersonal relationships. Religion requires the spiritualization of emotions, and it is difficult to attach emotions of love or veneration to an impersonal absolute. In Christianity, the concepts of God the Father and God the Son have provided a familiar and helpful focus for worshipers, while older religions have favored the concept of a Mother Goddess. Throughout India, millions of worshipers have found the gods and goddesses of their sect or tradition a personification of divinity.

Parapsychologists have found that the personalities of communicators channeling through mediums may be manufactured consciously, and that such fictional entities can produce paranormal phenomena, as in the famous case of "Philip." Such experiments have validated the concept that spirit guides may often (but not invariably) be an artificial creation of subconscious mentation by the psychic or the sitters. Sometimes spirit communications are a strange mixture of genuine and false information, perhaps influenced by the conscious memory of the channeler.

The reemergence of the concept of spirit guides in North America comes at a time when popular interest in traditional Spiritualism seems less widespread than in Britain. It may be that the new name "channeling" and its disassociation from the fraud associated with Spiritualism, provides an attractive image for a new generation of spiritual seekers.

Sources:

Anderson, Rodger I. "The automatic writings of Frances Bird: A review and a discussion of channeled Communications." The Journal of the American Society for Psychical research 85, no. 4 (October 1991).

Bjorling, Joel. Channeling: A Bibliographic Exploration. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Caddy, Eileen. The Spirit of Findhorn. New York: Harper & Row, 1976. Reprint, London: L. N. Fowler, 1977.

Carroll, Lee [Kryon]. Kryon: The End Times. Del Mar: Kryon Writings, 1992.

Channelings and Higher Realms. http://www.spiritweb.org/Spirit/channelings.html. April 10, 2000.

Channeling Links. http://www.wholeagain.com/channeling.html. April 10, 2000.

Decuypere, J.M.. "Channelling—Sick or scientific?." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 63, no. 3 (July 1999).

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life As a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. New York, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Hastings, Arthur. With the Tongues of Men and Angels: A Study of Channeling. Fort Worth: Holt, Reinhart & Winston. 1991.

Kardec, Allan. Spiritualist Philosophy; The Spirits' Book. London, 1893. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Kautz, William H., and Melanie Branon. Channeling: The Intuitive Connection. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.

Klimo, Jon. Channeling: Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources. Berkeley: North Atlantic Books, 1998.

MacLaine, Shirley. Dancing in the Light. New York: Bantam Books, 1986.

———. Out on a Limb. New York: Bantam Books, 1983. Reprint, London: Elm Tree Books; Hamish Hamilton, 1983.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly, eds. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Moses, William Stainton. Spirit Teachings, Through the Mediumship of William Stainton Moses. London, 1883. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Roberts, Estelle. Fifty Years a Medium. London, 1959. Reprint, New York: Avon, 1972. Reprint, London: Corgi, 1975.

Roberts, Jane. The Seth Material. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970.

———. Seth Speaks: The Eternal Validity of the Soul. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1972.

Silver Birch. More Philosophy of Silver Birch. Compiled by Tony Ortzen. London: Spiritualist Press, 1979.

Vaughn, Alan. "Channeling." New Realities 3, no. 3 (January/February 1987).

Vaughan, Alan, and Bobby L. Oller. Doorways to Higher Consciousness. Williamsburg, Va.: Celest. 1998.

Walsch, Neale Donald. Conversations with God, Vol 1. New York: Putnam's, 1996.

Westen, Robin. Channelers: A New Age Directory. New York: Perigee Books (Putnam), 1988.

What is Channeling and Prophecy? http://www.wholeagain.com/channelingfaq.html. April 10, 2000.

White, Ruth, and Mary Swainson. Gildas Communicates; The Story and the Scripts. London: Spearman, 1971.

White, Stewart Edward. The Betty Book. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1930.

White Eagle. The Path of the Soul: The Great Initiations of Every Man. Liss, U.K.: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1959.

World Channelers Directory. http://www.channeling.net/channelers/. April 10, 2000.

Chaomancy

A branch of aeromancy (divination through aerial phenomena such as thunder and lightning) concerned with divination from apparitions or visions in the air. For instance, the shapes of clouds and the occurrence of rare aerial phenomena such as comets were interpreted in chaomancy. (See also austromancy; meteormancy)

Chaos Magick

Chaos Magick developed in England in the 1960s as a new form of magical practice that at the time was dominated by the thelemic system as articulated by Aleister Crowley (1875–1947). Chaos magicians look to Austin Osman Spare (1886–1956) and his critique of traditional ritual magic as the forerunner of chaos magick and to Ray Shermin as the actual originator of chaos magical theory. Spare, an associate of Crowley, broke with the Order Templi Orientis that Crowley headed and developed a simple form of magical practice that, in his understanding, jettisoned much of the superfluous activity of ceremonial magic that prevented the practitioner from discovering his/her own power. Spare developed a very simple form of magic based upon the use of sigils.

Chaos magick is based on the understanding that order is a concept imposed upon the universe. Systems of order, be they religion or science, are attempts to control and subdue, and must find ways to dismiss what is not controllable or understood. Chaos magicians, drawing upon Eastern philosophical notions, posit the idea that the universe is one vast ever-changing whole transcending all categories and concepts. It can be intuited but not defined. Chaos is seen, not as the disorder that is opposed to order, but as the Order beyond understanding. As such, chaos is identical with the Hindu Brahman and the Taoist Way. Chaos theory also agrees with the belief articulated in the Upanishads that Atman, the inner essence of the individual, is identical with Brahman, and that enlightenment derives from the direct experience/knowledge of the truth of that identification.

Chaos magicians do not believe in gods or demons who have objective existence and consider the source of magical power to be found within the subconscious of the practitioner. Thus, basic exercises for the chaos magician attempt to place the magician in touch with his/her inner self rather than any outside power or entity. Ritual is used, but is considered drama that arouses the subconscious to a fever pitch prior to the discharge of the power. Ritual should be designed by the magician using images that are most provocative. Such images are rarely found in traditional mythology; rather they are more likely to come from popular culture.

Chaos magicians began to associate informally in the 1960s in what was described as the "Circle of Chaos." A more formal organization, the Initiates of Thanateros (IOT), was created in 1977. Early experiments in rituals were produced by Ray Sherwin, and published as the Book of Results and the Theatre of Magick. These were followed in the later 1980s by the more popular work of Peter J. Carroll whose Liber Null contains the rituals of the IOT. Carroll also put together a training manual covering the theory and practice of chaos magick, Psychonaut. The IOT may be contacted at BM Sorcery, London WC1N 3XX, United Kingdom. Its webpage is at http://www.chaosmagick.org.

Sources:

Carroll, Peter J. Liber Null & Psychonaut. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1987.

Savage, Adrian. An Introduction to Chaos Magick. New York: Magickal Childe, 1988.

Chaos: The Review of the Damned

A publication devoted to detailed references connected with Forteana, the unexplained anomalous natural phenomena studied by Charles Fort, author of The Book of the Damned (1919). The "damned" were the data rejected or explained away by orthodox science, including strange falls from the sky, mysterious appearances and disappearances, unusual synchronicities, enigmatic artifacts, and astronomical ambiguities. Chaos explored the background detail of Fort's references and supplements them by additional in-depth material. Last known address: Res Bureaux, Box 1598, Kingston, Ontario K7L 5C8, Canada.

Charcot, Jean Martin (1825–1893)

French physician who studied hypnotism in relation to hysteria. Born November 29, 1825, in Paris, Charcot became a doctor of medicine and was later appointed physician at the Central Hospital Bureau, Paris. In 1860 he became a professor of pathological anatomy in the medical faculty, and two years later he became closely associated with the development of the Saltpêtrière, the great neurological clinic of Paris.

Charcot was responsible for notable researches in the fields of muscular disease and mental disturbance. His work, together with that of his student Pierre Janet, the director of the psychological laboratory of the Saltpêtrière from 1889 to 1898, marked the beginning of serious medical and scientific study of the phenomena of hypnotism (in contrast to the earlier studies of mesmerism, which had occult connotations). Their research forced the French Academy of Sciences to accept hypnosis as a new therapeutic instrument.

Among Charcot's most famous students was Sigmund Freud. Charcot died August 16, 1893.

Sources:

Charcot, Jean Martin. Les demoniaques dans l'art. Paris, 1887. Reprint, Amsterdam: B. M. Israel, 1972.

———. Lectures on the Diseases of the Nervous System. London, 1881. Reprint, New York: Hafner, 1962.

Didi-Huberman, Georges, and J. M. Charcot. Invention de l'hysterie: Charcot et l'iconographia photographiqe de la Salpetriere. Paris: Macula, 1982.

Chari, C(adambur) T(iruvenkatachari) K(rishnama) (1909–   )

Professor and chairman of the Department of Philosophy and Psychology at Madras Christian College in India. Chari was born June 5, 1909, in Trivellore, India, and received both his M.A. (1932) and Ph.D. (1953) degrees from Madras University. He served as lecturer in philosophy at American College, Madurai (1933–40), and as assistant professor (1940–56) and associate professor (1956–58) at Madras Christian College before becoming chairman of the Department of Philosophy and Psychology in 1958. He was also a consulting editor of the Indian Journal of Psychology.

Chari became interested in psychical research as a teenager when he read the works of Stainton Moses. A Christian, he was also somewhat critical of yoga and the belief in reincarnation and emerged as a critic of the research of Ian Stevenson. Over the years he published numerous articles on the wide range of subjects covered by parapsychology from a philosophical perspective. In 1958 he became a corresponding member of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He also edited the volume Essays in Philosophy Presented to Dr. T. M. P. Mahadevan in 1963.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Chari, C. T. K. "The Challenge of Psi; New Horizons of Scientific Research." Journal of Parapsychology 38 (1974).

"An Evaluation of Some Field-Theoretical Approaches to Psi." Psychocosmos 1 (1970).

———. "A Postscript to 'Quantum Physics and Parapsychology.' " Journal of Parapsychology 21 (1957).

———. "Regurgitation, Mediumship, and Yoga." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 47 (1973): 156.

———. "Some Generalized Theories and Models of PSI: A Critical Evaluation." In Handbook of Parapsychology. Edited by B. Wolman. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1977.

Charing Cross Spirit Circle

The first Spiritualist organization in London, established in January 1857. It was later superseded by the London Spiritualist Union, but difficulties arose centering on the activities of a medium named Jones, whose followers broke away to form a new group, the Circle of Spheral Harmony.

Chariots of the Gods

English title of a book by Erich von Däniken, published in 1968, that first posed the question, Was God an astronaut? and suggested that religions originated from race memories and legends of astronauts visiting the earth 40,000 years ago. Von Däniken had been given the idea of ancient astronauts from his reading of Jacque Bergier's and Louis Pauwel's The Morning of the Magicians (1960) and Robert Charroux's One Hundred Thousand Years of Man's Unknown History (1963) and had subsequently traveled to North Africa and the Americas to explore some of the archaeological sites. Chariots of the Gods? became a best-seller and popularized ancient astronaut ideas that had been surfacing in UFO litertaure for some fifteen years. Von Däniken and other writers produced a host of books on the theme over the next decade. In response, numerous books critical of these theories were published complaining of such a naive approach to both theology and archaeology. That criticism eventually led to the decline of a popular audience for ancient astronaut ideas, but not before an Ancient Astronaut Society had been formed and a cadre of followers organized. The writings of Ronald Story and Clifford Wilson make a case against von Däniken's theories.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Story, Ronald. The Space Gods Revealed: A Close Look at Erich von Däniken. New York: Harper and Row, 1976.

Von Däniken, Erich. Chariots of the Gods?: Unsolved Mysteries of the Past. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1960.

Wilson, Clifford. Crash Go the Chariots: An Alternative to "Chariots of the God." New York: Lancer Books, 1972.

Charismatic Movement

An interdenominational Christian renewal movement that began in the 1960s and has developed an international following, especially among members of the Roman Catholic church. It takes its name from the Greek word charisma, meaning "gifts," and emphasizes manifestations of the gifts of the Holy Spirit as described in First Corinthians, chapter 12, as a sign of the presence of the Holy Spirit. The movement began among members of the Full Gospel Businessman's Fellowship, an independent Pentecostal brotherhood, but quickly spread to Roman Catholic and mainline Protestant churches throughout the United States. There was controversy over whether its elements were based on genuine expressions of worship or impassioned outbursts of emotion. For a time, charismatic preachers were labeled as charlatans, and worshippers displaying charismatic expressions were ridiculed and dismissed as ignorant or unbalanced. By the early 1970s it had spread to Europe and gained important support from Belgian Cardinal Suenans.

The movement has been characterized by its acceptance of the importance of speaking in tongues (also known as glosso- lalia), divine healing and prophecies as part of the grace of the power of the Holy Spirit; most meetings are for prayer and spirited singing and shouting; anointing the sick with oil is also often part of worship service. It has become a meeting ground between followers of the older Pentecostalism and people who manifest the gifts but are members of older denominations. As the movement matured through the 1980s, a number of new denominations evolved from it.

In time most evangelicals came to accept the charismatic movement and many of its practices. It is no longer unusual to see charismatics of many faiths—Baptists, Catholics, Episcopalians, Lutherans—as well as non-denominationalists, raising their hands and arms in prayer, and singing, dancing, and shouting in the Spirit.

Sources:

Ford, J. Massyngberde. The Pentecostal Experience. Paramus, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1970.

Grimes, Ronald L., Bill J. Leonard, Anne E. Patrick, and Wade Clark Roof. Religion and American Culture. 9, no. 2. (June 22, 1999): p. 131.

Manuel, David. Like a Mighty River. Orleans, Mass.: Rock Harbor Press, 1977.

Poloma, Margaret M. The Charismatic Movement: Is There a New Pentecost? Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1982.

Quebedeaux, Richard. The New Charismatics: The Origins, Development and Significance of Neo-Pentecostalism. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1976.

Ranaghan, Kevin, and Dorothy Ranaghan. Catholic Pentecostals. New York: Paulist Press, 1969.

Robey, Steve and Steve Rabey. Revival in Brownsville : Pensacola, Pentecostalism, and the Power of American Revivalism. Nashville, Tenn.: Thomas Nelson, 1999.

Samarin, William J. Tongues of Men and Angels. New York: Macmillan, 1972.

Williams, J. Rodman. "Should We All Speak in Tongues?" Christianity Today (March 6, 2000): 84.

Woodworth-Etter, Maria Beulah. The Holy Spirit. Whitaker House, 1998.

Charlemagne (or Charles the Great) (742–814)

The greatest of the Frankish kings. Charlemagne was the elder son of Pepin the Short and succeeded his father in 768–814 C.E. He was Emperor of the West, 800–814 C.E. He had a close connection with the supernatural according to legend. Very often in the pages of French romance, the emperor was visited by angels who were considered to be the direct messengers of the heavenly power.

These visitations, of course, were meant to symbolize his position as the head of Christendom in the world. He was its upholder, with the Moors on his southern borders and the pagans (Prussians and Saxons) to the north and west. Charles was regarded by the Christians of Europe as the direct representative of heaven, whose mission it was to Christianize Europe and to defend its true faith in every way. Charlemagne and his court were also connected with the realm of fairies. Encounters with the fairy folk by his paladins were not so numerous in the original French romances that deal with his court, but in the hands of Boiardo, Ariosto, and Pulci, the paladins dwelled in an enchanted region where at any moment they might have met with all kinds of supernatural beings.

Both in the early and late romances the powers of magic and enchantment are ever present, chiefly instanced in magical weapons such as the Sword Durandal of Roland, which cannot be shivered; the magic ointments of giants like Ferragus, which when applied provide invulnerablity; and armor that exercises a similar guardianship on the body of its possessor. Heroes like Ogier the Dane penetrated into fairyland itself and wedded its queens. This union with fairyland was the fate of a great many medieval heroes. The analogous cases of Tom-a-Lincolne, Tannhäuser, and Thomas the Rhymer are also relevant. The magic and the marvels are everywhere in use in the romances that deal with Charlemagne.

He died on January 28, 814 C.E. and was buried in Aachen.

Sources:

Cabaniss, Allen. Charlemagne. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1972.

Easton, Steward C. The Era of Charlemagne. New York: Van Nostrand, 1961.

Shepard, Les. The History of Street Literature. Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1973.

Charm (Carmen)

A magical formula, sung or recited to bring about a supposedly beneficial result as part of a spell, or to confer magical efficacy on an amulet. In popular usage the same word is employed to designate the incantation and the object that is charmed.

Sources:

A Gypsy Queen. Zingara Fortune Teller. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1901.

Lippman, Deborah, and Paul Colin. How to Make Amulets, Charms, & Talismans. New York: M. Evans, 1974.

Sepharial [Walter Gorn Old]. The Book of Charms and Talismans. New York: Arc Books, 1969.

Charnock, Thomas (1526–1581)

English alchemist born in the Isle of Thanet, Kent. As a young man Charnock traveled all over England in search of alchemistic knowledge, but eventually he fixed his residence at Oxford, and there he made the acquaintance of a noted scientist. The scientist was impressed with the youth's cleverness and appointed him his confidant and assistant. After working in this capacity for a number of years, Charnock found himself the sole legatee of his patron's paraphernalia and likewise of the various secrets written in his notebooks.

Armed with this knowledge, he proceeded to devote himself more eagerly than ever to the quest of gold production, but in 1555, just as he imagined himself on the verge of triumph, there was a sudden explosion in his laboratory.

In 1557, when he again thought that success was imminent, the press-gang arrived at his house to recruit him by force into the English army to fight the French. The alchemist was bitterly chagrined on being kidnaped in this way; he set about to destroy all his equipments so no one would lay claim to his secrets.

He subsequently proceeded to France as a soldier and took part in the disastrous campaign that culminated in the English being defeated at Calais by the Duc de Guise.

How Charnock fared during the expedition is not known, but he returned to England safely, and in 1562 he married Agnes Norton. Thereafter, he settled at Stockland, in the county of Somerset, and continued to pursue scientific researches. Neither the military nor the church disturbed his pursuits from that point forward.

The antiquarian and historian Anthony Wood, in his Athen Oxoniensis, credited Charnock with a considerable amount of writing, and it is possible that several items enumerated are in reality from some other pen than the alchemist's. However, there are certain books he undoubtedly wrote, notably Aenigma ad Alchimiam (1572) and Breviary of Natural Philosophy (1557). Breviary was subsequently reprinted in the Theatrum Chemicum of Elias Ashmole.

Chartres Cathedral

A superb example of twelfth- to thirteenth-century Gothic architecture, believed by some occultists to enshrine ancient mysteries of religious inspiration. For example, in his book The Mysteries of Chartres Cathedral (1972), Louis Charpentier claims that the cathedral is built on the site of powerful and ancient earth currents. He examines the mystery of the amazing architecture of the cathedral, its historic connection with the Knights Templar, and its symbolic and esoteric meanings.

Sources:

Charpentier, Louis. The Mysteries of Chartres Cathedral. London: Research into Lost Knowledge Organization, 1972. Reprint, New York: Avon, 1972.

Chase, Warren (1813–1891)

One of the first apostles of Spiritualism in America. Born in Pittsfield, New Hampshire, Chase began to study mesmerism in Southport, Wisconsin, by 1843. He was street commissioner and road master at the time, and discussed both this subject and Charles Fourier's scheme of socialism in the local lyceum through that winter. The result was a socialist settlement in May 1844 in Fond-du-Lac County. The Wisconsin Phalanx, as the community was known, lasted for six years. It was the only one of the experiments that yielded, at the time of dissolution, substantial profit to its members. After the dissolution Chase began to take a more active part in politics, became a senator in Wisconsin in 1848, and was nominated for governor the following year.

The philosophy of Andrew Jackson Davis made a deep impression on him, and when the Spiritualist movement was born, he became its untiring apostle for over thirty years. His Spiritualist experiences are embodied in his Forty Years on the Spiritual Rostrum (1888) and his socialist activities in The Life Line of the Lone One, an Autobiography of the World's Child (1857).

Sources:

Chase, Warren. Forty Years on the Spiritual Rostrum. Boston, 1888.

———. The Life Line of the Lone One, an Autobiography of the World's Child. Boston: B. Marsh, 1857.

Noyes, John Humphrey. Strange Cults & Utopias of 19th Century America. 1870. Reprinted as History of American Socialisms. New York: Dover Publications, 1966.

Chauvin, Rémy (1913–)

Director of the Experimental Ethology Laboratory at Bures sur Yvette, France, and noted behaviorist and entomologist. Chauvin was born October 10, 1913, in Toulon, France, and earned a doctorate in 1941 from the Sorbonne. He became the research director of the French Agronomical Research Institute in 1946; two years later he was appointed director of the Experimental Ethology Laboratory. In 1954 he assumed duties as coeditor of the Journal of Insect Physiology. He was named a laureate of the French Academy of Science.

Chauvin wrote on a wide variety of parapsychological subjects but was especially interested in ESP in relation to animals. He wrote many articles that were published under a pseudonym.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Duvall, Piere [Rémy Chauvin], and E. Montredon [Jean Mayer]. "A PK Experiment with Mice." Journal of Papapsychology 32 (1968): 153.

———. "Further Psi Experiments with Mice." Journal of Parapsychology 32 (1968): 260.

Cheiro (Count Louis Hamon) (1866–1936)

Palmist and astrologer, Cheiro was born Louis Hamon on November 1, 1866, in Dublin, Ireland, the son of Count William de Hamon, whose title he eventually inherited. He was educated privately and from his mother inherited an interest in the occult, especially palmistry, astrology, and numerology. At the early age of 11, much to his father's consternation, he wrote an essay on palmistry. He studied for the ministry but did not complete his academic work because of his father's bankruptcy.

As a young man he travel to India. He met a group of occultists and stayed with them for several years, during which time he did his own research on palmistry. He later moved to Egypt before he settled in England and opened an office as a palmist. To avoid any problems with his family, he worked under his pseudonym.

By the 1890s Cheiro had gained an international reputation, his own background granting him entrance into the world of royalty, many of whom were interested in the occult. In 1893 he traveled to the United States for the first of a number of visits. The following year he wrote the first of his many books, Cheiro's Language of the Hand. This book, and its equally popular sequel, Cheiro's Guide to the Hand (1900), were primary elements in the reestablishment of palmistry as a popular form of fortune-telling in the modern world. Celebrities of all kinds were his clients.

In the late 1920s, Cheiro wrote several books on astrological predictions of world events. However, he spent the last part of his life poverty-stricken in Hollywood, California, where he died on October 8, 1936.

Sources:

Cheiro [Count Louis Hamon]. Cheiro's Guide to the Hand. London: Nichols & Co., 1900.

———. Cheiro's Language of the Hand. London, 1894.

———. Cheiro's Year Book. Rev. ed., London: London Publishing, 1930.

———. Mysteries and Romances of the World's Greatest Occultists. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1935.

———. You and Your Hand. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1931.

———. You and Your Star. Los Angeles: London Publishing; London: Herbert Jenkins, 1926.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Cheirological Society of Great Britain (Dukes)

The original Cheirological Society of Great Britain, the most prominent British organization promoting the art of palmistry, was founded in 1889 by Katherine St. Hill and continued to be active through the early decades of the twentieth century. The society began to lose strength during the 1930s and appears to have dissolved by the end of the decade. In the decades after World War II (1939–45), its place was taken by the Society for the Study of Physiological Patterns. In the 1970s, a new Cheirological Society of Great Britain emerged around the person of Terence Dukes. Dukes is the author of Chinese Hand Analysis (1987), a popular textbook on palmistry.

The society has prepared a course of study for palmists and offers classes to students who reside in the London area. The introductory class lasts for six to ten weeks. Nonresident students may work with a personal tutor via correspondence. Those who complete the several phases of the course of study may be awarded a Foundation, Intermediate, or Advanced diploma as appropriate.

According to Dukes, during the St. Hill era—although she and the other leaders of the society concentrated on Western palmistry techniques—they also initiated the study of Eastern techniques, beginning with their meeting and conversations with two Chinese diplomats, Li Wen Tien and Li Tsu Cheng, who were working out of the Chinese embassy in London. Additional Chinese teachings were introduced through the Theosophical Society and by students who had resided in China while working in the tea business. These Chinese teachings have been restated by Dukes in Chinese Hand Analysis, which is now the fundamental text of the society.

The position assumed by Dukes concerning the history of the society and of its appropriation of Chinese hand reading techniques have been challenged by Andrew Fitzherbert, the noted historian of palmistry. He suggests that Dukes has been unable to establish any organizational continuity between the society he heads and the St. Hill organization. He has also charged that Dukes has deliberately falsified much of the account of his own appropriation of the Chinese hand reading tradition, including his use of a photo of an unidentified Chinese individual found in a collection of photos at the Smithsonian Institute as the Master Ching Kang Szu, the head of the Wu Hsing (Five Elements) method of hand reading which Dukes advocates. Fitzherbert also notes that Dukes' teachings are unlike those found in other books of Chinese palmistry; rather they appear to draw heavily from the ideas of several Western texts, especially Fred Gettings' 1965 publication The Book of the Hand.

The Cheirological Society may be contacted through its library at 29 London Rd., East Dereham, Norfolk, NR19 1AS, United Kingdom. It has a website at http://x-stream.fortunecity.com/melrose/102/. It is affiliated with a set of related structures, including the General Council and Register of Cheirology (which regulates awards and licenses in cheirology), the Society of Hand Analysts, the British College of Cheirology, and the Faculty of Cheirological Practitioners.

Sources:

Campbell, Edward D. The Encyclopedia of Palmistry. New York: Perigee, 1996.

Dukers, Terence. Chinese Hand Analysis. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1987.

Fitzherbert, Andrew. "Terry Dukes and the Cheirological Society." http://www.angelfire.com/mt/terrydupes/cha.htm. May 26, 2000.

Chelidonius

A stone taken out of a swallow, said to be good against melancholy and periodical disorder. It was placed in a yellow linen cloth and tied about the neck to cure fever. Stones are sometimes found in birds and other mammals, especially in ducts and hollow organs; they are usually pathological concretions known as calculi.

Chemical Phenomena (in Séances)

Psychic phenomena of a chemical nature have often been reported to occur in séance rooms. Psychic light is one of the strangest chemical manifestations as it is cold, and its production defies human ingenuity.

Some alleged examples of chemical phenomena include: instances where blood was drawn without a break in the skin; during materialization, ozone and phosphorus were often smelled and fully materialized phantoms exhaled carbon dioxide; a lead whistle often melted during sittings with Frau Silbert; phantoms dissolved into a cloud of smoke or black vapor in the house of Charles L. Tweedale; Admiral Moore's ink in his bottle was changed to dirty water in a séance with the Bangs sisters; and in a sitting with David Duguid the color of a glass of water changed to the hue of wine and tasted as bitter as gall.

The book Supramundane Facts in The Life of The Rev. J. Babcock Ferguson (1865), edited by T. Nichols, states that the little daughter of J. B. Ferguson, under a strange spell, ordered a clean tea cup and a silver spoon. She commenced stirring the spoon in the empty cup and subjected it, after a time, to the observation of each person present. Then, returning to the center of the room in about five minutes, she presented the cup with over a teaspoonful of dark and odorous ointment with which she anointed the face of a gentleman of the house. He was suffering from neuralgia and professed to have received immediate relief.

Tosie Osanami, a Japanese medium who died in 1907, was famous for similar medical miracles. According to a statement by Wasaburo Asano, a Japanese researcher, quoted by Harry Price in Psychic Research (a journal of the American Society for Psychical Research) in 1928, she produced liquid medicine within empty glass bottles:

"Her patients would come and ask for medicine and present their own bottles. These bottles she would place in front of her family shrine. She would then kneel down before it and offer up prayers according to the Shinto rites for about ten minutes. When the prayers were ended the patients would see the bottles spontaneously fill with liquids of different colors according to the nature of the malady. Red, blue and orange were the most usual colors of these medicinal apports. . . . Accused of being a swindler, she was tried in the District Court of Kobe. In court, however, before the judge and jury she succeeded in producing a brown liquid in an empty bottle that had been sealed previously by the court. Speechless with astonishment, the court acquitted her."

In the case of Mary Jobson, water sprang up unaccountably through the floor and was sprinkled in the room. Previously a voice was heard calling upon the angels to perform the demonstration.

